

KALHANA'S RĀJATARAṄGINĪ,

A CHRONICLE OF THE KINGS OF KAŚMĪR.

TRANSLATED, WITH AN INTRODUCTION, COMMENTARY, AND APPENDICES,

M. A. STEIN.

VOL. I.

INTRODUCTION. BOOKS I.—VII.

WESTMINSTER:

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE AND COMPANY, LTD.

M.D.CCCC.

TO THE MEMORY OF
GEORGE BÜHLER.

PREFACE.

It was in the summer of 1888, on my first visit to Kāśmīr, that I was attracted to the task which the present work is intended to complete.

Amidst the ancient remains and traditions which the Valley has preserved in such abundance, I could not fail to become impressed with the importance of KALHAṆA'S Chronicle, our oldest and fullest record of Kāśmīr history. I realized that in order to render its contents fully accessible for research it was necessary, on the one hand, to obtain a critically correct text, and on the other, to collect for its elucidation whatever data a close study of the country and its old remains could furnish.

My subsequent visits to Kāśmīr offered valuable opportunities in both directions. In 1889 I succeeded in securing the codex archetypes of all extant manuscripts of the Rājatarāṅgīnī, and with its help I was able to publish in 1892 my critical edition of the text of the Chronicle. In its preface I expressed my intention of embodying the materials I had collected for the interpretation of the work in the form of a commentary to be published as a second volume.

Heavy official labours and another literary duty did not allow me to approach this portion of my task until the summer of 1895, when an arrangement between the Kāśmīr Darbar and the Panjab University, adopted on the recommendation of the Tenth International Congress of Orientalists, secured to me the necessary facilities. Availing myself of the two months' periods of 'special duty' granted to me in extension of the summer vacations of 1895, 1896, and 1898, I was able to expand the plan of my labours and ultimately to complete the present annotated translation of the Chronicle which, together with its Introduction and various Appendices, is now offered in place of the commentary originally contemplated.

The detailed analysis of the RĀJATARĀṅGĪNĪ contained in the initial chapters of my Introduction will explain the reasons which make the Rājatarāṅgīnī so important for the study of ancient Kāśmīr and for Indian historical research generally. This importance and the exceptional interest which attaches to Kalhaṇa's "River of Kings" as practically the sole extant product of Sanskrit literature possessing the character of a true Chronicle, account for the efforts which have been directed towards the elucidation of the work ever since European scholarship became aware of its existence. A brief review of these earlier efforts will help to indicate more clearly the object of the present publication and the nature of the labours it has involved.

As early as the seventeenth century Dr. BERNIER, to whose visit to Kashmir in the summer of 1664 we owe the first European account of the Valley, and one as accurate as it is attractive, had turned his attention to the 'histories of the ancient Kings of Kachemire.' The Chronicle, of which he possessed a copy, and of which, as he tells us, he was preparing a French translation, was, however, not Kalhana's work, but a Persian compilation, by Haidar Malik, Cadura, prepared in Jahāngir's time avowedly with the help of the Rājatarāngini.¹ Also the summary of Kashmir rulers which Father TIEFFENTHALER a century later reproduced in his "Description de l'Inde," was still derived from that abridged rendering.²

Even before, however, the work of the Tyrolean missionary appeared in print, Mr. Gladwin had published his translation of the Alim-i Akbari of Abul-Fazl, and as the latter distinctly quotes Kalhana's Chronicle as the authority for his own abstract of early Kashmir history, the Sanskrit original could no longer escape attention. We accordingly find the "history of India from the Sanskrit (Kashmir authorities)" prominently included among the tasks which Sir WILLIAM JONES had contemplated.³ The life of the pioneer of European Sanskrit studies was cut short before he could obtain access to these authorities. It was not until the year 1805 that Mr. COLERUOKE secured in Calcutta an incomplete copy of Kalhana's work, and even then twenty more years passed before his intention of giving an account of its contents was realized.

To Dr. HORACE HAYMAN WILSON's justly famous "Essay on the Hindu History of Cutch" belongs the merit of having first acquainted European students with the general character of Kalhana's work and of having furnished them with a critical abstract of the contents of its first six cantos.⁴ The sound judgment and thoroughness displayed in this publication of the distinguished Sanskrit scholar deserve all the more credit, as the three incomplete Devanāgarī manuscripts at his disposal were so defective "that a close translation of them, if desirable, would have been impracticable." This serious difficulty accounts for

¹ See BERNIER, Travels, ed. A. Constatle, p. 394. The translation on which Bernier seems to have been actually engaged for a time has never been published. Is it possible that it still lies with other papers of that learned and most observant traveller in one of the archives of his native country, where he spent so many years after his return from the Great Moghul's Court?

² See Description de l'Inde, i. p. 402.

³ Asiatic Researches, i. p. 421.

⁴ Published in 1825, in Vol. xv. of the Asiatic Researches, Calcutta.

most of the mistakes which Professor Wilson's article undoubtedly contains, and which in some instances have been reproduced also in subsequent accounts of Kāśmīrian history.^a

Even before Professor Wilson's Essay was published Mr. Moorcroft, the traveller, had made a successful endeavour in Kāśmīr itself to obtain better textual materials. During his sojourn in S'rinagar, in 1823, he had a Devanāgarī transcript prepared from an old S'aradā manuscript which, as I have shown elsewhere, was no other than the codex archetypus of all extant Kāśmīrian manuscripts. Nevertheless, the editio princeps of the Rājataranginī, which appeared in 1835 under the auspices of the Asiatic Society, Bengal, and which was mainly based on Mr. Moorcroft's transcript, failed to furnish a critically reliable text of the Chronicle. The corruptions of all kinds which appear through the whole of the Calcutta edition, and which render its text wholly unintelligible in many passages, can easily be traced to two main causes. The numerous mistakes plainly due to faulty transcription from S'aradā into Devanāgarī characters show that Mr. Moorcroft's copy shared the usual defects of all Devanāgarī manuscripts prepared in Kāśmīr. But it is equally evident also that the Calcutta Paṇḍits, unable to follow in many places the details of Kalhaṇa's narrative owing to want of familiarity with the topography, traditions, and other local lore of Kāśmīr, had frequently altered the text in an unscrupulous manner.

In 1840 Mr. A. TROYER, who, while Principal of the Calcutta Sanskrit College had occasion to become acquainted with the labours preceding the issue of the editio princeps, began the publication of a new edition of the text and of a French translation under the auspices of the Société Asiatique at Paris. This edition was prepared practically from the same materials as those used at Calcutta, and was not carried beyond the first six Books. His translation, however, accompanied by elaborate historical and geographical dissertations, was completed in 1852.

It is unnecessary to discuss at length the grave defects which characterize this, the main portion, of Mr. Troyer's work; for they have long ago been recognized by all qualified Sanskritists. Though the patient industry and perseverance of the aged scholar may justly claim our admiration, we must acknowledge with Professor Bühler, the most competent and fairest of judges, that Mr. Troyer who "has seldom been able to make out the meaning of the text except where Kalhaṇa uses the simplest, plainest language," had undertaken a task very much beyond his strength.^b The most striking of the translator's shortcomings directly result from a want of proper preparation, easily intelligible in view of the peculiar circumstances connected with Mr. Troyer's personal career and his literary labours.¹ But his failure is largely due also to the insufficiency of the materials then available to European scholars. This observation applies with particular force to the materials required for the proper comprehension of all those points in Kalhana's narrative which are connected with the history, topography, economic conditions and other local features of Kaśmīr.

^a See BÜHLER, Report, p. 55.

See BÜHLER, Report, p. 55.

The difficulty in dealing with these points without the materials which only local research could furnish, is illustrated by the results of the labours which two Indologists of the first rank bestowed upon the Kaśmīr Chronicle soon after the Valley became fully accessible to Europeans. General (then Captain) A. CUNNINGHAM, whom political duty had brought to Kaśmīr after the first Sikh war and the establishment of Dogrā rule in the Valley, was able to elucidate with remarkable success a series of important questions bearing on the chronological system of the Rājatarānginī and on the numismatic history of the country. With the help of the information obtained through local inquiries he correctly ascertained the era

¹ Mr. TROYER appears to have been born in the Tyrol about the year 1781, and to have been educated at an Austrian military academy. The wars of the French Revolution found him as a young artillery officer in Flanders, where the accidental discovery of a polyglot Bible in an abandoned convent which his battery occupied, first directed his attention to the study of Arabic. Transferred to the army operating in Italy, and employed during the siege of Genoa as Austrian commissioner at the British headquarters, he made the acquaintance of Lord William Bentinck, who formed a firm friendship for him.

When Lord W. Bentinck proceeded in 1803 to Madras as Governor of the Presidency, he offered to his friend an appointment on his personal staff, which Troyer readily accepted. A commission as captain in some native regiment provided Troyer at the same time with the requisite military rank. He remained in Madras after the recall of his patron, ultimately occupying the post of Principal of the local Muhammadan College. He seems subsequently to have retired to Paris, from where he once more followed Lord W. Bentinck's fortunes to India when the latter became Governor-General in 1827. Made Principal of the Calcutta Sanskrit College, he remained in India until 1835, when he finally returned to Paris.

It is only during his residence at Calcutta that he seems to have seriously taken up Sanskrit studies, a fact which in view of his advanced age indicates no small amount of vigour and scholarly zeal. The thirty years which Troyer spent in complete retirement after his return to Europe, were devoted to the same interests which had originally attracted him to India. He died in 1861, nearly a centenarian, after having preserved to the last a remarkable freshness of mind. Among the many literary labours which he planned or began during the later portion of his life, only two had been brought to completion, his Rājatarānginī work and the annotated translation of that curious Persian text, the Maḥabāt.

I take the above from an interesting obituary notice which is contained in M. Mohl's Rapport Annuel to the Société Asiatique for the year 1866 (Journal asiat., 1866, Extrait No. II, pp. 13-14). I owe the reference to this publication as well as a manuscript copy of it to the kindness of my lamented teacher, Professor H. von Harn, who had known Mr. Troyer during his own student's days at Paris (1845-49), and who in 1861 still vividly remembered some quaint features of his character and habits.

According to Prof. von Harn's recollection the old gentleman put his birth at an even earlier date than that indicated in M. Mohl's notice. It seems probable that a search in the archives of the Vienna war office would lead to more accurate information about Troyer's early life and his career in the Austrian army. I regret not to have found an opportunity to make the necessary inquiries.

employed in Kallhana's chronological reckoning, and thus succeeded in fixing with fair accuracy the dates for almost all the kings from the advent of the Kārkoṭa dynasty onwards. In the same paper, published in the Numismatic Chronicle for 1840, he communicated the results of his search for ancient Kāśmīrian coins, and proved by their analysis the great value of numismatic evidence for the critical control of Kallhana's records.⁸ Equally useful for the study of Kāśmīrian antiquities was his rapid survey of the most conspicuous architectural remains of the Hindu period still extant in the Valley.⁹ It threw light on the history of interesting temple-buildings mentioned in the Chronicle, and also enabled General Cunningham to identify a number of localities which are important for the ancient topography of the country.

Professor LARSEN, who in his great encyclopædia, the Indische Alterthumskunde, gave an exhaustive analysis of Kallhana's Chronicle,¹⁰ had no original materials of any kind at his disposal. We can, therefore, scarcely feel surprised if even his learning and acumen failed to extend materially the store of trustworthy historical data already gathered by Professor Wilson and General Cunningham. The conjectural attempts to establish synchronisms between the semi-legendary portion of Kallhana's record and the earlier epochs of general Indian history could not be expected to furnish useful results at a time when the reliable data regarding the latter were yet so scanty. Similarly I have been obliged to point out elsewhere that the tendency towards purely conjectural identifications of local names displayed in this analysis has often caused the narrow territorial limits to be ignored to which the events recorded in the later and historically most valuable portion of Kallhana's narrative are in reality restricted.¹¹

All these labours had clearly proved that trustworthy materials were required before the contents of the Chronicle could be made fully available for historical and antiquarian study. Yet no attempt was made to secure them until Professor G. BÜHLER, then of the Bombay Education Department, during the summer of 1875, visited Kāśmir in search of Sanskrit manuscripts. Many important results rewarded his brilliant researches and render this tour a memorable one in the annals of Sanskrit philology. But none among them, perhaps, show more clearly the keen historical sense and the sure perception of the departed great scholar than itecture as exhibited in the Temples of Kashmir, in J.A.S.B., 1848.

⁸ The ancient coinage of Kashmir, with chronological and historical notes, in "The Numismatic Chronicle and Journal of the Numismatic Society," 1840, No. xx. pp. 1 sqq.

⁹ An Essay on the Arian Order of Archi-

¹⁰ See in particular Indische Alterthumskunde, ii. pp. 18 sqq., 763-781, 886-914; iii. pp. 981-1128.

¹¹ See below, Vol. II., p. 350.

the lucidity with which he indicated the task concerning the Rājatarāṅgi and the materials that were at hand for it.¹²

By the examination of good though modern Sārada copies of the Chronicle, Professor BÜHLER was able to prove the absolute superiority of the Kaśmir manuscripts over the Devanāgarī transcripts. He also ascertained that the former were all derived from a single old Sārada manuscript. Though unable himself to obtain more than a glimpse of this jealously-guarded codex archetypus, he thus showed the way for the critical reconstitution of the genuine text. He recognized clearly the importance of a minute study of the ancient geography of Kaśmir for the correct comprehension of Kalhaṇa's narrative, and pointed out the most valuable help which could be obtained for such researches from the Nilamata-purāṇa, the legendaries (Mahātmyas) of Kaśmir Tirthas, and other Kaśmirian texts he had discovered. As regards the difficulties arising from the peculiarities of the Chronicler's diction and style, he showed how they might be overcome by close attention to the form of composition adopted by Kaśmirian poets who immediately preceded and followed Kalhaṇa. The long discussion on the Rājatarāṅgi embodied in his famous Report finally gave Professor Bühler also an opportunity to trace some of the critical principles which must guide us in regard to the use of Kalhaṇa's work for the history of Kaśmir and of India.

He thus expressed his conclusion as to the task that remained to be done. "A new attempt to translate and to explain the Rājatarāṅgi, and to use its contents for the history of India, ought to be made. But it is a work of very considerable difficulty, and will require much time and patience." The manner in which he contemplated this new translation was illustrated by a specimen given in the Appendix of his Report and containing a masterly exposition of verses 1-107 of Kalhaṇa's First Book.¹³ Professor Bühler had himself at one time planned to undertake the work which had attracted so much of his interest. But other tasks and probably also the conviction that further local researches were indispensable for its satisfactory execution, prevented him from following up this plan after his return to Europe, in 1881.

Subsequently Dr. E. HULTZSCH utilized the manuscript materials which Professor Bühler had collected, and others obtained during his own visit to Kaśmir in 1885, for a series of articles which appeared in Volumes xviii. and xix. of the Indian Antiquary. They were intended to supply an abstract translation and historical summary of the Chronicle. Though these articles were not continued beyond the commencement of Book iii., they have yet furnished a considerable number of useful critical observations, particularly in regard to Kalhana's system of chronology.

¹² Detailed Report of a tour in search of Sanskrit MSS. in Kaśmir (J. H. Br. R.A.S., Extra No., 1877), pp. 52 seqq.

¹³ See Report, pp. lxxi.-lxxvii.

Before concluding this review of previous labours, reference must be made to Mr. Yogesh Chunder DUTT's English version which appeared at Calcutta, 1879-87, under the title: Kings of Kāshmirā : being a translation of the Sanskrita work Rājataranginī of Kuhlana (sic) Pandita. This translation though published some time after Professor Bühler's researches, is based exclusively on the corrupt text of the Calcutta edition of 1835, and was manifestly prepared without reference to any of the Kāśmīrian sources of information which are indispensable for the correct comprehension of Kalhana's narrative. Exegetical puzzles are passed over without any notice, and practically no attempt is made to grapple with the difficulties arising from Kalhana's constant references to local topography, institutions, and other realia of ancient Kāśmīr.¹⁴ Though the rendering of those portions of the text which are not altogether obscured in sense by the defects of the Calcutta edition, is distinctly superior to Mr. TROYER's version, and though the patient labour of the Bengali translator deserves commendation, it is yet evident that a publication of this kind could scarcely help towards the solution of the real difficulties in Kalhana's work and towards the elucidation of those points which mainly interest the critical student.

It would be impossible to enumerate here all the works in which European and Indian Sanskrit scholars have incidentally discussed particular portions or passages of the Rājataranginī, and have thus in varying degrees contributed towards the interpretation of the Chronicle. Referring for the most prominent among them to the note below,¹⁵ I may now turn to the labours which have led to the production of the present work.

I have already in my opening remarks indicated the reasons which induced me ¹⁴ Regarding the confusion resulting from the disregard of topographical matters, see below Vol. II., p. 340.

¹⁵ Geheimrath O. von BÖRTLINGER, in his great florilegium of Indian proverbial wisdom, the Indische Sprüche, has translated many of those didactic and descriptive verses of the Rājataranginī which form so characteristic a feature in Kalhana's poetic style; see below Introd., § 38. The same venerable scholar together with Prof. KERN, of Leyden, has also, in vol. vii. of the Mélanges asiatiques of the St. Petersburg Academy, proposed a considerable number of textual emendations for the Chronicle. Many of them have subsequently been confirmed by the readings of the codex archetypus as recorded in my edition.

General CUNNINGHAM, nearly half a century after his first important contribution, resumed the discussion of interesting numismatic points connected with Kalhana's narrative in his posthumous book, "The Coins of Medieval India," 1894. Prof. J. JOLLY in his paper "Rechts-historisches aus der Rājataranginī" (Weber-Festschrift, 1895) has given a very instructive synopsis of the data furnished by the Chronicle for the study of legal and social lore in Kāśmīr, etc.

during my first visit to Kāśmīr to form the plan of a critical edition of the Rājatarāṅgiṇī. My first endeavour was to secure the use of the codex archetypus of all extant manuscripts of the Chronicle, of which Professor Buhler had not been allowed more than a glimpse and which subsequently to his visit had been divided between the three heirs of the former owner. In this I succeeded during my second visit in 1889, notwithstanding the additional obstacles created by the above division. I was then able to ascertain that the codex had been written by a well-known Kāśmīrian scholar, Paṇḍit Rājānaka Ratnakarṇṇa, probably about the third quarter of the seventeenth century, and that it contains besides a wealth of various readings and corrections from several old hands, a great number of important glosses. The features which make that codex so valuable for critical and exegetical purposes, have been fully set forth both in the preface of my edition and in the résumé contained in Chapter III. of the Introduction to the present work.¹⁶

A series of antiquarian tours in Kāśmīr for which I utilized my summer vacations during the years following my first visit, allowed me to acquaint myself on the spot with the topography, archaeological remains, local customs, and other realia of the country. They also furnished opportunities for the acquisition of manuscripts of those products of Kāśmīrian Sanskrit literature, which like the Nilamata, the Māhātmyas of the numerous sacred sites, the poetical compositions of Kalhaṇa's period, have carefully to be consulted by the interpreter of the Chronicle. With the assistance of the materials thus collected and on the basis of the codex archetypus I was able to prepare my edition of the Sanskrit text of the Rājatarāṅgiṇī, which together with the complete apparatus criticus was published in 1892 under the patronage of the Kāśmīr Darbar.¹⁷

In the preface of this Edition I had promised,—as soon as the scanty leisure I could spare from teaching and office duties would permit,—to give in a second volume exegetical notes on the text together with a running commentary on those points of Kalhaṇa's narrative which are of interest for the history, archaeology, and topography of Kāśmīr. It was impossible for me to take up this task in earnest until the arrangement already above alluded to had secured to me the leisure of two summer seasons in Kāśmīr.

Already previously I had convinced myself that the only way of testing my comprehension of Kalhaṇa's text was for me to write down a close translation of it. I soon found that such a continuous rendering provided far simpler means of explaining and justifying my interpretation of the text than elaborate exegetical

¹⁶ See Intro., §§ 44-48.

¹⁷ Kalhaṇa's Rājatarāṅgiṇī, or Chronicle of the Kings of Kāśmīr. Edited by M. A. Stein.

Vol. I. Sanskrit Text with Critical Notes. Bombay: Education Society's Press, 1892, pp. xx., 1-220, folio.

notes on all difficult or doubtful passages. There seemed also good reason to assume that a complete English version would not only bring the contents of the Chronicle within easier reach of all students interested in Kāśmīr and in Indian history generally, but would render reference to them also far more convenient to fellow-Sanskritists. I accordingly decided to offer in place of the promised commentary the present unannotated translation which in view of its bulk and for other practical reasons had to take the form of a distinct publication.

The object which, as just indicated, led me to the preparation of a full translation, accounts also for the form given to the latter. It appeared to me that a close and as far as possible literal version was required in order to convey accurately the interpretation adopted for a text which combines with the intricacies of the florid rhetoric of the Sanskrit Kāvya so many obscurities due to the subject-matter, the local allusions, and other peculiarities of Kallhapa's form of narration. In that section of my Introduction which deals with Kallhapa's style, I have discussed at length the various causes which have made it often so difficult to ascertain exactly the meaning of particular expressions and also of whole passages.¹⁴ Without referring to those here in detail, it will be evident that in the case of such a text where the interpreter can proceed only cautiously, and has often, as it were, to clear his way step by step, a freer form of rendering would be useful only for the purpose of giving an adequate conception of the work as a literary product to readers unable to study the original. Notwithstanding the poetical merit which we may allow to various features of Kallhapa's work, if judged as a Kāvya,¹⁵ it appears to me doubtful whether the interest of that class of readers would ever justify more than comparatively small selections from the Chronicle being treated in the manner indicated.

These considerations have induced me to follow the example set by Professor Bühler in his above-mentioned specimen-translation, and to adopt a form of rendering that allows the interpreter not only to reproduce plainly the meaning of the text, but also indirectly to indicate often the construction or other exegetical reason underlying his version. Thin square brackets have been employed throughout to distinguish words which are not actually found in the original, but require to be added in order to make the context intelligible in English, while round brackets denote additions having more the nature of glosses. Pedantic as this device may appear, it has often saved lengthy explanatory notes, and its advantages will be readily appreciated wherever reference to the exact words of the Chronicle is essential.¹⁶

¹⁴ See Introd., §§ 38-40.

¹⁵ Compare ib., § 37.

¹⁶ From the method of translation here indicated I have departed only in regard to a small number of passages, amounting, in the aggregate, to not more than a hundred

The addition of Marginalia to indicate the reigns and more important events dealt with in particular portions of the text will, I trust, make reference easier, and to some extent remedy the defect arising from the want of proper division in Kalhana's narrative.

I am fully aware that notwithstanding the standard of close verbal accuracy aimed at it would have been possible to give to this translation a form more attractive to the general reader. But even if I could have claimed the literary skill and command of language required for such a task, I doubt whether I could have attempted it without the risk of seeing my labours protracted far beyond the limits of the leisure assured for them. Any shortcomings in this direction will, I hope, be the more readily pardoned as the time thus saved has permitted me to follow up all the more carefully the many philological and antiquarian questions connected with the interpretation of the Chronicle.

In the course of these inquiries I have endeavoured to utilize to the best of my ability the special advantages I have enjoyed for the study of ancient Kāśmīr. The antiquarian tours to which I have already referred, and which I was able to supplement by others in 1894-96, have enabled me not only to examine most of the ancient ruins and sites of Kāśmīr, but also to gain a thorough personal acquaintance with the topography of the country and its economic and ethnic conditions. The great geographical barriers which separate Kāśmīr from the rest of India, coupled with the marked difference of climatic conditions, have from early times assured to the alpine land a distinct character of its own which manifests itself strongly in all matters of culture, customs, and social organization. It scarcely needs a detailed explanation to prove that closest attention to all these peculiarities of modern Kāśmīr is required if we desire to arrive at a correct comprehension of Kalhana's narrative, and of the historical events of which it treats.

But it is not alone in the unaltered features of topography and climate, in ruined structures and other antiquarian remains, that so much of ancient Kāśmīr has survived to this day. The historical isolation of the country, directly due to its alpine position, and fully noticed in my Introduction,²¹ has saved Kāśmīr from many changes which have elsewhere in India effaced the conditions of earlier periods. To this seclusion we owe in Kāśmīr that remarkable tenacity of tradition which, whether in matters of local lore, in religious practice, or in social custom,

S'lokas, which contain rhetoric descriptions or didactic matter of a wholly conventional type, practically unconnected with the narrative proper. As these passages do not offer any points which are of interest, or in need of comment, I have contented myself with reproducing their purport by means of brief summaries.

²¹ Compare below, pp. 30, 131 sq.

has often proved a most welcome help for the interpretation of the Chronicle. In evidence of the value of this source of information it will suffice to refer here only to my inquiry into the ancient monetary system of Kāśmīr, and to the numerous instances where local tradition has assisted me materially in tracing interesting ancient sites.²¹ I need scarcely add that in collecting traditions of this kind I have always endeavoured to exercise due critical caution.

It was fortunate that I was able to conduct many of these inquiries, and in particular those connected with Pāṇḍit traditions and the customs and manners of the Brahman population, with the help of my lamented friend, Pāṇḍit GOVIND KAU, of S'rinagar. Thoroughly imbued himself with the traditional spirit of his class and country, and at the same time, like some other distinguished Kāśmīrian scholars of earlier days, possessed of a keen eye for the realities of life, Pāṇḍit Govind Kau held his store-house of old-world lore and learning ever open to me. The advantages I derived from it were not restricted to the ample information on traditions and customs I gathered through him. They were equally great in another direction. All those who have had opportunities to study more closely Hindu thought in its products, as well as in its living inheritors, know how deep the differences reach that separate it from Western thought, whether classic or modern. It is a direct result of these differences that the Western interpreter of a text like the Rājatarāṅgini, which treats of so many aspects and relations of life, is only too frequently liable to misapprehend the drift of the author's thought, even where his words are plain, and the subject-matter sufficiently elucidated. In the absence of an indigenous commentary on the work it was no small assurance to me that I was able to test my interpretation wherever such doubts could arise, by consulting a scholar so thoroughly versed in the traditional notions of Kālhana's country.

If a Sanskrit commentary on the Chronicle had ever been written by a countryman of Kālhana, not too far removed from his own time, it would in all probability have made the task of proving the exact significance of many local terms and references far more simple. In the absence of such a convenient guide their meaning had only too frequently to be established in my notes by an exhaustive comparison of parallel passages, references to other Kāśmīrian texts, and other independent evidence. A very great portion of the materials used was obtained from texts hitherto unpublished, and scarcely any of the questions raised had previously formed the subject of systematic inquiry. These considerations have rendered it necessary to make in each case the exposition of the available evidence detailed and exhaustive; they must mainly be held to account if some of these notes, e.g. on the terms Damara (Note i), dvāra (v. 214), on the Dinnāra reckoning, and the monetary system of old Kāśmīr (Note ii), have grown into little monographs. Wherever the comments on a particular subject were too long to be conveniently printed as footnotes they have been placed in the APPENDIX found after Book viii.

²¹ See Note II, §§ 8, 9, 36, sqq.; Memoir on the Ancient Geography of Kāśmīr, § 36.

The detailed study of the historical geography of Kāśmīr and the neighbouring hill-regions was from the first recognized by me as a condition of primary importance for my task, and as these researches had also otherwise a special attraction for me I have spared no effort to make my survey of the sites and tracts which form the scene of Kallhaya's narrative, as thorough and accurate as possible. The Memoir to be mentioned below has given me an opportunity to explain in detail the methods and means which have enabled me to identify with certainty the vast majority of the old localities, in and about Kāśmīr, referred to by the Chronicler, and very often to trace also the remains of particular structures, etc.²¹ A reference to notes like those on the Castle of Lohara (Note E), on the re-discovery of the long-forgotten Pārtha of Uthra (Note A), on the old confluence of the Vitastā and Sindhu (Note I), etc., will help to realize the interest attaching to this search, as well as the time and trouble it has frequently cost me.

It has been a source of special satisfaction to me that I was able to illustrate the results of my researches into the ancient topography of Kāśmīr by the maps attached to this work. I am indebted for the publication of the two larger ones, of ancient Kāśmīr and its capital Śrinagar, to the help of the Asiatic Society, Bengal, which, through the kind offices of Drs. GÜNTHER and HORNSTEDT, very liberally agreed to bear the cost of their preparation on the understanding that they would be published also separately in its Journal. The plan which I followed in preparing these maps and the system by which they were reproduced at the Offices of the Survey of India, will be found fully explained elsewhere.²² The successful technical execution of the maps was mainly due to the ready co-operation of Major-General J. WATKINSON, late Assistant Surveyor-General, in charge of the Lithographic and Photographic Office of the Survey of India. The third map showing the site of Parīhasapura and the ancient confluence of the Vitastā and Sindhu was subsequently reproduced at the well-known establishment of Mr. W. Griggs, of Peckham.

I am too well aware of the value of graphic reproduction as an important aid of the commentator, not to have wished that it might have been practicable for me to provide, apart from these maps, other illustrations that would help to bring the scenes of Kalhana's story closer before the eye of the reader. The materials are ample in Kashmir, where the sites to which the Chronicler's narrative takes us, can mostly be traced with such accuracy, and where so many objects of antiquarian interest have survived from the periods he deals with. But Kalhana is neither a Pausanias nor a Marco Polo, and hence the wish of an illustrated translation such as the efforts of two distinguished scholars have provided for the antiquarian of classical Greece and for the great traveller of the Middle Ages, must remain a primum desiderium which even the most enterprising publisher might well hesitate to realize.

²¹ See below, Memoir, §§ 10-37.

²² See below, Memoir, § 2.

My translation and the notes which accompany it were finished in manuscript in October, 1898. With the scanty leisure available to me at Lahore it would have been impossible to attempt to complete my task by a historical introduction such as I had originally promised. Yet my recent labours had convinced me more than ever how necessary it was from the point of view of the critical student that the many important questions relating to the personality of the author, the character and scope of his Chronicle, and its value as a source of historical information, should be examined systematically, and in a connected form. A recommendation of the Eleventh International Congress of Orientalists, 1897, induced the Kashmir Darbar and the Punjab University jointly to grant me once more a two months' period of special duty for the purpose of completing my work in the manner indicated. I was thus able to prepare during the summer, 1898, the critical Introduction which precedes my translation of Kalhana's text, and in addition also the "Memoir on the Ancient Geography of Kashmir" which follows it.

In the INTRODUCTION I have endeavoured to elucidate in the first place the data which can be gathered as regards the person of Kalhana, his family, and the milieu in that he lived. The discovery of a curious and hitherto unnoticed reference to Kalhana by his countryman and contemporary, the poet Mañkha, may perhaps claim special interest, as confirming in a striking manner the conclusions derived from the Chronicler's own work as regards his literary training and interests.²⁸ In the second Chapter I have examined as closely as our available materials would permit, the objects and methods which guided Kalhana in the composition of his work, the sources he used for it, and the form which he gave to his narrative. The condition in which the text of the Chronicle has been handed down to us, and the materials I have used for its reconstitution, are discussed in the third Chapter, while the next contains an exposition of Kalhana's system of Chronology.

²⁸ See Introd., §§ 9, 10.

In the concluding and longest Chapter of the Introduction it has been my object to present a critical summary of Kalhana's narrative and of the historical data contained in it. For the purposes of this analysis it was necessary to scrutinize with special care all independent evidence on Kashmirian history that we can at present gather from the coins, foreign notices and similar records.

It is only by the discovery of fresh materials of this kind that we can hope to obtain true light regarding the earlier periods for which the first three Books of Kalhana's work do not furnish us with a critically reliable account. Conjectural "adjustments" of Kalhana's statements, as proposed by some of my predecessors, cannot take the place of such materials, and I hope, therefore, I shall not be blamed for having strictly avoided them. On the other hand, I trust, the analysis of the subsequent portions of the Chronicle will show that from the advent of the Karkota dynasty onwards we possess in it a truly historical record which grows more and more accurate as we approach the time of the author, and which by its wealth of information on all aspects of old Kashmir amply repays the attention of the student of Indian history and culture.

The Chronological and Genealogical Tables attached to the Introduction are intended to present in a condensed form the information furnished by the Rājatarāṅgi regarding the date and descent of successive rulers of Kashmir.

The Memoir which follows the translation and Notes, presents a connected and detailed account of the Ancient Geography of Kashmir. The importance of the latter for the comprehension of the Chronicle and for the critical study of Kashmir history generally needs, in view of my previous remarks, scarcely to be emphasized here. The preparation of this Memoir, which, with certain modifications, was intended also to accompany the separate issue of the maps of Ancient Kashmir and Srinagar, has enabled me to treat the subject as a whole and in a systematic manner. It gave me an opportunity to utilize fully the valuable topographical information available from other sources apart from the Rājatarāṅgi, and at the same time to bring out the true bearing and interest of Kalhana's data far more clearly than it was possible in the scattered notes of the translation.

I have spared no labour to make the Index which concludes the work full and accurate. It will, I trust, be found helpful not only for purposes of ready reference, but also for supplying the reader with the abstract biographies he needs in order to follow intelligently the fortunes of all the personages which flit through the later portion of Kalhana's narrative in such a bewildering fashion.²⁰

The Index is also intended to rectify a certain want of uniformity which, I regret, will be noticeable in the spelling of some Kashmiri words, particularly local names. The correct reproduction of Kāśmīrī words presents often unusual difficulties. This is due to the variety and peculiarity of the sounds of the language, particularly its vowels, as well as to the want of a system of spelling recognized in the country itself and to other causes which need not be detailed here. The lines adopted by Dr. GRIERSON for the phonetic rendering of Kāśmīrī in his admirable analysis of Pāṇjit Śivara Kaṇḍa's Grammar undoubtedly represent the nearest approach to an exact transcription, and I have endeavoured to follow them closely.²⁷ A great portion of my commentary was, however, written before I received, through Dr. Griereson's kindness, the proofs of his publication and before I myself had begun to make a closer study of Kāśmīrī phonetics. Many of the local names had been recorded by me long before in notes collected during earlier antiquarian tours, and though I took care to test afresh their pronunciation wherever possible before embodying them in my commentary, complete uniformity in their spelling could for the reasons above indicated not be secured from the beginning. In the cases of names where slight variations of this kind have occurred a reference to the Index will show the form definitely adopted by me.²⁸

²⁰ Compare regarding this serious difficulty of the interpreter, Introd., § 40.

Such a reference will be useful also in those instances where the accidental breaking of diacritical types in the course of printing has produced apparent variations of spelling in Sanskrit and other Oriental words. In the transcription of these the system approved by the Tenth International Congress of Orientalists, 1894, has been uniformly followed.

From the time when I first began my study of the Kāśmīr Chronicle the advice and ready help of Professor BÜHLER had accompanied my labours. His own researches in Kāśmīr were my best guide to the materials that were needed for the task, and nothing encouraged me more in its execution than the unflinching interest with which he followed it. Realizing from his own Indian ²⁷ See Dr. Griereson's several papers on Kāśmīrī phonetics and inflection in the J.A.S.B., 1897-98.

It may be useful to mention here that the vowel-signs raised above the line (°, °, °, °) which I have adopted in accordance with Dr. Griereson's system, represent the exceptionally short, so-called "broken" vowel-sounds peculiar to Kāśmīrī.

²⁸ The variations referred to concern mostly certain vowel-sounds, the misidentifications of which through epenthesis have in my earlier notes not always received sufficient attention: hence Huḍḥrār for Huḍḥrār, Sunḥman for Sunḥman, Kul for Sunḥman, Kul, Arḥm for Arḥm, etc.

A change due to purely typographical reasons is the substitution of ā for ā̇, to represent the Kāśmīrī sound approaching in pronunciation the vowel of the English word ant.

It may be mentioned here that the distinction of the letters ś, ṣ, ṣ as renderings of the Kāśmīrī sound corresponding to English sh, is made on purely phonetic grounds. I have used ś where the vowel is ā̇, ṣ where it is ā̇, and ṣ in all other cases, the last character being employed as the representative of the lingual sibilant in conformity with the general system of transcription followed.

experience the practical difficulties with which I had to contend, he readily helped to secure to me the leisure indispensable for the work. When the facilities obtained largely through the weight of his recommendation had enabled me to complete my translation and commentary for the press he generously offered his assistance in revising the proofs. This most valuable help to which I owe beside improvements in the form of my translation a number of interesting suggestions separately acknowledged in my notes, extended over the greater portion of the text contained in the first Volume and only ceased with Professor Bühler's lamented death, in the spring of 1898.

The irreparable loss which the study of ancient India has suffered in so many directions by the untimely end of the departed great scholar, has been felt to widely to need my comments here. The results which he achieved in his unceasing endeavours to lay open the true sources of early Indian history, would alone suffice to make his name for ever memorable in the records of Indologist research. In Kāśmīr it was he who first showed the right way to a critical study of the history of the country, and the very task which I have here endeavoured to solve had long before been planned by himself. Fate has denied me the hoped-for satisfaction of placing the completed work in the hands of the master who would have been its most competent judge. But assured of his opinion regarding the parts that I was able to submit, I may at least without hesitation dedicate the volumes to his memory as a token of the gratitude and admiration I shall ever cherish for him.

I have already above had occasion to refer to the advantage I enjoyed by being able to gather valuable information on many points of the traditional and local lore of Kāśmīr through Paṇḍit Govind Kaul, of Śrīnagar. This accomplished Kāśmīrī scholar, who had already assisted me in collecting some of the critical materials embodied in my edition of the Sanskrit text of the Rājatarāṅgīnī, continued to be as my amanuensis during the years which I spent over the preparation of the translation and commentary. By arranging under my directions provision Sanskrit indices for the Rājatarāṅgīnī, the later Chronicles and other Kāśmīrī texts requiring constant reference, and by similar labours he lightened for me the great burden of mechanical work which is inseparable from such a task. The identification of Kalhaṇa's numerous allusions to stories contained in the Mahābhārata and Purāṇas is mainly his work. I am also indebted to his aid for a preliminary collation of the Lahore manuscript of the Chronicle which has enabled me to improve the critical constitution of the text underlying my translation.

It is a source of true sorrow to me that this faithful assistant of my labor is no longer among the living. Paṇḍit Govind Kaul died at Śrīnagar in the summer of 1899, separated from me at the time by the whole breadth of India. I

I hope this public acknowledgment of his services will help to preserve the memory of a scholar who was worthy to maintain the learned traditions of the land of Nārada.

It would have been impossible for me to prepare the work now completed without the leisure granted to me in addition to my vacation, in the years 1895, 1896, and 1898. I owe this important concession to the liberality of the Kashmir Darbar and the Punjab University which jointly bore the cost involved by my 'deputation.' For the material assistance thus rendered to me I wish to record here the expression of my sincere gratitude.

His Highness the Maharaja and the State Council of Jammu and Kashmir had already given a proof of their generous interest in my labours by sanctioning in 1891 a grant towards the publication of the Chronicle which had materially facilitated the issue of my edition of the text, and the collection of the materials required for the commentary. In connection with the help I have received on the part of the Darbar, I must record my sincere thanks to Colonel D. W. K. HARR, F.R.S., Mr. H. S. BARNES, C.B., and Colonel Sir A. TALBOT, K.C.B., successive Residents in Kashmir, who were all equally ready to grant me the benefit of their support. To Mr. W. R. LAWRENCE, C.B., late Settlement-Commissioner of Kashmir and the author of the best account of the modern conditions of the Valley, I offer my grateful acknowledgments for his kind help and advice in regard to the steps which first led to my deputation.

I owe a similar debt of gratitude to the late Vice-Chancellors of the Punjab University, Sir W. H. HARRISON, K.T., G.C., and Sir CHARLES A. HODGKIN, K.T., LL.D., who by their recommendations materially aided me in obtaining the concession already referred to.

Owing to my distance from the printers and for other reasons the passing of the work through the press has involved a heavy amount of labour. I, therefore, feel particularly grateful for the good offices of those who at various stages of the work have lent me a helping hand in the revision of proofs. Apart from Professor Bühler's help already mentioned I received for portions of the first volume the assistance of Miss TOULMIN-SMITH, Librarian of Manchester College, Oxford, and Dr. J. MORTON. For the whole of the second volume and the Introduction I benefited by the help and advice of my friend, Professor T. W. ARNOLD, of the Government College, Lahore, who has generously sacrificed to the task much hard-earned leisure. As it was impossible to arrange that more than single proofs should reach me in India, my friend Dr. M. WINTERNITZ, with the publishers' assent, kindly undertook the reading of all final revisions. I owe it largely to his care if the number of misprints proves smaller than might be anticipated from the difficulties with which I had often to contend in reading proofs while on tour or in the midst of official business.

Last, but not least, I feel obliged to express my thanks to my publishers and printers. To the former they are due for the spirit of enterprise they have shown in undertaking, unaided, a publication of this kind, and for the free scope they have allowed me as regards its extent.

From Messrs. GILBERT AND RIVINGTON I have received every assistance in carrying out the typographical arrangements which seemed to me to be best adapted to the purposes of the work, notwithstanding the extra difficulties which the use of a large variety of special types has necessarily involved.

* * *

The alpine surroundings amidst which I write these lines, and with which I shall always associate the recollection of the greatest part of my labours, help forcibly to draw my thought to the local bearing of the work now concluded.

From the high mountain plateau which my camp once more occupies, almost the whole of Kashmir lies before me, from the ice-capped peaks of the northern range to the long snowy line of the Pir Panjal,—a little world of its own, enclosed by mighty mountain ramparts. Small indeed the country may seem, by the side of the great plains that extend in the south, and confined the history of which it was the scene. And yet, just as the natural attractions of the Valley have won it fame far beyond the frontiers of India, thus too the interest attaching to its history far exceeds the narrow geographical limits.

The favours with which Nature has so lavishly endowed "the land in the womb of Himālaya," are not likely to fade or vanish. But those manifold remains of antiquity which the isolation of the country has preserved, and which help us to resuscitate the life and conditions of earlier times, are bound to disappear more and more with the rapid advance of Western influences.

Great are the changes which the last few decades have brought over Kashmir, greater, perhaps, than any which the country has experienced since the close of the Hindu period. It is easy to foresee that much of what is of value to the historical student will before long be destroyed or obliterated. It is time to collect as carefully as possible the materials still left for the study of old Kashmir and its earliest records. I have spared no efforts to serve this end, and in the result of my labours, I hope, there will be found some return for the loans which I owe to Kashmir.

M. A. STEIN.

MOTILAL BANSAL :

18th May, 1900.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

VOLUME I.

	PAGE
PREFACE	vii—xxiv
LIST OF ABBREVIATED TITLES	xxvii—xxxī

INTRODUCTION.

PRELIMINARY	3—5
CHAPTER I.—THE AUTHOR OF THE CHRONICLE	6—21
Section i. Kallhapa's person and descent, §§ 1—4	6
„ ii. Kallhapa's literary training, §§ 5—9	10
„ iii. Kallhapa and his time, §§ 10—17	14
CHAPTER II.—THE RĀJATARAṆGIṆĪ: ITS SCOPE AND CHARACTER	22—41
Section i. Kallhapa's conception of his task, §§ 18—20	22
„ ii. Kallhapa's sources, §§ 21—24	24
„ iii. Kallhapa's critical horizon, §§ 25—29	27
„ iv. Kallhapa as a narrator, §§ 30—36	32
„ v. Kallhapa's style, §§ 37—40	38
CHAPTER III.—THE TEXT OF THE CHRONICLE	42—55
Section i. The Text left by Kallhapa, §§ 41—43	42
„ ii. The Colex Archetypus, §§ 44—48	45
„ iii. The Lahore Manuscript, §§ 49—51	50
„ iv. Critical constitution of the text, §§ 52—53	54
CHAPTER IV.—THE CHRONOLOGY OF THE RĀJATARAṆGIṆĪ	56—70
Section i. The system of Kallhapa's Chronology, §§ 55—59	56
„ ii. The Chronology of the first three Books, §§ 60—64	62
„ iii. The Chronology of the Kārkoṭa and later dynasties, §§ 65—69	66

	PAGE
CHAPTER V.—THE RĀJATARAṂGI AS A HISTORICAL SOURCE	71—132
Section i. The kings of the First Book, §§ 71—77	73
„ ii. The kings of Books II. and III., §§ 78—83	80
„ iii. The Kārkoṭa Dynasty, §§ 84—91	87
„ iv. The kings of Books V. and VI., §§ 92—99	97
„ v. The first Loḥara Dynasty, §§ 100—107	106
„ vi. The second Loḥara Dynasty, §§ 108—116	117
„ vii. Kāśmīr after Kallhaṇa, §§ 117—119	130
NOTE I.—Kallhaṇa and the Harsaerita	133
APPENDIX I.—DYNASTIC AND CHRONOLOGICAL TABLES	134—138
II.—GENEALOGICAL TABLES OF KĀŚMĪR DYNASTIES	139—146

THE RĀJATARAṂGI OF KALLHANA

FIRST BOOK [i. 1—373]	1—55
SECOND BOOK [ii. 1—171]	56—71
THIRD BOOK [iii. 1—220]	72—110
FOURTH BOOK [iv. 1—720]	120—185
FIFTH BOOK [v. 1—183]	186—235
SIXTH BOOK [vi. 1—368]	236—266
SEVENTH BOOK [vii. 1—1732]	267—402

LIST OF ABBREVIATED TITLES.

ABU-L-FAZL, Āin-i Akb.

The Āin-i Akbari by Abū-l-Faẓl 'Allāmi, translated from the original Persian by Colonel H. S. Jarrett. Calcutta: Asiatic Society, Bengal. Vol. II. 1891.

ALBERŪNĪ, India.

Alberūnī's India. An account of the religion, philosophy, literature, geography, chronology, astronomy, customs, laws, and astrology of India about A.D. 1030. An English edition with notes and indices by Dr. Edward G. Sachau. London: Trübner & Co. Vols. I., II. 1888.

ALPHABET, Cat. Catal.

Catalogus Catalogorum. An Alphabetical Register of Sanskrit works and authors. By Theodor Aufrecht. Leipzig. 1891.

BATES, Gazetteer.

A Gazetteer of Kashmir and the adjacent districts of Kishtwar, Budrawar, Jammū, Naushera, Poonch and the Valley of the Rishon Ganga, compiled (for judicial and military reference) by Charles Ellison Bates, Captain, Bengal Staff Corps, and Brevet-Major. Calcutta: Office of the Superintendent of Government Printing. 1878.

BERNIER, Travels.

Travels in the Mogul Empire A.D. 1656-1668, by François Bernier, M.D. of the Faculty of Montpellier. A revised and improved edition by Archibald Constable. Westminster: Archibald Constable & Co. 1891.

BÜHLER, Report.

Detailed Report of a tour in search of Sanskrit MSS. made in Kashmir, Rajputana, and Central India. By G. Bühler. Extra number of the Journal of the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society. Bombay. 1877.

COLE, Anc. Build.

Illustrations of Ancient Buildings in Kashmir. Prepared under the authority of the Secretary of State for India in Council from photographs, plans, and drawings taken by order of the Government of India. By Henry Hardy Cole, Lieutenant, R.E., Superintendent, Archaeological Survey of India, North-West Provinces. London: W. H. Allen & Co. 1893.

COWIE, Notes.

Notes on some of the temples of Kashmir, especially those not described by General A. Cunningham, in his essay published in the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal. By W. G. Cowie, Chaplain on duty in Kashmir during the summer of 1865. Journal of the Asiatic Society, Bengal, 1866, Part I. Calcutta.

CUNNINGHAM, Anc. Geogr.

The Ancient Geography of India. I. The Buddhist Period, including the campaigns of Alexander, and the travels of Hwen-Thsang. By Alexander Cunningham, Major-General, Royal Engineers (Bengal, retired). With thirteen maps. London: Trübner & Co. 1871.

- CUNNINGHAM, Coins of Ancient India.—Coins of Ancient India from the earliest times down to the Seventh Century, &c. By Major-General Sir A. Cunningham, K.C.B., &c. &c. London: H. Quaritch, 1891.
- CUNNINGHAM, Coins of Medieval India.—Coins of Medieval India from the Seventh Century down to the Muhammedan conquests, by Major-General Sir A. Cunningham, K.C.B., &c. &c. London: H. Quaritch, 1891.
- CUNNINGHAM, Later Indo-Scythians.—Later Indo-Scythians. By Major-General Sir A. Cunningham, K.C.B., &c. &c. Reprinted from the Numismatic Chronicle, Vol. XIII. Third Series. London: 1903.
- CUNNINGHAM, Temples.—An Essay on the Aryan Order of Architecture, as exhibited in the Temples of Kashmir. By Captain A. Cunningham, Engineer. Journal of the Asiatic Society, Bengal, 1818, Part I. Calcutta.
- DREW, Jummoor.—The Jummoor and Kashmir Territories. A Geographical Account. By Frederick Drew. London: Edward Stanford, 1875.
- DURGAPRASADA (Durgapr.)—The Rājatarangini of Kāshana. Edited by Durgaprasada, son of Vijayalala. Bombay: Government Central Book Depot. Vols. I–II. 1902/3.
- DUTT, —Kings of Kashmir: being a translation of the Sanskrit work Rājatarangini of Kāshana (see Panth.) By Jogesh Chunder Dutt. Calcutta. Printed by L. C. Bose & Co., and published by the author. Vols. I–II. 1878/9.
- KALHAṆA, History.—The history of India, as told by its own historians. The Muhammedan period. Edited from the posthumous papers of the late Sir H. M. Elliot, K.C.B., East India Company's Bengal Civil Service, by Professor John Dowson. London: Trübner & Co. Vol. I. 1907.
- FORSTER, Journey.—A journey from Bengal to England, through the northern part of India, Kashmir, Afghanistan, and Persia, and into Russia by the Caspian Sea. By George Forster, in the Civil Service of the Honourable the East India Company. London: Printed for R. Faulder & Son, New Bond Street. Vols. I–II. 1808.
- FOURTH CHRON.—The Rājavalipātaka of Prajyabhatta and Suka. (Fourth Sanskrit Chronicle of Kashmir. Compare below, ii. p. 371. Quoted from the editor princeps, Calcutta, 1865.)
- HARACAR.—The Haracaritāntamam of Rājāsaka Jayadratha. (Compare below, ii. p. 378. Quoted from MS. No. 200 of my collection.)
- HUEN-TSANG, Life.—The life of Huen-Tsang. By the Shaman Hsuei Li and Yen-Tsang. With a preface containing an account of the works of I-Tsing by Samuel Beal. London: Trübner & Co. 1888.
- HÜBEL, Kashmir.—Kashmir und das Reich der Sack. Von Carl Freiherrn von Hübel. Vols. I–IV. Stuttgart: Hallberger. 1890.
- INCE, Handbook.—Ince's Kashmir Handbook: A Guide for Visitors. Rewritten and much enlarged, by Joshua Duke, Surgeon-Major, Bengal Medical Service. Calcutta: Thacker, Spink & Co. 1888.

- Itinéraire d'On-k'ong.* Voyages des pélerins bouddhistes. L'itinéraire d'On-k'ong (751-749) traduit et annoté par M^{re} Sylvain Lévi et Ed. Chavannes. Extrait du Journal asiatique. Paris: Imprimerie Nationale. 1895.
- Jolly, Recht u. Sitte.* Grundriss der ind-arischen Philologie und Alterthumskunde, herausgegeben von Georg Bühler. Recht und Sitte. Von Julius Jolly. Strassburg: K. Trübner. 1896.
- Jonar.* The Rājatarāṅgī of Jonarāja. [Compare below, ii. p. 373. Quoted from the editio princeps, Calcutta, 1835, except for additional verses found in Prof. Peterson's edition, Bombay Sanskrit Series, 1896; compare for the latter, below, ii. p. 286, note.]
- JASSEN, Ind. Alt.* Indische Alterthumskunde. Von Christian Lassen. Leipzig: L. A. Kittler. London: Williams and Norgate. Vols. I.-IV. 1868-71. [Vols. I.-II. quoted from second edition.]
- LAWRENCE, Valley.* The Valley of Kashmir, by Walter R. Lawrence, Esq., C.E., Settlement-Commissioner, Kashmir and Jammu State. With illustrations. London: Henry Frowde, Oxford University Press Warendon. 1895.
- Lokap.* The Lokapraśāsa ascribed to Kṣemendra. [Compare below, ii. p. 375; quoted from MSS. in my collection.]
- Mah.* Mahātmya [compare regarding Mahātmyas of Kashmir Tirthas, below, ii. pp. 378 sqq., 381 sq.]
- Mahādh.* The Mahādharmas. [Quoted from Bombay Edition, 1855-58.]
- McCRINDLE, Ptolemy.* Ancient India as described by Ptolemy: being a translation of the Chapters which describe India and Central and Eastern Asia in the treatise on geography written by Claudius Ptolemaeus. By J. W. McCrindle. Bombay: Education Society's Press. 1885.
- M. MÜLLER, Indie.* India, what can it teach us? A course of lectures delivered before the University of Cambridge by P. Max Müller, Esq. London: Longmans, Green & Co. 1883.
- MOOREHEAD, Travels.* Travels in the Himalayan Provinces of Hindustan and the Punjab; in Ladakh and Kashmir; in Peshawar, Kabul, Kunduz, and Bokhara; by Mr. William Moorehead and Mr. George Trebeck, from 1819 to 1825. Prepared for the press, from original Journals and Correspondence, by Horace Hayman Wilson. London: John Murray. Vols. I.-II. 1841.
- Nilamata.* The Nilamatapūrāṇa. [Compare below, ii. pp. 376 sqq.; quoted from MSS. in my collection.]
- N. P. W.* Sanskrit Wörterbuch in kürzerer Fassung. Bearbeitet von Otto Böhtlingk. St. Petersburg: Kais. Akademie der Wissenschaften. Vols. I.-VII. 1879-1883.
- P. W.* Sanskrit-Wörterbuch. Herausgegeben von der kaiserlichen Akademie der Wissenschaften. Bearbeitet von Otto Böhtlingk und Rudolph Roth. St. Petersburg: Kais. Akademie der Wissenschaften. Vols. I.-VII. 1856-75.
- Rājat.* Kalluṃya's Rājatarāṅgī, or Chronicle of the Kings of Kashmir. Edited by M. A. Stein. Vol. I. Sanskrit Text, with Critical Notes. Bombay: Education Society's Press. 1892.

- BEINART, *Mémoire sur l'Inde. Mémoire géographique, historique et scientifique sur l'Inde, antérieurement au milieu du XI^{ème} siècle de l'ère chrétienne, d'après les sources arabes, persanes et chinoises. Par M. Beinart. Mémoires de l'Institut National de France, Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres. Tome XVIII. Paris: Imprimerie Nationale. 1849.
- REMUSAT, *Nom. Mélanges Asiat. Nouveaux Mélanges Asiatiques, ou recueil de morceaux de critique et de notices, par M. Abel Remusat. Paris: Schubart et Houbert. Vols. I. II. 1829.
- RITTER, *Erdkunde. Die Erdkunde von Asien, von Carl Ritter. Berlin: G. Reimer. Vol. II. 1833.
- Sanyam. The Sanyamātrika of Ksemendra. Bombay Karyamālā Series. 1888. (Compare below, ii p. 375.)
- Si-yu-ki. Si-yu-ki. Buddhist Records of the Western World. Translated from the Chinese of Hsuen Tsang (A.D. 629), by Samuel Beal. London: Trubner & Co. Vols. I. II. 1884.
- Strikuhāra. The Strikuhāra of Mañha. Bombay Karyamālā Series. 1887.
- Stre. The Jaina-Rajatarangini of Streva. (Quoted from the editio princeps, Calcutta, 1835; compare below, ii p. 373.)
- STEIN, *Catalogue of Jammu MSS. Catalogue of the Sanskrit Manuscripts in the Raghunatha Temple Library of His Highness the Maharaja of Jammu and Kashmir. Prepared for the Kashmir State Council by M. A. Stein. Bombay: Nirnayāsagar Press. 1904.
- STEIN, *Notes on the-k'ang. Notes on On-k'ang's account of Kashmir. By M. A. Stein. Sitzungsberichte der Kais. Akademie der Wissenschaften in Wien, Vol. cxxv. Vienna: Carl Gerold's Sohn. 1896.
- STEIN, *Notes on the Pir Pantāl. Notes on the ancient topography of the Pir Pantāl Route. By M. A. Stein. Journal of the Asiatic Society, Bengal. 1895, Part I. Calcutta.
- ST.-MARTIN, *Étude. Étude sur la géographie grecque et latine de l'Inde, et en particulier sur l'Inde de Ptolémée, dans ses rapports avec la géographie sanscrite, par M. Vivien de Saint-Martin. Mémoires présentés par divers savants à l'Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres, 1^{re} série, tomes v.-vi. Paris.
- ST.-MARTIN, *Mémoire analyt. Mémoire analytique sur la carte de l'Asie Centrale et de l'Inde, construite d'après le Si-yu-ki (Mémoires sur les contrées occidentales) et les autres relations chinoises des premiers siècles de notre ère, pour les Voyages de Hsuen-Tsang dans l'Inde, depuis l'année 629 jusqu'en 645, par M. Vivien de Saint-Martin. Paris: Imprimerie Impériale. 1858.
- Tārīkh-i-Rashīdī. The Tārīkh-i-Rashīdī of Mirza Muhammad Baidar, Dughlat. A history of the Moghuls of Central Asia. An English version edited with commentary, notes and map by N. Elias. The translation by E. Denison Ross. London: Sampson Low, Marston & Co. 1895.
- TIFFENTHAUER, *Description de l'Inde. Description historique et géographique de l'Inde. Tome I. La Géographie de l'Indoustan, écrite en latin, dans le pays même, par le Père Joseph Tiffenthaler, Jésuite and Missionnaire apostolique dans l'Inde. Le tout, augmenté de remarques et d'autres additions, rédigé et publié en

- français, par M. Jean Bernoulli. Berlin, de l'imprimerie de Christian Sigismund Spener. 1786.
- Tirthas.* The Tirthasatgraha of Pundit Sahibram. [Compare below, ii. pp. 383 sq. Quoted from MSS. in my collection.]
- TROYER, Râdjat.* Râdjatarangini, Histoire des Rois du Kachmir, traduite et commentée par M. A. Trayer et publiée aux frais de la Société Asiatique, Paris. Imprimé à l'Imprimerie Royale (Nationale). Vols. I.—III. 1840-52.
- Vie de Hiouen-Thsang.* Histoire de la Vie de Hiouen-Thsang et de ses voyages dans l'Inde, depuis l'an 629 jusqu'en 645, par Hoei-li et Yen-Thsang; suivie de documents et d'éclaircissements géographiques tirés de la relation originale de Hiouen-Thsang; traduite du chinois par Stanislas Julien. Paris: Imprimerie Impériale. 1853.
- VINCK, Travels.* Travels in Kashmir, Ladak, Iskardu, the countries adjoining the mountain-course of the Indus, and the Himalaya, north of the Panjab. With maps. By G. T. Vinck Esq. London: Henry Colburn. Vols. I.—II. 1842.
- Vikram.* The Vikramārkabhāṣita. Life of King Vikramāditya of Kalyāṇa, composed by his Vidyapati Bhaṇṇa. Edited, with an introduction, by Dr. G. Bühler. Bombay: Government Central Book Depot. 1875.
- Wiher-Festgabe.* Gedenkblatt zum fünfzigjährigen Doctorjubiläum Albrecht Wiher dargebracht von seinen Freunden und Schülern. Leipzig: O. Harrassowitz. 1890.
- WILSON, Essay.* An Essay on the Hindu History of Kashmir. Transactions of the Asiatic Society. Asiatic Researches, Vol. XV. Calcutta: Asiatic Society. 1825.
- YULE, Cathay.* Cathay and the way thither; being a collection of medieval notices of China, translated and edited by Colonel Henry Yule, &c. With a preliminary essay on the intercourse between China and the Western nations previous to the discovery of the Cape route. London: Hakluyt Society. Vols. I.—II. 1866.

N.B. In addition to the above the usual abbreviations have been used in references to Orientalist periodicals; thus J.R.A.S. (Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society), Ind. Ant. (Indian Antiquary), Z.D.M.G. (Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft), &c.

Quotations by book and verse, without a preceding title or abbreviation, refer to passages of the Râdjatarangini in the present translation.

INTRODUCTION

TO KALHANA'S RĀJATARANGINĪ.

INTRODUCTION

TO

KALHAṆA'S RĀJATARANGINĪ

PRELIMINARY.

It has often been said of the India of the Hindus that it possessed no history. The remark is true if we apply it to history as a science and art, such as classical culture in its noblest prose works has bequeathed it to us. But it is manifestly wrong if by history is meant either historical development or the materials for studying it. India has never known among its Śāstras the study of history such as Greece and Rome cultivated or as modern Europe understands it. Yet the materials for such a study are equally at our disposal in India. They are contained not only in such original sources of information as inscriptions, coins and antiquarian remains generally; advancing research has also proved that written records of events or of traditions concerning them have by no means been wanting in ancient India.

Historical literature in India, &c.

This is not the place to examine the causes which in India have prevented the growth of a historical literature in the Western sense of the word. They are most closely connected with deep-rooted peculiarities of Indian thought and culture which have rendered the mind of the Indian scholar indifferent to the search for the bare truths of historical facts and have effectively prevented it from arriving at the perception of historical development and change.

It is a direct result of these causes that we find the great mass of what we must call records of Indian history, in departments of literature which to the student of European history would appear distant from the field of his research. Much of what popular tradition had retained of the events of an early past, has found its way, overgrown and interwoven with myths and legends, into the Indian epics, the Purāṇas, and the fable literature. The object to which we owe such records of traditional lore, was didactic and religious, but not historical.

On the other hand we find that artificial Sanskrit poetry has availed itself, probably from an early date, of historical themes. They serve in this case mainly as a framework for the display of all the subtle poetic art and rhetorical embellishment which constitute the characteristic object and raison d'être of the Kāvya. It is no mere chance that almost all 'historical Kāvya' (Caritas) which have yet come to light, deal with the exploits of the poets' princely patrons or the latter's immediate predecessors. Sanskrit poetry of the Kāvya type has always been an artificial product, dependent more than any other branch of Indian scholarship—for as such we must class it—on courtly patronage. If then the Kavi had enough originality to choose his theme outside the hackneyed spheres of mythology and romance, what subject more suitable could he find than the life of the ruler who was likely to reward his labours?

Historical Kāvya.

This restriction of the subject of the historical Kāvya has effected in two directions its value as a source of historical information. The fact that it treats of contemporary events represents an undoubted advantage. But this is impaired to no small extent by the obvious limitations implied by the panegyrical character of these poems. As the events described are supposed to be well known to the reader, the author's skill is not directed towards a lucid exposition of the facts and their causes, but rather towards their poetic embellishment. Hence results a striking want of accurate details without which the narrative cannot attain true historic reality, and an equally striking abundance of obscure allusions, the point of which must necessarily often escape us.

This character of the Caritas directly accounts for their rare preservation. Written for the delectation of a particular court and period, they were bound soon to lose popularity if they ever attained it. When no longer read by the Paṇḍita, these works ceased to be copied, and the few extant manuscripts were exposed to all the risks attending Indian libraries. We can hence scarcely feel surprised that so few only of these texts should have come down to us.¹

Character and scope of Kalhapa's
Chronicles.

The interest of Kalhapa's Rajatarāṅgiṇī for Indian history generally lies in the fact that it represents a class of Sanskrit composition which comes nearest in character to the Chronicles of Mediæval Europe and of the Muhammadan East. Together with the later Kāśmīr Chronicles which continue Kalhapa's narrative, it is practically the sole extant specimen of this class.

A Kāvya in form and conception the Rajatarāṅgiṇī has yet a scope and aim widely different from that of the Caritas we have previously noticed. Its author's object is to offer a connected narrative of the various dynasties which ruled Kāśmīr from the earliest period down to his own time. He begins with the legends which represent the popular traditions of the country regarding its earliest history. These he follows up by a narrative of subsequent reigns taken from older written records and arranged in a strictly chronological order. The final portion of the work, considerable both in extent and historical interest, is devoted to an account of the events which the author knew by personal experience or from the relation of living witnesses. These events are narrated from the point of view of a more or less independent Chronicler and by no means with the purely panegyrical object of the court-poet, which reigns supreme in the Caritas.

Kalhapa nowhere claims the merit of originality for the plan and form of his work. On the contrary, he refers to various earlier compositions on the history of Kāśmīr kings which he had used. But none of these older works has come down to us. Nor has Sanskrit literature in any other part of India preserved for us remains of Chronicles similar to the Rajatarāṅgiṇī, though indications of their former existence have come to light in various quarters. The complete loss of such texts makes it impossible for us to ascertain what Kalhapa's work owed to an earlier development, or to judge of its character and its value for historical research by a comparative standard.

¹ To Professor Bühler belongs the merit of having first recognized the historical value of the Caritas. He has explained their character and the cause of their disappearance with admirable lucidity in the introduction to his edition of the Viṅśatīkhandakavya, pp. 1 sqq.

If we wish to throw light on these points, we can only turn to the Chronicle itself. From the indications scattered through the narrative we can gather some instructive facts regarding the author's personality and the time and surroundings in which he lived. A brief analysis of his sources, methods, and style will show us in outline the aims and principles which guided him in his labours. Finally we may endeavour, by a critical examination of Kalhapa's narrative and chronology, to ascertain the value of the several portions of his work as sources of historical information.

CHAPTER I.

THE AUTHOR OF THE CHRONICLE.

SECTION I.—KALHANA'S PERSON AND DESCENT.

Scantiness of biographical data.

1. KALHANA has shared the fate of so many Indian authors of note whose memory lives solely in their works. There is no record to tell us of the life of the scholar-poet to whom we owe our knowledge of the history of old Kāśmīr. Nor do we even meet with the name of Kalhana except in the colophons of his work and in the introductory notice which his successor and continuator Junarāja has prefixed to his own Chronicle, three centuries later. It is from Kalhana's work alone that we can gather some facts regarding his origin and person.

The colophons which are attached to the end of each Book of the Rajataranginī, ascribe its composition to "Kalhana, the son of the great Kāśmīrian minister, the illustrious Lord Cappaka." There is no reason to doubt the authenticity of the information conveyed to us in these colophons. They are found already in the codex which is the archetype of our extant Manuscripts. In view of their form which gives honorific titles merely to the father of the author, these colophons may be assumed with great probability to go back to Kalhana himself.²

Date of Kalhana's
work, A.D. 1148-49.

Kalhana wrote the introduction of his Chronicle in the year 4224 of the Laukika era or A.D. 1148-49, and completed his work in the year following.³ Considering this date and the significance of the above titles, the identity of Kalhana's father with the CAPPKA who is repeatedly mentioned in the Chronicle as one of the chief officials of King Harṣa (A.D. 1089-1101), becomes highly probable. Collateral evidence supporting this opinion is supplied by the Chronicle itself.

Cappaka, Kal-
hāna's father.

2. In the several passages which mention Cappaka, we find the latter invariably spoken of with evident respect for his character and activity. We first meet him as lord of the Gate (dvārapati) or commandant of the frontier defences in the latter part of Harṣa's reign. On the occasion of the king's expedition against the castle of Dugdhaghāta on the Darad frontier, shortly before A.D. 1099, Cappaka's success in effecting the investment of that mountain stronghold notwithstanding the intrigues of official rivals is specially eulogized.⁴ When relating Harṣa's desperate struggle for his crown and life, Kalhana mentions Cappaka amongst the last few officials who loyally held out by the king's side. He is careful to explain Cappaka's absence at the final catastrophe by a detailed account of the special mission which the doomed king entrusted to him.⁵ The dialogue which Kalhana puts into the mouth of king and minister, bears every appearance of historic truth. Reference is made in it to a particular incident which, from the nature of the case, could not have well been remembered by any one except Cappaka himself.⁶ Its special record and that of the whole dialogue becomes intelligible in the light of the fact that Kalhana was the minister's son.

² See Rajāt. i. 52; vii. 3404.

³ vii. 1177 sqq.

⁴ vii. 1586 sqq.

⁵ vii. 1591.

⁶ vii. 1591.

This connection, too, explains the exact and graphic account which Kalhaṇa is able to give us of the flight of the unfortunate king from the capital and of his tragic death.⁶ The only companions of Harṣa on his flight and during the few days of his hiding were his faithful chamberlain Prayāga, and Mukta, a menial servant of Caṇpaka's household. The former was killed fighting together with his royal master. Mukta alone escaped death under circumstances which Kalhaṇa takes special care to explain and justify.⁷ It is evident that he had received his account of Harṣa's last days from this sole surviving witness who belonged to his father's household.

Information derived from Caṇpaka.

Kalhaṇa describes Caṇpaka as a fervent worshipper at the Tīrthas of Nandi-kṣetra, the present Butthśēr.⁸ This accounts for the intimate acquaintance he himself displays with that sacred site.⁹ As Caṇpaka's son he was likely to have accompanied his father on his regular annual visits to the Tīrthas. From a reference to the latter it appears that Caṇpaka was yet living about the year A.D. 1136.¹⁰

Incidental notices of the Rajataranginī enable us to trace yet another close relative of Kalhaṇa. The Chronicle relates among many extravagant acts of Harṣa that the music-loving king presented one lakh of gold coins to KANAKA, a younger brother of Caṇpaka, who had gained his favour by taking lessons in singing from him.¹¹ The same Kanaka is subsequently praised for having proved himself grateful to the memory of his royal patron. He retired, after the latter's death, to Benares and ended there his days in pious resignation.¹²

Kanaka, probably an uncle of Kalhaṇa.

If this younger brother of Caṇpaka was in reality Kalhaṇa's uncle, as there seems every reason to assume, we can account for Harṣa's extravagant present by the family's high position. Kalhaṇa also mentions as another meritorious act of Kanaka that by his timely intercession he saved the colossal Buddha image at Parihāsapura, his birthplace, from destruction by King Harṣa.¹³ The saving of the only other Buddha statue, which escaped the king's clutches, is ascribed to the Buddhist Śramaṇa Kuśalaśrī. In view of this company it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that Kanaka, too, was personally connected in some way with Buddhist worship. We shall see below how well this conclusion agrees with certain observations regarding Kalhaṇa's own attitude towards Buddhism.

From the mention of Parihāsapura as Kanaka's birthplace, we may infer that this town was the original home of Kalhaṇa's family. We owe probably to this circumstance the detailed references which Kalhaṇa makes to the sacred buildings of Parihāsapura, and the close acquaintance he shows with the topography of that neighbourhood.¹⁴

3. It can scarcely be doubted that Kalhaṇa's family was Brahman by caste. Sanskrit learning of the type displayed in the Rajataranginī has, in Kāśmir, as

Kalhaṇa's,
Brahman descent.

⁶ See vii. 1024 sqq.

⁷ vii. 1701 sq.

⁸ Compare vii. 954 and note; also viii. 2365.

The abrupt manner in which Caṇpaka is introduced to us in the first-named passage, appears to me a further indication of his identity with the Chronicle's father. Kalhaṇa when first mentioning new personages in his narrative, ordinarily particularizes their origin and position. The omission of such particulars in the case of Caṇpaka is significant. Kalhaṇa, who seems never to have troubled himself about making his narrative intelligible to other than contemporary readers (see below, § 40), naively considers further particulars about his own father unnecessary.

⁹ See note i. 86; i. 107 and the passages quoted in the note, also i. 121.

¹⁰ See viii. 2365.

¹¹ vii. 1117.

¹² See viii. 19 sq.

¹³ vii. 1097 sq.

¹⁴ Compare iv. 194-204 (Note F), 323 sq.; vii. 1326 sqq.; 1344 sqq.; v. 97-100 (Note I).

elsewhere in India, been always cultivated chiefly if not exclusively, by Pandits of Brahman descent. Kalhana betrays in more than one passage the conscious pride of 'the gods on earth' and his full sympathy with Brahminical self-assertion.¹⁵ We have besides the direct testimony of Jonarāja who refers to Kalhana with the epithet dvija.¹⁶

Kalhana's S'aiva
cult.

The introductory verses prefixed to each Book of the Chronicle all contain prayers addressed to S'iva in his form of Arđhanārīśvara, representing the god in his union with Pārvati. It is hence clear that Kalhana was attached to S'aiva worship which, as far as we can go back, has always occupied the first place among the Hindu cults of the Valley. This is in full accord with what we know of his father Cāpaka's pious visits and gifts to the Tirthus of Nandikōṣṭra, all of which are sacred to S'iva. From the respectful way in which Kalhana refers to Bhaṭṭa Kalāṭa, one of the chief expositors of the Kāśmīrian S'aivaśāstra,¹⁷ it appears probable that the transcendental doctrines based on the S'aiva creed, were not foreign to him. Tantric cult which in Kāśmīr is still closely connected with S'aiva worship, seems also to have been well known to Kalhana. Various ironical allusions, however, show that he entertained but scant regard for the individuals who posed as its privileged hierophants.¹⁸

Kalhana's interest
in Buddhism.

The above facts indicate a close attachment to S'aivism on the part of both Kalhana and his father. It is curious to note also by side with it the manifestly friendly attitude which Kalhana displays towards Buddhism throughout the whole of his Chronicle. A long series of kings, from Aśoka down to his own time, receives his unstinted praise for the Vihāras and Stūpas they founded for the benefit of the Buddhist creed.¹⁹ Similar foundations by private individuals are recorded with the same attention. Others, like Mōghavāhana, are praised for having in accordance with the 'Jina's' teaching prohibited the slaughter of animals.²⁰ Kalhana does not hesitate to refer repeatedly to the Bodhisattvas or to Buddha himself as the comforters of all beings, the embodiments of perfect charity and nobility of feeling. They are to him beings of absolute goodness "who do not feel anger even against the sinner, but in patience render him kindness."²¹ It is impossible to read Kalhana's detailed account of the legend of the Kṛtyāśrama Vihāra (i. 131-147), with its plainly marked Buddhist tendency and phraseology, without realizing the author's sympathy with Buddhist traditions.

We note the same feeling in the numerous references which Kalhana makes to images of Buddha claiming special interest.²² When describing the sacrilegious confiscations of Harsa, he is as particular to name the Buddha-statues which were preserved, as the images of Hindu gods which shared that distinction.²³ In addition it deserves to be noted that Kalhana takes care to show us on more than one occasion his thorough familiarity with special points of Buddhist tradition and terminology.²⁴

¹⁵ See, e.g., the characteristic account of King Jayasīdha's end, iv. 631 sqq., 640 sqq.; v. 16 sq., 48 sqq.; the description of Yaśas-kara's reign, vi. 2 sqq.; the story of the Brahman's revenge, viii. 2227 sqq., etc.

¹⁶ See Jonar. 5.

¹⁷ v. 66; compare regarding the S'aiva philosophy of Kāśmīr and its several schools, Prof. BÜHLER's Report, pp. 77 sqq.

¹⁸ See vi. 11 sq. and the humorous hits at Tantric Gurus, vii. 278 sqq., 295 sqq., 528, 712.

¹⁹ For a complete list of such Buddhist foundations compare the Index, s.vv. vihāra, caitya, and stūpa.

²⁰ iii. 4-7, 27 sqq., 255 sq.; v. 64, 119.

²¹ i. 184 sqq.; iii. 28; viii. 2284, 2574.

²² iii. 355, 464; iv. 200, 259-263, 507; vi. 172 sq.; vii. 606; viii. 1184.

²³ vii. 1087 sq.

²⁴ Compare i. 135 sqq., 172 sq.; viii. 240, 2284.

4. The contrast which this partiality for Buddhist cult and traditions presents to the avowed S'aivism of Kalhaṇa, is more apparent than real. For centuries before Kalhaṇa's time Buddhism and the orthodox creeds had existed peacefully side by side in Kāśmīr. As far as the laity was concerned, they had to a great extent amalgamated. His own narrative from the point where it reaches historical ground, gives ample proof of this. Of almost all royal and private individuals, who are credited with the foundation of Buddhist Stūpas and Vihāras, it is recorded that they, or at least members of their family, with equal zeal endowed also shrines of S'iva or Viṣṇu.²⁵ In Kalhaṇa's own time we note that every contemporary royal personage or minister who is praised for his Buddhist endowments, showed the same pious liberality also in regard to Brahminical temples and establishments.²⁶

Contemporary
Buddhism in
Kāśmīr.

The condition of religious feeling indicated by these facts is amply illustrated by what we know of the position of heterodox creeds in other parts of India, both ancient or modern. Of early historical instances when they shared the royal patronage equally with Brahminical cults, it will suffice to cite the well-known example of King Harsavardhana of Kanauj. Hiun Tsiang relates as an eye-witness how Buddhists and Jaiṇas, as well as the Brahmans, received equal honours and support at his court. Exactly at the time of Kalhaṇa Gujrāt furnishes us with a striking illustration of the same fact. Professor Bühler in his admirable biography of Hōmacandra, has fully proved that the Caulukya King Kumārapāla whom the great Jaina doctor could claim as his most famous convert, never ceased to maintain his hereditary attachment to the cult of S'iva.²⁷

Yet undoubtedly the Jainism of the twelfth century in Gujrāt was both in doctrine and practice far less accommodating to orthodox notions than the Kāśmīr Buddhism of the same period. From various indications it appears that the condition of the latter must have closely approached the state of modern Buddhism in Nepāl.²⁸ Kāśmīr had its married Bhikṣus long before Kalhaṇa's time.²⁹ Buddha had centuries earlier been received into the orthodox pantheon as one of Viṣṇu's Avatāras,³⁰ and Buddhist worship had not failed to reap the practical benefits of such recognition. Hence we find that the Nilamatapurāṇa, the canonical authority for Brahminical cult in Kāśmīr, directly prescribes the celebration of Buddha's birthday as a great festival. His statue is then to be worshipped according to the rites of the S'ākyas or Buddhist ascetics; the latter themselves are to be honoured with presents and the Caityas to be decorated.³¹

²⁵ Compare regarding Laṭṭaditya, iv. 188, 200, 203 with iv. 189 sq., 192, 195 sqq., etc.; regarding Jayāpīḍa, iv. 507 with iv. 508; for Queen Didda, vi. 303 with vi. 299 sq., 304, etc. It is characteristic that Kāśmīr tradition knows the great Aśoka both as a founder of Vihāras and Stūpas and as a fervent worshipper at the ancient S'iva shrines; see i. 102 sq. and i. 105 sqq.

²⁶ Compare for King Sussala, viii. 580 and 579; Jayasīṃha, viii. 3318; Queen Ratnādēvī, viii. 2402 and 2433-41; the minister Rāhṇa, a patron of Kalhaṇa, viii. 2410 sq. and 2409, 3364, sqq.; his wife Sussala, viii. 2415, 2417 and 2418; Bhūṭa, viii. 2481 and 2480, 2432;

Dhanya, viii. 3343 and 2419; Udaya, viii. 3352 sq. and 2420.

²⁷ See Über das Leben des Jaina Monches Hemachandra, pp. 203, 209 sq.

²⁸ Compare Hodgson, Essays, p. 52.

²⁹ See note iii. 12.

³⁰ See BÜHLER, Report, pp. 41, 47. Kṣemendra, a century before Kalhaṇa, duly devotes one canto (ix.) of his Dakṣa-tārācarita to an accurate enough life of S'ākyamuni.

³¹ Nilamata, 697-703; also BÜHLER, Report, p. 41.

It is a curious fact that Buddha's birthday still retains a place in the Calendars of modern Kāśmīr Brahmans.

elsewhere in India, been always cultivated chiefly if not exclusively, by Pundits of Brahman descent. Kalhana betrays in more than one passage the conscious pride of 'the gods on earth' and his full sympathy with Brahminical self-assertion.¹⁵ We have besides the direct testimony of Jonarāja who refers to Kalhana with the epithet dvija.¹⁶

Kalhana's S'aiva
cult.

The introductory verses prefixed to each Book of the Chronicle all contain prayers addressed to Śiva in his form of Ardhanārīśvara, representing the god in his union with Pārvatī. It is hence clear that Kalhana was attached to Śaiva worship which, as far as we can go back, has always occupied the first place among the Hindu cults of the Valley. This is in full accord with what we know of his father Canpaka's pious visits and gifts to the Tirthas of Nandikēśvara, all of which are sacred to Śiva. From the respectful way in which Kalhana refers to Bhaṭṭa Kalata, one of the chief expositors of the Kāśmīrian Śaivaśāstra,¹⁷ it appears probable that the transcendental doctrines based on the Śaiva creed, were not foreign to him. Tantric cult which in Kāśmīr is still closely connected with Śaiva worship, seems also to have been well known to Kalhana. Various ironical allusions, however, show that he entertained but scant regard for the individuals who posed as its privileged hierophants.¹⁸

Kalhana's interest
in Buddhism

The above facts indicate a close attachment to Śaivism on the part of both Kalhana and his father. It is curious to note side by side with it the manifestly friendly attitude which Kalhana displays towards Buddhism throughout the whole of his Chronicle. A long series of kings, from Aśoka down to his own time, receives his unstinted praise for the Vihāras and Stūpas they founded for the benefit of the Buddhist creed.¹⁹ Similar foundations by private individuals are recorded with the same attention. Others, like Meghavāhana, are praised for having in accordance with the 'Jina's' teaching prohibited the slaughter of animals.²⁰ Kalhana does not hesitate to refer repeatedly to the Bodhisattvas or to Buddha himself as the comforters of all beings, the embodiments of perfect charity and nobility of feeling. They are to him beings of absolute goodness "who do not feel anger even against the sinner, but in patience render him kindness."²¹ It is impossible to read Kalhana's detailed account of the legend of the Kṛtyāśrama Vihāra (i. 131-147), with its plainly marked Buddhist tendency and phraseology, without realizing the author's sympathy with Buddhist traditions.

We note the same feeling in the numerous references which Kalhana makes to images of Buddha claiming special interest.²² When describing the sacrilegious confiscations of Harṣa, he is as particular to name the Buddha-statues which were preserved, as the images of Hindu gods which shared that distinction.²³ In addition it deserves to be noted that Kalhana takes care to show us on more than one occasion his thorough familiarity with special points of Buddhist tradition and terminology.²⁴

¹⁵ See, e.g., the characteristic account of King Jayapīḍa's end, iv. 631 sqq., 640 sqq.; v. 16 sq., 40 sqq.; the description of Yaśas-kara's reign, vi. 2 sqq.; the story of the Brahman's revenge, viii. 2227 sqq., etc.

¹⁶ See Jonar. 5.

¹⁷ v. 66; compare regarding the Śaiva philosophy of Kāśmīr and its several schools, Prof. BÜLLER'S Report, pp. 77 sqq.

¹⁸ See vi. 11 sq. and the humorous hits at Tantric Gurus, vii. 278 sqq., 295 sqq., 623, 712.

¹⁹ For a complete list of such Buddhist foundations compare the Index, s.vv. vihāra, cātīya, and stūpa.

²⁰ iii. 4-7, 27 sqq., 255 sq.; v. 64, 110.

²¹ i. 134 sqq.; iii. 23; viii. 2234, 2574.

²² iii. 355, 404; iv. 200, 250-268, 507; vi. 172 sq.; vii. 606; viii. 1184.

²³ vii. 1097 sq.

²⁴ Compare i. 135 sqq., 172 sq.; viii. 240, 2234.

4. The contrast which this partiality for Buddhist cult and traditions presents to the avowed Śaivism of Kalhaṇa, is more apparent than real. For centuries before Kalhaṇa's time Buddhism and the orthodox creeds had existed peacefully side by side in Kāśmīr. As far as the laity was concerned, they had to a great extent amalgamated. His own narrative from the point where it reaches historical ground, gives ample proof of this. Of almost all royal and private individuals, who are credited with the foundation of Buddhist Stūpas and Vihāras, it is recorded that they, or at least members of their family, with equal zeal endowed also shrines of Śiva or Viṣṇu.²⁵ In Kalhaṇa's own time we note that every contemporary royal personage or minister who is praised for his Buddhist endowments, showed the same pious liberality also in regard to Brahminical temples and establishments.²⁶

Contemporary
Buddhism in
Kāśmīr.

The condition of religious feeling indicated by these facts is amply illustrated by what we know of the position of heterodox creeds in other parts of India, both ancient or modern. Of early historical instances when they shared the royal patronage equally with Brahminical cults, it will suffice to cite the well-known example of King Harṣavardhana of Kanauj. Hiuen Tsiang relates as an eye-witness how Buddhists and Jains, as well as the Brahmins, received equal honours and support at his court. Exactly at the time of Kalhaṇa Gujrat furnishes us with a striking illustration of the same fact. Professor Bühler in his admirable biography of Hemacandra, has fully proved that the Cālukya King Kumārāpāla whom the great Jaina doctor could claim as his most famous convert, never ceased to maintain his hereditary attachment to the cult of Śiva.²⁷

Yet undoubtedly the Jainism of the twelfth century in Gujrat was both in doctrine and practice far less accommodating to orthodox notions than the Kāśmīr Buddhism of the same period. From various indications it appears that the condition of the latter must have closely approached the state of modern Buddhism in Nepāl.²⁸ Kāśmīr had its married Bhikṣus long before Kalhaṇa's time.²⁹ Buddha had centuries earlier been received into the orthodox pantheon as one of Viṣṇu's Avatāras,³⁰ and Buddhist worship had not failed to reap the practical benefits of such recognition. Hence we find that the Nilamata-purāṇa, the canonical authority for Brahminical cult in Kāśmīr, directly prescribes the celebration of Buddha's birthday as a great festival. His statue is then to be worshipped according to the rites of the Śākya or Buddhist ascetics; the latter themselves are to be honoured with presents and the Caityas to be decorated.³¹

²⁵ Compare regarding Lalitāditya, iv. 188, 200, 208 with iv. 189 sq., 192, 195 sqq., etc.; regarding Jayapīḍa, iv. 507 with iv. 508; for Queen Diddā, vi. 308 with vi. 299 sq., 304, etc. It is characteristic that Kāśmīr tradition knows the great Aśoka both as a founder of Vihāras and Stūpas and as a fervent worshipper at the ancient Śaiva shrines; see i. 102 sq. and i. 106 sqq.

²⁶ Compare for King Sussala, viii. 580 and 579; Jayasinha, viii. 3818; Queen Ratnādevī, viii. 2402 and 2433-41; the minister Rāhāṇa, a patron of Kalhaṇa, viii. 2410 sq. and 2409, 3384, sqq.; his wife Sussala, viii. 2415, 2417 and 2418; Bhṛṅga, viii. 2431 and 2430, 2432;

Dhanya, viii. 3343 and 2419; Udaya, viii. 3352 sq. and 2420.

²⁷ See Über das Leben des Jaina Mönches Hemacandra, pp. 208, 209 sq.

²⁸ Compare Hodgson, Essays, p. 52.

²⁹ See note iii. 12.

³⁰ See BÜHLER, Report, pp. 41, 47. Kṣemendra, a century before Kalhaṇa, duly devotes one canto (ix.) of his Daśāvatāracarita to an accurate enough life of Śākya-muni.

³¹ Nilamata, 697-703; also BÜHLER, Report, p. 41.

It is a curious fact that Buddha's birthday still retains a place in the Calendars of modern Kāśmīr Brahmins.

SECTION II.—KALHAṆA'S LITERARY TRAINING.

5. The author of the Chronicle tells us nowhere of the education and early studies which had fitted him for his task. But the manner in which he has solved it and occasional indications may help us to trace the outlines of his life as a student.

Kalhaṇa as a Kavi.

"Worthy of praise is that power of true poets, whatever it may be, which surpasses even the stream of nectar, inasmuch as by it their own bodies of glory as well as those of others obtain immortality. Who else but poets able to bring forth lovely productions, can place the past times before the eyes of men!" These words with which Kalhaṇa opens the introduction to his work, suffice to show us what qualification he considered the chief one for the task he had undertaken.

Even if Kalhaṇa had been less outspoken on the point, no reader of the original work could doubt for a moment that its author looked upon himself mainly in the light of a Kavi. Sanskrit classical poetry of the Kāvya type, such as Kalhaṇa knew and cultivated, presupposes a thorough training in the sciences of Indian rhetoric, the Alaṃkāraśāstra, and an equal mastery of Sanskrit grammatical lore. Kalhaṇa's composition proves amply that his studies in those departments of traditional learning had been both thorough and extensive.

The form and style which, as we shall see, Kalhaṇa chose for his poem, do not allow of that lavish display of intricate rhetorical art which delights the heart of the Pandit. But the occasions are not unfrequent when the Chronicler has succumbed to the charm of that poetic 'amplification' which, as he tells us, he had purposed to avoid (i. 6). The verses to which we are then treated, leave no doubt that their author had learned to apply with great skill and dexterity the more subtle arts of the Alaṃkāraśāstra.¹

Kalhaṇa's literary studies.

6. The conventionality pervading so much of Kāvya literature, and the substantive identity of the rhetorical precepts followed by its authors, make it difficult to ascertain the particular works which Kalhaṇa knew and studied. His acquaintance with the older standard Kāvyas, such as the Raghuvamśa and Meghadūta, may be assumed a priori, and is proved in fact by several overt reminiscences.² A closer search in this direction than I was able to make, would probably show the same for a number of other texts of that description.

Study of the Vikramādhikādevacarita.

That Kalhaṇa had carefully studied the Vikramādhikādevacarita, the historical poem of his fellow-countryman Bilhana, written about the eighth decade of the eleventh century, may be considered as certain.³ Kalhaṇa shows himself thoroughly acquainted with the personal history of his fellow-poet, as detailed in the latter's work. He also refers in at least two passages to historical incidents which are mentioned by Bilhana. He does this in terms which clearly indicate an acquaintance with the older poem.⁴ In view of this evidence the strongly marked general resemblance in phraseology and style which can be traced between the two works, assumes full significance.

¹ Compare for such passages, e.g., i. 208 sq.; iii. 414 sq.; v. 343 sqq., 361 sqq.; vii. 928 sqq., 1567 sqq.; viii. 842 sqq., 947 sqq., 1334 sqq., etc.

² See note vii. 312.

³ Compare for this text and its author Prof. BILHANA'S Introduction to his edition of the poem, Bombay, 1875.

⁴ See notes vii. 935-937, 260 and iii. 378.

Another and earlier work which Kalhaṇa appears to have closely studied, is Bāṇa's Harṣacarita, the well-known historical romance describing the exploits of King Harṣavardhana of Kanaṇj and Thāṇesar. The number of rare words and phrases which this text and the Rājatarāṅgiṇī have in common, and which otherwise cannot be traced, makes the above conclusion practically certain.⁵ In style and composition the difference between Bāṇa's work, with its highly poetical but equally florid prose, and the Chronicle of Kalhaṇa is so great that no slavish imitation could be imputed to the latter. On the other hand, we can easily understand why the Kāśmīrian author should have devoted close attention to the novel of Harṣavardhana's court poet. It was one of the few older Sanskrit compositions dealing with historical events which are likely to have enjoyed popularity in his own time.⁶

Study of Harṣacarita.

7. Leaving the field of Kāvya literature we must ascribe to Kalhaṇa a very intimate knowledge of the Mahābhārata. Whenever he desires to illustrate his narrative by a reference to similar events or to emphasize a point of moral judgment, he turns to this vast store-house of traditional lore.⁷ His allusions are often made to little-known episodes and obscure incidents. The trouble which their identification has frequently cost, enables us to judge of the labours Kalhaṇa must have devoted to the thorough mastery of the gigantic Epic. He seems to have been equally well acquainted with the Rāmāyana though his quotations from it are less numerous.⁸

Kalhaṇa's knowledge of the Epics.

We can easily trace the connection between this close study of Sanskrit epic literature and Kalhaṇa's work as a Chronicler. To Kalhaṇa as to the Paṇḍit of the present day, the legends clustering round the war of the Kurus and Pāṇḍavas and the life of Rāma, with the mythology attaching to them, all appeared in the light of real history. What distinguishes these epic stories to the Indian mind from events of historical times, is only their superior interest due to the glamour of a heroic age, and their record by sacred authority. We may safely surmise that the study of the sacred epics had directly influenced Kalhaṇa in the choice of his task.

We have probably indications of Kalhaṇa's literary training also in the frequent incidental references which he makes to particular poets and scholars in the reigns of various kings.⁹ These notices are of considerable interest for the history of Sanskrit literature. It is not easy to say which of these literary data were derived from Kalhaṇa's own reading, and which simply reproduced from the earlier sources to be noticed thereafter. Some, like the mention of the poets who flourished at Yaśovarman's court,¹⁰ are more likely to have been supplied by current literary tradition than by older Kāśmīrian Chronicles. To the former we may attribute also Kalhaṇa's acquaintance with several poetical dicta, chiefly satirical, which he quotes on occasion.¹¹ In addition it may be noted that he had literary history.

Knowledge of

⁵ Compare for detailed evidence, Note i.

⁶ Old MSS. of the Harṣacarita are by no means rare in Kāśmir, and a passage from it is quoted in the old Kāśmīrian handbook of rhetoric, the Kāvyaaprakāśa.

⁷ For Kalhaṇa's references to the Mahābhārata, compare i. 119 sq.; ii. 94 sq.; iii. 276; iv. 76, 103, 521, 600, 626, 641; vii. 510, 535, 804, 1168, 1365, 1476, 1718; viii. 335, 469, 670, 692, 1003, 1160, 1280, 1355, 2025, 2122, 2170, 2250, 2280, 2305 sq., 2336, 2789, 2811, 2848, 2911 sq., 2948, 2977, 3449. Several of these passages contain allusions to more than one story of the Mahābhārata.

⁸ See iii. 66; iv. 67, 107; vi. 226; vii. 1202; viii. 335, 1355, 1591, 1808 sqq., 2322, 2376, 3159, 3449.

⁹ See i. 178; ii. 16; iv. 144, 488 sq., 495 sqq., 705; v. 28, 32 sqq., 204.

¹⁰ iv. 144 (Bhavabhūti, Vākpatirāja).

¹¹ iii. 181, 252; iv. 635-637; vii. 1123 sqq.

evidently also devoted some attention to the Jyotiḥśāstra, as shown by the references made to passages of Vaṛāhamihira's Brhatśamhitā.¹²

Kaḥaṇa in MAṆKHA'S
S'rikarṇācarita.

8. The literary affinities of Kaḥaṇa which we have just noticed, enable us to trace also a curious contemporary reference to our author which has hitherto escaped attention. It is contained in a passage of the S'rikarṇācarita, a Kāvya composed by the poet MAṆKHA, a fellow-countryman and contemporary of Kaḥaṇa. This work, first brought to light by Professor Bühler, possesses interest for us chiefly on account of its xxv. Canto which has rightly been called altogether unique in Sanskrit literature.¹³ Maṅkha gives us there a detailed description of the Sabhā or literary assembly held at the house of his brother, the minister Alaukārā, at which he submitted his poem to a gathering of Kāśmīrian scholars and officials. He introduces to us the guests present at the occasion by their names, in each case adding some appropriate details as to their respective Śāstras and personal attainments.

Professor Bühler has already shown that Maṅkha wrote his poem only a few years before the composition of Kaḥaṇa's Chronicle. Its date must fall between the years A.D. 1128 and 1144.¹⁴ Considering this close approach in time, we might reasonably expect to meet also with Kaḥaṇa in Alaukārā's Sabhā, the representative character of which is proved by the mention of no less than thirty individual scholars. Yet at first we look in vain for Kaḥaṇa's name in this long list. Its absence seemed all the more curious in view of the fact that Kaḥaṇa himself mentions both Maṅkha and Alaukārā among his contemporaries and in a manner implying some acquaintance with the family.¹⁵ In reality, however, Maṅkha on his own part has not failed to mention his distinguished fellow-poet, the author of our Chronicle. But the name by which he refers to him, is, on the first look, so different from our familiar "Kaḥaṇa," that we can scarcely feel surprised at the Chronicle having so far not been recognized in this incognito.

Maṅkha's notice of the poet Kalyāṇa.

Maṅkha in his account of the 'Sabhā,' devotes three verses to a complimentary notice of the Kavi KALYĀṆA.¹⁶ He describes him as holding a distinguished position among the expert masters of the Kāvya, as a person whom "the illustrious Alakadattā thought capable of accomplishing fully his chosen task [as a composer of poetry]." Of Kalyāṇa's poetic skill he says that it had become so polished as to be capable of reflecting like a mirror the whole perfection of Bīḍhaṇa's muse.

¹² i. 55 sq.; vii. 1720; viii. 715.

¹³ See Report, p. 50.

¹⁴ The limit of the second date is fixed by two indications. Govindacandra, ruler of Kanauj, whose ambassador Sihala is mentioned among Alaukārā's guests, reigned according to the inscriptions, between A.D. 1120 and 1144; see Report, p. 51. It is further to be observed that Kaḥaṇa when speaking of Alaukārā, Maṅkha's brother, in connection with events which took place A.D. 1144, mentions him as holding the high office of Rājasthāniya; compare viii. 2557, 2618, etc., and note viii. 2423. Maṅkha, on the other hand, speaks of his brother as Sūmadhi-vigraha, or minister of foreign affairs (see S'rikarṇācar. iii. 62; xxv. 61). This must have been undoubtedly Alaukārā's earlier office, as Maṅkha distinctly says that it was bestowed upon him already by King Sussala. Maṅkha himself had succeeded to it when Kaḥaṇa wrote (see viii. 3351).

As regards the limit of the first date the mention made by Maṅkha of Jayasīṃha (A.D. 1128-1149) as his ruling sovereign (iii. 60) is conclusive evidence. Prof. Bühler took A.D. 1135 as the earlier limit of date, but I am unable to find his exact evidence for this. On general grounds I am inclined to believe that the time of the composition of the S'rikarṇācarita lies nearer to A.D. 1141 than to the earlier date: comp. the reference made to Aparāditya, king of the Kōṭkaṇa, who still ruled, A.D. 1146.

¹⁵ Compare notes viii. 2423, 3351, and for S'hyāṭra, another brother of Maṅkha, note viii. 2422.

¹⁶ S'rikarṇācar. xxv. 78-80.

Finally it is noted of him that he knew no limit in his enthusiastic devotion to the study of stories and legends of many kinds.

From Jonarāja, the commentator of the S'rikanthacarita, we learn that the otherwise unknown Alakadatta whom Maṅkha evidently wishes to mention as Kalyāṇa's patron, held the position of Sāṁdhivigrahaka or minister of foreign affairs. He further correctly indicates that by the kathās, in the study of which Kalyāṇa is said to have been so deeply interested, the stories of the Mahābhārata and other epic texts are meant. But of Kalyāṇa's person himself the learned commentator has nothing to tell us.

9. I think, we can easily and conclusively show that this poet Kalyāṇa, Maṅkha's distinguished contemporary, who emulated Bilhana and who was deeply read in epic lore, is no one else but our Kalhaṇa. The name Kalhaṇa is undoubtedly an Apabhraṁśa form derived through Prakrit Kallāna from Skr. Kalyāṇa, which being a word of auspicious meaning ('happy,' 'blessed'), is often found as a proper name. The consonantal group ly becomes by a regular phonetic law lh in Prakrit, and this again is liable to appear as lh in Apabhraṁśa and the modern Indo-Aryan Vernaculars. Thus Skr. kalyāṇ, 'to-morrow,' which is found as kalhu in Prakrit, reappears in forms like kalh, kālh, kalha, kālha in the several modern Vernaculars.¹⁷ The shortening of ā into a in the second syllable is similarly accounted for by well-known facts of phonetic conversion.¹⁸

Name Kalhaṇa an
Ap. derivative
from Kalyāṇa.

In proof of this derivation of Kalhaṇa < Kalyāṇa we may point to the intermediary Prakrit form Kullāna which actually occurs as the name of a person in the Rājatarāṅgiṇī.¹⁹ By its side we meet in the Chronicle once with the name in its Apabhraṁśa form Kalhaṇa, and more frequently with the Skr. form of the name, Kalyāṇa.²⁰ We can trace the same name as a feminine appellation in an exactly corresponding triplet of forms. To the Skr. Kalyāṇadevī, 'Queen Kalyāṇa,' the name borne by one of Jayāpīḍa's queens, correspond the names Kallanā and Kalhanikā (from Skr. Kalyāṇikā*), borne by royal ladies at the court of Kalāśa and Jayasimha, respectively.²¹

We shall have occasion to note below how often Kalhaṇa himself in his Chronicle introduces to us the identical persons under names which show similar phonetic modifications.²² We can hence feel in no way surprised on observing that Maṅkha has recorded his fellow-poet's name in its correct Sanskrit form while the colophons of Kalhaṇa's own work present it in the corresponding Apabhraṁśa

¹⁷ Compare Dr. GRIERSON'S Phonology, Z.D.M.G., i. p. 32, § 97.

Dr. Grierson, to whose kindness I owe this and the other references on the phonetic question involved, mentions as further examples of the change, Skr. ly > Pr. lh > Apabh. lh, Skr. paryasyati > Pr. pallattai or palhattai; comp. Hemacandra, iv. 200; Skr. ṣilla, 'kite' > Pr. ṣilla > Bihārī ṣil or ṣilh. The frequent change of Pr. ṣ into ṣh (ṣh for ṣ, etc.), Vararuci, iv. 33, offers an exact parallel.

¹⁸ "When a word begins with two long syllables, the second of which has the stress-accent, the secondary accent on the first syllable often attracts the first accent to itself, and the syllable which would ordinarily bear the stress-accent, is shortened;" GRIERSON, Phonology, § 11. Thus Skr. Kalyāṇa, Pr. Kāllāṇa becomes Ap. Kāllāṇa. Compare Skr. pāṇya > Ap. pāṇya; Skr. kāyātha > Pr. kāyāthi > Hindi kāyath, etc. See also Hemacandra, iv. 329.

¹⁹ vii. 182.

²⁰ For Kalhaṇa, a Rājaputra, son of Saha-deva, see viii. 926; for persons called Kalyāṇa, iv. 679; viii. 609 (abbreviated from Kalyāṇacandra), 2605.

²¹ Compare iv. 461, 467, etc.; vii. 298; viii. 1648, 3039.

The name Kalha, borne by the lord of Kalinjara who is often mentioned in Books vii. and viii., is evidently the Apabhraṁśa representative of Skr. Kalya ('vigorous').

²² See below, § 40, for doublets like Gagacandra > Gaggacandra; Loṣṭhaka > Loṭhaka, etc.

form. It is likely that the latter was the one used ordinarily by the Chronicler himself. He at least shows no objection to the use of Apabhraṃśa names when speaking of his contemporaries, while Mañkha, on the other hand, seems anxious to preserve a quasi-classical colouring and hence employs almost exclusively Sanskrit names for the persons figuring in his xxv. Canto.

Identity of Kalyāṇa
with Kaḥḥaṇa.

The substantial identity of the names as here demonstrated, and the coincidence in date would alone, I believe, be sufficient to make it highly probable that the Kavi Kalyāṇa of the S'rikanṭhacarita is the same person as Kaḥḥaṇa, the author of our Chronicle. Any possible doubt on the point must, however, give way before the evidence which is afforded by the close agreement we note between Mañkha's words regarding Kalyāṇa and our previous observations regarding Kaḥḥaṇa's literary leanings. A careful perusal of the Itājataruṅgim fully illustrates both the influence of Bilhana's poetry on Kaḥḥaṇa and the latter's exhaustive study of epic literature.

It is certainly curious that Jonarāja had evidently not realized the identity of Kalyāṇa with the author whose Chronicle he himself continued. In explanation it is enough to point out that Jonarāja wrote fully three hundred years after the date of Kaḥḥaṇa, and that his comments on the S'rikanṭhacarita in more than one instance betray a deficient knowledge of the realia of that earlier period.

It would be more difficult at present to give an explanation for Kaḥḥaṇa's complete silence as regards Alakadatta whom Mañkha's words seem to indicate as his patron. Various reasons* might be thought of, but for none can we find at present any evidence. It has, however, to be kept in view that years had passed between the time when Mañkha's poem was composed and the date of Kaḥḥaṇa's Chronicle. Such an interval might well have brought about a change in the personal relations of the Chronicler and his former patron.

SECTION III.—KALHAṆA AND HIS TIME.

10. If Kaḥḥaṇa had, like the vast majority of his fellow Kavis, chosen a legendary tale or a romance from the land of fancy as the subject-matter of his poem, we should have to rest content regarding his personality with the meagre details just discussed. Kaḥḥaṇa's work, however, deals with the history of his own country, and a very large portion of it is devoted to an account of events which Kāśmīr had witnessed within his own lifetime or at least within living memory.

Milieu of Kaḥḥaṇa's life.

These facts place us in a far more advantageous position. We are able to realize the political and social conditions in which Kaḥḥaṇa lived, with a degree of accuracy rarely attainable in the case of any old Indian author. His work gives us a detailed knowledge of the old topography of Kāśmīr. This again, combined with the narrow limits and distinct geographical character of the country, enables us to restore with precision the local milieu in which Kaḥḥaṇa moved. Finally it must be remembered that Kaḥḥaṇa's narrative, particularly where it deals with contemporary events, freely acquaints us with the author's opinions on many points relating to his country and its representative men and classes. We shall see that it is possible to draw from such statements some safe conclusions regarding Kaḥḥaṇa's character and personal relations.

The local surroundings in which Kaḥḥaṇa's life was passed, and the historical development which accounts for the political conditions of his own time, will have to be considered elsewhere. Here we may confine ourselves to a brief sketch of the main events of Kāśmīr history which fell within Kalhaṇa's lifetime, and their influence on contemporary society.

We have already seen that Kalhaṇa, according to his own statement, wrote his work during the years 1148-49. Various indications in the style and spirit of the Chronicle suggest that its author was then no longer a young man. Fortunately, however, we have more distinct evidence on this point in Kalhaṇa's own words. When describing the events which occurred in Srinagar in the spring of A.D. 1121 immediately before King Sussala's restoration, he speaks as an eye-witness of the treacherous conduct of the troops of the usurper Bhikṣācāra.¹

Probable birth-date of Kalhaṇa.

There is much in Kalhaṇa's account of this troubled time and of the first period of Sussala's reign (A.D. 1112-20) that implies personal observation made with a mature mind. It is hence not likely that Kalhaṇa should have been a mere boy at the time. In view of these considerations we can scarcely go far wrong if we place Kalhaṇa's date of birth about the beginning of the century. This approximate date agrees fully with what we know of Kalhaṇa's father Caṇpaka whom we find as an energetic officer holding a high military post about A.D. 1098.²

11. The commencement of the twelfth century is marked in the history of Kāśmīr by an important dynastic revolution which brought about material changes in the political state of the country. King HARṢA whose rule (A.D. 1089-1101) seems at first to have secured to Kāśmīr a period of consolidation and of prosperous peace, had subsequently fallen a victim to his own Nero-like propensities. Heavy fiscal exactions necessitated by a luxurious court, and a cruel persecution of the Dāmaras who formed the landed aristocracy, had led to a rebellion under the leadership of the brothers Uccala and Sussala, two relatives of Harṣa from a side branch of the Lohara dynasty. Harṣa had succumbed in the struggle and had found a tragic death by murder.

Kāśmīr politics in Kalhaṇa's lifetime.

The rebel princes who in their success had threatened to become rivals, avoided a conflict for the crown by a partition of Harṣa's territories. Kāśmīr was to be ruled by UCCALA, the elder brother, while the adjoining hill-state of Lohara, the original home of the family, fell to Sussala. The downfall of Harṣa had been due solely to the rising of the powerful Dāmaras of Kāśmīr, and consequently the latter retained a predominance dangerous alike for the king and the peace of the country. Uccala seems to have held his throne merely by the unscrupulous diplomacy with which he played off one great feudal landholder against the other, and his alliance with the strongest of them, Gargacandra, the lord of Lahara. His reign (A.D. 1101-11) was threatened frequently by the rise of pretenders, and invasions on the part of his own brother Sussala. Ultimately he was murdered by a conspiracy among his trusted officials.

Rappa, one of their number, whom they proclaimed king, occupied the throne only for one brief day, December 8th-9th, A.D. 1111. Gargacandra defeated the conspirators after a short but bloody struggle and thereupon became the true king-maker.³ He first put up SALLANA, a half-brother of the murdered Uccala, who being a mere puppet in the hands of the powerful Dāmara allowed the kingdom to becomes the scene of violent disorders. Internecine struggles of rival Dāmaras and an eruption of Sussala followed by bloody persecutions rendered Salhana's reign of four months like "a long evil dream."¹

¹ viii. 941.

² See above, § 2.

³ Compare Kalhaṇa's words, viii. 425.

SUSSALA'S reign
(A.D. 1112-28).

Ultimately SUSSALA allied himself with Gargacandra and secured through his help the long-coveted throne. In contrast to his elder brother he seems to have been personally brave, but rash, cruel, and inconsiderate. His rule, A.D. 1112-28, was practically one long and disastrous struggle with the irrepressible Dāmaras and with dangerous pretenders. When Sussala after much fighting and treachery had at last succeeded in destroying Gargacandra, the discontent of the Dāmaras broke out in a great general rebellion. In BHIKṢĀCARA, a grandson of Harsa, who had been brought up abroad, they found the desired pretender. Sussala's oppression and senseless cruelties increased their ranks, until they were strong enough to besiege the king in his capital. After a protracted defence during which the capital suffered severely, Sussala was obliged to flee to Lohara.

BHIKṢĀCARA'S
usurpation
(A.D. 1120-21).

Bhikṣācara was crowned in the capital and held nominal rule over Kāśmīr for a little over six months (A.D. 1120-21). He was a mere tool in the hands of rival Dāmaras factions, and the royal authority was so much reduced that Bhikṣācara was at last in difficulty even about procuring food.² Solomni fasts (pragaprasa) held by the Brahmans in the capital and elsewhere showed the extremity to which the people were driven by the rapacity and violence of the Dāmaras and their allies in the official classes. The eyes of the populace turned once more towards Sussala. After successfully rallying a Kāśmīrian force which had been sent against Lohara, Sussala came back to Kāśmīr, and owing to the Dāmaras' disunion, recovered the throne (A.D. 1121).

Civil wars of Sussala's second reign.

12. During the following seven years civil war continued almost without interruption. The king was unable to cope with the powerful supporters of his rival, and various disasters which befell his troops, reduced him again and again to great straits. Three times Srinagar went through severe sieges, and famine and fire added their horrors to the sufferings of the capital. During these struggles Sussala maintained himself only owing to the valour of his condottieri from the lower hills and the Panjāb, who served him faithfully in the midst of so much treachery. The contest was also prolonged by the Dāmaras finding their interests directly served by the disturbed state of the country and showing no desire to end it by a decisive victory of Bhikṣācara.³

Early struggles of
JAYASIMHA.

Finally, in 1128, Sussala fell a victim to a murderous plot which he had himself started for the destruction of his rival. His son JAYASIMHA who succeeded him, found the Dāmaras as strong as ever and Bhikṣācara ready to march into Srinagar. The means by which he gradually secured a footing and restored at least a semblance of royal authority, were not the reckless valour of his father, but compromise with the feudal grandees and Machiavellian cunning. For two years after his accession the danger from Bhikṣācara continued until the brave pretender was treacherously entrapped and killed in a frontier castle. Scarcely had this enemy been put out of the way, when a successful conspiracy placed the ancestral castle and territory of Lohara in the hands of a new pretender, LOṢṬANA, a brother of Salhana. Jayasimha's attempt to recover this serious loss ended in ignominious disaster. Though Lohara was ultimately retaken through treachery, Loṣṭana and

¹ viii. 449.

² See viii. 892.

³ See viii. 1028 seq.

Mallārjuna, another pretender, continued to harass Kaśmīr for years. They found over ready support among the great Dāmaras whose power had remained uncurbed.

When at last Mallārjuna had been captured (A.D. 1135), the exhausted country seems to have obtained a respite from its troubles and sufferings. This was not to last long. In the year 1143 we find Jayasimha confronted again by dangerous rivals. Bhoja, the new pretender, a son of Salhana, obtained powerful allies in the Darads, the northern neighbours of Kaśmīr, while all through the land the great Dāmara houses were rising in arms. Dissensions among Bhoja's supporters saved the king from a disaster, but the struggle with the feudal land-holders was severe and indecisive. Ultimately Jayasimha's diplomacy scored a success by a peaceful pact with Bhoja (A.D. 1145). But Kalhana's narrative shows plainly that the forces of internal strife and disruption which had crippled the unfortunate country over since the time of Harṣa, were by no means spent when he wrote his Chronicle.

Later events of Jayasimha's reign.

13. From the brief summary of events we have given here, it will be seen that the greatest portion of Kalhana's life passed in what was for Kaśmīr one long period of civil war and political dissolution. The influence of this fact on the plan and spirit of his work will be examined below. At present we shall only endeavour to trace the influence which the political condition of his country is likely to have exercised on Kalhana's life and his personal relations with his contemporaries.

We may consider it as certain that the dynastic revolution which had cost King Harṣa his throne and life, had a lasting effect on the fortunes of Kalhana's family. However detailed the accounts are which we receive in Book viii. of the officials, great and small, who served the succeeding rulers, Candaka's name is never found among them. Yet a reference made to him in connection with the Bhātesvara Tirtha makes it highly probable that he was still living after the year 1135.⁷ It is hence evident that Kalhana's father, who in Harṣa's reign had occupied one of the highest posts of old Kaśmīr administration, played no longer any part in public life after that monarch's death. Whether this retirement was entirely voluntary or otherwise, we can no longer ascertain. That it was, however, connected in some way with the loyal attachment which Candaka, according to the Chronicle, had proved to the last for the ill-fated king, seems likely enough.

Kalhana's family and the fall of
Harṣa.

Kalhana's work makes it quite clear that he himself had never held office under any of the rulers of the new dynasty or otherwise enjoyed their special favour. Considering the very redundant praise and flattery which by custom and literary tradition Indian authors feel obliged to bestow on their patrons, the negative evidence of the Chronicle may be considered decisive on this point. There is nothing whatever to show that Kalhana wrote his poem by order of Jayasimha. The outspoken manner in which he judges of the king's character, and the undisguised allusions to the reprehensible nature of many of his actions make it very improbable that he ever expected royal recognition.⁸

Kalhana not under Jayasimha's
patronage.

To those who are acquainted with the style of fulsome flattery which Indian usage demands in the relations of a Kavi towards his patron, the comparatively few passages in which Kalhana praises Jayasimha or acknowledges his achievements, must appear very tame and guarded. They seem to have been inserted merely on ⁷ viii. 2364 sq.

⁸ Compare particularly the references to Jayasimha's character, viii. 1553 sqq., 1560, 2105 sqq., vi. 73 sq.; his treacherous conduct,

compare note v
regarding the on

viii. 2083 sqq., 2186 sqq., 2381, 2978 sqq.; his bad policy, viii. 2969 sq.; the distress under his rule, viii. 2309.

the ground of the conventional respect due to the actual ruler and possibly with a view to avoiding denunciation and its probable consequences.

Kalhana's severe judgment of Sussala.

The same conclusion is indicated by the harsh if just remarks which Kalhana makes regarding the reign of Sussala, Jayasinha's father. He openly denounces the grave defects of his character, his wanton cruelties, avarice, etc.; he does not even hesitate to record the popular opinion that he was possessed by a demon.⁹ On the other hand it is significant that Kalhana freely bestows the highest praise on the valour and heroism of the pretender Bhikṣācāra from whom Sussala and his son had suffered so much injury.¹⁰ Yet from the manner in which Bhikṣācāra's reign is described, it is clearly seen that this short-lived restoration of Harsa's dynasty had brought no benefit to Cāmpaka or his family.

Among the other pretenders who rose during Jayasinha's rule, only the brave and considerate Bhoja seems to have attracted Kalhana's sympathy.¹¹ It seems that the latter appears to have drawn much of his information concerning recent events directly or indirectly from the prince himself. For Bhojāna, the old pretender, and Mallārjuna, his worthless nephew, the Chronicler has nothing but bitter satire and undisguised contempt, though they, too, like Bhoja were living at the time at Jayasinha's court.

Kalhana's estimate of his countrymen.

14. The eventful period into which Kalhana's life was cast, with its rapid changes of royal and private fortune, had given him ample opportunities to study the character of his countrymen. We cannot feel surprised, therefore, at the truthfulness with which certain of its features, and by no means the most pleasing, are portrayed in his narrative.

Kalhana had evidently not failed to realize that conspicuous want of physical and moral courage which is so characteristic of the great mass of the Kāśmīrian population, and in particular of the lower classes. He avails himself often of the opportunity furnished by historical incidents to expose with humorous sarcasm the inveterate cowardice and empty bragging of the Kāśmīrian soldiery.¹² We read of Kāśmīr armies which disperse at the sight or even the rumour of a resolute foe, of rival forces which both tremble in fear of each other, etc. Murder by a few resolute ruffians in the royal palace is usually followed by a general stampede of guards, courtiers, ministers, and troops. The uncompromising realism with which Kalhana paints such scenes leaves no doubt as to the estimate which experience had led him to form of his countrymen's military valour.

Contrast with foreign mercenaries.

To emphasize his opinion still further Kalhana more than once shows us in contrast the bravery of the Rājaputras and other mercenaries from abroad who in his own time were evidently the mainstay of Kāśmīrian rulers.¹³ But we can see from some sarcastic allusions that the air of superiority naturally assumed by these foreign adventurers was not to the liking of the Chronicler.¹⁴ The events of Kalhana's lifetime had shown him much treachery in every form among his countrymen. We can well appreciate the bitterness with which he refers to those in positions of influence and trust who were always ready to desert or sell their master.¹⁵ The rare examples of faithfulness on the other hand find

⁹ Compare e.g. viii. 654, 675 sqq., 1141 sqq., 1460 sqq.

¹⁰ See viii. 1017 sqq., 1740 sqq., 1768, 1778.

¹¹ See particularly viii. 3088 sqq., 3261 sqq.

¹² Compare e.g. vii. 57, 85 sqq., 118, 1158, 1191; viii. 324, 463, 800, 1322 sqq., 1340 sqq., 1706, 1806, 1880 sqq., 2251, 3157, etc.

¹³ viii. 1082 sqq., 1017, 1138 sqq.

¹⁴ vii. 1017; viii. 200.

¹⁵ See e.g. vii. 1000 sqq.; viii. 782 sqq., 803 sqq., 824, 923, 941, 927, 1522, 1537, 1735 sqq., etc.

in him a warm eulogist even when it was displayed for his country's or king's enemies.¹⁶

By the side of the treason ever rife in the royal court and camp Kalhaṇa does not fail to notice the callous indifference with which the Kāśmīrian populace was prepared to welcome any change. His graphic descriptions of the idle and disaffected city crowds and the feelings that swayed them, show how thoroughly he understood the nature of his compatriots.¹⁷ In these and many other passages of the Chronicle a certain aristocratic hauteur of the author seems to display itself. Other weaknesses of Kāśmīrian character are recognized by him with equal frankness.¹⁸

15. Looking at Kalhaṇa's attitude towards the various classes of contemporary society, we note in the first place the open aversion and contempt he shows for the Dāmaras. The overweening power and turbulence of these feudal landholders had been the direct cause of King Harṣa's fall and all the troubles which preyed upon the country during Kalhaṇa's lifetime. The term dasyu, 'robber,' which he regularly uses for their designation, is characteristic enough.¹⁹ Having risen from the agriculturist population of the Valley, the Dāmaras even in powerful families seem to have retained much coarseness and boorishness in their ways and habits.²⁰ Kalhaṇa loses no opportunity to expose these defects. The bitterness with which he speaks of the Dāmaras' cruelty and wantonness, suggests that he or his family had personal reason to regret their predominance. The presence in the land of so many petty tyrants must have weighed heavily indeed not only on the cultivators but also on the official class and the Brahman population of the capital. The lands from which the latter drew their maintenance were in times of internal trouble ever at the mercy of the Dāmaras.²¹

Animosity against the Dāmaras.

That Kalhaṇa though probably drawn by descent and position towards the official class was by no means partial to the latter, is shown by many a hard hit he makes at the vices of the 'Kāyasthas.'²² The great mass of them was undoubtedly Brahman by caste, corresponding to the present Karkun of Kāśmīr.²³ The numerous satirical allusions to the petty officials' oppression and greed and the evident relish with which Kalhaṇa details their discomfiture by more energetic rulers, suggest that he had ample occasion to study their character by personal experience.

Attitude towards official class.

The narrative of the Chronicle allows us also to judge of Kalhaṇa's views regarding another influential class of old Kāśmīr, the Brahman priests or Purohitas. Organized into corporations (paṛṣad) at all the more important shrines and pilgrimage places and often possessed of great endowments, they played more than once an important part in the internal politics of the country. The solemn fasts or Prāyopaveśas to which they were apt to resort in critical circumstances, were evidently powerful means of coercion which weak rulers had reason to dread.

Contempt of Purohitas.

Kalhaṇa does not hide his contempt for this priestly class whose ignorance was equal to its arrogance, and bitterly condemns their baneful interference in affairs of ¹⁶ Compare e.g. vii. 1323 sqq., 1376, 1411 sqq., 1535 sq.; viii. 634, 2157, 2330.

¹⁷ vii. 1466 sqq.; viii. 702-711, 428 sq.; vii. 1351, 1683.

¹⁸ See e.g. viii. 73; vii. 418.

¹⁹ Compare note viii. 7.

²⁰ Regarding the origin of the Dāmaras and the character given to them in the Chronicle, see Noto G, iv. 348.

²¹ See viii. 763 sqq., 1207 sq.

²² iv. 620 sqq.; v. 130, 439; vii. 149, 1226; viii. 53, 86 sqq., 580 sqq.

²³ Compare e.g. vii. 1105, 1319; viii. 2383.

state. In the humorous descriptions he gives of several great Purohita assemblies he freely ridicules their combined self-assertion and cowardice and shows scant respect for their sacred character.²¹ To those who know the modern Pujari of Indian Tirthas and the low estimation in which he as well as the ordinary Purohita is deservedly held by Brahmans of position and learning, Kalkha's feelings will be easily intelligible. Various references show that whatever respect traditional notions demanded for the 'gods of the earth' in abstracto, Kalkha was not prepared to extend it to their claims as a political factor.²²

It may be mentioned in conclusion that the humorous and detailed picture which Kalkha draws of the cheating merchant and his ways in the anecdote related of Uccala, bears also a distinct personal tinge.²³ It is evidently taken from life and suggests unpleasant experiences.

Kalkha's personal relations with contemporaries.

16. There is much in Kalkha's detailed account of contemporary Kaśmir history that makes it probable that he was personally acquainted with various of its most prominent actors. The high position of the family to which he belonged would fully explain this. But in view of the impartiality with which Kalkha metes out both blame and praise to contemporary personages, it is not easy to ascertain those with whom he was specially connected.

Friendly relations seem most probable in the case of the minister RILHANA, who was one of Suseśa's faithful companions in arms and employed in an influential position through the whole reign of Jayasinha. He is the only one among the high officials of the latter whom Kalkha lauds for patronage of learning.²⁴ The Chronicler gives an exceptionally detailed record of Rilhana's, his wife's and brother's pious foundations, and misses no opportunity to extol the bravery and military skill of the former.²⁵ Most characteristic, however, is the panegyrical passage which Kalkha devotes to the description of some costly adornments given by Rilhana to a temple at Surośvari.²⁶ These verses differ markedly in style from Kalkha's usual references to such subjects. They look very much like a small Prasasti or laudatory poem composed specially by the Kavi in honour of the newly-consecrated gift of his friend or patron. Only a personal connection of this kind could justify and explain the digression.

ALANKARA, too, who held high posts in the later reign of Jayasinha, is mentioned with distinction. We know from the Kāvya of his brother Maṅkha that Alankara was himself a man of learning and a patron of scholars.²⁷ Maṅkha himself is only once named by Kalkha as minister of foreign affairs, while no reference is made to his capacity as a fellow-poet.²⁸ Also for Udaya, lord of the 'Gate,' Kalkha seems to have cherished feelings of special regard.²⁹

It is of interest to note the evident respect with which Kalkha speaks throughout of RĀJYADANA, who had only a few years before headed a dangerous rebellion against Jayasinha.³⁰ As the narrative itself does not show special reason for this exceptional treatment, personal relations with the Chronicler naturally suggest themselves.

²¹ Compare regarding Purohitas and their 'Priyas,' v. 465 sqq.; vii. 13 sqq.; viii. 901 sqq., 989 sq.

²² See v. 461 sqq.; vi. 2 sq.; viii. 768-777, 2737 sqq.

²³ See viii. 128 sqq.

²⁴ viii. 2404.

²⁵ viii. 2405-2418, 2813-38, 3000 sqq., 3355 sqq.

²⁶ viii. 3364-70.

²⁷ Compare for Alankara, note viii. 2423.

²⁸ viii. 3354.

²⁹ viii. 2501 sqq.

³⁰ viii. 2095 sqq., 2723 sqq., 2903.

17. Scanty indeed are the data which we have gleaned from the Chronicle regarding its author's personality. They cannot compensate for the loss which his reticence regarding himself has caused us. Yet there is one important point concerning Kalhaṇa, on which full light is thrown by the work itself. It is impossible to peruse the Chronicle, and in particular its later portions, without realizing that the poet who wrote it, had an observant eye and an open mind for the affairs of the world around him. He displays no little knowledge of human nature, intimate acquaintance with his country's material conditions, interest in antiquarian details even of the humblest kind, and in the facts of every-day life. All these are features which show us Kalhaṇa in a light very different from that of the ordinary Indian Kavi.

Kalhaṇa's knowledge of the world

His literary training, indeed, had been of the strictly traditional type, and the manner in which he employed it shows no conscious departure from the conventional norm. Yet it is clear that Kalhaṇa was not a man of the schools, absorbed in his Śāstras and content to make his living by them.

There is another interesting observation to be gathered from the Chronicle. We know that also in ancient India, as elsewhere, the question of demand and supply has exercised its potent influence on literary production. But it would be difficult to account from this point of view for the composition of the Rajataranginī. The Kāśmīr court of Kalhaṇa's time was not the place where scholarly or poetic merit—so closely connected in the Indian mind—could lead to honours and preferment. We may take it for certain that the Chronicle was not written under the patronage of the ruling prince nor with a special view to securing his favour.

Considering these facts and those features in the Chronicle which are characteristic for the author's personality, we finally may perhaps hazard an opinion regarding the motives which had induced Kalhaṇa to undertake this task. Born from a family of rank and note he could have expected to take an active share in the affairs of his country like his father had before him. Adverse political circumstances, however, and perhaps family policy, had closed to him the career of a soldier or administrator. What use more congenial to his hereditary tastes could he then make of his literary training than by recording the traditions regarding the history of his country and his views on the times he had lived through?

Kalhaṇa's motives in writing his Chronicle.

Seen in this light, much of what strikes us as individual and peculiar in Kalhaṇa's narrative assumes its proper and significant aspect. We can thus understand his strongly-marked political opinions and his thorough grasp of the internal history of contemporary events. The notable accuracy and interest with which the details of military operations are often set forth, and which seem to betoken at least a theoretical acquaintance with the art of war, become intelligible. The extensive knowledge of the topography of Kāśmīr which we must ascribe to the author of the Chronicle, finds its explanation in the opportunities which his means and position afforded for travel. Finally we can thus account for that independence of judgment which Kalhaṇa displays throughout in regard to contemporary events and persons.

But these and other important facts touching upon Kalhaṇa's character as a historian will become clearer when we have made ourselves acquainted with the scope and nature of his Chronicle.

CHAPTER II.

THE RĀJATARAṄGIṆĪ: ITS SCOPE AND CHARACTER.

SECTION I.—KALHAṆA'S CONCEPTION OF HIS TASK.

The Chronicle composed as a Kāvya.

18. The interest and importance which Kalhaṇa's work possesses for us, lies in its character as a historical record and in the mass of detailed information it furnishes regarding the conditions of ancient Kaśmīr. This fact, however, must not make us forget that to its author it was in the first place a Kāvya. By considering this aspect of the work first we shall be better able to do justice to its object and character.

We have already above glanced at the conditions which oblige us to look for historical records in the products of rhetorical Sanskrit poetry. The growth of history has had its close connection with poetry in classical literature too; the 'father of History' has not without good reason been called another Homer.¹ But it would be manifestly wrong were we to see in the Kavyas with historical subjects a parallel to the development which led in Greece from epic poetry to the earliest historical prose.

With more justice we may recall to our mind that history was yet even to Cicero opus hoc unum maxime oratorium. Rome, long after Thucydides and Polybios, saw in history only a matter for the display of rhetorical skill and a collection of facts useful for the inculcation of moral principles.² We have only to substitute the Alankāraśāstra for the art of the rhetor in order to realize the resemblance between this attitude and Kalhaṇa's conception of his task. Of the latter the introductory verses with which his work opens, furnish characteristic evidence.

"Worthy of praise is that power of true poets, whatever it may be, which surpasses even the stream of nectar, inasmuch as by it their own bodies of glory as well as those of others obtain immortality. Who else but poets resembling Prajāpatis and able to bring forth lovely productions, can place the past times before the eyes of men?"

This praise of the poet's art finds its significant place at the very beginning of the Chronicle. It alone would suffice to characterize the relation which the author sees between his art and the subject-matter of his narrative. It is his skill as a Kavi, the merit of his poetic composition, which is to save from oblivion the history of his country.

Kalhaṇa and the Alankāraśāstra.

19. In view of this fact it is only natural that we should find Kalhaṇa first judging his subject not as to its intrinsic interest but with regard to the opportunities it offers for conventional treatment as a Kāvya. "Though in view of the length of the narrative diversity could not be secured by means of amplification, still there may be found in it something that will please the right-minded." Diversity (varietas) is a quality which the canons of the Alankāraśāstra distinctly prescribe for poetical compositions. Much of the endless similes, the hackneyed descriptions of seasons, scenery, etc., which help to swell the bulk of the ordinary Mahākāvya, is directly due to this requirement.

¹ Taine, Essai sur l'Épique, p. 334.

² Ibid. p. 15.

The Rajataranginī is comparatively free from these, to our taste burdensome, embellishments. Its narrative shows for the greatest part a relative directness and simplicity of diction for which we must feel grateful. But Kalhana is anxious to make it clear that this is by no means due to conscious neglect of literary precept and tradition. Still less could we ascribe it to the author's want of skill in this kind of poetic 'amplification.' Through the whole of the Chronicle we meet with verses showing all the elaborate rhetorical ornaments which appertain to the style of a Mahākāvya. More than one digression is made for the sake of highly florid descriptions of a conventional type.³ Making full allowance for these features in Kalhana's work, it is yet easy to realize that they play in it a far less prominent part than in compositions like the Harṣacarita and Vikramāṅkadeva-carita. Kalhana's direct reference to the "length of the narrative" clearly indicates the reason for this marked difference.

Kalhana tells us also elsewhere how the subject-matter he had chosen has influenced his work as a poet. The rules of the Alaṅkāraśāstra make it necessary for a Kāvya or its main component parts to exhibit a characteristic 'Rasa' or sentiment. Kalhana informs us that it is the sentiment of resignation (śuntarasa) which is to reign supreme in his work.⁴ He justifies its choice by a reference to the instability of everything human which is so amply illustrated by his narrative. It is no doubt the desire of emphasizing this main Rasa which makes Kalhana treat at exceptional length the stories of those kings who ended their reigns by acts of pious renunciation or otherwise in a pathetic manner.⁵ Nor can it be considered accidental that four out of the eight Books into which his work is divided, close with descriptions of this character.⁶

20. It is in the direction indicated by the choice of this 'sentiment' that we can most clearly trace the didactic features of Kalhana's work. The transitory nature of all mundane glory, the uncertainty of royal possessions, and the retribution which inevitably follows offences against the moral laws, these are lessons which Kalhana never tires of impressing upon his readers. The chapters of Kāśmīr history which lay nearest to his own time, and which he knew best, furnish Kalhana with ample illustrations for these texts. In the same way, acts of policy, statecraft, and individual conduct are again and again made the object of general reflections and analyzed in the light of the Dharma or Nitiśāstra.

Didactic features of Kalhana's work.

It is Kalhana's custom to emphasize striking examples by references to similar incidents narrated in the Mahābhārata or Rāmāyaṇa. We know how closely quotations of this kind correspond to the largely didactic character of the great Indian Epics. Their remarkable frequency in Kalhana's Chronicle has hence its particular significance. The same purpose accounts for the great number of verses setting forth maxims of proverbial wisdom and their illustrations, which we find inserted through the whole of Kalhana's narrative.⁷

³ Compare e.g. i. 208 sq.; iii. 414 sqq.; v. 848 sqq.; vii. 928 sqq., 1559 sqq.; viii. 842 sqq., 948 sqq., 979 sqq., 1744 sqq., 2148 sqq., 3366 sqq., etc.

⁴ i. 28.

⁶ Compare i. 867 sqq.; ii. 158 sqq.; iii. 512

sqq.; iv. 380 sqq.; vii. 1646 sqq. (Harṣa's tragic end).

⁵ See the concluding parts of Tarāṅgas, i.-iii., vii.

⁷ See e.g. vi. 273, 364; vii. 86, 136, 488, 504 sqq., 616, 824, etc.

It would be of great interest if we could trace the origin of this didactic character which is so strongly accentuated in the Rājatarāṅgiṇī and yet foreign to the great mass of extant Kāvya literature. Have we to see in it a result of the close study which Kalhana, as we have seen, had personally devoted to the Epics? Or was it present already in the earlier Chronicles which Kalhana had known and probably followed as models? If the latter assumption were right we could scarcely avoid the conclusion that Epic literature has had its share in the development of Sanskrit historical poetry. Unfortunately the works which preceded Kalhana's Chronicle, are lost, and in their absence this question, with many others, must remain unanswered.

SECTION II.—KALHANA'S SOURCES.

21. The interest which attracts us to Kalhana's work, is mainly due to its character as a historical record. Whatever can assist us in estimating correctly its value from this point of view, may claim our special and close attention. Here, too, we are able to turn to the author himself for guidance.

Recognition of historical impartiality.

In the first place it is reassuring to find Kalhana fully alive to the value of historical impartiality. Immediately after the panegyric on poetic intuition with which his introduction opens, he declares that poet alone "worthy of praise whose word, like that of a judge, keeps free from love or hatred in relating the facts of the past."¹ In this emphatic declaration and the prominence given to it we feel something of the historian's spirit. Still more we must hold it to Kalhana's credit that he has taken care to indicate, at least generally, the materials which he had used for his narrative.

Kalhana's review of earlier
chronicles.

He frankly acknowledges in his introduction that the subject-matter of his work had been treated by others before him.² In order to justify his own enterprise he subjects these earlier compositions to a brief review which is of considerable historical interest. We learn from it that there had been extensive works of ancient date containing the royal chronicles of Kaśmīr. In Kalhana's time these works no longer existed in a complete state. Kalhana attributes their partial loss to the composition of Suvrata, who had condensed their contents in a kind of handbook. We know how often in India the appearance of a convenient abstract has led to the neglect and subsequent loss of all earlier works on the subject. Kalhana refers to the popularity of Suvrata's poem, but calls it troublesome reading owing to the author's misplaced learning. The Kāvya character of this composition can hence safely be concluded.

22. Kalhana distinctly tells us that he had inspected "eleven works of former scholars containing the chronicles of the kings," besides the Nilamata-purāṇa. The latter we still possess. We shall have occasion below to refer to it in connection with some royal names which Kalhana avowedly took from this source. Of the other texts we know nothing but the names of three of the authors.

Kaśmendra's
'List of Kings.'

Kaśmendra's 'List of Kings' (nṛpāvalī) was evidently a work of some popularity and pretension; for Kalhana singles it out for special mention immediately after Suvrata's handbook. He acknowledges it to be "the work of a poet," but charges it with showing mistakes in every single part, "due to a certain want of care." Kṣemendra, the Kāśmīrian poet and polyhistor, lived about a century before Kalhaṇa's own time. The numerous compositions we still possess from his hand, show him rather as a prolific compiler than as a writer of originality and skill.³ Kalhaṇa's judgment on his Chronicle of Kāśmīr kings was therefore in all probability well merited. All the same we must greatly regret its loss. For judging from the mechanical way in which Kṣemendra in other extant works has reproduced his materials, we might have expected to derive from his Chronicle much useful information regarding his own and Kalhaṇa's original sources.

The other two earlier Chroniclers whom Kalhaṇa refers to by name, are quoted as authorities for certain entries in the early part of his dynastic list. From PADMANITHIRA Kalhaṇa took the eight royal names beginning with Lava. The former himself had obtained this, as we shall see, very doubtful, information from the work of the Prāsūpata ascetic HELĀRĀJA who had composed a 'List of Kings' (Pārthivāvali).⁴ Kalhaṇa ascribes to the latter the considerable extent of twelve thousand Ślokas. But the terms in which he mentions Helārāja's Chronicle, seem to indicate that he had no direct access to it. CHAVILLĀKARA's work, however, which furnished Kalhaṇa with the names of Aśoka and some other kings, was certainly in his hands, as he gives us a direct quotation from it.

Chronicles of PADMANITHIRA and CHAVILLĀKARA.

From the titles of these earlier compositions and the matter for which they are quoted as authorities, it can safely be concluded that they began their accounts of Kāśmīr history with the earliest period. There is reason to believe that this was not the case with all of the eleven works which Kalhaṇa inspected. When indicating the scope of his work, he distinctly speaks of authors who had composed "each the history of those kings whose contemporaries they were."⁵ The task of supplementing their narrative by an account of more recent events is described by Kalhaṇa as one which would not satisfy his own ambition. It is evident that Kalhaṇa alludes here to compositions which did not embrace the whole of Kāśmīr history, but were content to take up the thread of the narrative where earlier Chroniclers had dropped it. Works of this type we actually possess in the Chronicles of Jonarāja, Śrīvāra and Prājyabhaṭṭa, which form successive continuations of the Rājataranginī. Kalhaṇa speaks somewhat contemptuously of such works. But it is evident that the authentic record of contemporary events which they are likely to have contained, might in our eyes have amply compensated for their limited scope and any possible want of poetic merit.

Scope of earlier
Chronicles.

23. In contradistinction to compositions of the kind last named Kalhaṇa describes his own work as an endeavour "to give a connected account where the narrative of past events has become fragmentary in many respects." For this purpose he used not only the earlier Chronicles already referred to, but also records of another and more original description. Kalhaṇa tells us that he has overcome

Use of inscriptions and other original records.

³ See BÖHLER, Report, pp. 46 sqq.

I have spared no efforts in the endeavour to bring to light a copy of Kṣemendra's Nṛpāvali from Kāśmīrian libraries. Like Prof. Bühler I had long hoped that the work might yet be recovered from some 'garita.' Repeated offers of substantial rewards have, however, failed to draw it forth. I fear therefore that the statement made to Prof. Bühler as to the existence of the work in Kāśmīr was only an ignis fatuus.

⁴ i. 17, 18.

⁵ Compare notes i. 9, 10.

"the trouble arising from many errors, by looking at the inscriptions recording the consecration of temples and grants by former kings, at the laudatory inscriptions and at written texts (śāstra)."⁶ The character of the various documents named has been fully explained in the note on the passage. Here we may only call attention to the general importance of this statement. It shows that Kalhana, besides being a Kavi, was also an antiquarian, interested in, and acquainted with, such original historical documents as his country could furnish. To find an author of Sanskrit poetry ready to take up the part of an antiquarian student, is a fact as rare as it is gratifying.

Kalhana's interest
in antiquarian
objects.

Kalhana's Chronicle contains unmistakable evidence of the actual use of such materials as his words indicate. It cannot be doubted that a large portion of the detailed and exact data he gives regarding the foundation of temples and other religious buildings, the origin of particular sacred images, etc., was obtained from dedicatory inscriptions. In the same way probably much of the detailed information which Kalhana displays as to 'Agrahāras' and similar endowments, was obtained direct from the original grants on copper-plates and similar records.⁷ To laudatory inscriptions (prasaśti) which for the modern student of Indian history are often so valuable sources of information, we must ascribe at least one distinct notice of the Rajatarangini.⁸ In the numerous references to authors and literary events we can clearly trace the use of those data which manuscripts of Sanskrit works often furnish regarding their authors' personality and time.⁹

Inscriptions and written works were, however, not the only antiquarian materials which Kalhana had made use of. Various allusions show that the historical information conveyed by the old coinage of the country had not escaped his attention.¹⁰ Elsewhere we find Kalhana referring to objects of antiquarian interest which he had himself inspected; and from the curious traditions he records of them, we see that he had evidently taken pains to follow up their origin and history.¹¹ The same conclusion may be drawn from various references concerning public offices and institutions.¹² traditions.

Use of popular

24. With the antiquarian data thus collected we may fitly class also the information which Kalhana owed to popular tradition. It cannot be doubted that Kalhana had taken many of the legends and anecdotes so frequent in the earlier portion of his narrative, direct from the traditional lore current in his own time and not from earlier writers. This is proved in numerous cases by the clearly local character of the accounts reproduced or the manner of their relation.¹³ It scarcely requires to be explained that it is not on account of the intrinsic historical value of these stories that we welcome their preservation in Kalhana's Chronicle. But they enable us often to trace the earlier forms of local traditions still extant in Kashmir, and always furnish interesting details bearing on the ancient topography or folklore of the Valley. In some instances we find Kalhana distinctly specifying popular

⁶ i. 15.

⁷ Compare for references the Index, s.v. Agrahāra, Endowments.

⁸ i. 344.

⁹ See Index, s.v. Authors.

¹⁰ Compare notes iii. 103; vi. 177; vii. 526.

¹¹ See e.g. i. 194; iii. 78; iv. 262, 335, 418, 471 (viii. 81).

¹² iii. 383; iv. 243; vii. 125 sq.

¹³ i. 131 sqq. (story of Kṛtyākrama Vihāra); i. 150-167 (legend of the Dāmōlara Uḍar); i. 263 sqq. (destruction of Narapura); i. 331 sqq.; ii. 129; iii. 336-340 (foundation of Pravarapura); iii. 374 sqq.; iv. 503-511 (foundation of Jayapura); v. 68 sqq. (Sagga's river-regulation; see particularly v. 101, 107), etc.

traditions which differed from the accounts accepted by himself or the authorities he followed.¹⁴

The very detailed record Kalhaṇa gives us of the history of Kaśmīr in his own time, was undoubtedly based mainly on personal knowledge and on the relations of contemporary witnesses. It is this fact which makes the lengthy narrative of the Eighth Book so valuable to us. We have already had occasion to refer to the passage where Kalhaṇa distinctly mentions his personal recollection of an incident connected with Sussala's restoration, A.D. 1121.¹⁵ But Kalhaṇa has been able to transmit to us first-hand information also for an earlier period. It has already been shown that Canyaka, his father, had taken a prominent part in the political affairs of King Harsa's time (A.D. 1089-1101). It is highly probable that Kalhaṇa's accurate and vivid account of this monarch's reign and tragic end is largely based on the communications of his father.¹⁶ Kalhaṇa, when describing the execution of Tanvaṅga's grandsons which took place about A.D. 1095, directly quotes the testimony of persons still alive at the time he wrote.¹⁷ Elsewhere, too, he refers to living witnesses of the times of Harsa.¹⁸ Family traditions, often remarkably tenacious even in modern Kaśmīr, are likely to have furnished the Chronicler with otherwise unrecorded details also for a much earlier epoch. In one instance we can trace back to this channel the mention of an incident fully two hundred years before Kalhaṇa's own time.¹⁹

Knowledge of contemporary history.

SECTION III.—KALHAṆA'S CRITICAL HORIZON.

25. The preceding inquiry has enabled us to form some idea of the materials which furnished Kalhaṇa with the subject-matter of his work. If we wish to learn something of his character as a historian, we must attempt to ascertain the manner and spirit in which he has used them.

At the outset of this task we encounter a serious difficulty. Kalhaṇa's introduction to which we owe our knowledge of his sources, tells us nothing of the relative value he attached to them, of the method or principles that guided him in their selection. He, himself, as we have seen, makes mention of "the trouble arising from many errors" in the earlier records. He acknowledges that "the narrative of past events has become fragmentary in many respects." Elsewhere he claims for his narrative the merit of being "useful where the accounts regarding the place and time of kings are fluctuating."¹ Yet, notwithstanding this plain avowal of the doubts and uncertainties besetting his subject, Kalhaṇa, except in the isolated instances already quoted, nowhere indicates his authorities. None of the earlier Chronicles which he had used, are available to us for comparison. Other historical documents that might allow us to control Kalhaṇa's method of work, such as coins, inscriptions, foreign records, are also unfortunately but rarely at our disposal. Hence our estimate of Kalhaṇa's character as a Chronicler must be based mainly on internal evidence.

Kalhaṇa's silence as to specific authorities.

¹⁴ i. 312 sqq.; iii. 456 sqq.; iv. 367 sqq.; viii. 1460 sqq.

¹⁵ viii. 895.

¹⁶ See above, § 2.

¹⁷ vii. 1066.

¹⁸ vii. 942.

¹⁹ vi. 135.

Want of critical
estimate of sources.

The critical analysis of the contents of the Rajatarāṅgiṇī will show us that none of the earlier Chronicles he used could have dated back farther than about three hundred years before his own time. Most of his written sources were in all probability even of more recent date. As we go back from the Fifth Book where with the middle of the ninth century we soon to reach contemporary records, the narrative becomes more and more legendary and anecdotal. Yet Kalhana shows no wise that he is conscious of the wide gulf which, in point of historic truth, separates the various portions of his narrative. With the same assurance and good faith he reproduces the bare lists of regal names, interspersed with local and other legends, we find in the first three books, and the detailed and authentic account of comparatively recent reigns. Of the defects of the records and of the conflicting opinions which according to Kalhana's introduction rendered his task so difficult, we nowhere receive a distinct indication. Of the means adopted to fill the gaps of the earlier narratives and of the grounds of decision in the case of discrepancies no information is ever vouchsafed to us. Various versions are but rarely quoted and then, too, mostly in the form of popular rumours and beliefs, between which the author does not attempt to decide.³ In two instances only does Kalhana mention a different opinion with a view to refuting it.⁴

Kalhana's
credulity.

Miraculous stories and legends taken from traditional lore are related in a form showing that the Chronicler fully shared the naïve credulity from which they had sprung. Manifest impossibilities, exaggerations and superstitious beliefs such as which we must expect to find mixed up with historical reminiscences in popular tradition, are reproduced without a mark of doubt or critical misgiving. Kalhana, indeed, refers once to more sceptical persons of his own time, "whose minds are swayed by doubts in regard to the miraculous deeds of Meghavahana and other ancient kings."¹ The purpose of this reference, however, makes it clear that he, himself, was not one of them. For speaking of King Harsa's mad proceedings he notes that owing to their extraordinary nature, they are likely to be doubted in the future just as those stories of the early kings. The latter were to Kalhana's mind evidently as real as Harsa's extravagances with which he compares them in point of strangeness.

Want of historical criticism.

26. All the above observations combine to show that Kalhana knew nothing of that critical spirit which to us now appears the indispensable qualification of the historian. Prepared as he himself is to believe, we cannot expect him to have chosen his authorities with special regard to their reliability, or their closeness to the events they profess to relate. Still less can we credit him with a critical examination of the statements he chose to reproduce from them. It would be manifestly unfair were we to lay all the defects of the Chronicle which result from this attitude, solely on Kalhana's shoulders. We know how recent a growth even in the West that system of critical principles is upon which modern historical science rests. There is nothing to justify the belief that they had ever been recognized even in part by any of Kalhana's forerunners and models.

On the contrary, it seems probable that those portions of Kalhana's Chronicle which are most open to critical objection, owe their want of historical value largely to the unsatisfactory character of the earlier records. Kalhana's account of the period preceding the sixth century of our era furnishes us on the whole only with

See i. 311-317; iii. 456 sqq.; iv. 367-371
(comp. vii. 1428 sqq.); vii. 1695; viii. 229-234
286.

³ ii. 6; vi. 108 sqq.

⁴ vii. 1137 sq.

bare dynastic lists and with traditions often of a very legendary nature concerning certain individual kings. But it is scarcely Kalhaṇa himself whom we have to blame for this absence of more substantial information.

Everything points to the conclusion that these scanty records of doubtful value were all that he found in his sources. The facts of true historical interest had become effaced long before as the record of these reigns passed through a succession of earlier Chronicles. It is only too evident that each narrator omitted more and more of authentic but to him uninteresting data, while legendary incidents and popular anecdotes on the other hand received an increasingly large share of attention.

Gradual effacement
of historical details.

We are no longer able to trace this process in the works which preceded Kalhaṇa's Chronicle. But we find it typically illustrated in the subsequent accounts of Kāśmīr history which are avowedly based on his work. The Persian Chronicles and Abū-l-Faẓl's abstract of the Rājatarāṅgiṇī do indeed reproduce Kalhaṇa's dynastic lists more or less correctly. But when we turn to the details of the narrative we see that only the stories bearing the stamp of the marvellous and the more curious anecdotes have been deemed worthy of reproduction. Abū-l-Faẓl has nothing to tell us of the reigns which fill the last three books of the Chronicle—more than two-thirds of its bulk—but the anecdote of Yaśaskara's Solomonic judgment. Haidar Malik who relates at length and even embellishes the marvellous stories about the early Hindu kings, can spare only a few garbled pages for Kalhaṇa's account of the Lohara dynasty, etc.

In proportion as Kalhaṇa's account becomes more and more historical, the excerpts of these later writers grow briefer and more superficial. But when they approach the centuries immediately preceding their own time, their interest in historical details is roused. Contemporary Muhammadan records are used; the narrative grows fuller and more authentic. Thus in turn these later Chronicles present themselves in their final portions as useful sources of historical information.

27. The process here briefly indicated may be safely assumed to have repeated itself again and again in the works of the Sanskrit Chroniclers who preceded Kalhaṇa. It is certainly illustrated by his own narrative, and accounts largely for the varying character of its portions and their striking disproportion in point of length. But if we want to appreciate rightly our author's mental attitude towards his subject, we must give at least a passing notice to the ideas which influence Hindu thought generally in relation to history.

Allusion has been made already to the fact that the Indian mind has never learned to divide mythology and legendary tradition from true history. To the modern Pandit as to his spiritual ancestors the Purāṇic myths and the legends of the heroic age are fully as real as the events of a comparatively recent past. Ordinarily the former are far better known to him, and the interest he takes in them is also far greater. The element of the marvellous and supernatural in these stories does not evoke doubt as to their reality. On the contrary, it serves as it were to confirm the belief in them; for it seems in full accord with what all authoritative traditions teach as to the conditions of those happier Yugas.

Inability to div
heroic legends f
history.

The products of religious imagination and epic fiction thus retain a matter-of-fact aspect even for the learned. That spirit of doubt does not arise which alone can teach how to separate tradition from historic truth, to distinguish between the facts and the reflection they have left in the popular mind. Still less can we expect that the changes implied by historical development should be noted and understood. Whatever the canonical tenets of the time recognize in the way of custom and law, is duly projected into the past. The further back a period lies, the closer its conditions are supposed to have approached the ideal standard conceived for the present.

Want of perception of historical changes.

The notions here briefly hinted at are sufficient to explain many a characteristic feature of Kālhana's narrative. Keeping them in view we can easily understand the naïve credulity he shows in regard to the marvellous stories recorded of the early rulers; the connection of the first Gonanda kings with the 'Great War' of the epics; the popular legends related of comparatively recent reigns like those of Lalitāditya and Jayāpīḍa, etc. Nor can we feel surprised if Kālhana's narrative, even in its most historical portions, shows but scant perception of the great changes which the course of political events must have gradually produced in the general condition of the country.

Historical isolation
of Kāśmīr.

28. The limitations implied by the above notions are such as affect all indigenous records of Indian history. But besides there are others more peculiar to Kālhana's native land. In my account of the ancient topography of Kāśmīr I have endeavoured to show to what extent the great mountain-barriers around the Valley have until quite modern times isolated its population from the rest of India. This isolation has at all times exercised a decisive influence on the history of Kāśmīr. Its effects can also be traced clearly in Kālhana's Chronicle.

The great natural ramparts which enclose Kāśmīr, have assured to the 'land of Śāradā' not only long immunity from foreign invasions, but also a historical existence of marked individuality. On this no lasting impression was left even by those periods when the Valley was under the sovereignty of great foreign dynasties. Kāśmīr history has hence always borne a distinctly local character. It cannot be doubted that this fact has been a decided advantage for the preservation of historical traditions. We probably owe to it most of what is exact and reliable in Kālhana's narrative. The history with which he had to deal, was that of a small mountain territory to which nature has given sharply-defined boundaries and a uniform character of its own. It was thus comparatively easy for Kālhana to acquire a thorough knowledge of the land of which he was to be the chronicler, and it is evident how much this must have helped him in his task. To it we owe the ample and accurate data bearing on the topography of Kāśmīr, its people, customs, climate, and the rest, which make the Chronicle so valuable for us. But we cannot ignore the fact that there are also defects directly connected with these narrow territorial limits.

Restriction of historical horizon
of Kāśmīrians.

The seclusion which Kāśmīr has enjoyed owing to its peculiar position, has even to the present day materially restricted the geographical horizon of its inhabitants. This must have been far more the case yet in Hindu times when a rigid system of guarding the frontiers increased the natural obstacles to intercourse with outside territories. It hence results that the true relation of Kāśmīr to the rest of India in point of importance and power is never fully realized. To the Kāśmīrī who knew the traditions of his land, but practically nothing of the world outside it, the imperial sway of the Mughal rulers over India naturally appeared rather as a consequence of their possession of Kāśmīr than vice versa. We can clearly trace the influence of such notions also in Kālhana's work.

To them is due the almost complete effacement of all recollections regarding early foreign dominion in Kāśmīr which is otherwise so plainly indicated. In their light we must judge of the fanciful conquests extending to the remotest limits of India, which Kālhana in evident good faith ascribes to various Kāśmīr kings even down to the eighth century.⁶ In reality Kalhaṇa's historical horizon is limited by the petty hill-states immediately adjoining the Kāśmīr Valley. From them he probably took the comparative standard by which he measured the resources and political importance of Kāśmīr. Even these neighbouring regions were towards the north but vaguely known to Kalhaṇa and his informants.⁶ Earlier interpreters of the Rajataranginī have expressed surprise at the fact that its narrative fails to notice many interesting events which took place in what to them appeared the close vicinity of Kāśmīr. But in view of what has already been said, Kalhaṇa's silence is easily understood.

The limited knowledge of the outside world and the exaggerated opinion of the importance of his country are not the only points which show us the direct influence of Kāśmīrian ideas on Kalhaṇa's work as a Chronicler. We recognize it clearly also in the large part which the supernatural element, sorcery, and similar factors play in his account of historical events. The modern Kāśmīris have very justly been called a gens religiosissima. The hold which superstitious beliefs of all kinds have over the population is probably more deeply rooted and universal in Kāśmīr than in India proper.⁷ Far away in Central Asia, Marco Polo heard of Kāśmīr as a land famous for sorcery and "dovlries of enchantment."⁸ Kalhaṇa's narrative proves how widespread the practice of witchcraft was in ancient Kāśmīr. More than one king was supposed to have been killed by it. Kalhaṇa himself fully shares the belief in its efficacy.⁹ Hence his marked disposition to credit supernatural agencies with an important share in the events he relates.

Influence of Kāśmīrian superstition.

29. For an estimate of the character of the Rajataranginī as a historical record it is necessary also to take into account its chronological framework. The questions raised by Kalhaṇa's chronological system are so manifold and detailed that it is advisable to discuss them separately in a subsequent chapter. Here only the result can be indicated. Our inquiry will show the wholly artificial nature of the chronology adopted by Kalhaṇa in the first three books of his work, i.e. up to the beginning of the seventh century of our era. It represents an attempt to fill a great chasm in historical tradition by figures bearing a fictitious look of exactness. We have no means to ascertain in detail how this faulty and unhistorical fabric was built up, and what share Kalhaṇa himself had in its construction. So much is clear that we cannot expect critical judgment in matters of chronology from an author who bases his reckoning on a legendary date like that of Yudhiṣṭhira's coronation, and is prepared to accept a reign of three hundred years for a single king (Rāṇaditya).

Want of critical judgment in Kalhaṇa's chronology.

This grave defect of Kalhaṇa's work is the result, however, of a more general

⁶ Compare i. 294 sqq. (conquests of Mihirakula extending to Lanka); iii. 27 sqq. (Meghavahana's Digvijaya); iii. 324 (Pravarasena); iv. 146 sqq. (Lalitāditya's expeditions reaching from the Carnatic to the Uttarakurus); iv. 463 sqq., 531 sqq. (Jayāpiṇḍa's conquest of Bengal, Nepal).

⁸ Compare below, Memoir, §§ 88 sqq.

It is very characteristic that Kalhaṇa when describing the home of the 'Mleccha' chiefs from the north which, in his own time, invaded Kāśmīr together with the Darads of the Kīṣanganga Valley (viii. 2762-64), can treat us only to details of the mythical geography of the Himalaya regions. The chiefs meant came in all probability from Aśtār, Gilgit and other valleys on the Upper Indus. These regions with which Kāśmīris have become familiar enough since the Sikh conquest, were to Kalhaṇa apparently a kind of Ultima Thule.

⁷ See Prof. BÜHLER's Report, p. 24.

⁸ See YULE, Marco Polo, i. p. 175, and my note iv. 94.

⁹ Compare for the belief in witchcraft, i. 331 sqq.; iv. 88 sqq., 112 sqq., 124, 651 sqq., 686; v. 239 sqq.; vi. 108 sqq., 121 sqq., 229; vii. 17 sqq., 183; viii. 1460 sqq., 2241.

cause than the individual disposition of the Chronicler. Albēṛūnī, whose critical genius could read so deeply in the Hindu mind, has not failed to notice it. "Unfortunately the Hindus do not pay much attention to the historical order of things, they are very careless in relating the chronological succession of their kings, and when they are pressed for information and are at a loss, not knowing what to say, they invariably take to tale-telling."¹⁰ In the system of early Kaśmīr chronology as embodied in the Rājataranginī we recognize only too plainly an illustration of Albēṛūnī's blunt judgment. But it is equally evident that Kalhāṇa was not the first who thus attempted to restore a semblance of chronological order where genuine tradition was vague and fragmentary.

SECTION IV.—KALHĀṆA AS A NARRATOR.

Kalhāṇa's
impartiality and independence.

30. It is pleasant to turn from the weakest side of Kalhāṇa's work to features which are apt to raise our estimate of its worth. Among these the author's honesty of purpose and impartiality deserve to be named first. Our brief review of Kalhāṇa's personality has already given us occasion to notice the independence he shows in his judgment of contemporary history and its actors. He does not hide from us the errors and weaknesses of the king under whom he wrote. The undisguised manner in which he often chastises the conduct of those holding influential positions in his own time, makes us occasionally wonder whether he could ever have intended to give full publicity to his narrative in his own days. He extends the same impartiality to the near past. In the pictures he draws of King Jayasīdha's father and uncle, as well as of his most dangerous adversary, the pretender Bhīṣma-cara, light and shade seem to be mixed with fairness.

The full and historically interesting account which Kalhāṇa gives us of the eventful reign of Harṣa, also bears out this opinion. We have seen that Kalhāṇa had personally good reason to feel grateful to this ruler whose favour had raised his family to high office and influence. Yet he dwells at length on all those evil qualities and acts of the king which had made his reign so baneful for the land and his own prosperity.¹ Even in the touching description of Harṣa's tragic end, where sentiment seems to rule supreme, Kalhāṇa makes us feel the justice of the fate which overtook this Nero of Kaśmīr history.

Honesty in a historian has not unjustly been called a forerunner of critical judgment.² In regard to contemporary history Kalhāṇa has manifestly endeavoured to be fair and impartial. May we not assume that the same feeling has helped to guide him rightly also in the opinions he formed of the past?

Individuality of Kalhāṇa's
characters.

31. We must hold it equally to Kalhāṇa's credit that where his materials are more ample and historical he endeavours to present to us the principal figures of his narrative in their individual character and not as mere types. To appreciate Kalhāṇa's merit in this respect it is enough to compare the pictures he gives us of personages like Tuṅga, Ananta, Harṣa, Śuṣala, with the colourless abstractions we meet in the *Kāvya*s including the historical Caritas. The narrative of Bāṇa and

¹⁰ See India, ii. p. 10.

¹ See particularly vii. 869 sqq.

² Taine, Life, p. 48.

Bilhāṇa, too, treats of historical facts. Yet their "heroes are painted all white and their enemies all black."³

It is true that in those few passages where Kalhāṇa attempts a systematic analysis of character he is apt to lapse into the conventionalities and platitudes of the Kāvya. The attraction of the traditional models has there evidently proved too much for him. The result is often a striking inconsistency between the common-places of the character-sketch and the individual acts of the person described.⁴ Where the same persons are introduced to us in their actions and their motives discussed, we feel at once brought face to face with real individuals. This life-like appearance of many of the principal actors in the later portions of the narrative is, no doubt, due to the fidelity with which Kalhāṇa has reproduced the ample materials there available. As we recede from the times which Kalhāṇa knew through living witnesses or reliable contemporary records, his characters become more and more generalized and shadowy. The great kings of legendary tradition in the first three Books, Meghavihāṇa, Tufjīna, Pravarasena, and the rest, have no more individuality about them than the heroes of the Epics or the fairy tale.

Many of the minor actors, too, of later Kāśmīr history are brought before us in life-like portraits. Kalhāṇa fully possessed that sense of humour and that quick eye for human weaknesses, which are so prominent features in Kāśmīrian character. This explains why he succeeds best in those portraits which he can light up by touches of humour or sarcasm. Figures like those of the upstart Bhadravarṇa, the miserly Candramukha, the truculent conspirator Saḍḍa, and others, stand out in Kalhāṇa's pages with an air of reality which does credit to his knowledge of human character.⁵

Humorous portraits of minor actors.

In descriptions of the low-born and coarse who had risen through their depravity, Kalhāṇa's humour becomes more than once quite Rabelaisian.⁶ We feel that if the details are, perhaps, not all historical, they are at least drawn true to life from available models. Kalhāṇa seems to have done his best to be just in such character-sketches, even where he could feel little sympathy or regard for the individuals. As a significant case we may mention the account he gives of the life and doings of Kularāja, a contemporary, whom his skill as a bravo had advanced to the influential position of city-prefect.⁷

32. The same spirit of historic truthfulness which gives reality to many of Kalhāṇa's characters, pervades also most of the detailed descriptions of particular events found in the later parts of the Chronicle. From the point of view of the modern historical writer we might find fault with the disproportionate length at which particular incidents are narrated. But we must gratefully acknowledge the fact that the descriptions themselves are often graphic and nearly always of historical interest. If accounts like those of King Harsa's last struggle, his flight and end, Bhikṣācara's tragic death, and the fall of Lohara,⁸ strike us as true, this is due not only to the mass of accurate detail with which they are related. The impression is created quite as much by the dramatic directness of the narrative and by the almost complete absence of those rhetorical ornaments and hyperboles with which such incidents are garnished in the typical Kāvya.

Historic truth in description of later events.

³ BÜHLER, Vikram, Introd., p. 4.

⁴ Compare, e.g., regarding Yaśaskara, vi. 2-13 and vi. 68 sqq.

⁵ Compare vii. 39 sqq., 111 sqq.; viii. 263 sqq.

⁶ See, e.g., vii. 297 sqq., 285 sqq.; vii. 87 sq.; v. 397 sq.

⁷ viii. 3333 sqq.

⁸ vii. 1539 sqq., 1616 sqq., 1700 sqq.; viii. 1702 sqq., 1814 sqq.

It is certainly not chance that we find the episodes which are described in this graphic and impressive manner confined almost entirely to the last two books of the Chronicle. The explanation lies clearly in the fact that Kallhana was in direct touch with the events there related through contemporary records and the narration of eye-witnesses. It seems as if we could yet trace the impressions of the latter in the very words with which Kallhana records pathetic incidents like Kalasha's death, Queen Sūryamati's Sati, King Sussala's murder.⁹ Often we feel that his description of particular scenes closely reproduces the picture which they had left in the minds of the onlookers.¹⁰ More than once Kallhana puts into the mouths of the actors of his story words so characteristic and pregnant that we can scarcely doubt their authenticity.¹¹

Elsewhere we meet with humorous anecdotes and expressions which bear the unmistakable stamp of contemporary popular origin.¹² It needs scarcely to be said that it is just this circumstance which gives them their value. But it is not only the humour of the popular mind which Kallhana knows how to record with fidelity. Passages like the one on the vanished glory of the Śāhi dynasty seem to convey to us still in full freshness the impression which great events had made on the minds of the people.¹³

Want of precision
in chronology.

33. In judging of the character of a Chronicler's work it is right to take into account the degree of precision he shows in matters of detail. Applying this test to the Rājataranginī we cannot fail to note again a significant shortcoming in regard to chronology. The artificial nature of the chronology given in the first three books has already been explained. In this portion only the length of individual reigns is mentioned, but no real dates stated. That Kallhana adds to the number of years each king is supposed to have reigned, often also the months and days, does not make these figures more authentic.

It is only from the death of Gippaṭa-Jayūpīḍa (A.D. 813) onwards that Kallhana gives us proper dates. They are expressed in the Laukika era which has since early times been in customary use in Kāśmīr. After the accession of the Uṣpala dynasty (Book v.) the beginning and end of each reign is indicated by a statement of year, month and day. It will be shown elsewhere that these dates are on the whole reliable and probably taken from sources representing contemporary records. But we have scarcely over the means to test their accuracy by independent data. Apart, however, from the dates indicating the length of individual reigns we receive no exact indication of the chronological succession of events until we reach the latter part of the eleventh century. Even, thereafter, when Kallhana relates what may be described as the history of his own time, exact dates remain scanty. We are hence often left in doubt as to the time even of such events which Kallhana thought important and deserving of lengthy accounts.

It is evident that Kallhana had not realized the assistance which exact dates offer for the comprehension of historical records. As a characteristic sign of his indifference on this point it may be mentioned that he sometimes states the month of a particular occurrence, yet leaves us entirely in the dark as to the year.¹⁴ That ⁹ See vii. 709 sqq., 463 sqq.; viii. 1287 sqq.

¹⁰ See, e.g., vii. 1557 sqq. (Harṣa's appearance after the capture of the palace); viii. 309 (Uccala's murder); viii. 703 (Bhikṣu-cara's advent); viii. 2635 sqq. (surrender of Lothana).

¹¹ vii. 1490; viii. 688, 880, 1013, 908, 1291.

¹² vii. 122, 1001, 1107, 1572 sqq.; viii. 90 sqq., 2370 sqq., etc.

¹³ vii. 60 sqq.

¹⁴ See, e.g., vii. 45, 47, 57, 915, 970; viii. 598, 903.

he gives a date for Haṇṣa's birth which does not agree with the statements accepted by him as regards the king's horoscope may be more readily forgiven.¹⁶ On the other hand it is fair to note that Kalhana shows exact knowledge of a detail in the lunisolar calendar of the year of Haṇṣa's death which lay fully half a century before the time of his writing.¹⁶

Genealogy is a matter to which an annalist must be expected to pay attention. It is hence gratifying to find that Kalhana was evidently aware of its importance. In those parts of his narrative for which he possessed trustworthy records, he generally indicates with accuracy the family-origin of every new actor who appears on the scene. But for this our difficulty in following the intricate details of the affairs which Kalhana relates in the last two books—often obscurely enough,—would have undoubtedly been yet far greater. For the more prominent figures of his narrative Kalhana sometimes gives regular pedigrees which throw an interesting light on family history and are otherwise useful in tracing historical details.¹⁷

Accuracy of genealogical statements.

Reference has been made already to the thorough and extensive acquaintance which Kalhana shows with the topography of his country. We can scarcely over-estimate the advantage we derive for the comprehension of the Chronicle from the clear and exact manner in which its local references are given. It is chiefly Kalhana's merit that we can restore the ancient topography of Kāśmīr in fuller detail than perhaps that of any other Indian territory of similar extent. The accuracy with which he usually specifies the localities of the events he relates, enables us often to elucidate the latter themselves by an examination of the actual topographical facts. A close relation is thus established between the study of the Chronicle and that of ancient Kāśmīr geography. The latter has been fully treated in the separate memoir attached to the present work. Its contents afford ample evidence of the reliability and precision which we must claim for our author as a guide to the scenes of his narrative.¹⁸

Exactness of Kalhana's topography.

34. Neither the general drift of Hindu thought nor the specific character of Kalhana's Chronicle would justify us in looking to the latter for a conscious appreciation of what we understand as the philosophy of history. To search for the laws which explain the concatenation of events and govern the development of a nation's history, would have presupposed a mental atmosphere wholly different from that in which Kalhana lived. Inductive analysis of the lessons of history has ever been foreign to the Indian mind. Yet this fact must not lead us to assume that the Hindu Chronicler could contemplate the records of the past without being influenced by certain general ideas. Individual events present themselves to his mind not as phenomena to be traced to their causes. He looks upon them merely as illustrations of those maxims, religious, moral or legal, which make up what the Hindu designates so comprehensively as 'Dharma.' It will not be without interest to acquaint ourselves with some of the most characteristic of these ideas as indicated by Kalhana. They may help us to realize better the light in which he viewed the events of the past; they are also likely to have influenced already the opinions formed by his predecessors.

General notions influencing Kalhana's views of history.

Of these ideas none, perhaps, is more significantly Indian than the notion which explains the fortunes of individuals or a nation by the influence of spiritual merits (puṇya) from previous births. Kalhana often accounts for strange facts by ¹⁶ See note vii. 1719-20.

¹⁸ See viii 35.

¹⁷ See, e.g., v. 469 sqq.; vii. 263 sqq., 1282 sqq.

¹⁸ Compare below, Memoir, §§ 17-21.

this convenient and to the Hindu mind absolutely conclusive argument.¹⁹ It is evident to what extent an unquestioning belief in this principle must divert attention from the true motives of individual actions and from all the influences determining the life of a nation.

The theory of the Yugas.

Another Hindu dogma which has a marked influence on the Chronicler's ideas, is connected with the theory of the Yugas. It assumes the progressive decay of all things spiritual and material in the present Kali Yuga. It naturally leads the Hindu mind to attribute to the past the more splendour and greatness the further back it lies. We can easily realize to what extent such a notion must predispose the Chronicler to accept in good faith the exaggerations of popular tradition regarding the ancient kings. Kalhaya distinctly adduces this principle in explanation of the reduced power of the Kāśmīr kingdom.²⁰ Viewed in this light, the fact, of the Kuśānir of his own time being a small country of limited resources could not appear to him a reason for doubting the wonderful power and exploits ascribed to Lalitāditya and other earlier rulers.

The power of Fate.

An equally characteristic feature is the unqualified belief in the power of Fate. Kalhaya never tires of expatiating on the inscrutable and perverse ways of this highest of factors.²¹ In all directions he is prepared to recognize its working. It is Fate to which Kalhaya attributes the falling of all resolve and wisdom in Harṣa at the close of his reign.²² Yet his own account of the latter shows plainly how little such qualities could be expected from a prince manifestly insane. Fate alone is the cause which turns the recipients of royal fortune into enemies of their relatives and trespassers against the moral laws.²³

Belief in divine
retribution.

35. More in harmony with our notions regarding the connection of cause and effect are Kalhaya's ideas about the retribution which follows upon evil government. Fiscal oppression seems to have weighed us heavily on Kāśmīr in Hindu times as it did in a more recent period. We can hence understand why Kalhaya takes particular pains to demonstrate that avarice in kings defeats its own object and meets soon with due punishment.²⁴ In one passage he emphasizes the point by giving a chronologically arranged list of illustrations taken from Kāśmīr history.²⁵ But even wealth thus evilly obtained becomes purified by being liberally used for pious objects, among which benefices to Brahmins naturally claim prominence.²⁶

We have already seen the important part which witchcraft and other features of Kāśmīrian superstition play in Kalhaya's narrative. It is fully in keeping with it that we find the cruelties and excesses which mark the later portions of the reigns of Harṣa and Śaṣaṣa explained by those kings having become possessed by demons.²⁷ The belief is plainly indicated by the Chronicler as a popular one, but it is equally clear that he fully shared it. He ascribes to the influence of bewitchment a political murder of his own time, though its real cause is clearly discernible in his own relation.²⁸ We can scarcely wonder that Kalhaya is prepared to credit cases of Brahmins committing suicide by voluntary starvation or otherwise with the power of procuring terrible consequences.²⁹ It is this semi-religious

¹⁹ v. 456; vi. 147; vii. 606, 1140; viii. 235, 281.

²⁰ iv. 309, 408; v. 137; see also viii. 2338.

²¹ See, e.g., ii. 92 sqq.; iii. 492; vii. 916 sqq., 1070 sq., 1369 sq., 1629; viii. 220 sqq., 607, 1086, 1274, etc.

²² vii. 1455 sqq.

²³ viii. 180 sq.

²⁴ v. 183 sqq.; 210 sq.

²⁵ viii. 1951-61.

²⁶ iv. 701.

²⁷ vii. 1248 sqq.; viii. 1160 sqq.

²⁸ viii. 2241.

²⁹ iv. 632 sqq.; viii. 2212.

belief which made the practice of prāyopaveśa under Hindu rule so dreaded a resource of the oppressed. Yet it is curious to note that this belief does not prevent Kalhaṇa from expressing, often in a sarcastic fashion, his contempt for the Purohitas who participated in the great Prāyopaveśa demonstrations so frequent in the later reigns.

Desecrations of holy shrines are naturally looked upon as specially provoking divine vengeance. Incidents of this kind are represented as the turning points in the fortunes of Harṣa and his grandson Bhikṣācara.⁸⁰ We can in Kalhaṇa's pages clearly trace also the superstitious awe which Kāśmīrian belief has always cherished towards the Nāgas or spring-deities. The legendary account of the destruction of Narapūra by the Nāga Suśravas and the quasi-historical incident at the spring of Pindāraka in Ananta's time illustrate the important issues attributed to the wrath of those genii loci.⁸¹ It is only what we must expect as a faithful reflection of universal belief, that we find Kalhaṇa allotting no small importance to omens and portents of all sorts.⁸²

36. The didactic element in Kalhaṇa's work to which we had occasion to refer above, is not sufficiently strong to make him use historical events as texts for lessons on policy. Yet there are passages which show that he could fully appreciate their value as illustrations of political maxims. We notice this plainly where the Chronicler takes occasion to criticize specific acts opposed to these maxims. Thus dealing with Jayasinha's expedition into the upper Kiṣangangā Valley, he takes particular care to point out how failure must ensue aliko from plans made without sufficient knowledge of the enemy and from undue deliberation in face of him.⁸³ When humorously describing Kamalavardhana's vain attempt to obtain the throne by diplomacy while it was within his reach by force, he plainly teaches the necessity in politics of quick perception of the opportune moment and of boldness in seizing it.⁸⁴ Elsewhere the risks arising from undue delay in diplomatic action are exemplified.⁸⁵ He does not hesitate to criticize the mistakes of policy committed by the rebel opponents of Jayasinha, and shows how much the king's success was due to their errors.⁸⁶

Historical events illustrating political maxims.

Particular interest attaches to the passage where Kalhaṇa gives us "in abstract the principles of government adapted to his own country."⁸⁷ This little code of administrative wisdom is put into the mouth of King Lalitāditya as a kind of political testament. But it was clearly drawn by the Chronicler from the experiences of his own time, and intended to express his personal views on them. The somewhat Macchiavellian air which pervades these precepts, could easily be traced also in the professed Niśiṣṭra works of India proper. But there is besides in Kalhaṇa's maxims an unmistakably Kāśmīrian flavour which makes them particularly interesting from a historical point of view.

Lalitāditya's code of Kāśmīrian statecraft.

The first item of advice bears already this distinctive local colour. As Kāśmīr has to fear no foreign foes, owing to the strength of its natural position, its rulers are advised to concentrate their attention on preventing internal dissensions. The inhabitants of the mountain-tracts enclosing the Valley "should be punished even if they give no offence." For if they were allowed to acquire wealth, the inaccessi-

⁸⁰ vii. 1344 sqq.; viii. 998.

⁸¹ i. 258 sqq.; vii. 169 sqq.

⁸² vii. 743 sqq., 796, 1291, 1309, 1643; viii. 713.

⁸³ viii. 2521 sqq.

⁸⁴ v. 453 sqq.

⁸⁵ viii. 1645.

⁸⁶ viii. 2014.

⁸⁷ iv. 344-352.

bility of their strongholds would make them dangerous. Kāḥaṇa evidently is thinking here of the Khāsas and other mountain clans surrounding the Kaśmīr Valley. Their restless disposition and habits of plunder were under weak reigns always a source of trouble to Kaśmīr.

Principles of fiscal policy.

Very characteristic is also the advice "that there should not be left with the villagers more food supply than required for one year's consumption, nor more oxen than wanted for the tillage of their fields." We clearly see from the remarks which follow after this and similar injunctions, that a rigorous administration of the land revenue in the fiscal interest seemed to Kāḥaṇa the only means for preventing the growth of a landed aristocracy. The latter was represented by the Dāmaras or feudal barons of contemporary Kaśmīr, so often mentioned in the last two Books of the Chronicle. Their endless rebellions were indeed the main cause of the great troubles from which Kaśmīr had suffered during Kāḥaṇa's lifetime, and for generations earlier. Similar advice is given regarding the guarding of important strongholds; the judicious distribution of high official posts between different families with a view to ensuring due balance of power, and other matters of state-craft.

Kāḥaṇa thoroughly understood the inconstancy of the political feelings of his countrymen, of whom it could justly be said then as now: moris plerumque rebus student. Kāḥaṇa dwells more than once upon the rapidity with which the great and the small in the land were ready to change their allegiance.²⁸ Popular attachment and loyalty is clearly a factor which he wishes his reader to exclude from serious consideration. He is also aware of the unconscious change which the mind of the people is bound to undergo, and justly warns us against trusting individual impressions even of contemporary events.²⁹

SECTION V.—KĀḤAṆA'S STYLE.

37. We had occasion to explain at the commencement of this chapter why the only form which Kāḥaṇa could give to his narrative was that of a Kāvya. It is this form naturally which determines the style of his composition.

Use of rhetorical ornaments.

We are accustomed to connect with the idea of a Sanskrit Kāvya a recumbence of all the rhetorical ornaments which according to the Alaṅkārasūtra are essential attributes of such a work. Metaphors, similes, puns, and the endless varieties of poetic figures which are the tests of the Kavi's skill, are indeed largely represented throughout Kāḥaṇa's Chronicle. But it is only in particular portions more or less episodic that we find them accumulated in the fashion characteristic of later Sanskrit poetry. Kāḥaṇa himself, as we have seen, takes care to explain this apparent departure from the conventional standard. It is the length of the story he has to relate, which according to the statement of his introduction precludes the "amplification" necessarily implied by a liberal use of these embellishments.¹

If we wish to gauge Kāḥaṇa's dexterity by the standard of the orthodox Kāvya, we have only to turn to incidental descriptions like those of Yudhiṣṭhira's departure into exile, Cakravartman's or Sussala's triumphal entries into the capital, ²⁸ See, e.g., vii. 1083 sqq.; viii. 375 sqq., 702 sqq., 922 sqq.

²⁹ viii. 2303 sqq.

¹ See above, § 19.

Bhikṣācara's last fight, etc.² We may not be able to indicate exactly the classical models which these and similar passages imitate. But their conventional character is made sufficiently clear by the total absence of historical detail or local colour. From our Western point of view we have hence little reason to regret that Kalhaṇa has given us but comparatively few specimens of what his pen could do in the more florid style of Kāvya composition.

Poetic merit of a different character must be ascribed to those portions of Kalhaṇa's work which display a certain dramatic force in the treatment of pathetic incidents. The narration of Jayāpīḍa's end, with the spirited dialogue between the king and the injured Brahmans whose curse proves fatal, furnishes a good specimen.³ Equally impressive is the account of King Ananta's funeral and the Sati of his consort Sūryamati.⁴ It is, perhaps, in the relation of Harṣa's tragic end that Kalhaṇa shows himself at his best as a narrator of historical incidents.⁵ In words which lose nothing of dramatic power by their simplicity and directness, he describes to us the ill-fated king staggering towards his doom. His helplessness in the face of overwhelming misfortunes; the desertion and treachery of his followers; his miserable refuge and sufferings as well as the redeeming valour of his final struggle, are all brought vividly before our eyes. The impression which Kalhaṇa's story leaves on the mind of the reader is all the deeper, because the form in which it is told wisely avoids all exaggeration and rhetoric effect.

Dramatic force in episodes.

38. The great mass of the subject-matter which Kalhaṇa has to relate, does not admit of such dramatic narration. By far the largest portion of the work can hence appeal to us only as versified prose. Kalhaṇa was, no doubt, aware of this. He tries to relieve what from the Kavi's point of view must appear monotonous in the relation of commonplace events, by poetic similes, bold antithesis and other rhetorical figures as well as by occasional puns.

Much of the metaphorical language to which we are thus treated, is not adapted to render the narrative more lucid or its contents more attractive for us. Yet we may readily acknowledge that the metaphors themselves are often distinctly graphic and original.⁶ It is probably for the same purpose that Kalhaṇa so frequently intersperses his story with verses setting forth general maxims and observations in proverbial form. These verses are usually composed in more elaborate metres and, thus easily distinguished even outwardly from the plain Ślokas of the narrative proper. Many of them display power of poetic imagination even where the themes are well-worn. Their language, though intricate, is often elegant and graceful. This accounts for the prominent place which both old and modern anthologies of Indian proverbial wisdom have accorded to Kalhaṇa's poetry.⁷

Metaphorical language; proverbial verses.

It is likely that we also owe the short orations and dialogues we meet in the Chronicler's narrative to the same desire of introducing diversity. Kalhaṇa more than once succeeds in making the actors of his story explain in this way more clearly the motives of their conduct.⁸ Elsewhere a lively dialogue enables us to Orations and dialogues in Kalhaṇa's narrative.

² i. 368 sqq.; v. 341 sqq.; viii. 947 sqq., 114 sqq.

³ iv. 640 sqq.

⁴ vii. 401 sqq.

⁵ vii. 1600-1714.

⁶ See, e.g., vi. 209; vii. 1067, 1225; viii. 134, 2520, 2560, 2586, 2635, 2747.

⁷ See for verses quoted from the Rājatar., Vallabhadava's Subhāṣitāvalī, ed. Peterson, p. 18. Geheimrath O. von Böhtlingk in his great collection of "Indische Sprüche" has reproduced and translated many verses of Kalhaṇa. Comparison of them with the great store of didactic Sanskrit poetry gathered in this florilegium shows how well Kalhaṇa could hold his own on this ground.

⁸ See, e.g., Uccala's exposition of his claim to the throne, vii. 1281 sqq.; Harṣa's vindication of his reign, vii. 1416 sqq.; Bhikṣācara's monologues, viii. 1023 sqq., 1449 sqq.

follow closely the changing aspects of a complicated affair or the varying sentiments of the bystanders.⁹ It is curious to note that just in such dialogues we find sayings introduced which are unmistakably reproductions of popular proverbs or expressions, some of them still currently used by modern Kāśmīris.¹⁰ We have here a welcome indication of the fact that Kālhana where he makes the actors of his later story speak, is not likely to depart very far from the conversational tone of his time and country.

Obscurities of Kālhana's diction.

39. It cannot be denied that Kālhana has made it often difficult for us to follow exactly the purport of his narrative. Many of the misinterpretations to which the latter has been subjected in the earlier versions, are due not to textual defects but to original obscurities of Kālhana's diction. These obscurities arise only partly from peculiarities of style, such as the use of rare words, involved constructions, or poetic ambiguities. To a great extent their causes lie deeper. Kālhana, particularly in the later portion of his narrative, has often to give us accounts of intricate affairs of state, of tangled intrigues, of petty incidents of court-life and administration, and the like. The more accurate and detailed he desires to make this information the more difficult we find it now to ascertain the matter-of-fact meaning of his statements, conched as they are in the florid phraseology of the Kāvya.

Kālhana writes for contemporaries.

This difficulty is considerably increased by the evident fact that Kālhana writes only for readers—or hearers—equally well-acquainted with contemporary Kāśmīr as he himself was. In dealing with the history of his own time he hence often omits to specify important details or alludes to them only in a manner necessarily obscure to us.¹¹ They evidently appeared to the Chronicler too notorious to require precise statement. In the same way we find Kālhana constantly using terms of a specific local sense without ever indicating their meaning, though a knowledge of the latter may be indispensable for a correct comprehension of the narrative. Only a close scrutiny of parallel passages in the Chronicle and of the scanty evidence available outside it enables us to ascertain the true significance of important terms like kampana, dvāra, pādāgra, pārśada, etc.¹²

Difficulties of Book viii.

40. The disadvantages to the modern reader from those peculiarities of Kālhana's diction make themselves particularly felt in the Eighth Book. Nothing perhaps has hampered more the correct interpretation of this curious record of contemporary Kāśmīrian history than the manner in which Kālhana constantly presupposes our familiarity with its actors, however unimportant, and their personal history.

In a narrative extending over nearly three and a half thousand verses it must be necessarily a source of trouble to find the same persons reappearing at great intervals under varying names, without our receiving any clear indication that the latter

⁹ Compare, e.g., dialogue of Ananta and Śūryamālā, preceding the former's suicide, vii. 423 sqq.; the consultation of Harṣa and his ministers, vii. 1886 sqq.; the soldiers and Dāmaras' comments on Bhikṣacāra's fall, viii. 1704 sqq., 1725 sqq.; the counsel of ministers outside Ś'īrahāṣīla castle, viii. 2618 sqq.; Jayasinha and Bhoja's meeting, viii. 3214 sqq.

¹⁰ Compare vii. 441 sqq.; viii. 2863, 2890, 3102; also viii. 903.

¹¹ Compare, e.g., notes vii. 1638; viii. 731, 1112, 1190, 1350, 1449, 1457-59, 2348-50, 2704-9, 2953, 3084, etc.

¹² So for kampana ('army,' 'command-in-chief'), note v. 447; dvāra ('frontier watch-station,' 'command of frontier-defences'), note v. 214; pādāgra, a high revenue office, note vii. 210; pārśad (Purohita corporation), note ii. 132.

apply to the identical persons. It has cost me a good deal of close investigation to make sure that Gargacandra, Garga, Gaggacandra and Gagga; Loṣṭhaka, Loṭhaka and Loṭhana; Rājavadana and Balahara, and many more doublets and triplets of this kind are in reality designations given to one and the same person.¹³ The use of such varying forms may often have been caused by metrical requirements.

Elsewhere it is even more difficult for us to find out whom Kalhaṇa really means. Frequently he refers to individuals merely by official titles, sometimes by such as they had already ceased to hold at the particular phase of the narrative. Changes of state officers were rapid enough in the Kāśmīr of Kalhaṇa's lifetime. The modern interpreter of the Chronicle who wishes to make sure of the persons meant, is thus obliged to prepare and to consult an official succession list, as it were, for the sake of these references. Sometimes again we can identify the person intended only by following up a complicated relationship or tracing an equally obscure allusion to some trivial incident in the person's previous career, etc.¹⁴

Indistinct
references to
contemporaries.

It is clear that the Chronicler had never thought of the trouble which his future reader would experience in following the thread of this, the most authentic and detailed portion of his narrative.¹⁵

¹³ See notes viii. 182, 2490, 2768; compare also viii. 1524 (Koṣṭhaka, Koṣṭheśvara); 2183 (Saralbhāsin, Saradiya), etc.

¹⁴ See, e.g., vii. 1177, 1468; viii. 372, 2808, 3244.

¹⁵ In translating the viii. Book of the Chronicle I have found it necessary to constantly take stock, as it were, of all personages figuring in the narrative, by means of a succession list as above indicated and an alphabetically arranged register of brief personal histories. It is only by this expedient that I succeeded in tracking the more intricate of Kalhaṇa's allusions.

While engaged in this task I have often regretted the absence of an indigenous commentary. Yet I doubt whether even a Kāśmīrian commentator would have always taken the trouble, or been able, to enlighten us on the points of real difficulty. Jonarāja's commentary on Maṅkha's Srikantacarita, as we have seen, does but little to elucidate the references which that poet makes to his contemporaries.

It is difficult to believe that the last Book of the Chronicle could ever have been attractive reading to the Paṇḍits even when its subject-matter was comparatively recent history. The little attention it has received accounts probably in part for the defective state of the text (see below, § 46).

CHAPTER III.

THE TEXT OF THE CHRONICLE.

SECTION I.—THE TEXT LEFT BY KALHAṆA.

41. In judging of Kalhaṇa's work as a whole and in using its contents, it is equally important for us to know whether the Chronicle we possess is in the main such as its author has left it. On this point our answer can unhesitatingly be given in the affirmative.

Rājatarangīni completed by Kalhaṇa,
A.D. 1149-50.

The exact dates which Kalhaṇa names both at the commencement and the end of his Chronicle, suffice to assure us that the extent of the work cannot have undergone any material change after its completion by the author. Kalhaṇa when discussing in his introduction the basis of his chronological system, distinctly tells us that he is writing in the year 1070, expired, of the Śāta era corresponding to the year [42]24 of the Laukika era, i.e. in A.D. 1148-49.¹ At the end again he takes care to indicate the Laukika year [42]25 or A.D. 1149-50 as the year current when he completed his narrative, and to specify the date still further by giving the year of the reign of King Jayasinha.²

There is no reason whatever to doubt that the writer who carried down the Chronicle's record to the latter date is the identical Kalhaṇa who wrote the introduction in the preceding Laukika year 4224 or A.D. 1148-49. The interval between the two dates represents in fact the minimum length of time which must be allowed for the composition of a work comprising nearly 8000 verses.

It is true that Mr. Troyer, in the preface to the third volume of his translation, had expressed the belief that the last two cantos of the Chronicle were the work of an author different from the Kalhaṇa who wrote the first six. But Prof. Bühler has long ago proved in a manner absolutely conclusive that the supposed discrepancies which had led Mr. Troyer to form this belief, were due solely to the translator's imperfect materials and to his inability to correctly comprehend Kalhaṇa's text.³ In view of this fact it would serve no useful purpose to detail here the several misapprehensions upon which Mr. Troyer's supposition was based. Nor would it, perhaps, have been necessary to refer at all to the latter had it not found its way also into Prof. Lassen's account of the Kāśmīr Chronicle.⁴ Prof. Bühler has

¹ i. 52.

² viii. 3404.

³ See Report, pp. 58 sqq. One of Mr. Troyer's arguments was that the viii. Book related events which occurred after A.D. 1148-49. Prof. Bühler is prepared to admit this statement, but rightly objects to the conclusion drawn from it, inasmuch as Kalhaṇa gives this date merely for the commencement of his work which he cannot be supposed to have completed in the same year. In reality, however, the Chronicle does not contain a single date later than the one already quoted for the conclusion of the work, viz. Laukika Samvat 4225 or A.D. 1149-50. The passage, viii. 3179, which Prof. Bühler, following Troyer's version, assumed to refer to events of the Laukika year [42]33, gives clearly the date 4221.

⁴ See Ind. Alt., iii. p. 481.

already pointed out that Jonarāja who wrote his continuation of the Rajataranginī about two hundred years after Kalhaṇa, distinctly states that the work of his predecessor ended with the reign of Jayasimha, i.e. the one described at such length in Book viii.⁵ This plain and explicit testimony must alone suffice to set at rest all possible doubts on the question.

42. The fact of the whole of the Chronicle as it is before us, being the work of one and the same hand, forces certain defects which are found in the latter portion of Kalhaṇa's narrative, still more prominently on our attention.

Want of revision in latter portion of Chronicle.

We have already had occasion to explain that much of the difficulty experienced in following Kalhaṇa's relation in Book viii. is due to the fact of Kalhaṇa writing as if only for readers—or hearers—already thoroughly versed in all details of contemporary Kāśmīr history. Another source of difficulty is, no doubt, the frequency of corruptions, in single words or whole verses, which we must needs ascribe to errors of successive copyists and other defects of the Manuscripts. But after making due allowance for these causes of obscurity there yet remain defects for which none but Kalhaṇa himself can be held responsible. They scarcely admit of any other explanation than that the latter portion of the Chronicle had not received the author's final revision.

Among the indications pointing in this direction I may mention at once several instances of undoubted oversights on the part of the Chronicler which meet us in the concluding portion of the viii. Book. Thus in the synopsis of reigns added at the end of the narrative proper Kalhaṇa departs in two, it is true, very minor points from his own relation in Book i. and iv.⁶ But, besides, he forgets altogether the mention of a king (Nara I.), the legends connected with whose reign he has treated at great length in the First Book.⁷ These oversights, pardonable enough in themselves, are such that an author of Kalhaṇa's general accuracy and precision could not have failed to notice and correct them if he had bestowed on this part the same careful revision which we have reason to assume for the earlier portions.

The same observation holds good of another historical retrospect in Book viii. where Kalhaṇa incidentally alludes to a detail which he had omitted to specify in the corresponding passage of the preceding Book.⁸ It also explains to us why we are confronted more than once in the concluding part of the narrative with a certain abruptness amounting almost to incoherence which we should look for in vain in the earlier portions. As particularly striking instances I may mention the abrupt references made to Prince Ghaṭotkaca's conquests;⁹ the sudden shifting of the narration from one scene to the other as in viii. 2842 sqq.; our introduction to a thoroughly changed political situation without any previous warning as in the relations of King Jayasimha and the rebel Rājavadana.¹⁰

43. In the light of these indications the cases not unfrequent towards the end of Book viii., where we meet with bad Sanskrit and wrong metrification in Kalhaṇa's verses, acquire significance.¹¹ Standing in a context which exhibits Defects of text in Books vii. and viii.

⁵ Jonar. 5.

⁶ See notes viii. 3411, 3425.

⁷ Compare note viii. 3414.

⁸ Compare note viii. 1957.

⁹ See viii. 3398-3402. It is characteristic that Kalhaṇa quite against his custom does not even indicate the home and descent of this foreign prince who became King Jayasimha's son-in-law.

¹⁰ See viii. 2992 sqq.

¹¹ Compare the remarks in notes viii. 3070-71 and 3331-35, and the defects noted in viii. 2701, 3097, 3125, 3238, 3319, 3326 sq., 3379.

For a striking case of wrong metre (which cannot be due to any corruption of the text), see viii. 2910.

otherwise all the peculiarities of Kallhana's thought and diction, it would be manifestly erroneous to condemn these verses on account of such formal defects as the work of an interpolator. It is far more probable that we have to recognize in these defects slips of Kallhana himself which, owing to the want of a final revision, have remained in the text. The cases where similes already previously used are repeated in almost identical terms, come under the same aspect. Such repetition is condemned by the rules of the Alaṅkāraśāstra, and it is characteristic that we meet with it only in the latter part of the viii. Book.¹²

Finally it appears to me that the unrevised state in which Kallhana left the concluding portion of his work, may be held to account also for the many textual corruptions we notice in it. It is true that undoubtedly corrupt readings and small lacunæ are found in the text of our two manuscripts throughout the whole of Books vii. and viii. But it is only within the last six hundred verses or so that meaningless passages and lacunæ of varying length become a constant feature in the text.¹³

We have already been led to assume that Kallhana had never finished the revision of the whole of his work. The explanation hence naturally suggests itself that the strongly marked inferiority of the final portion in regard to textual correctness may directly be due to Kallhana having left for it no corrected clean Manuscript. If this portion of Book viii. was originally copied from Kallhana's unrevised and possibly badly written autograph, perhaps some time after the author's death, the very defective condition of the extant text would be thoroughly intelligible. It is, however, evident that other explanations are à priori also possible, and that with our manuscript-tradition reaching back no further than the seventeenth century, any view on this point must for the present remain purely conjectural.

¹² Compare viii. 2789, 2796, 2810, 2848, with viii. 468, 2747, 776, 1199, respectively.

¹³ See for textual corruptions of all kinds, viii. 2818 sqq., 2862 sq., 2920, 3003 sq., 3070 sqq., etc. For lacunæ the verses shown with † in the translation from viii. 3204 onwards, may be referred to. These lacunæ are distinctly marked in Rājānaka Ratnakapṭha's old codex, and are such as might result from the partial illegibility of the original Manuscript.

In the first part of Book viii. we find some large lacunæ of a different kind, not indicated in our MSS., yet plainly proved by the break in the narrative; see notes viii. 290, 343. In these cases the omissions are most likely due to clerical oversights.

Very curious are those corrupt passages where we find half-verses or Pādas of manifestly different context tacked together; see viii. 1197 sq., 3327, 3379. It is difficult to guess here the exact reason of the strangely garbled condition of the text.

SECTION II.—THE CODEX ARCHETYPUS.

44. The questions touched in the preceding paragraphs show sufficiently why it is necessary for us in the present place to take note also of the Manuscript tradition through which Kalhana's work has reached us. The results of my researches on this subject have for the greater part been discussed already in the Critical Preface of my edition of the text.¹ Of those, it will suffice to give here only a succinct résumé.

The Calcutta edition of 1835 which forms the editio princeps of the Rajatarāṅgiṇī, was based principally on a Devanāgarī transcript which Mr. Moorcroft, the traveller, had caused to be prepared for the Asiatic Society of Bengal during his stay at Srinagar in 1823. The versified colophon attached to this transcript and reproduced at the end of the editio princeps, informs us that the original Manuscript from which the Annals of the kings of Kāśmīr were copied for "the illustrious Murkarāphaka Sahibha," had been obtained from the learned Kāśmīrian Paṇḍit Śivarāma. The latter is praised in the colophon as the representative of that family which alone in Kāśmīr had always preserved a copy of the Royal Chronicles.²

The very numerous corruptions found in the text of the Calcutta edition prove clearly that Mr. Moorcroft's copy shared all the defects inherent to Devanāgarī transcripts made in Kāśmīr from Śāradā Manuscripts. Yet even in this defective condition the text obtained from Kāśmīr was far superior to that presented by the incomplete Devanāgarī Manuscripts from Calcutta and Lucknow on which Dr. Wilson had been obliged to rely in 1825.³ Mr. Troyer's edition of the first six books (Paris, 1840) was avowedly prepared with the same materials as the editio princeps.

No advance was made towards the recovery of the genuine text of the Rajatarāṅgiṇī until Professor Bühler's memorable tour in search of Sanskrit Manuscripts in Kāśmīr in 1875. One of the many important results which rewarded his brilliant researches, was that he established the absolute superiority of the Kāśmīr MSS. of the Chronicle written in the Śāradā character, over those in Devanāgarī. He also clearly recognized the fact that all Śāradā MSS. known to exist in Kāśmīr are derived from a single Manuscript, the same from which Mr. Moorcroft had obtained his copy. This codex archetypus, as Professor Bühler appropriately called it, was at the time of his visit in possession of Paṇḍit Kośavarāma, the grandson of Paṇḍit Śivarāma. The owner guarded his precious heirloom so jealously that Professor Bühler was not able to obtain more than a glimpse of the ancient manuscript.⁴

45. The chances of obtaining access to the codex seemed even less promising at the time of my first visit to Kāśmīr in 1888. After Paṇḍit Kośavarāma's death, which had occurred in the meantime, the manuscript had been cut up and divided among three of his heirs. My first endeavours to secure permission to see and collate these portions resulted in failure. The actual owners, though by no means able to appreciate the scientific value of their possession, were evidently resolved to maintain their predecessor's policy. More than a year passed in repeated endeavours and negotiations, which proved fruitless but were instructive to me in a small way of the methods of eastern diplomacy. My success in obtaining at last the loan of

Mr. Moorcroft's transcript.

Discovery of codex archetypus.

Codex archetypus secured for edition, 1889.

¹ See pp. v.-xiii.

³ See Essay, p. 2.

² The colophon is reproduced in my edition, p. xii.

⁴ See Report, pp. 7, 54.

the several parts for the purposes of my edition was mainly due to the kind offices of the Honourable Paṇḍit Suraj Kaul, C.I.E., then Member of the Kashmir State Council, and his son Paṇḍit Hari Kishan Kaul, then my pupil and now an officer of the Statutory Civil Service, Punjab.

Thus the disjecta membra of the codex archetypus of the Rājatarāṅgiṇī became once more for a time united in my hands.⁵ It proved to contain all the eight Books of Kalhaṇa's work, forming a large octavo volume which originally consisted of 323 folia of age-worn Kāśmīr paper. The last leaf and one in the middle have been lost, probably when the above-mentioned partition took place. The leaves are arranged as in the case of most Kāśmīr MSS., in forms which were originally bound up after the fashion of European books, but are now loose. The facsimile of a leaf published with my edition shows the character of the writing and the general appearance of the manuscript.

Rājānaka Ratnakaṇṭha, the writer
of the cod. arch.

46. The colophons attached to the several Books do not contain a date. But fortunately they name the writer of the codex, Paṇḍit Rājānaka Ratnakaṇṭha, and this entry enabled me to fix the age of the codex with approximate accuracy. Other MSS. from the same writer's hand which I successively saw or purchased, show dates ranging from Śaka 1570 or A.D. 1618-9 to Śaka 1603 or A.D. 1685-6. One of these MSS. contains Rājānaka Ratnakaṇṭha's own commentary on the Haraviṣayakāvya. The more detailed information which the writer gives here as to his person and family, proves beyond all doubt his identity with Rājānaka Ratnakaṇṭha, son of Śaṃkarakaṇṭha, the learned author of several commentaries on Kāśmīrian Kāvyaś and also of some original poetical compositions. The known dates of these works fall within the time-limits already indicated.⁶

⁵ Habent sua fata libelli. The codex, the use of which had been obtained with so much trouble, was nearly lost on my voyage to England in 1890. The box which contained it, was dropped overboard in the Ostende harbour through the carelessness of a Flemish porter, and recovered only with difficulty. Fortunately my collation of the text was complete and safely packed elsewhere.

Happily, too, the soaking with sea water left no perceptible trace in the codex. Kāśmīr paper of the old make stands immersions of this kind remarkably well, and the ink used to this day by Kāśmīrian Paṇḍits for their Sanskrit MSS., is in no way affected by water. The owners when they received back in 1892 their respective parts, had no inkling of the abhiṣeka their household talismans had undergone.

⁶ The following are the texts which I am at present able to trace to the authorship of our Rājānaka Ratnakaṇṭha.

i. Laghupacīrīkā, a commentary on Ratnākara's Haraviṣayakāvya. (My MS. of this work, No. 188, is Ratnakaṇṭha's autograph copy. The dates shown in the introduction and the colophon of Canto i, prove that the composition and writing fall both within the year Śaka 1603 or A.D. 1681-2).

ii. Sūryahitā, a commentary on the Yudhi- śharaviṣayakāvya of Vasudhava, composed in Śaka 1593 or A.D. 1671-2. (An edition of this commentary has been printed by Paṇḍit Śivadatta in the Kānyamālā, based on my MS., No. 206.)

iii. Laghupacīrīkā, a commentary on the Stutisūmāṅgalī of Jagaddhara, a Bhakti text of the Śaiva persuasion, composed Śaka 1602 or A.D. 1680-1. (Printed in the Kānyamālā Series.)

iv. The Ratnasataka or Citrabhūṃśataka, a century of verses in praise of Sūrya, composed Śaka 1587 or A.D. 1665-6. (MS. No. 175 in my collection.) Both this and the following small text are referred to by Ratnakaṇṭha in the colophon of his Yudhiśharaviṣaya commentary.

v. Sūryastutirīkṣya, a small devotional poem, undated (MS. No. 179 in my collection).

vi. A commentary on Yaśaskara's Devastotra which itself is a poetical illustration of Śobhākara's Alaṃkāraśāstramāhātmya, undated (MS. No. 14 of my collection).

vii. Sārasamuccaya, a commentary on the Kāvyaṇṭakā, containing a résumé of the Jayanti and other earlier expositions. (Compare regarding this text, Prof. Peterson's remarks, Second Report of operations in search of Sanskrit Manuscripts, pp. 18 sqq.)

In the first five compositions Rājānaka

The point thus established is of considerable importance for our estimate of the critical value of the codex archetypus. We see clearly that its writer was not a mere copyist but a scholar of no small attainments who, we have good reason to Text of Ratnakarṇṭha's oodox.

Ratnakarṇṭha calls himself the son of Rājanaka S'ankarakarṇṭha, of the Dharmayāna Gotra, an inhabitant of "the land which is purified by the dust from the lotus-feet of Ś'ārada," i.e. Kāśmīr. Rājanaka is a name borne by numerous Paṇḍit families in Kāśmīr; compare below, note vi. 117.

The memory of Rājanaka Ratnakarṇṭha still lives in Kāśmīr Paṇḍit tradition as that of a great scholar and very fast writer. The latter fact accounts for the considerable number of manuscripts written by him which are still extant in Kāśmīrian libraries both in and outside the Valley. I myself have been able to acquire at Ś'rinagar, copies from his hand of the following texts:—

i. Rāyamukuta's commentary on the Amarakośa, written Ś'aka 1577 or A.D. 1655-6 in 'Kaṣṭhavūṭa' (sic) or Kaṣṭ'vār (No. 6 of my collection).

ii. Amaravūṭyā (No. 9).

iii. Kāntarapāṇicikā of Trilocanadāsa, dated Ś'aka 1595 or A.D. 1673-4 (No. 33).

iv. Kāśmīhātmya from the Brahmapurāṇa (No. 39).

v. A commentary on the Prabodhacandrodaya (No. 93).

vi. Jonarāja's commentary on the S'rikanṭhacarita (No. 166).

The oldest of the MSS. from Ratnakarṇṭha's hand which I have seen, is the interesting birch-bark codex now in possession of Paṇḍit Mahānandajīva, son of my departed friend Paṇḍit Dāmodar, of Ś'rinagar. The Kūṣya-grahāṇasāhikā which it contains, besides some other Alankāra texts, is dated Ś'aka 1570 corresponding to A.D. 1648-9. (Compare regarding this codex which to my knowledge is the latest dated Kāśmīr manuscript on birch-bark, my edition of the Rājat., Preface, p. vii., and my Catalogue of Jammu Sanskrit MSS., p. xxiv.)

A manuscript of the Kṣetrapālpadāhati by Ratnakarṇṭha dated Ś'aka 1607 (A.D. 1685-6), came to light on my examination of Paṇḍit Jaganmohana Haṇḍ's library at Lahore (see below, § 49). Other MSS. from the learned copyist's hand, I have little doubt, have found their way into other Kāśmīrian libraries in the plains, and probably also into the collections acquired by Prof. Böhler and other European scholars in Kāśmīr.

An inspection of the codex archetypus or of the facsimile pages reproduced from it in my edition, fully bears out the tradition of the Paṇḍits as to Ratnakarṇṭha's fast writing.

His handwriting as it appears there, with its very cursive and peculiar characters, presents unusual difficulties even to the practised reader of Ś'ārada writing. To these difficulties must be ascribed, at least partly, the numerous clerical corruptions and blunders which we meet, to a greater or smaller extent, in all modern transcripts of the codex archetypus. Those among the above-quoted MSS. which bear earlier dates, show the same peculiar cursive ductus, but are more easily read. It seems to me very probable that Ratnakarṇṭha wrote his copy of the Rājatarāṅgi at a comparatively advanced age and, like the majority of his manuscripts, chiefly for his own use.

The following anecdotes were related to me by Paṇḍit friends in illustration of the above tradition. When Ratnakarṇṭha was a youth and still at school, he used to write out the whole of the text which his teacher had expounded during a fortnight on the single day closing the pakṣa, which is a regular anadhyayana or holiday of orthodox Brahman instruction. He is credited with having been able habitually to write six hundred Ś'lokas per diem. On one occasion he is supposed to have accomplished even a greater clerical feat. Resting during the middle of the day at Gambhīrasaṅgama (see below, Memoir, § 64), on a journey from Ś'rinagar to Vīṭ'brōr, Ratnakarṇṭha is believed to have presented his companion with a copy of the Bhagavadgītā which he had written while the latter had busied himself about their meal. Ratnakarṇṭha's name in its Kāśmīr form, Rath' Rāzdān (Rājanaka), still lives in a proverbial saying often heard among Paṇḍits, "Yim gai Rath' Rāzdān' achar" ("Those are Rath' Rāzdān's letters"). It is used of a hurried writing, difficult to read. Ratnakarṇṭha's direct descendants still live in Ś'rinagar as a respectable family of Kārkuns.

Judging from my manuscript of the Rāyamukuta which was written in Kaṣṭ'vār, A.D. 1655, Ratnakarṇṭha seems to have continued copying texts even while travelling abroad. Curiously enough, while writing this note, an excellent manuscript of Bāṇa's Harṣacarita in Ratnakarṇṭha's familiar hand has reached me from Bhadravāh (Sk. Bhadrāvahā, see Rājat. viii. 501), the district adjoining Kaṣṭ'vār on the south. Is it possible that this welcome find is in some way connected with Ratnakarṇṭha's visit to that region?

believe, has copied his original with great care and accuracy. The text given by Rājānaka Ratnakāṇṭha in the first six books and in the greater portion of the seventh, is remarkably free from mistakes and corruptions. Yet the care with which he has marked in these portions of the text the lacunæ he found in his original, proves sufficiently that the immunity of his text from defects of this kind cannot be due to unscrupulous restoring as might otherwise be suspected. These lacunæ are now filled up by a later hand, as we shall see, from the collation of another manuscript, independent of Kalhaṇa's original.

The fact here indicated makes it clear that the far less satisfactory condition in which we find the remaining portion of the work, must be attributed to the defective state of the text in Rājānaka Ratnakāṇṭha's original. Here we meet much more frequently with lacunæ, now but rarely supplemented by the later hand already mentioned. Undoubted corruptions, blunders and misspellings also increase as we proceed towards the close of the work. We have had already occasion above (§ 43) to indicate a cause which may be held to account for part of these deficiencies. There are, however, also other circumstances which are likely to have co-operated. The diminished interest with which the concluding portion of the Chronicle seems to have been read, must have caused them to be copied less frequently. Hence the number of copies available for comparison and correction was also more restricted. The greater obscurity of Kalhaṇa's narrative where it deals with contemporary events, is likely to have often led even intelligent copyists into errors. Finally it is to be remembered that the leaves at the end of birch-bark volumes, such as we must suppose the older copies of the Rājatarāṅgiṇī to have been, were always exposed to greater risk of injury from the peeling or breaking off of their brittle material.⁷

The glossator A_2 .

47. The great critical value of the codex archetypus (marked A in my edition and Notes) is due not only to the fact of its having been written by a scholar of Rājānaka Ratnakāṇṭha's stamp, but also to the abundance of important glosses, various readings and corrections which later hands have recorded in it. Two of these designated in my edition A_2 and A_3 , respectively, are of particular importance.

Of A_2 I have shown that he was the oldest of the annotators of the codex and probably a contemporary of Rājānaka Ratnakāṇṭha himself. To A_2 we owe, besides a series of important corrections and various readings, a great number of valuable glosses. They have proved most useful to me in tracing the details of the historical topography of Kāśmīr, and have more than once thrown welcome light also on other points in Kalhaṇa's narrative. Certain indications fully noticed in the edition led me to the conclusion that the corrections, various readings, and probably also the majority of the glosses entered by A_2 , resulted from a careful collation of Ratnakāṇṭha's copy with its original. While Ratnakāṇṭha was copying the text, A_2 appears to have revised what the former had written, and to have added from the original manuscript the marginal notes and various readings which Ratnakāṇṭha had omitted to copy.

The conclusion I had thus formed as to the age of the annotator A_2 has quite recently received a striking confirmation. Since the publication of my edition I had repeatedly in manuscripts of other Sanskrit texts which I saw or acquired in Kāśmīr, come across learned glosses and notes in the handwriting of A_2 , so familiar to me from the codex archetypus.⁸ But none of these texts furnished a clue to the person of the annotator. In the autumn of last year (1898), however, I was able to purchase in Srinagar an old paper manuscript of part of the Mahābhārata which in a most conclusive fashion settled the question as to the age and identity of "A₂." Apart from numerous explanatory notes written by A₂, I found in it, endorsed on the first leaf of the Āśvamedha Parvan, a formal deed of sale executed and signed in the annotator's own handwriting.

⁷ Comp. Prof. Bühler's remarks, Report, p. 30.

The document which I hope to reproduce elsewhere as it presents also other points of interest, records the sale by certain Pandits of a complete copy of the Mahābhārata for 45,000 Dinnāras to one designated as the "excellent Guru Ananda." The writer of the deed signs himself with the name of Tukade Bhaṭṭa Haraka. The date is given as Thursday the 8th śukla of the Āśvayuja of the Lankika year 58. This by calculation and the evidence of the Muhammadan date, indicated in an attached Persian version of the deed, is shown to correspond to Thursday the 10th July, A.D. 1682. Thus the fact of A₂, recte Bhaṭṭa Haraka, having been a contemporary of Rājānaka Ratnakāṇṭha is proved beyond all doubt. From the way in which Bhaṭṭa Haraka annotated not only the codex archetypus but other MSS. written by Ratnakāṇṭha it may be inferred with great probability that he was his constant companion and possibly his pupil. The name Tukade (written with le as the final syllable and hence pronounced 'Takare')⁹ represents, perhaps, the modern 'Krām' designation 'Trilek' borne by a considerable number of Brahman families in Srinagar.

A₂ identified with Bhaṭṭa Haraka.

48. Another important annotator of the codex archetypus is A₃. His hand has filled up most of the lacunæ which Ratnakāṇṭha had left in the text of Books i.-vii. He has, besides, recorded a considerable number of various readings and explanatory notes. A₃ has also supplied in several instances whole verses and Pādas which Ratnakāṇṭha had omitted without indicating a lacuna. It is certain that all these additions of A₃ were made after Bhaṭṭa Haraka had done his revision of the codex.

The annotator A₃.

There is ample evidence to prove that the additions of A₃ are derived from a genuine recension of Kalhana's text and cannot be due to conjectural emendation. We are hence fully justified in assuming that for the purpose of revising Ratnakāṇṭha's text, A₃ had used a manuscript independent from the latter's original. But my endeavours to obtain information as to the existence of this manuscript have been in vain. Nor have I been able to discover traces of its use in other Kāśmīrian copies. No definite opinion can thus be formed as to the relative value of the text recension which this manuscript now lost represented. The very numerous lacunæ and corruptions which have remained in the text of the last two Books notwith-

Text recension
followed by A₃.

⁸ Numerous glosses of A₂ are found in the manuscripts from Rājānaka Ratnakāṇṭha's hand, described above in note 6, under i.-iv., also in Ratnakāṇṭha's autograph copy of his commentary on the Haraviśayakāvya.

Of other MSS. showing notes from the hand of A₂, I may mention the following now in my possession: No. 122, Srīvara's Rājataranginī; No. 208, Karmakriyākāṇḍa of Somaśāmbhu; Nos. 228 and 222, Ṛcalas containing Mantras of the Kāṭhakasāmbhita (described by Prof. Von Schroeder in the "Anzeiger" of the Imperial Academy, Vienna, Jahrgang 1896, p. 73). The glosses in the last-named text show that A₂, a rara avis among Kāśmīrian Pandits, had studied works connected with Vedic literature, like Yaska's Nirukta, Uvāṭa's Bhāṣya, etc.

Glosses by A₂ are frequent also in the MS. of the Harṣacarita written by Ratnakāṇṭha, which has recently come into my hands; see above, note 6.

⁹ See note i; 806.

standing the revision of A_3 , suggest that the text of the manuscript collated by A_4 was in these Books either equally defective or partially missing. Some indications to be noticed below, seem to show that the revision of A_3 took place early in the last century but was not effected at one time. I am hence inclined to look for the person of A_4 among the early owners of the codex, possibly ancestors of S'ivarāma and Kēśavarāma.

Apart from the two old annotators A_1 and A_2 , we meet in Ratnakapṛṣṭha's codex with additions also from other hands. But none of these can claim any special interest or authority. Two of them, A_1 and A_2 , can be shown to be of very recent date, while the rest have contented themselves with entering explanatory notes only in isolated instances.

Other Kāśmīr
MSS. derived from
A.

Notwithstanding a diligent search extending over a series of years, I have succeeded as little as Professor Bühler in bringing to light in Kāśmīr a manuscript of the Chronicle which might prove independent of Ratnakapṛṣṭha's archetypus. All Kāśmīr manuscripts of the Rājatarāṅgiṇī which I have seen or of which I could obtain information, are comparatively recent transcripts from that codex made either directly or through some intermediary copy. Many of the mistakes we find in them are directly due to the difficulty the copyists experienced in reading Ratnakapṛṣṭha's peculiar and extremely cursive handwriting. In all of these transcripts we notice that the scribes in copying have followed indifferently either Ratnakapṛṣṭha's text or the various readings of A_1 and A_2 . This circumstance accounts for the frequent discrepancies which these copies exhibit among themselves notwithstanding their undoubted common origin. To these comparatively modern transcripts of A belongs also the S'ārada MS., now in the Dacca College Collection, on which Paṇḍit Durgāprasāda's text edition (1892-94) was based.

SECTION III.—THE LAHORE MANUSCRIPT.

49. The critical materials above indicated had already been fully recorded and utilized in my edition of Kalhana's text. I should have been obliged to content myself with them also in preparing my translation, had not a fortunate chance enabled me to secure fresh textual help in a place where I little expected it.

Discovery of
Lahore MS., 1895.

In April, 1895, I obtained, after a good deal of negotiation, access to a small and much-neglected collection of Sanskrit manuscripts, belonging to Paṇḍit Jagannāth Lāl Hund, a Purohita of Kāśmīrian descent, temporarily resident in Lahore. Among the contents of a miscellaneous bundle of manuscripts, a few loose leaves, evidently from some Rājatarāṅgiṇī copy in Devanāgarī characters, attracted my attention. I had a careful search made in the confused rubbish representing the remainder of the 'library,'¹ with the result that the greatest portion of the manuscript was ultimately recovered.

At first this find seemed to promise but little. It was evident that the manuscript had been very carelessly copied by an ignorant scribe from a S'ārada original, the text of which agreed closely with that of the Kāśmīrian codex archetypus. A closer examination, however, of some detached leaves which happened to belong to the vii. Book, revealed to my surprise that amidst endless blunders and corruptions there were also some readings manifestly superior to Ratnakapṛṣṭha's text. I accordingly prepared, with the assistance of Paṇḍit Govind Kaul, a careful collation of the whole manuscript as far as I was able to obtain it. The help this manuscript has furnished for restoring the true sense of Kalhana's text in a number of passages, makes it necessary to give a detailed description of it in the present place.

¹ Garta would be a more appropriate designation, to use the facetious term current among my Paṇḍit friends in S'rinagar.

The codex which in the notes accompanying the translation has been marked as L, seems to have consisted originally of about 316 leaves. Of these the folia at the beginning and end as well as some 44 leaves from other parts could not be traced by me.² The manuscript is written on brownish paper of Kāśmīr make, apparently about 150 years old. The leaves are carefully cut and were originally arranged in forms or 'samoayas' of about 8 folia each. They measure 10 inches in height by 6½ inches in width. The writing is enclosed in a nicely-drawn frame of coloured ruling; its lines, on the average about 20 per page, run parallel to the narrower side just as is the case in almost all Kāśmīrian manuscripts.

Description of Codex L.

This mode of writing, unknown in Sanskrit manuscripts of India proper; the arrangement in forms equally peculiar to Kāśmīr; the prevalences of clerical mistakes directly due to a faulty transcription of S'ārādā characters,—all these are indications showing that L had been written either in Kāśmīr or, if outside the Valley, by a Kāśmīrian still attached to the clerical traditions of his home. Certain considerations seem to point to the latter conclusion.

In the first place it must be remembered that the common use of Devanāgarī characters in Kāśmīr cannot be traced back beyond the second quarter of the nineteenth century,³ whereas paper and writing prove unmistakably an older date for L. I further ascertained from Paṇḍit Jaganmohan Lal's vaṁśāvalī or family tree that his great-great-grandfather (Nātharām Huṇḍ) had emigrated from Kāśmīr to Delhi, probably in the third quarter of the eighteenth century. Nātharām's son, Mukundrām Huṇḍ, who seems to have been a Sanskrit scholar of some attainments, lived at Lucknow about the end of the eighteenth century. A ṛcaka manuscript in S'ārādā character which was copied for him at "Ayodhyā," by a Kāśmīrian scribe (Lachirāma), and which is now in Jaganmohan's collection, bears the Laukika date 57, corresponding to A.D. 1781-2. It seems thus chronologically possible that L was also copied at Delhi or Lucknow, from some S'ārādā original which Nātharām, Jaganmohan's emigrant ancestor, had brought with him from Kāśmīr.

L probably written outside Kāśmīr.

50. The questions presented by the text of L in its relation to that of Ratnakanṭha's codex, A, appeared for a long time very puzzling. On the one hand there was overwhelming evidence to show that the text found in L, with all its faults of transcription and other clerical defects, was directly derived from A. On the other hand, again, there was the fact that L, in a considerable number of passages spread through the whole of the Chronicle, presents readings which set right undoubted corruptions of A. In certain cases lacunæ of A, even to the extent of half-verses, appeared in L filled up with a text which could clearly not be the result of conjectural restoration.

Text of L in relation to A.

In proof of the first point it will suffice to mention the following. Throughout the whole of the work L shows the same curious mixture of readings taken indifferently from Rājānaka Ratnakanṭha (A), and his annotators, A, and A, which, as already stated, characterizes all extant Kāśmīr MSS. derived from the codex archetypus. Thus often, even in the same verse, L sides with A, against A, and vice versa. In several instances L shows actually the various lectiones which A, has quoted in the margin as "from another manuscript," while otherwise slavishly following the text as given by A.⁴ The great majority of lacunæ found in Books vii. and viii., whether large or small, reappears in L exactly in the same form. Even such minute details as to whether Ratnakarṇṭha has marked the lacuna by dots, ---, or not; whether yugalakas and tilakas are designated as such in words or merely by the figures 2, 3, are duly reflected in the text of L. Though L, like most modern copies of the archetypus, does not reproduce ordinarily the wealth of glosses found in A, yet there is one instance (viii. 2628) where L actually shows one of the rare explanatory notes jotted down by Ratnakarṇṭha himself.

² The folia missing at the time of my collation were 1, 2, 22, 68-71, 81-110, 120, 140, 160, 181, 311-finis.

³ Compare Report, p. 33.

Independent
readings of L.

By the side of such manifest proofs of descent from A the Lahore Manuscript exhibits readings which cannot be accounted for except by the use, direct or indirect, of some independent source. Reference has already been made to the most striking evidence, viz. those passages where L supplements the text of lacunæ found in A. These instances are unfortunately not numerous, but as the supplemented text is such as cannot possibly be attributed to conjectural restoration, they are quite sufficient to establish the point.⁵ Equally convincing are those very numerous passages in which the otherwise so defective text of L rectifies undoubted corruptions of Ratnakarṇṭha's codex. Such critically most welcome corrections are offered by L throughout the whole of the Chronicle. But they are exceptionally frequent in the vii. Book, and there again in that portion which might roughly be described as the second third.⁶

A critical examination of all the passages for which such corrections by L have been recorded in my notes, shows conclusively that these correct readings cannot be due to the conjectural emendations of some Pandit. In a series of passages it is true L actually confirms the emended readings which I or Pandit Durgaprasāda had proposed in our respective editions.⁷ But their number is indeed insignificant when compared to the number of passages where corruptions had not been suspected before, or where satisfactory emendation seemed previously hopeless. Another argument against the suspicion of conjectural restoration is supplied by the fact that the corrections of L are very unequally distributed over the several parts of the text. Thus Book viii., which with its many textual deficiencies might reasonably be supposed to have offered the widest scope for such emendations, shows in proportion to its length the smallest number of corrections.

Text of L copied from A but revised from independent
MS.

51. It appears to me that the observations above detailed can be reconciled only by the assumption that L represents a text which has been copied from Ratnakarṇṭha's archetypus, but has subsequently undergone a revision with the help of some manuscript independent alike from A and the codex collated by A₁. It is evident that this revision cannot be attributed to the writer of L itself. His numberless blunders and inaccuracies prove him to have been an exceptionally careless vii. 194 is missing in L); vii. * 234, 243, 253, 295, 313, 316, 390, 416, 422, 462, * 487, 511, 517, 524, 555-1178 (corrections found in not less than 111 verses), 1200, 1304, 1551, 1648; viii. 147, 357, 445, 452, 510, 631, 701, 1023, 1031, 1165, 1346, 2500.

⁴ See for readings thus quoted in A and reproduced by L, iv. 498; vii. 248, 264.

⁵ See notes iv. 420; vii. 881, 897, 1081; viii. 343.

⁶ Compare for noteworthy corrections of the text as supplied by L, notes ii. 44, * 187; iii. 28, * 214, * 475, 523; iv. 246, 335, 462, 464, 499, 500, 507, 594; v. 108, 231, 261, 280, 282, 297, 303, 370, 374 (the text from v. 375 to

⁷ See the passages marked with * in the preceding note, and vii. 748, 811, 902, 1001, 1082, 1128, 1166; viii. 631, 701.

and ignorant copyist, incapable even of always reading correctly the S'aradā writing of his original. We are thus led to the conclusion that the scribe of L found this revised text already in the manuscript which he copied and which for brevity's sake we may designate as λ.

The assumption of such a manuscript, intermediary between A and L, allows us to explain also why L sometimes marks small lacunæ where the text of A is even now intact.⁸ It is clear that in those passages λ had suffered slight damages before the writer of L set about to copy it. Similarly it becomes intelligible why we find in L in a few passages the places of single syllables which Ratnakaraṇṭha has omitted through mere oversight, correctly marked as lacunæ.⁹ The careless copyist of L could scarcely be supposed to have noticed himself such slight omissions. But it was different with the writer (or corrector) of λ who, from the very fact of his text-revision may be assumed to have been a scholar capable of noticing also such small defects. The manuscript λ was certainly written in S'aradā characters. For only thus can we explain the numberless faults of transcription in L, and the occasional occurrence in it of S'aradā characters which the scribe has slavishly reproduced instead of transcribing them.

Original of L.

It would, of course, be possible to argue that there was yet another manuscript besides λ in the line of descent which leads from A to L. But at present I see no ground for such an assumption. The interval between the respective dates when A and L were written can, after what has been said above, a priori, not be assumed to exceed a century.

In this connection it may yet be mentioned that there is good reason to suppose that λ (or the copy immediately preceding it) was transcribed from A at a time when the revision of the codex archetypus by A, was not yet completed. It is only in this way that we can readily understand why some lacunæ which in Ratnakaraṇṭha's codex are now filled in by the hand of A, still figure as lacunæ in L.¹⁰ It is evident that so extensive a text-revision as that of A, is not likely to have been effected at one time. If, as seems probable, we must recognize in the still anonymous annotator A, a later owner of the archetypus, it is only natural to suppose that he added his corrections and supplements at various times in the course of his reading, or as opportunity offered for the collation of other manuscripts.

Date of MS. λ.

I have not been able to discover in any of the Kāśmīrian copies known to me, traces of the use of the original of L. If the latter manuscript, as suggested above, was copied outside Kāśmīr in Delhi, Lucknow, or some other place of the plains, this can scarcely surprise us. The manuscript λ when once carried outside the Valley by some emigrant, was not likely to find its way back again to the land of S'aradā. If, then, the original of L has escaped destruction it would be from the gargas of one of those towns in the North-West Provinces or the Panjāb where there are great colonies of Kāśmīrian Brahmans, that we might expect it to come to light again.

⁸ Thus in v. 162-178 in twelve places; vii. 887, 1554, 1598; viii. 206, 629, 714, 1038, 1200, 1244, 1386, 1624, 1751, 1822, 1888, 2380, 2524, etc.

⁹ Thus in vii. 1707; viii. 1788, 1921, 2703.

¹⁰ Such lacunæ are found, vii. 1395, 1637, 1661 sq., 1673, 1676, 1688; viii. 5, 26, 48, 725, 1157, 1286, 1350, 1366, 1550, 3138, 3140.

Apart from these passages L has all the extremely numerous lacuna-supplements as given by A. It is certainly curious that a few verses which A, has supplied in the margin of the archetypus, viz. iii. 80 sq., 95, 310, are also missing in L. All other verses thus supplemented by A, are duly reproduced in L.

SECTION IV.—CRITICAL CONSTITUTION OF THE TEXT.

Lines followed in edition of text.

52. The lines which I followed in preparing the text of the Chronicle as shown in my edition, have been fully indicated in the critical preface of the latter.¹ We have seen already that besides the text which Ratnakarṇṭha had copied and A₁ revised from some now lost codex, the only critical materials then available were the corrections and additions reproduced by A₂ from one other independent manuscript. In these circumstances Ratnakarṇṭha's copy as revised by A₂, or Bhaṭṭa Haraka, was the only possible basis of my edition. From this I had departed in favour of A₃ only where the readings of the latter appeared to be distinctly preferable and to represent a closer approach to Kalhana's original text. The full apparatus criticus given in the footnotes of my edition makes it possible to see at a glance the manuscript authority for the text as adopted by me, as well as the eventual variations from it as represented by the several hands of the codex archetypus.

Such emendations as I had thought indisputably required for the constitution of an intelligible text, were invariably marked as such in the edition and the actual readings of A carefully recorded. But I had kept in view the risks with which any attempt at emendation is beset in the case of so difficult a text as the Rājataranginī, and had accordingly endeavoured to exercise the utmost caution. For the same reason I had abstained from suggesting conjectural restorations for passages in which the text as found in A showed lacunæ, except where only a few Akṣaras were missing, and could be restored from the nature of the context or by reference to related passages with a reasonable degree of certainty.

53. My prolonged study of Kalhana's Chronicle which followed the publication of the edition, has brought to light no facts to modify the principles on which my text has been constituted. No lengthy explanations are hence required in regard to the text underlying my present translation.

Text adopted for translation.

It is in all material points the same as has been adopted in my edition. In those comparatively rare cases where a close examination of the context had induced me to change my choice between the different readings recorded in A, the point has been distinctly indicated in the notes. The same was done, of course, in all those instances where the translation is based on emendations arrived at since the publication of my edition. Whenever L supplied readings which appeared to me preferable to those shown in the printed text, I have followed them in the translation and indicated them in the notes. In the latter, too, I have marked those not unfrequent instances in which the readings of L have actually confirmed conjectural emendations already proposed in the edition. In view of the circumstances explained above it would have served no useful object to include in the present work a complete collation of L. But I have taken occasion to show in the notes all those variæ lectiones of L which though not superior to A, yet seemed deserving of consideration.

Paṇḍit Durgaprasāda's posthumous edition of the text which was published after the appearance of my own, was avowedly prepared from modern copies of A.² These I had occasion to examine after the death of that lamented scholar. Neither in them nor in his printed text was I able to trace the use of materials which would point to a source independent of A. No independent critical authority can therefore attach to Durgāprasāda's text. But the Paṇḍit's edition contains also a considerable number of useful new emendations, besides others which had already been proposed in my edition. Wherever I saw good reason to adopt such emendations for my translation, their source has been duly indicated in the notes. Though the direct aid I could derive from Paṇḍit Durgāprasāda's edition was limited to these corrections, I had yet ample occasion to appreciate the great care and critical judgment with which he had prepared his text. To the scholarly merits of his work I may hence be allowed to render here a well-deserved tribute.

¹ See pp. xiv, sq.

² See Prof. Peterson's note in Preface to

Vol. ii. of Paṇḍit Durgaprasāda's edition, Bombay, 1894, p. v.

CHAPTER IV.

THE CHRONOLOGY OF THE RĀJATARANGINĪ.

Chronology as a critical test.

54. The contents of Kalhana's work from the point of view of the critical tests which we are able to apply to them, divide themselves into two great portions, marked also by a corresponding difference in their intrinsic historical value. The narrative of Books iv. to viii. which extends from the beginning of the Karkota dynasty to Kalhana's own time, we are able to check in many important points by independent evidence from other sources, such as coins, inscriptions and the notices of Indian and foreign writers. Our position is very different in regard to the first three Books containing the narrative of the earlier epoch. The record here found of the successive Gonandiya dynasties whose rule is supposed by Kalhana to have filled an aggregate period of nearly 8050 years, consists mainly of bare dynastic lists interspersed with more or less legendary traditions and anecdotes. The persons and events which figure in them, can but rarely be traced in our other sources, and then, too, only with considerable variations as to date and character. It is clear that here where independent information fails us in the control of Kalhana's statements, we must depend all the more on the only remaining critical test, that of internal evidence.

It helps us greatly in applying this test that Kalhana follows from the first a clearly-defined system of chronology which by its outward precision lends itself conveniently to critical analysis. It is evident that the result of a scrutiny of this chronological system must have an important bearing on our views regarding the historical value of the narrative itself, for which that system forms as it were the framework. It hence seems justified that an examination of the characteristic features of Kalhana's Chronology should precede our critical inquiry into the traditions and records contained in his Chronicle.

SECTION I.—THE SYSTEM OF KALHANA'S CHRONOLOGY.

55. It can safely be asserted that what induced European scholars from the first to turn with special interest towards Kalhana's account of Kaśmīr history, was not the intrinsic importance of the records contained in it, but the fact of their being presented with all the appearance of strict chronology. The Kaśmīr Chronicle stands quite alone among extant works of Sanskrit literature in respect of the exact dates it furnishes. They seemed to offer the means for determining the dates of events and persons in other parts of India, the history of which in the absence of similar Chronicles presented itself to the inquirers of the early part of this century as shrouded in hopeless obscurity. It is, therefore, only natural that all those scholars who had occasion to occupy themselves with the Rājataranginī, have devoted a good deal of attention to the determination of these dates,

Notwithstanding these continued labours, the general student of Indian history who had occasion to consult the Chronicle in the several published translations and abstracts, might have apparently had just reason to complain of perplexing variations and uncertainties in connection with its chronology.¹ In justice to Kalhaṇa it is necessary to point out that whatever the defects of his chronology from a historical point of view may be, he can yet in no way be held responsible for these obscurities. They have arisen partly from the defective state of the text upon which the inquiries of early interpreters like Wilson, Troyer and Lassen were based, partly from their insufficient acquaintance with the particular era in which all really reliable dates of Kalhaṇa are calculated. The attempts made by those scholars and others like General Cunningham, to "adjust" the early part of Kalhaṇa's chronology on a conjectural basis, with the help of dates gathered from outside the Chronicle, only increased the discrepancies and doubts in their respective results.²

Apparent uncertainty of chronological statements.

It is due to Prof. Bühler's researches that the two main difficulties in the way of an exact comprehension of Kalhaṇa's chronology have been removed. His "Kāśmīr Report" indicated for the first time the materials available for the restoration of the genuine text of the Chronicle. It also fully elucidated the questions connected with the Saptarṣi or Laukika era which Kalhaṇa uses, as well as those relating to the theoretical basis of his chronological system.³ Since the Prof. Bühler's researches.

¹ Thus e.g. Mr. THOMAS, Useful Tables, ii. p. 243, in dealing with Kāśmīr chronology was justified by the condition of the information then available to complain of "the hazy atmosphere with which Oriental authors so often envelop the simplest history."

² Dr. WILSON has treated Kalhaṇa's Chronology at length in his Essay, pp. 81-92*. He started from the perfectly correct perception that it was "advisable to commence with the most modern and recede gradually to the most remote dates." Unfortunately Dr. Wilson was not in possession of the text of the last Book and thus failed to obtain the right clue to the calculation of Kalhaṇa's dates given in the Laukika era. He clearly recognized, however, the marked difference in the character of Kalhaṇa's chronological data from the commencement of the Kārkoṭa dynasty (Book iv.) onwards.

Mr. TROYER's chronological tables, ii. pp. 363 sqq., mark no real advance beyond Wilson's results. He has not succeeded in computing correctly the exact dates given in the last four Books, and has allowed his calculations as to the regnal periods quoted in the earlier Books, to be vitiated in detail by consideration of the totals shown in the verses interpolated after the colophons of these Books. His attempt at a critical analysis of the chronology of the Rājatarāṅgiṇī can scarcely be taken seriously, seeing that amongst other curious points it endeavours to prove the possibility of King Raṇāditya having ruled during three hundred years as Kalhaṇa has it (ii. pp. 379 sqq.).

General CUNNINGHAM had occasion to discuss Kāśmīr chronology at length in his paper on the Hindu coinage of Kāśmīr, Nunismatio Chronicle, 1843, vi. pp. 1 sqq. He used rightly the key supplied by Kalhaṇa for the calculation of the Laukika dates, and his results as regards the chronology of the Kārkoṭa and subsequent dynasties require correction only in minor points. The extensive adjustment of Kalhaṇa's figures which General Cunningham attempted for the periods preceding the Kārkoṭa dynasty was based on purely conjectural grounds derived from often more than doubtful synchronisms, and cannot claim equal merit.

These lines of conjectural rectification were followed also by Prof. LASSEN. His elaborate treatment of early Kāśmīr chronology, Ind. Alt., ii. pp. 759-781, 1219 sqq., did not furnish any new results as far as the elucidation of Kalhaṇa's data is concerned. For the period following the accession of the Kārkoṭa dynasty Prof. Lassen adopted the dates as calculated by Troyer; see Ind. Alt., iii. pp. 1177 sqq.

A convenient synopsis of the chronological results deduced from the Rājatarāṅgiṇī by Wilson, Troyer, and Cunningham, has been given by Mr. THOMAS, in his edition of Prinsep's Useful Tables, ii. pp. 243 sqq.

³ See Report, pp. 59 sq.

important advance thus made a detailed review of the chronological statements and speculations contained in the above-quoted earlier publications can only have a quasi-historical interest.

We may hence proceed directly to the exposition of Kalhana's chronology as it is presented in the text itself. Our first task must be to ascertain what the chronological data are which Kalhana wishes to put before us. Subsequently we may concern ourselves with the question what critical value can be allowed to this chronological system as a whole, and to the particular dates it furnishes.

Precise dates in Books v.-viii.

56. In regard to the chronological information contained in the Rājatarāṅgiṇī it is essential to note at the outset the marked difference between the two forms in which this information is conveyed to us. In the earlier portion of Kalhana's narrative as comprised in the first three Books, as well as in the bulk of Book iv., we receive no chronological data whatever except such as may be deduced from the stated length of individual reigns and a few general figures of a manifestly theoretical character. On the other hand we find that from the concluding part of the Fourth Book onwards, the dates of the accession of individual rulers, and of other events of political or economical importance for the country, are indicated by the quotation of the exact years of the Laukika era, coupled in most cases with equally precise statements of the month and day. The dates thus ascertained range from the Laukika year 3889 which began on March 7th, A.D. 813, to the Laukika year 4225 corresponding to A.D. 1149-50. The first named date is that of the death of King Cippata-Jayapīḍa; the last is given by Kalhana as the time of the completion of his work.⁴

In regard to the form in which the chronological statements of the last four Books are made, it has to be noted that Kalhana, following an ancient custom prevailing to the present day in connection with the Laukika era, does not name the centuries. But this omission causes no difficulty whatever in calculating the corresponding Christian dates for the connected narrative of the last four Books. For Kalhana has been careful enough to indicate the time of the composition of his Chronicle not only in Laukika years but also according to the S'aka reckoning.⁵

Reckoning in the Laukika era.

The Laukika or Saptarṣi era, as it is also often designated, is still in current use among the Brahman population not only of Kāśmīr but also of the hill territories to the south-east, such as Cambā, Kāngra, Mandī, etc. Prof. Bühler was the first to prove from the extant tradition of Kāśmīr Brahmins and other evidence that the commencement of the Laukika era is placed on Caitra śudi 1 of Kali Sāmyat 25 (expired) or the year 3076-75 B.C.⁶ Since his discovery correct accounts of the Laukika reckoning are to be found in all handbooks of Indian Chronology.⁷ Laukika years are counted at present in Kāśmīr from the first day of the bright half of the luni-solar month Caitra. A reference to Rajāt. viii. 341, 480 proves that Kalhana follows the identical reckoning.⁸ In the same way it can be shown ⁴ Compare iv. 703 and viii. 8404, respectively.

⁵ Compare notes i. 52; iv. 703.

⁶ See Report, pp. 59 sq. Al-Bērūnī's remarks, India, ii. pp. 8 sq., regarding the calendar "of the people of Kāshmir," show that he was correctly acquainted with the system of reckoning as maintained in Kāśmīr to this day.

⁷ Compare, e.g., CUNNINGHAM, Book of Indian Eras, pp. 11 sqq.; SEWELL AND DIKSHIT, Indian Calendar, p. 41.

⁸ In viii. 341 we are informed that Uccala's murder took place on the 6th Paṇṣa śudi of the Laukika year 4187. The dethronement of his successor Salhana which Kalhana places 3 months 27 days later, is dated the 3rd Vaiśākha śudi of the year 4188.

with certainty that the months are reckoned by him pūrṇimānta, just as is the invariable practice in Kāśmīr at the present day.⁹

All points bearing on Kalhaṇa's system of reckoning being thus clearly determined, the dates intended by the chronological statements of Books v.-viii. can be fixed with absolute precision. Thus the very form in which these dates are placed before us, raises a strong presumption in favour of their substantial correctness. We shall see that this presumption is fully borne out by whatever evidence is available to us from independent sources regarding that period of Kāśmīr chronology.

57. The date given by Kalhaṇa for Cippaṭa-Jayapīḍa's death¹⁰ as already indicated, is an important landmark in the chronology of the Rajataranginī. The dates which succeed it, besides their precise form, have the great merit of being independent of each other; that is, a possible error in the reckoning of one would not necessarily imply a corresponding error in other dates. It is very different in the case of the chronology given for the preceding period. Here Kalhaṇa has no real dates to offer to us, but only figures indicating the supposed duration of the reigns of individual rulers. If we wish to deduce from these figures true dates we must either reckon backwards from Cippaṭa-Jayapīḍa's death or start our reckoning from the initial date which Kalhaṇa accepts for the commencement of his long dynastic list. This, as we shall see, is based on "the imaginary date of a purely legendary event." It is evident that in either case the approximate correctness of the results must depend on the soundness of each link in this long chain of regnal reckonings, and, further, that the historical value of those results must diminish in proportion as we recede from the above-indicated chronological landmark.

Kalhaṇa himself, in the closing passage of his Introduction, has given us sufficiently clear indications as to the theoretical basis of this earlier portion of his chronology.¹¹ The points explained by him there are briefly as follows.

58. Kalhaṇa takes as the starting-point of his chronological calculations the traditional date indicated by Varāhamihira's Brhatsamhitā for the coronation of Yudhiṣṭhira, the Pāṇḍava hero of the epics, viz. the year 653 of the Kali era.¹² The date of this legendary event is accepted by him also for the accession of Gonanda I., the first of the 'lost' kings of Kāśmīr, whose name, as we are told, was recovered by the Chronicler (or his predecessors) from the Nilamata Purāṇa.¹³ The exact reason for the equation of these dates is nowhere given. But it appears that the story as contained in the earlier version of the Nilamata which Kalhaṇa had before him, represented Gonanda I. in a general way as a contemporary of the 'Kauravas and Pāṇḍavas.'¹⁴

Kalhaṇa next assumes a period of 2268 years as the aggregate length of the reigns of Gonanda I. and his successors as detailed in Book i. For this statement Kalhaṇa does not adduce his authority, though it is one of the main bases of his

Lengths of reigns shown in Books i.-iv.

Calculated date of Gonanda I.
(653 Kali).

Calculated aggregate of reigns in Book i.

⁹ Compare note vii. 131.

¹⁰ iv. 708.

¹¹ See i. 48-56. For detailed evidence as to the interpretation of Kalhaṇa's statements compare notes i. 48-50, 53, 54.

¹² i. 55 sq.

¹³ i. 16.

¹⁴ The extant text of the Nilamata which is in many parts fragmentary, does not contain a distinct reference to Gonanda I. But the few verses at the beginning of the work which mention Gonanda's immediate successors, prove beyond all doubt that Kalhaṇa's narrative of Gonanda I. and the next three rulers was derived from the Nilamata as stated by himself in i. 16; compare BÜLLER, Report, p. 88.

chronology. But the importance which he attached to it, is evident from the trouble he takes to prove its correctness. He does this by showing that if to the figure of 2268 years are added the 653 years from the commencement of the Kali era to Gonanda I.'s accession, as well as the years (1328) representing the rough total of the reigns described in Books ii.-viii., we arrive at an aggregate of 4249 years which corresponds exactly to the 4249 years of the Kali Yuga elapsed in S'aka 1070, the date when Kalhana wrote his introduction.¹⁵

Kalhana himself tells us that the calculation of a total of 2268 years for the regnal period of the first Gonanda dynasty had been "thought wrong by some authors." As the ground of their objection he indicates the belief (according to him, erroneous) which placed the 'Great War' of the Kurus and the Pāṇḍavas at the close of the Dvāpara Yuga, i.e. at the commencement of the Kali era. From this remark it is evident that Kalhana was not the first to propose the above figure for the aggregate length of the reigns of Gonanda and his descendants, and, further, that the connection of Gonanda I.'s date with the legendary date of the Bhārata war was generally assumed by writers on Kāśmīr history. Kalhana's reticence does not allow us to go beyond this. We know neither the source from which he obtained that base of his chronological system, nor by what figure the critics he alludes to were prepared to replace it.

Date assumed for
Gonanda III.
(1182 B.C.).

59. Kalhana's Introduction furnishes us only with two more chronological statements of a general character. One is that at the time of Kalhana's writing, or in S'aka Samvat 1070, "on the whole 2330 years had passed since the accession of Gonanda III.," and the other that 1266 years were "believed to be comprised in the sum of the reigns of the fifty-two lost kings."¹⁶

¹⁵ For detailed evidence as to Kalhana's line of argument, compare note i. 50. For its correct exposition we are indebted to Dr. Hultzsch, Ind. Ant., xviii. pp. 89 sq.

We are led by two calculations to the total of 1328 years as Kalhana's aggregate of the reigns from the close of the first Gonanda dynasty to Kalhana's time. Deducting from the total of 2268 years for the reigns comprised in Book i., the 1266 years which Kalhana allows "for the sum of the reigns of the fifty-two lost kings" (i. 54), there remain 1002 years for the aggregate rule of the kings the length of whose reigns is specified in Book i. (from Gonanda III. to Narendraditya I.), and of Yudhishtira, the last king of Book i., the duration of whose reign Kalhana has omitted to indicate. If we deduct those 1002 years from the rough total of 2330 years which Kalhana mentions as having elapsed from the accession of Gonanda III. to his own time (i. 53), we get the result of 1328 years as the aggregate length of the reigns in Books ii.-viii.

The other calculation we may follow is to add up the figures given in the seven later Books. These are, according to the text, adopted for our translation as follows *:-

	Years.	Months.	Days.
Total of reigns of Book ii.	102	0	0
" " " iii.	569	10	1
" " " iv.
from Durlabha-vardhana to Cippata-Jayāpīḍa .	212	5	27
Period from the death of Cippata-Jayāpīḍa, Lau- kika-Samvat [33]89 (iv. 708), to the date of Kalhana's Introduction, Laukika-Samvat [42]24 (i. 52)	335	0	0

The exact total of those figures would be 1329 years, 3 months and 28 days. But if we disregard the odd months and days found in the aggregate of Books ii. and iii., the result will be again 1328 years. We are all the more justified in adopting this manner of calculation as Kalhana's words (i. 53) distinctly imply that he himself had arrived at the figure of 2330 years for the total from Gonanda III. to his own time by a similar 'rough' reckoning.

¹⁶ i. 53, 54.

* The only passages where the codex archetypus shows any variations as to regnal figures, are iii. 379 and iv. 400. In both cases those readings have been adopted which agree with Kalhana's own rough total of 1328 years.

In explanation of the first statement it has to be noted that it is only from Gonanda III. onwards that Kalhaṇa is able to indicate the length of individual reigns. With this ruler begins in fact the continuous list of kings which Kalhaṇa professedly obtained from the works of earlier chroniclers.¹⁷ We have already seen that a 'rough calculation,' as implied by Kalhaṇa's expression (prāyah, 'on the whole'), of the aggregate duration of those reigns actually gives us the total of 2330 years.¹⁸ Kalhaṇa does not tell us distinctly whether he took the figures for individual reigns summed up in this 'rough' total, also from the "works of former scholars" which supplied the dynastic names from Gonanda III. onwards. It is hence à priori not certain whether those earlier sources already know the date of Gonanda III.'s accession as indicated by Kalhaṇa's calculation, viz. 1919 Kali or 1182 B.C.

As regards the second statement, allotting 1266 years to the whole of the reigns of the 'lost' kings who preceded Gonanda III., it is evident that this figure could easily be computed either from the traditional sum of 2268 years for the whole period of the first Gonanda dynasty or from the rough total of 2330 years just discussed.¹⁹ Kalhaṇa's words in fact seem to imply that this computation had been made by himself.

Computed length of reigns of 'lost
kings.'

Our observations as to the theoretical basis of Kalhaṇa's early chronology may thus be briefly summed up. We have seen that the starting-point of his and his predecessors' calculations was the supposed date of Gonanda I., obtained by connecting a semi-mythical king of Purāṇa tradition with a purely legendary event of the great Indian epic and its imaginary chronology. We are next asked, without mention of an authority, to accept the figure of 2268 years for the aggregate length of rule of a single dynasty, of which, however, fifty-two kings had already become 'lost' to the tradition of the earlier Chronicles. Lastly, Kalhaṇa presents us, again without naming his authority, with the figure of 2330 years as the result of an avowedly 'rough' calculation of the aggregate duration of reigns from Gonanda III., to his own date.

¹⁷ Compare i. 16 with the gloss of A, thereon.

¹⁸ See above, § 58, note 15.

¹⁹ Total of reigns of first Gonanda dynasty 2268
Deduct for reigns from Gonanda III. to Yudhiṣṭhira I. 1002
—
Results a total for 'lost' kings' years 1266

The same result is obtained by deducting from—

The number of Kali years elapsed in Ś'aka Samvat 1070	—	4249
The aggregate number of years of known reigns . . .	2330
+ the number of Kali years passed before Gonanda I. . .	653
	—	2983
		1266

SECTION II.—THE CHRONOLOGY OF THE FIRST THREE BOOKS.

60. The doubts which these observations are bound to raise in us as to the value of the earlier portion of Kalhana's chronology, are in no way dispelled by an examination of the figures given for individual reigns in the first three Books. These figures will be found tabulated in a convenient form in the Dynastic Table shown in Appendix I. of this Introduction.

Lengths of reign not recorded for earliest kings.

It has already been stated that Kalhana indicates the length of reigns only from Gonanda III. whose name was the first in the regular list of kings supplied by the earlier Chronicles. For the preceding period of the fifty-two 'lost' kings no chronological information whatever is given to us apart from that conveyed by the two extreme dates, viz. Kali 653 for Gonanda I.'s accession and Kali 1919 for that of Gonanda III. Attempts have sometimes been made to fill the gap left between these two dates, by means of approximate calculations regarding the reigns of the kings who are supposed to have been recovered from among the 'fifty-two lost' ones.¹ But it must be remembered that Kalhana avowedly took the seventeen royal names thus 'recovered' from three entirely distinct sources, and that for the place and order in which he inserted these three groups of names we have no authority but his own.

Averages of reigns for Gonanda
dynasties.

The regnal years for each of the rulers from Gonanda III. onwards are shown, indeed, with an outward look of precision. But this very display of exact figures must excite suspicion when we come to examine them more closely. Dr. Wilson has already called attention to the curious fact that according to Kalhana thirty-seven princes of the first three dynasties reign for not less than thirty or on an average more than forty-eight years each.² It is manifestly a point of average which greatly exceeds possibility, does not allow us to play Maïjying a trifle whatever on the pretended accuracy of the statements regarding individual reigns.

This observation applies with equal force to each of the firsts calculated averages of reigns being approximately forty-eight years & of its chronology two years in the ii.; and fully fifty-nine years in the iii. Book. The main sections. The of figures which imply such excessive average durations of reigns which Kalhana illustrated than by a comparison of the corresponding figures to the accession of the of the Chronicle. Here we find a period of 547 years divided into the reigns of the Karkota fifty princes. This gives an average of not fully eleven years. The last section is made of whole period. The maximum average for a particular dynasty which reigned in period is a little over sixteen years, viz. in the case of the Karkota's own time. treated in Book vii.

Reigns of excessive length in Book i.

61. Our misgivings as to the real character of Kalhana's chronology have found that the exact are only increased by an examination of the durations, which corresponds to the reliable reigns. Thus we are invited in the First Book to accept the figures as he has had at his disposal. It is possible that minor descending from father to son, each one of sixty or more (e.g. Vasukula, Mihirakula, Baka). Of twenty-one princes of the Gonanda dynasty not less than eight are credited with having reigned for more than fifty years.

of the Karkotas, p. 40, is vitiated by an error in the data furnished by the Chinese Annals.

¹ See, e.g., TROYER, ii, pp. 420 sq.; DUTT, ii, p. x.

² Essay, pp.

sixty to seventy years. That Kalhana in the case of one of these exceptionally long reigns (Baka) is able to specify even the number of days by which it exceeded sixty-three years, is not calculated to allay our scruples.³

But the most remarkable particular feature to be noticed in this portion of Kalhana's Chronology is undoubtedly the wonderful reign of three hundred years which our author allots in Book iii. to King Raṇaditya.⁴ The attempts to account for this truly astounding item in Kalhana's dynastic reckoning have been numerous enough. Mr. TROYER was at pains to justify it, as it were, by quoting examples of exceptional longevity and referring to the belief in individual existence protracted through fresh incarnations.⁵ Other interpreters more critically disposed have thought that the extravagantly long reign attributed to Raṇaditya was intended to hide a great break in the succession of indigenous kings, or have proposed other conjectural explanations. But I doubt whether the true significance, from a critical point of view, of Kalhana's extraordinary figure has yet been sufficiently emphasized.

Raṇaditya's reign of 300 years.

According to the Chronicler's reckoning there is only an interval of roughly seventy-nine years between the end of Raṇaditya's reign and the accession of the first Karkoṭa king Durlabhavardhana which marks the commencement of the truly historical period in Kalhana's records. Independent evidence shows us that the date which the reckoning of the Rājatarāṅgiṇī would assign to Durlabhavardhana's reign (A.D. 600-636), cannot be more than about a quarter of a century removed from the right one. Notwithstanding the close vicinity in which the alleged date of Raṇaditya's death thus appears to the commencement of Kalhana's real chronology, we find the Chronicler yet prepared to insert this extraordinary reign of three hundred years in his dynastic list, and that without a single word of comment or tradition.

claim than can scarcely expect a more signal proof of Kalhana's wholly uncritical

In endeavours matters of chronology. An author who is ready to treat us to so fast impetu, surfe of chronological information at a distance of scarcely more than reigns in his own time, cannot be expected to have sifted with critical ascribedets and traological materials available to him for earlier epochs. Still less known to initial cl that he should have taken care to specify where the chrono-Kalhaner the quest in his sources were fragmentary or contradicting.

from footp to furnishre indicated agrees fully with the conclusions we have already shows reflected in it. an we as to Kalhana's notions as a historian. But it is right even th following the per's wholly uncritical attitude was the natural result of the selves. (ioate the sour th which he moved. Considering that his predecessors, the hundre character and fasmir, had looked at things past more or less with the rulers bus observation,ely feel surprised at the incongruities already noticed. evidence ne what histor,ies equally striking are revealed to us if we turn to the

The to us. For th points of contact which can be established between logical as furnished by t and the ascertained facts of general Indian history.

th right records such y-four reigns recorded in the first three Books of the se, able us to call att six of which some notice can be traced also in other avail-ough incidental ag the position assigned to these reigns in Kalhana's early ne light on th follow the order indicated by the Rājatarāṅgiṇī.

the fact that all r

we been fully

schore concise tha 330.
ii. 470.

Want of critical judgment in K.'s chronology.

³ See TROYER, ii. pp. 370 sqq.

Alleged date of Āśoka.

The first historical name which we meet in the Chronicle is that of King Āśoka. Kalhana had taken it together with the names of the next four rulers from the work of Chavillākara. The latter himself, in a verso quoted by Kalhana, had declared that these royal names "were obtained by the ancients from among the fifty-two lost ones."⁶ Āśoka falls thus outside the list of those kings for whom Kalhana indicates the length of reign. Nor does the Chronicle furnish any distinct statement as to the number of generations which were supposed to have intervened between Āśoka and Gonanda III. Yet it is certain from the succession of reigns as shown in the Chronicle, that Kalhana must have placed Āśoka a considerable time before the Kali year 1919 or 1182 B.C. which, according to the computation explained above (§ 60), he accepted as the initial date of Gonanda III.

Āśoka's date is fortunately one of the few facts of old Indian chronology which are established beyond all doubt. The most authentic documents, Āśoka's own inscriptions, prove that the great patron of the Buddhist creed whose fame is spread through the whole of Buddhist literature, ruled about the middle of the third century B.C.⁷ On the other hand, Kalhana's narrative leaves no doubt as to the identity of the Āśoka of the Kāśmīr record with the Āśoka of universal Buddhist tradition. It is thus clear that if we were to give credence to Kalhana's chronological calculations for this period we should have to place Āśoka at least fully a thousand years before his real date.

Date assigned to Huska, Juska, Kaniška.

The list of kings which Kalhana borrowed from Chavillākara, presents us a second time with truly historical names in those of the Turuska kings, Huska, Juska, and Kaniška, who, according to the Chronicle, are supposed to have reigned simultaneously. The identity of the third and first of those princes with the great Kusana rulers known to us as Kaniska and Huviska from the inscriptions as KANHĪKI and OOHĪKI from their coins, has long ago been recognized. The exact date of Kaniska and his successor Huviska has not yet been determined with equal certainty. A theory which had been originally proposed by H. H. S. J. and which had met for some time with general acceptance, recognized the year of the Saka era, A.D. 78, the date of Kaniska's coronation, as the date of the reign of the first of its chief direct objections have recently been urged against this assumption, by S. Lévi who, relying chiefly on new evidence from Chinese sources, places Kaniska about the commencement of our era.⁸

Whatever date we shall have ultimately to adopt in the main section, the dates of the reigns of the Turuska kings which I have placed in the last section of the Chronicle cannot be removed by more than a century from the reigns of the Turuska kings. Kalhana, on the other hand, makes the Turuska king, Abhimanyu, and thus places him with one intermediate reign (Abhimanyu), and thus places him at 1182 B.C., which implies a chronological aberration of not less than 1000 years.

Date assumed for
Mihirakula.

63. We are confronted with an equally curious remark in the Chronicle that the next prince of Kalhana's first Gonanda dynasty who is known to have had at his disposal the sources. There can be no doubt whatever that Kalhana's king of popular Kāśmīrian tradition, is identical with the ⁶ i. 19 sq.

⁷ Compare, e.g., DUFF, Chronology of India, pp. 11 sq.; SENART, Inscriptions de Piyadasi, u. pp. 256 sqq.

⁸ Compare note i. p. 40, is vitiated by ruler of that name.¹⁰ From the conclusive testimony of the inscriptions, the coins and the Chinese records, Mr. FLEET has been able to establish the fact that Mihirakula ruled within the first half of the sixth century of our era over the Western Panjāb and the neighbouring territories including Kāśmīr. Yet calculating from the figures which Kalhana gives for the reigns following after Gonanda III., we should have to assign to Mihirakula's rule the period 704-634 before Christ. We see that in this case the difference between Kalhana's date and the true one amounts to fully twelve hundred years.

⁹ See his Notes sur and the Chinese Annals, 76 sqq. (Journal)

For one more royal name found in Book i. we are able to adduce the probable evidence of the coins. The Rājatarāṅgiṇī mentions as Gokarna's son and the nineteenth successor of Gonanda III., King Narendraditya I., who also bore the second name Khinkhila. This curious un-Indian looking name we find in a slightly modified form, Khingila, also on a unique silver coin of the White Hun type, which General Cunningham was prepared to attribute to the king named in the Chronicle.¹¹ The coin on numismatic grounds must be assigned to the fifth or sixth century of our era, while the date deducible from Kalhana's chronology would be 250-214 B.C. Thus assuming the historical identity of Khingila with the Narendraditya-Khinkhila of the Rājatarāṅgiṇī we find here a chronological error of not less than six hundred years.¹²

64. The names of the Kings recorded in the Second Book do not assist us in the examination of Kalhana's early chronology, as none of them have as yet been traced in other sources. In the Third Book, however, we meet again with historical names, as we may reasonably expect seeing that we are there nearing the commencement of the authentic records in the Chronicle. But the comparison of the names of the Kings calculated on Kalhana's basis with the periods indicated by independent sources safely improves conclusively how far removed from true critical value Kalhana's chronology is even for the period immediately preceding the Karkota era, surro a sing.

In the series of only historical name is that of TORAMĀNA, whom Kalhana represents and co-regent of King Hiranya. In my note on the passage initial of twelve on the ancient currency of Kāśmīr,¹³ I have shown that the question of the ruler whose copper coinage bearing the name of Toramāna is to furnish the basis of the chronology in Kāśmīr in remarkable abundance. Calculated with reference to the system the date of Toramāna would fall towards the end of the fifth century before our era. But whether we have to identify the Toramāna of the date the son of Toramāna, Hun king of that name, the father of Mihirakula, or to character and signs to the ruler, there is the unmistakable evidence of the coins as observation conclusively shows that the prince who issued them must have ruled at least four centuries before the date above indicated.

to us. For many of the coins which Kalhana makes to the great Vikramaditya-Harṣa, of the next reign, that of the poet Mātṛgupta, exposes a chronology of such magnitude. Kalhana, true to his chronological scheme, is unable to call attention to the discrepancy.

Incidental and Ant. i. p. 91; light on the subject the father and pre-tiya-Khinkhila, King of the Panjāb, had read the coin of the so-called Med. India, p. 43 and pl. iii. 6. But according to information kindly communicated to me by Mr. Rapson, the reading of this coin, now in the British Museum, is extremely doubtful.

¹³ See note iii. 103, and Note H (iv. 495), §§ 18 sqq.

Date of Toramāna.

identifies this king with the Vikramāditya whose victory over the Śakas he, in agreement with an old popular theory, supposed to be commemorated by the initial date of the Śaka era, 78 A.D.¹⁴ Yet Kālhana, himself, in a subsequent passage clearly designates this Vikramāditya-Harṣa as the father of King Śīlāditya-Pratāpāśīla, whom we know from a statement of Hiuen-tsiang to have flourished as ruler of Mālava (Ujjain) about sixty years before his own time, i.e. about A.D. 580.¹⁵ Hiuen-tsiang ascribes a rule of over fifty years to Śīlāditya. The real date of his father, the Vikramāditya meant by Kālhana, falls thus into the first half of the sixth century, i.e. nearly five centuries later than the date which Kālhana's calculation would lead us to assume.

Time of Pravarasena.

We note the same discrepancy between Kālhana's chronology and the true date in the case of King Pravarasena II. whom the Rājataranginī mentions as the son of Toramaṇa and immediate successor of Mātṛgupta. Pravarasena's historical existence and approximate date is attested by his coins and by the foundation of Srinagara, the Kāśmīr capital, which derives its proper designation Pravarasena [seno]pura from this king.¹⁶ The coins of Pravarasena by their type and the Gupta characters of their legend attach themselves closely to the coins of Toramaṇa already mentioned, and thus clearly indicate the sixth century as the date of their issue. The same conclusion can be derived from the statement of Hiuen-tsiang who, A.D. 631, visited the capital founded by Pravarasena, and who speaks of it as "the new city" in distinction from the earlier capital (Paripādhisthāna).¹⁷

White Hun rulers.

The suggested identification of Laḥkhana-Narendradītya, according to Kālhana, Pravarasena's grandson, with the Laḥkhana-Udayadītya of the coin cannot be considered as absolutely certain though there is much to support it. If correct, it shows Kālhana's early chronology in a very curious light also from another point of view. The coins of Laḥkhana, undoubtedly those of a White Hun ruler, exhibit the closest resemblance in type, legend and fabric to those of Khingila whose identity with the Khinkhila-Narendradītya of the Yüan will here as already explained, can scarcely be doubted.¹⁸ As Kālhana's director assign to Khinkhila a date corresponding to 250-214 B.C., while the reign of Laḥkhana is 209-222 A.D., we should find here two rulers of its chronology whose proximity in time is vouched for by their coins, separated by four centuries.

SECTION III.—THE CHRONOLOGY OF THE KĀRKOTĀ DYNASTIES which reign of their own time.

65. The consideration of the comparatively few we found that the chronology which can be tested by historical evidence, corresponds to the mythical reign of three hundred years ascribed to have had at least some significance of which has already engaged our attention. It is possible that may suggest itself for this extraordinary item in Kālhana's chronology that we approach almost immediately after it the valuable portion of his chronology.

The account of the Kārkotā dynasty contained in the Yüan, p. 40, is vitiated by the omission of the data furnished by the Chinese Annals.

¹⁴ Compare note iii. 125 and iii. 128.

¹⁵ See for references below, note iii. 330.

¹⁶ Compare note iii. 339-349.

¹⁷ Compare below, p. 40.

¹⁸ See note iii. 333.

¹⁹ See above, § 63.

Chronicle forms as it were the transition between the semi-legendary traditions recorded in the first three Books and the detailed and accurate narrative of the last four. At the end of the Fourth Book Kalhana gives us the first date expressed in years of the Laukika era,¹ and his chronology of the early Kārkoṭa rulers brings us to comparatively safe ground already at its commencement.

We owe the historical evidence which enables us to check Kalhana's dates for the early reigns of the Kārkoṭa dynasty, to records of the Chinese Annals. The chronologically most definite of these notices concern Candrāpiḍa, the third king in Kalhana's list of that dynasty.² We are informed in the Annals of the T'ang dynasty that King Tchen-t'o-lo-pi-li of Kaśmīr whose identity with Candrāpiḍa has long ago been recognized, sent, A.D. 713, an embassy to the Chinese court to invoke its aid against the Arabs. They further record that about the year A.D. 720 Tchen-t'o-lo-pi-li was at his request granted the title of king on the imperial rolls. Allowing for the time required by an embassy to cover the great distance between Kaśmīr and the Chinese capital, we must conclude that Candrāpiḍa was still living A.D. 719. Candrāpiḍa, according to the Rājataranginī, was put to death by his younger brother Tarāpiḍa, after a reign of eight years and eight months. Assuming the duration of the reign here indicated to be approximately correct and keeping in view the recorded date of the arrival of the first embassy at the Imperial court (A.D. 713), Candrāpiḍa's death could not be put much later than A.D. 720.

Date of C
Annals for Candrāpiḍa.

If we now turn to Kalhana's relation, we find there a period corresponding to A.D. 686-695 assigned to Candrāpiḍa's reign, and the latter thus antedated by twenty-five years as against the Chinese records. The necessity of rectifying Kalhana's computation by the addition of twenty-five years has been duly pointed out by General Cunningham and other scholars.³ We shall see that it implies among the probability a corresponding correction in Kalhana's dates for other kings of Kaśmīr. But this error must indeed appear small if we compare it with the chronology of the first three Books. Its relative smallness creates the impression that we are now nearing firm ground in the records of Kaśmīrian an safely established endeavour throughout the history of Kaśmīr to endeavour to bring the dates of the reigns of the kings of Kaśmīr into accord with the Chinese Annals. The latter mention the arrival of an embassy from Kaśmīr, after the first Chinese expedition against Polu in the initial decade of the eighth century, A.D. 736-747.⁴ The identity of the king who sent the embassy may be considered as certain, and the object assigned to it is that the latter could have been despatched only after its reflection in the Chinese expedition. This makes it evident that the embassy must have taken place considerably later than the date indicated by Kalhana.

Date of Mukṭāpiḍa.

Following the lead of the Chinese Annals, we may safely conclude that the reign of Mukṭāpiḍa, 699-735 A.D., into accord with the Chinese Annals. The latter mention the arrival of an embassy from Kaśmīr, after the first Chinese expedition against Polu in the initial decade of the eighth century, A.D. 736-747.⁴ The identity of the king who sent the embassy may be considered as certain, and the object assigned to it is that the latter could have been despatched only after its reflection in the Chinese expedition. This makes it evident that the embassy must have taken place considerably later than the date indicated by Kalhana.

sumed the discussion of the point in Chins of Med. Ind., pp. 38 sqq. But several misapprehensions render the conjectural results arrived at in this posthumous work confused and unreliable.

⁴ For references, see note iv. 126.

reckoning ruled in the years 600-636 A.D. For it is tempting to identify T'u-lu-pu, the name of the Indian king who between the year 627-619 A.D. was charged with having the envoys of Ki-piu or Kābul safely conducted to their country, with Durlabha, the abbreviated name by which Durlabhavardhana calls himself on his coins.⁶ But this identification does not lead to any exact conclusion as regards the correctness of Kalhana's data, as the latter would suit the period indicated in the Chinese notice whether we apply the proposed correction or not.

There is reason to suspect that the error of about twenty-five years which the Chinese notices just discussed prove in Kalhana's dates for the early Kārkoṭa kings, extends also to his reckoning towards the close of the dynasty. But this point will be more conveniently dealt with below in our critical abstract of Kalhana's narrative.⁶

Exact dates of Books v.-viii.

We have already had occasion to notice the important change which the accession of Avantivarmā's dynasty (Book v.) marks in the character of Kalhana's narrative and particularly in its chronology. From this point onwards the accuracy and completeness of Kalhana's dynastic succession list is vouched for in the most authentic fashion by an unbroken series of coins; and again it is from Avantivarmā onwards that we find Kalhana recording the lengths of individual reigns by means of exact dates, that is by stating the laukika year, the month and day when each reign closed and the new commenced. The very form of the chronological data thus justifies the presumption that they are based on contemporary records and as such entitled to our acceptance unless disproved by reliable evidence. The fact that conflicting evidence of this kind has not yet come to light, notwithstanding the more ample materials available for this later period in Kāśmīr history, only helps to strengthen our belief in the general accuracy of Kalhana's chronology for the three centuries preceding his own date.

Conclusions as to value of K.'s
chronology.

67. We have already in the preliminary remarks of this chapter pointed out that the scrutiny of Kalhana's chronology is of importance as supplementary to the historical value of the several portions of his narrative.⁷ It will be useful briefly to sum up the conclusions which may be drawn in this connection from the review of chronological data just completed.

We have seen that in respect of the critical reliability of Kalhana's account of Kāśmīr history divides itself into three parts. The first coincides with the first three Books, dealing with the dynasty which is supposed to have ruled the land from the earliest times to Kārkoṭa. The second is represented by the narrative of the dynasty which fills the Fourth Book. The third and last part is represented by Books iv.-viii, giving a detailed relation of the several dynasties of Kāśmīr from the middle of the eighth century to Kalhana.

In regard to this last portion of the narrative we find that the form and correctness of the chronological data given in it are well supported by the ample sources which we must suppose the Chronicler to have had at his disposal for the period immediately preceding his own time.

⁶ Compare below, note iv. 8, and CUNNINGHAM, Coins of Med. India, pp. 33 sq., 43.

⁷ A probable discrepancy between Kalhana's date of Cippatā-Jayapīḍa and the true one will be noticed below, § 91. General Cunningham's attempt at a conjectural revision of Kalhana's Coins of Med. India, erroneous interpretation by the Rājatarāṅgī See above, § 54.

chronological errors had found their way into the records used by Kalhana also for this period. But none have yet been proved, while there is a general agreement between Kalhana's reckoning and our other sources in respect of all dates which can at present be checked by outside evidence. It is clear that in dealing with Kāśmīr history of the three centuries comprised in Books v.-viii., we must accept Kalhana's dating of reigns and events until conclusive proof is furnished of its inaccuracy.

As regards the period comprised in Book iv. we have seen that Kalhana's chronology of the Kārkotā dynasty, though out of reckoning by about twenty-five years, is yet in its general outlines in touch with historical facts. We do not know whether the chronological discrepancy proved by the Chinese Annals is caused by, or connected with, any error in the record of the several reigns attributed to this dynasty. But as the ascertained chronological aberration is relatively small and the succession of reigns attested by absolutely authentic evidence, we may reasonably hope that the discovery of fresh materials will yet give us the means of adjusting Kalhana's chronology for this dynastic period on a satisfactory basis.

68. We find ourselves in a widely different position as regards the chronology of the first three Books. Here we are furnished nowhere with true dates but only with figures indicative of the supposed duration of the individual reigns. Kalhana cannot supply even these figures for the initial part of his dynastic list, comprising characteristically enough fifty-two "lost reigns." Yet notwithstanding this acknowledged want of tradition we find Kalhana fixing the imaginary date of a legendary event previous to these "lost reigns," as the starting-point of his chronological calculations. The latter are vitiated not only by the unhistorical character of the initial date, but also by arbitrarily chosen aggregates for the duration of specific dynasties. For these aggregates Kalhana cannot adduce his authority, nor even the support of a uniform tradition or the assent of his predecessors.

Unhistorical chronology of Books i.-iii.

72. Turning to the details of this chronological system we are confronted by manifold possibilities and absurdities, such as the excessive length of the average reigns and, throughout the first three Books, and a reign of three hundred years represented to a single king. Comparing the true dates of the few rulers who are known to us from other sources, with the imaginary dates deducible for them from Kalhana's computations, we find them separated from the latter by periods ranging from ten to twelve centuries. The wide range of these chronological aberrations is sufficiently that Kalhana's dates for these well-known rulers cannot claim the merit of being approximately consistent in their relation among themselves. And thus indeed we find, e.g., Mihirakula not only placed some twelve centuries before his true date but also separated by about eight centuries from the figure of Toramāṇa, Pravarasena, Lakhkhana, whom numismatic and other authorities assign to periods immediately preceding or following his rule. The fact is, however, that the conclusion that we must draw from these facts is plainly that the chronology of the first three Books of the Rājatarāṅgiṇī cannot be accepted as the basis of any critical account of the periods of Kāśmīr history preceding the twelfth century of our era.

See i. 191. The grave defects of Kalhana's chronology for the so-called Gonandiya dynasty were duly recognized by Professor Wilson, General Cunningham and Professor Lassen, who first subjected it to a critical analysis. We must attribute it to the temptation of more reliable historical materials at the time that each one of those historians was tempted into a conjectural "readjustment" of Kalhana's dates with a view to using them for the elucidation of early Indian chronology generally. It would be of little interest or advantage to indicate here the points of contact which were assumed between Kalhana's narrative and the events of early Indian history, or to review the often very arbitrary methods adopted to reduce Kalhana's impossible dates to more reasonable chronological limits.

Attempts to "re-adjust" Kalhana's chronology.

It is the merit of Professor BÜHLER to have emphatically pointed out the uselessness of such readjustments on a conjectural basis.^a He justly called attention to the important fact that we do not know what materials Kalhana had at his disposal for the reigns recorded in the first three Books, nor how he treated them; "in any particular case he lengthened or shortened the reigns, and if he displaced or omitted kings or not." Without a knowledge of these older accounts of Kashmir history it is impossible to explain the strange chronological errors which meet us whenever Kalhana's narrative of the earlier dynasties can be confronted with the earlier or independent records. Still more difficult would it be to estimate adequately the probable errors in those statements for which such external evidence is not available. The discovery of truly historical records, such as inscriptions, coins and temporary foreign notices, may yet throw light on that dark epoch of Kashmir history and enable us to restore, at least partly, the true chronological relation of the reigns and events which figure in the first three Books of the Chronicle. But it is evident that in this task we can expect no help from Kalhana's own chronology of events, and that in regard to questions of general Indian history it will be safe to ignore it completely.

^a WILSON, Essay, pp. 89 sqq.; CUNNINGHAM, Numismatic Chronicle, 1848, pp. 1 sqq.; LASSEN, Ind. Alt., ii. pp. 782 sqq.

^b See Report, pp. 68 sq.

CHAPTER V.

THE RAJATARANGINI AS A HISTORICAL SOURCE.

70. It would be a task far beyond the scope of the present introduction we to attempt a detailed critical account of the history of Kaśmīr such as asents itself from all extant sources during the long period comprised in ana's Chronicle.

On the one hand, our available historical information is for a great part of period far too scanty to permit of anything resembling a connected treatment tical and cultural development of the country. On the other hand again remembered that the history of Kaśmīr, notwithstanding the geogra- tion of the Valley, has been greatly influenced by the relations which of race, religion and culturo, and at times also political dependence, ished from an early date between this country and the neighbouring India proper. As regards the history of the latter territories during immanan epoch our information is even more fragmentary and in need 'ing than in the case of Kaśmīr. It is thus evident that a great deal ' work still requires to be done before the task above indicated can be ' satisfactory critical basis.

ose preliminary labours precodence may justly be claimed for a critical lkhana's Chronicle as a source of historical information. For the is at present our earliest accessible record of the historical ie country, and is likoly also to remain so hereafter. Before utilize its contents for the reconstruction of Kaśmīr history, we r, firstly, to arrive at a clear perception of its author's personal undings and intellectual horizon, his materials and methods of oond place it is necessary to review from a critical point of view litions which he has recorded, and his opinions regarding them. apters of the present Introduction we have had occasion to ions arising under the first head. In the present place we may a critical summary of Kalhana's narrative and of the historical course of Kalhana's relation we shall endeavour as far as possible ces which he had utilized for its several portions, and to trace relative trustworthiness. On the basis of this analysis and our s regarding Kalhana's own labours as a chronicler we shall ical value can be attached to the traditions and records pre- e purpose of this scrutiny we shall take special note of the he comparison of Kalhana's data with the evidence of inde- as the coins, foreign notices, etc. Finally our review will ation also to those features in Kalhana's narrative which perhaps not strictly historical in themselves, yet throw a ltural development and social conditions of the country. of detail bearing on the historical contents of the Chronicle ed in the commentary, will permit us to make this review l be otherwise possible.

Purpose of critical summary of K.'s narrative.

Kings taken from Helārāja.

The series of eight royal names which follows the gap, can scarcely claim any historical value whatever, but is of interest as throwing light on the character of some of Kalhana's sources. According to Kalhana's own statement these names had been furnished to him by Padmanuhira, who himself had taken them from an earlier work, the 'Pārthivāvali' of the Pāṇpata Brāhman Helārāja.⁶ Dr. Hultsch has already justly called attention to the fact that all that Helārāja can tell us regarding Lava and the other seven kings, is their connection with particular localities in Kāśmīr, and that this connection is manifestly based on mere popular etymology.⁷

LAVA, KUŚA, etc.

Thus we find LAVA credited with the foundation of the Agrahāra of Lavara; KUŚA with that of Kurukhāra; Khāgi and Khommuṣa attributed to KHAGENDRA; GODHARA as the founder of Godharā, etc. Whether the local names are those of villages, sacred buildings or canals, we find them invariably showing the same initial consonants as the names of the kings with which they are mentioned. In no case can we trace any other connection between the localities or structures and their supposed founders than this superficial resemblance of the names.

King GODHARA in local legend.

The explanation for this peculiar character of the notices taken from Helārāja's work is not far to seek. Popular tradition in Kāśmīr, as in other countries, is to this day influenced by a tendency to account for local names by their apparent relation to names of kings whether real or imaginary. And in the case of at least one of the places named by Helārāja, Godharā, the local legend still survives which probably gave rise to Helārāja's notice regarding its alleged founder, King Godhara.⁸ We are thus led to conclude with good reason that what Helārāja in all probability did was to include in his list a number of kings whose names were known to popular local tradition, but not to the historical records of the country. It is impossible for us now to make certain whether these royal names themselves were pure creations of popular etymology or whether only their connection with particular localities and consequent preservation was due to that agency. So much, however, is clear that we cannot attach historical value to Helārāja's notices of the kings from Lava to Śaśinara, and still less to the order in which Kalhana has thought fit to introduce them.

Five kings taken from Chavillākara.

73. We reach a record of a different character with the next five kings whose names Kalhana has obtained from Chavillākara.⁹ This author whose time and person are not otherwise known, has been the means of preserving for us at least a few fragments of genuine tradition regarding some prominent figures in the early history of Kāśmīr. The name of King AŚOKA which is the first in the list taken from Chavillākara, stands out as a great landmark in general Indian history. The reminiscences which Kāśmīr tradition has retained of this great ruler, may therefore, scanty as they are, claim special interest.

AŚOKA.

Kalhana's account, in full agreement with historical fact as vouched for by Aśoka's own famous inscriptions, represents the king as a pious follower of the teaching of Buddha.¹⁰ The mention of S'uṣkalettra and Vitasātra in particular, as places where Aśoka had erected Vihāras and Stūpas, is significant as pointing to the survival in Kāśmīr of local traditions regarding him. That Buddhist tradition in Kāśmīr knew of Aśoka's connection with the Valley is made quite certain by the

⁶ i. 18.

⁷ See Ind. Ant., xviii. p. 69; also below, note i. 86.

⁸ See note i. 96.

⁹ i. 20.

¹⁰ i. 102 sqq.

records of the Chinese pilgrims.¹¹ Kalhana attributes to Aśoka the foundation of S'rinagari, the old capital, which can be shown to have occupied a site in the close vicinity of the present S'rinagar and to have left its name to the latter. It is fully in keeping with what from other evidence we may conclude as to Aśoka's attitude towards other great religious systems, that he figures in the Kāśmīr record also as the benefactor of the ancient and famous Śaiva shrine of Vijayeśvara.¹² There the king is said to have replaced the old stuccoed enclosure of the shrine by a new one of stone and to have erected two temples called after him Aśokeśvara. One of these appears to have been known by Aśoka's name even down to Kalhana's time.¹³ Also the ancient Kāśmīrian pilgrimage site of Ś'iva Bhūteśa is said to have claimed King Aśoka among its worshippers.

Foundation of S'rinagari.

Of less interest than these statements which seem to reflect genuine local traditions, are the recorded references to Aśoka's descent. The alleged relationship with Śaśinara, the last in Helārāja's list of kings, must appear highly suspicious already on account of the character we have proved above for that list. Of Śakuni, whom Kalhana names as Aśoka's great-grandfather, our other sources know nothing. It seems evident that Kāśmīrian tradition has preserved no recollection of Aśoka's true historical position as a great monarch ruling over the whole of Northern India. But by retaining his name at least in the list of Kāśmīr kings it affords us a welcome indication that the sovereign sway of the historical Aśoka was acknowledged also in that distant region.

JALAUKA, whom the traditions preserved by Kalhana represent as the son and successor of Aśoka, appears before us as the popular hero of many wonderful stories.¹⁴ He is described as a great warrior who cleared the land of oppressing Mlecchas and effected extensive conquests. From the subdued regions he is supposed to have brought settlers to Kāśmīr, and to have established there for the first time a complete system of administration. From among the many tales of Jalauka's divine power Kalhana reproduces several which show the king to have figured traditionally as a fervent worshipper at the shrines of Ś'iva Vijayeśvara and Nandīśa.¹⁵ More characteristic still is the story of the Kṛtyāśrama Vihāra, a local legend of unmistakably Buddhist colouring, in which the king appears first as an opponent of Buddhist worship subsequently converted to a more friendly attitude by special divine intercession.¹⁶ Also the mention of the saint Avadhūta, "the vanquisher of Buddha controversialists," as Jalauka's religious instructor shows that tradition saw in Aśoka's son pre-eminently the pious Śaiva.¹⁷

JALAUKA.

It is impossible for us to indicate what historical elements, if any, there are in the Kāśmīrian tradition regarding Jalauka. The name of this alleged son of Aśoka cannot otherwise be traced in our available sources, and the account given of his reign in the Chronicle bears in its main part a manifestly legendary character. As data possibly derived from more historical records, we may indicate, however, the references to the Agrahāra founded by Jalauka at the hamlet of Vārabāla (the present Bāravul), and to certain sacred diagrams attributed to his queen Iśānadovī.¹⁸

74. With DĀMODARA II., the next king whose name Kalhana had taken from Chavillākara, we come clearly to the region of local legend. The stories told

DĀMODARA II.

¹¹ For references compare note i. 101.

¹² i. 106 sq.

¹³ See note viii. 3391.

¹⁴ i. 121 sqq.

¹⁵ i. 118 sq., 123 sqq., 149 sqq.

¹⁶ i. 181 sqq.

¹⁷ i. 112.

¹⁸ See notes i. 121, 122.

of the wonderful works executed by this king and his final transformation into a snake, cluster to this day round the dry alluvial plateau south of Srinagar, known still as "Dāmodara's Uḍar."¹⁹ Apart from these tales the origin of which must be looked for in ancient folk-lore rather than in history, Kalhana has nothing to record of Dāmodara II. Even his connection with Aśoka's family is characteristically enough left doubtful by the Chronicler.

The Turuṣka kings:
HUṢKA, JUṢKA,
KANISKA.

With the names of the three Turuṣka kings, HUṢKA, JUṢKA and KANISKA, we reach once more the terra firma of historical record. The identity of Kaniska with the great Kuṣana or Indo-Scythian ruler of North-Western India, so well known to us from Buddhist traditions, the coins and inscriptions, has been recognized long ago. The name of Huṣka, too, frequent enough in the form of Huviṣka on coins and inscriptions, has been verified by epigraphical evidence.²⁰ Juṣka alone remains to be searched for. Kalhana's account of the reign of these kings who are supposed to have ruled simultaneously, is brief enough, but undoubtedly preserves data of genuine historical tradition. It clearly describes them as princes of Turuṣka, i.e. Turkish nationality, as powerful sovereigns and as faithful patrons of the Buddhist Church. On these points the statements of the Chronicler are fully supported by the evidence of our most authentic records. The continued existence of the three places, Kaniskapura, Huṣkapura and Juṣkapura, which are described as foundations of these kings and which still survive to the present day, is likely to have assisted in preserving a recollection of their founders.

Kaśmīr under Kuṣana rule.

That Kaśmīr was included in the wide dominion of the great Kuṣana dynasty, is a fact amply attested by the combined evidence of the Buddhist records and the coins, copper pieces of Kaniska and Huviṣka being found to this day in remarkable abundance at many of the old sites of Kaśmīr. According to the uniform Buddhist tradition Kaniska held the third great Council of the Church in Kaśmīr, and Hsien Tsiang on his visit to Kaśmīr still found local traditions regarding that ruler fully alive in the country. Kalhana's notice of the popularity and power enjoyed by Buddhism in Kaśmīr under the sway of the Turuṣka kings thus truly represents historical information. The Chronicler records the Buddhist teacher Nāgārjuna as living in Kaśmīr at that time, and it deserves to be noted that Tibetan sources certainly place that patriarch of the Buddhist Church at a date identical with that traditionally assigned by them to Kaniska.²¹ This notice of the Chronicler, as well as another indicating the supposed date of the Turuṣka kings as reckoned from Buddha's Nirvāṇa, show plainly that Buddhistic information had been embodied here in Kalhana's source.

ABHIMANYU I.

In curious contrast to this we find a distinctly anti-Buddhist colouring in the account given of ABHIMANYU I.'s reign. The name of this king, who is the last taken from Chavillākara's list, cannot otherwise be traced. Under him the Bauddhas guided by the Bodhisattva Nāgārjuna are supposed to have obtained such preponderance that the traditional customs and rites of the land fell into abeyance. This evoked the wrath of the Nāgas, the tutelary deities of the Valley, who revenged themselves by causing excessive snowfall which destroyed the Bauddhas and obliged the king to reside for six months in the cold season in the lower hills south of Kaśmīr. Finally a pious Brahman through the help of ¹⁹ Compare note i. 156.

²⁰ See for detailed references regarding these Indo-Scythian kings, note i. 168.

²¹ See note i. 173; also SCHIEFNER, Tāranātha's Geschichte des Buddhismus, p. 301.

Nilanāga, the lord of Kāśmīr Nāgas, restored the traditional cult as prescribed in the Nilamatapurāṇa, and thereby freed the land both from excessive snowfall and "plague of the Bhikṣus."²²

I have shown that we have in this story nothing but the rechauffé of an ancient legend told in the Nilamatapurāṇa which relates the deliverance of Kāśmīr from the plague of the Piśācas through the rites revealed by Nilanāga.²³ The story reproduced by Kālhana agrees so closely in all particulars with the earlier legend that the Chronicler himself calls attention to the resemblance. The characteristic substitution of the Bauddhas for the Piśācas shows clearly that the source from which this story was originally borrowed was not the same as that to which we owe the notices regarding the reign of the Turuṣka kings. The references made in Kālhana's account to the introduction of the study of the Mahābhāṣya under Abhimanyu and to certain religious foundations by him, seem to place that ruler more in a historical light; but they cannot be verified by independent evidence.

Kāśmīr delivered
of excessive snowfall.

75. Kālhana lets Abhimanyu be followed by GONANDA III., who is supposed to have finally assured the restoration of the traditional worship and the consequent recovery of the land.²⁴ With Gonanda III. begins the continuous list of Kāśmīrian rulers which, we must assume, Kālhana found in the earlier works containing the 'chronicles of the kings.' It is a significant point that apart from the statement regarding the restoration of the earlier cult which necessarily follows from Gonanda III. being represented as the successor of Abhimanyu, Kālhana has nothing to tell of him but that he was the founder of the Gonandiya dynasty. We have already above drawn attention to the curious light which this description of Gonanda III. throws upon the true character of the notices taken from the Nilamata regarding the earlier two Gonandas.²⁵ But we are not helped by it to a more exact estimate of the historical character which may attach to the person of Gonanda III. The existence of a Gonanda dynasty in Kāśmīr may be looked upon as a historical fact vouched for by genuine tradition. But it is well to realize that as to the person and time of its founder we can gather nothing from our available sources.

GONANDA III.

Of the next four kings, VIBHĪṢANA I., INDRAJIT, RĀVAṆA, and VIBHĪṢANA II., only the names are recorded, as well as the lengths of their reigns. These, after the explanations given above, need not engage our attention.²⁶ The account given of NARA or KĪMNARA, the next ruler, seems more substantial, filling nearly eighty verses. In reality, however, it consists only of a poetically elaborated legend relating to an ancient town near Vijayeshvara which local tradition, surviving partly to the present day, attributed to King Nara, and which was believed to have been destroyed in a great catastrophe brought about through the king's wickedness.

VIBHĪṢANA I.,
INDRAJIT, RĀVAṆA,
VIBHĪṢANA II.

NARA.

The antiquarian and topographical facts underlying these legendary traditions regarding Narapura have been fully noticed elsewhere.²⁷ Interesting as these traditions are as illustrations of Kāśmīrian folk-lore and from an antiquarian point of view, they do not help us to determine the question as to the historical existence of King Nara. Kālhana's mention of ruins and the actual finds of ancient coins in the locality are indications that there once stood an old town on the banks of the

Legend of Narapura.

²² i. 177-184.

²³ See note i. 184.

²⁴ i. 185 sqq.

²⁵ See above, § 71.

²⁶ Compare above, §§ 60, 61.

²⁷ See below, notes i. 201 sq., 203 sq.; also Memoir, § 108.

Vitastā below the plateau of Cakradhara. But nothing has yet come to light to instruct us regarding the real history of this important site.

SIDDHA.

UTPALAKṢA; HIRAN-
YAKṢA; HIRANYA-
KULĀ; VASUKULĀ.

76. SIDDHA, the son and successor of Nara, in obviously intentional contrast to his father and in conformity with his name (meaning 'saint'), is described as a very pious prince and credited with a bodily ascent to heaven. Of UTPALAKṢA, HIRANYAKṢA, HIRANYAKULĀ, and VASUKULĀ, the next four kings who are supposed to have ruled in due succession from father to son, we are practically told only the names and lengths of reigns. Hiranyakṣa appears to have traditionally figured as the founder of Hiranyapura, now a small place at the entrance of the Sind Valley (Ranyil).²⁸

MIHIRAKULĀ.

We reach again a record of truly historical interest in Kalkha's account of MIHIRAKULĀ, the son and successor of Vasukulā. Already above, when discussing the chronological value of this notice, we have shown that the identity of Kalkha's Mihirakulā with the Ephthalite or White Hun ruler of that name must be regarded as certain.²⁹ From the epigraphical and other evidence which Mr. Fleet was the first to collect and to interpret correctly, it is seen that Mihirakulā had succeeded, about A.D. 515, to his father Toramāna as ruler of the wide dominion which earlier White Hun conquests had established between the Kabul Valley and Central India. About 530 A.D. Mihirakulā had been ousted by a hostile alliance from the greatest part of those territories and forced to retire northwards towards Kāśmīr. From there he seems to have made endeavours to recover his lost dominions along the Indus, down to the time of his end, which falls about A.D. 544-550.

Popular traditions about Mihirakulā.

Kalkha's relation of Mihirakulā's reign consists largely of legendary anecdotes. But these are of considerable historical interest because it can be shown that on the whole they reproduce faithfully the popular tradition regarding the king such as had developed in Kāśmīr within a century of his death. The feature of Mihirakulā's character which seems to have most impressed the popular mind, was undoubtedly his violence and cruelty. The stories by which Kalkha illustrates these qualities of the king, agree closely with those which Hsien Tsiang heard related, and with the description which an earlier Chinese pilgrim, Sung-yun, has left us of his own personal interview with the "cruel and vindictive" king. One of Kalkha's anecdotes which accounts for Mihirakulā's characteristic epithet trikoṭihan, "the killer of three crores," shows a further development of a tradition recorded by Hsien Tsiang.³⁰ Another which relates the destruction of a hundred elephants on the ancient pass of the Pir Panjal, is of interest because a recollection of it still survives to the present day in local tradition.³¹

The historical fact of Mihirakulā's extensive wars abroad has left its trace in Kalkha's story of the king's expedition to Ceylon and the conquests connected with it. That the phantastic motive which is assigned by the Chronicler to this expedition had figured in the popular tradition regarding Mihirakulā long before Kalkha's time and also outside Kāśmīr, is proved by its record in the version of the story as preserved in the Mujmalu-t-Tawārikh.³²

Kalkha's references to the settlements of Gandhāra Brahmins which Mihirakulā effected in Kāśmīr,³³ may be based on historical facts and show in any case that Kāśmīr tradition was aware of Mihirakulā's close connection with that ²⁸ See note i. 287.

²⁹ For detailed references regarding the data bearing on the historical Mihirakulā, see note i. 289.

³⁰ Compare note i. 322.

³¹ See note i. 302.

³² See note i. 294.

³³ i. 307, 312 sqq.

territory as proved by Hiuen Tsiang and Sung-yun's relations. In regard to Mihirakula's religious propensities, too, we can trace some agreement between Kalhana's narrative and the earlier record. Mihirakula who in the tradition preserved by Hiuen Tsiang figures as a persecutor of Buddhist institutions, seems to have been remembered in Kāśmīr, at least in respect of his later career, as a liberal patron of Brahmins.³¹

This point is brought out particularly in the several versions which Kalhana mentions as current regarding the king's death by suicide. One of these specified as a "tenacious popular tradition," attributes to the king the merit of having after all his cruelties re-established in Kāśmīr pious observances which had suffered through Mleccha irruptions, and describes his self-immolation as a pious atonement.³² The legends and emblems of Mihirakula's coins display an unmistakable leaning towards Śaiva cult, and thus seem to justify to some extent the tradition above indicated.

77. It is impossible for us to trace the cause of the remarkable chronological confusion which has led to Mihirakula figuring in the Chronicle fully twelve hundred years before his real date. But we see this great error reflected as it were, also in the fact that Mihirakula is completely severed in Kalhana's dynastic list from the other Kāśmīr kings whom by the evidence of their names and coins we have to recognize as rulers of White Hun descent (Khinkhila, Lakhkhana-Narendraditya).

BAKA whom the Rājatarāṅgiṇī presents to us as the son and successor of Mihirakula, is painted as a most virtuous prince and a comforter of humanity with the same conventional contrast between father and son we have noticed already in the case of Nara and Siddha. Kalhana has otherwise nothing to tell of him but his alleged connection with certain localities the names of which contain the word baka, and his supernatural death at the hands of a screech-owl.³³ Kalhana mentions that a recollection of the latter story was kept alive in his own day by the tradition of certain localities.³⁷

BAKA.

The next four kings, KṢITINANDA, VASUNANDA, NARA II., and AKṢA, are each disposed of with a single line, and accordingly can claim only a very shadowy existence as historical personages. All the information vouchsafed regarding them is that Vasunanda composed a handbook on erotics, and Akṣa founded the village of Akṣavāṭa; a statement which in view of the formation of this local name may be assumed to rest on mere popular etymology.

KṢITINANDA;
VASUNANDA;
NARA II.; AKṢA.

To Gopāditya, the next in the list, we may allow a greater claim to historical reality; for local traditions which seem genuine and old, represented him as the founder of Agrahāras at a series of well-known places.³⁴ Popular belief attributed to Gopāditya the temple of Jyeṣṭheśvara on the hill near Śrinagar which was known by its ancient name as Gopādrī, and connected with him also several localities in the immediate vicinity of the hill. Kalhana's reference to a certain epithet which was given to Gopāditya in a 'prasasti' or laudatory poem, looks as if derived, directly or indirectly, from some inscriptional record.³⁵

GOPADITYA.

Of GOKARNA, the successor of Gopāditya, Kalhana has nothing to mention but

GOKARNA.

³⁴ i. 307, 311, 312-314.

³⁵ i. 312 sqq.

³⁶ See i. 329. It must be remembered that baka is a common word in its ordinary meaning of 'heron.' The connection of the local names quoted by Kalhana with a king Baka may be due to popular etymology.

³⁷ i. 335.

³⁸ i. 340 sqq.

³⁹ i. 344.

the foundation of the otherwise unknown shrine of Śiva (Gokarṇeśvara).¹⁰ General Cunningham believed that he had found this king's name on a unique coin of the Kidāra type. But according to the information kindly given to me by Mr. Rapson who re-examined the coin, the reading is more than doubtful.

KEIŪKHILA*
NARENDRĀDITYA.

On the other hand, it appears probable enough, as already indicated above (§ 63), that we must recognize KEIŪKHILA, also called Narendrāditya, whom Kalhaṇa names as Gokarṇa's son, in the Ephthalite ruler who calls himself on his coin Deva S'āhi Khingila.¹¹ The chronological question raised by this identification has already been discussed above. The thoroughly un-Indian character of the name KeiŪkhila and the references to some religious endowments attributed to this king seem to lend support to the belief in his historical existence. It deserves to be noted that Lakṣhaṇa, another king in Kalhaṇa's list who on numismatic evidence must be identified with an Ephthalite prince, also figures with the second name of Narendrāditya.¹²

Kalhaṇa's First Book closes with an account of the reign of Yudhiṣṭhira I., known by a nickname as Andha-Yudhiṣṭhira, who is supposed to have brought to an end the first Gonanda dynasty. What we learn of him is mainly that by his injudicious conduct he exasperated his subjects and ministers who ultimately rose against him and forced him to abandon his kingdom. The poetic description of the betrayed king's retirement from his land gives Kalhaṇa an opportunity to treat us to the 'sentiment of resignation' which he had adopted as the main rasa of his composition.

SECTION II.—THE KINGS OF BOOKS II. AND III.

78. The six kings whose reigns are chronicled in Book ii., are represented to us as unconnected with Gonanda's dynasty and of different lines of descent. PRATĀPĀDITYA I., the first among them, is said to have been brought to Kaśmīr from abroad by the discontented ministers, and to have been a relative of King Vikramāditya. Kalhaṇa rejects the opinion of other earlier chroniclers who held this Vikramāditya to be identical with Vikramāditya Śākāri, the traditional vanquisher of the Śakas.¹ But he does not himself supply a clue that might help us to ascertain which of the several Vikramādityas of Indian tradition was really meant. As Kalhaṇa in the same connection informs us that Kaśmīr was about that period "subject to Harṣa and other foreign kings," we might be led to conclude that the great Harṣa-Vikramāditya of Ujjayini who ruled in the first half of the sixth century of our era, was intended. Yet as Kalhaṇa's subsequent account represents this ruler as the patron of Mātṛgupta who in his own chronology is placed 268 years later, it is evident that he himself could not have assumed this identity.

Reference to foreign dominion.

It would be possible to suppose that owing to some confusion the cause of which can no longer be traced, Kalhaṇa had been unwittingly guilty of introducing to us the same historical personage at two widely distant periods. But the total want of the earlier sources and of other materials does not allow us to form more than conjectures on the subject. The expressed acknowledgment of foreign dominion over Kaśmīr is, however, in itself a point of historical interest, and throws light on ¹⁰ i. 346.

¹¹ See note i. 347.

¹² See below, § 83.

¹ See notes ii. 6 sq.

the real cause of the break which tradition was constrained to assume in the line of the Gonanda dynasty. We have here the clear indication of a foreign conquest, such as we must assume Kaśmīr to have been exposed to during more than one period preceding the commencement of authentic history in Kalhana's record.

Of PRATĀPĀDITYA I. and his son and successor JALAUKA, Kalhana has otherwise nothing to tell us but that they ruled justly and for exactly the same period, thirty-two years each. The account given of TUŠJINA I., the next in the list, consists mainly of an elaborate description of a great famine in which the people were saved by the charity of the king and the miraculous intercession of his saintly wife, Vakpuṣṭā. The references to some pious foundations of Tuṣjina and his queen, one of them still maintained in Kalhana's time,² and to the Kavi Canduka who is stated to have lived in their reign,³ bear a more historical character.

JALAUKA.

TUŠJINA I.

Of the next king, VIJAYA, Kalhana contents himself with recording that he belonged to another family, and that the foundation of the town surrounding the ancient shrine of Vijayēśvara was due to him.⁴ The possibility of the latter statement resting on a popular etymology naturally suggests itself in view of what has been demonstrated above in regard to Ilalarāja's royal names.

VIJAYA.

The account given of Vijaya's son JAYENDRA, consists merely of a fanciful legend spun out in great detail, relating how the pious and wise minister Saṁdhimati, whom the wicked king had cruelly put to death, was miraculously restored to life by the magic of witches.⁵ The saintly hero of this fairy tale is then supposed to have ascended the Kaśmīr throne vacated by Jayendra's death, under the name of Āryarāja, and to have ruled the land with exceptional piety for forty-seven years. Saṁdhimati-Āryarāja who seems to have figured in Kaśmīr tradition as the beau idéal of a royal do-gooder, is represented as having in the end voluntarily abdicated owing to disaffection among his subjects. He ended his days as a recluse at the sacred site of Śiva Bhūtesa.

JAYENDRA.
Story of Saṁdhimati.

Fanciful as the story of Saṁdhimati-Āryarāja is as related in the Chronicle, we should yet scarcely be justified in treating the existence of this king as altogether mythical. Local traditions extant in Kalhana's time soon to have connected his memory with certain old shrines and religious endowments.⁶ The picture drawn of the peculiar character of this priest-king, notwithstanding its exaggerations, shows traces, too, of historical individuality. What the elements were from which the curious story regarding Āryarāja's wonderful antecedents grew up, can no longer be guessed now. Judging from the explanation which Kalhana gives for the alleged change of the name Saṁdhimati into Saṁdhimat we might be tempted to assume that "popular etymology" had something to do also with the creation of this legend.⁷

79. Āryarāja's abdication which closes the Second Book of the Chronicle, was followed according to Kalhana by a restoration of Gonanda's family to the rule of Kaśmīr. MEGHAVĀHANA, the first prince of the restored dynasty, is said to have been the son of Gopāditya, a great-grandson of Yndhiṣṭhira, living in exile at the court of the king of Gandhāra. Meghavāhana, who is supposed to have taken possession of the throne of his forefathers at the invitation of the Kaśmīrian

MEGHAVĀHANA.

² See ii. 14, 55, 57 sq.

³ ii. 16.

⁴ ii. 62.

⁵ ii. 65-115.

⁶ Compare ii. 120-135.

⁷ See ii. 110. The witches who made Saṁdhimati rise to life when reduced to a skeleton, are said to have given him the name of Saṁdhimat because the limbs of his body were joined (saṁdhita) once more (!).

ministers, is described as a strong but pious ruler. Various acts attributed to him, like the prohibition of the killing of animals, even in sacrifices, and the building of numerous Viharas by his court, seem to show Meghavāhana in the light of a patron of Buddhism.⁸ Apart from several legendary anecdotes which are intended to illustrate the spiritual greatness of the king and his command of supernatural powers acquired thereby, Kalkya relates of him a 'divvijaya' or conquest of the world.⁹ Meghavāhana is supposed to have undertaken it in order to impose his prohibition of slaughter on the whole earth, and to have subjected in the course of it even Vibhīṣaṇa, the mythical demon king of Laṅkā or Ceylon. It needs scarcely to be demonstrated that no historical value can attach to the record of such fabulous conquests. That popular belief in Kaśmīr gave them full credence is shown by the fact that certain royal banners, used still in Kalkya's time, were alleged to have been presented on that occasion by the lord of Laṅkā.¹⁰

Kalkya himself acknowledges some embarrassment at having to relate "of this king of recent times, acts which cannot be believed by common people."¹¹ But among these extravagant tales it is yet possible to discern some data which seem historical. The report of Meghavāhana having come from Gandhāra acquires significance in view of the unmistakable numismatic evidence which points to Kaśmīr having been subject to princes who were connected with the later Kuṣāṇa and Kṣpātharite rulers of Gandhāra. The Amṛtābhayana Vihara which Kalkya mentions as having been founded by Amṛtābhayā, Meghavāhana's chief queen, was known already to Ou-loung.¹² The attribution of a Sūtra known by a Tibetan designation (Loh-stongpā) to the Guru of this foreign queen, seems also to rest on genuine tradition.¹³

S'REṢṬHASENA.

Of Meghavāhana's son and successor S'ṛeṣṭhasena, who is said to have borne also the names of Pravaraṣena and Tuṣṭīṇa, we are told only that he built various sacred structures at Purāṇādhiṣṭhāna, 'the old capital,' the site of which is marked by the modern Pāndrūthān.¹⁴

HIRANYA and TORAMĀNA.

80. S'ṛeṣṭhasena is said to have had two sons, of which the elder, HIRANYA, succeeded him, while the other, TORAMĀNA, acted as Yuvarāja. Toramāna presumed to strike coins in his own name, whereupon Hiranya threw him into prison for the remainder of his life.¹⁵ During his long captivity a son was born to him, who was brought up in disguise and in humble surroundings, but ultimately ascended the throne as Pravaraṣena II.

Coins of Toramāna.

Of Hiranya's historical existence we do not possess at present independent evidence. But the name of Toramāna is found on a species of Kaśmīr copper coins of which remarkably large quantities have been preserved to this day. The connection of this coinage with Kalkya's notice cannot be doubted; but the interesting historical questions which are raised by it, and which have been fully discussed elsewhere, do not admit at present of a certain solution.¹⁶ By the evidence of the characters of their legend the coins bearing the name of Toramāna must belong in their earliest issues to the fifth or sixth century of our era. They are undoubtedly the oldest representatives of that peculiar type which the copper coinage of Kaśmīr exhibits throughout the whole of the Hindu period. The fact of this type making its first ⁸ Compare iii. 4, 7, 8 sqq.

⁹ iii. 27 sqq., 72 sqq.

¹⁰ iii. 77 sq.

¹¹ iii. 84.

¹² Compare note iii. 9.

¹³ See note iii. 10.

¹⁴ iii. 99 sq.

¹⁵ iii. 102 sqq.

¹⁶ Compare for all details, note iii. 103 and Note H (iv. 105), §§ 18 sqq.

appearance on the coins of Toramāṇa and the abundance of their issues suggest that these coins were first struck by some powerful conqueror. It has accordingly been supposed that the Toramāṇa of these coins is identical with the Ephthalite king Toramāṇa, the father of Mihirakula, of whom it can be shown that he ruled over the Panjāb and probably also Kāśmīr towards the close of the fifth century.

If this supposition is correct, we should, indeed, have to charge Kalhaṇa with having placed the father some seven hundred years after the son.¹⁷ But it must be remembered that as far as our present knowledge goes, Kāśmīr may well have known another and later ruler bearing the name Toramāṇa. The name, though unusual and probably of Turkish origin, can be shown from Kalhaṇa's narrative to have been borne by a Hindu Śāhi prince of Gandhāra as late as the tenth century. However the question as to the real issuer of the Toramāṇa coins may ultimately be decided, it will be difficult to explain why he should appear in Kalhaṇa's narrative as an ill-fated pretender.

81. According to Kalhaṇa, Toramāṇa died in captivity, and his son Pravarasena, who had grown into a youth by that time, left Kāśmīr for a tour of pilgrimages.¹⁸ Hiranya himself is supposed to have died shortly afterwards, after a rule of thirty-one years. In the interval between his death and the advent of Pravarasena II., Kalhaṇa places the rule of the poet Mātṛgupta. The account given of it in the Chronicle forms an episode of considerable historical interest, notwithstanding the legendary elements with which it is interwoven.¹⁹ The story which Kalhaṇa relates to us at great length and in the stylo of works like the Kathāsaritsāgara, represents Mātṛgupta as a poor poet who had sought the court of King Harṣa-Vikramāditya of Ujjayinī. After long futile endeavours to attract the king's attention to his merits, he succeeds at last in gaining his favour by a romantic proof of devotion. The king, touched by the incident, sends Mātṛgupta to Kāśmīr with a letter directing the ministers of that land to instal him on the vacant throne. When Mātṛgupta, unacquainted with the contents of the letter, arrives at the Kāśmīr frontier pass, he finds the ministers awaiting King Harṣa's nominee, and is forthwith crowned. After a just rule of less than five years the pious poet is then said, at the death of his patron Harṣa, to have abdicated in favour of Pravarasena II., whom a divine ordinance had called back to Kāśmīr, and to have retired as a recluse to Benares. There he died, supported to the end by the liberal donations of his generous rival and successor.

MĀTRGUPTA

Romantic as this story appears, which Kalhaṇa treats as a text for many a moralizing reflection, it yet furnishes us with an important historical clue in the mention of Mātṛgupta's royal patron. Vikramāditya-Harṣa of Ujjayinī is subsequently mentioned by Kalhaṇa as the father of Śīlāditya-Pratāpaśīla, and the latter is undoubtedly the same as King Śīlāditya whom Hsien Tsiang knew to have ruled in Mālava about 580 A.D. This indication leads us to identify Kalhaṇa's Vikramāditya-Harṣa with the famous Vikramāditya who is mentioned by Hsien Tsiang as Śīlāditya's predecessor, and whose rule must be placed in the first half of the sixth century.²⁰ It appears probable that Vikramāditya had assisted in or at least profited by the overthrow of the Ephthalite dominion. It

Vikramāditya-
Harṣa of Ujjayinī.

¹⁷ See HULTZSCH, Ind. Ant., xix. p. 262.

¹⁸ iii. 123.

¹⁹ iii. 125-328.

²⁰ Compare for detailed references, notes

iii. 125, 330, and for the date of Vikramāditya, Prof. M. MÜLLER's lucid exposition, India, pp. 286 sqq.

is therefore possible also that he exercised that direct influence on the affairs of Kāśmīr which Kālhana's narrative regarding Mātṛgupta seems to indicate.

While we thus realize that the traditions recorded in the Chronicle can be reconciled generally with our available data, it is yet difficult to arrive at any conclusion as to the historical character of Mātṛgupta's reign. The existence of a poet Mātṛgupta is vouched for by the verses quoted from his compositions by Kṣemendra and other Kāśmīrian authors;²¹ but the fact of his having governed Kāśmīr cannot be established by independent evidence. If Kālhana's story in its broad outlines rests on historical fact, we should have to conclude that Kāśmīr, about the middle of the sixth century, had for a short time been subject to a ruler who acknowledged the sovereignty of Vikramāditya of Ujjayini or had claimed his support. We have apparently genuine traditions regarding Mātṛgupta in the references made by Kālhana to the temple of Mātṛguptasvāmī built by him,²² and to the poet Menpha, who wrote the now lost Kāvya Mayagṛavavallha under his patronage.²³

PRAVARASENA II.

82. The Chronicle represents PRAVARASENA II. as having received the news of Vikramāditya's death and Mātṛgupta's abdication when he was in Trigarta or Kāngra marching against Kāśmīr to recover the kingdom of his forefathers.²⁴ Considering Kālhana's manifest bias for Mātṛgupta, the fellow-poet, we may perhaps recognize in this statement a disguised acknowledgment that in reality Vikramāditya's protégé lost the throne by the successful invasion of the son of an earlier ruler.

Kālhana's account of Pravarasena II.'s reign possesses special interest, as it can be verified in some important particulars by authentic historical data. Kālhana attributes to the king an extensive expedition abroad, in the course of which he is supposed to have vanquished the inhabitants of Śrāṣṭra or Gujaraṭ, and to have recovered for Śīlāditya-Pratāpaśīla the throne of his father Vikramāditya.²⁵ We have already seen that this ruler of Malava can be proved from Hsien Tsiang's record to have succeeded Vikramāditya-Harsa. The agreement we note here between the statements of the Chinese pilgrim and Kālhana, strengthens the belief that the latter was also right in making Pravarasena a contemporary of Śīlāditya. Hsien Tsiang distinctly tells us that Śīlāditya was on the throne of Malava sixty years before his own time, i.e. about 580 A.D., which brings us to the second half of the sixth century as the approximate date of Pravarasena.

Foundation of
Pravarapura.

The date here indicated is indirectly confirmed also by the tradition which Kālhana records in great detail regarding the foundation by Pravarasena of his capital Pravarapura (shortened from Pravarasnapura). I have shown elsewhere that this city was undoubtedly built on the site of the modern Śrīnagar, which has remained the capital of Kāśmīr to the present day, and still bears in Purāṇit usage the designation of Pravarapura.²⁶ The record found in the Chinese Annals of the Tang dynasty, proves that the name Pravarapura was already in the early part of the eighth century, the official designation for this city.²⁷ Hsien Tsiang does not mention the name of the Kāśmīr capital, but he describes it exactly

²¹ See note iii. 129, where Dr. Bhanu Daji's ingenious but insufficiently supported theory of Mātṛgupta's identity with Kalidāsa has also been noticed.

²² iii. 263.

²⁴ See note iii. 260.

²⁵ iii. 285 sqq.

²⁶ iii. 330 sq.

²⁷ See for detailed evidence, note iii. 330-340 and Memoir, §§ 91 sq.

²⁸ Compare Memoir, § 10.

enough in the position still occupied by Śrinagar, and distinguishes it as "the new city" from "the old city," corresponding to Purāṇādhishṭhāna or Pāndrēṭhan. It is thus clear that at the time of Hiuen Tsiang's visit, circ. A.D. 631, the capital founded by Pravarasena already existed, but that it was then a comparatively recent city. It is easy to perceive how well this observation agrees with the date which we have been led above to assign to Pravarasena's reign.

Equally convincing evidence on this point is supplied by the coins bearing Pravarasena's name, of which we possess rare specimens both in gold and silver.²⁸ They show in their types a close connection on the one hand with the Kaśmīr Toramāṇa coins, and on the other with the coinage of the 'Kidāra' Kuṣanas, who appear from the fifth century onwards as the successors of the later Great Kuṣanas in Gandhāra and the regions east of the Indus.²⁹ The coins of Pravarasena are unmistakably older than the coins of the Kaśmīr kings, whose names we shall meet in Kalhana's list of the Kārkoṭa dynasty (Book iv.). The legend Kidāra, which we find written perpendicularly both on Pravarasena's coins and on those of the Kārkoṭa kings, is taken from the coinage of the Little Kuṣanas. It is usually identified with the name of the founder of the latter dynasty, who in the Chinese Annals is called Kitolo. If this interpretation is correct, it would certainly lend support to the conclusion that Pravarasena and the other early Kaśmīr rulers, on whose coins this legend appears, were connected with the ruling family of the Little Kuṣanas.³⁰ Doubtful evidence on this point can, however, be expected only from the discovery of fresh materials.

The detailed description which Kalhana gives of the city as founded by Pravarasena, and the accuracy of the antiquarian data supplied in it, show plainly that reliable historical traditions were accessible to the Chronicler for Pravarasena's reign. The great temple of Śiva Pravareśvara, which the king had built evidently as the chief shrine of his newly-founded city, was still extant in Kalhana's time. A popular legend recorded already by Bilhana, a hundred years before Kalhana, made the king end his life at this shrine by a miraculous ascent to heaven.³¹

83. Of Yudhiṣṭhira II., Pravarasena's immediate successor, Kalhana has only to chronicle the foundation of some Vihāras and other sacred buildings by certain royal ministers. One of these, the Skandabhavanavihāra, has left its name to a city-quarter in Śrinagar.³² We receive no more detailed account of this king's son and successor NARENDRĀDITYA. But the second name, LAḤKHAṆA, which Kalhana records for this prince, possesses special historical interest. We find this curious and thoroughly un-Indian name on a silver coin of the Ephthalite type which bears the legend Rāja Laḥkhaṇa Udayāditya, and which on account of its close resemblance to the coin of Khinkhila already mentioned must be ascribed to Kaśmīr.³³ It appears very probable that by the Laḥkhaṇa-Narendraditya of the

Coins of Pravarasena.

YUDHIṢṬHIRA II.

LAḤKHAṆA-
NARENDRĀDITYA.

²⁸ See CUNNINGHAM, Coins of Med. India, p. 43; also below, Noto II (iv. 496), § 17.

²⁹ Compare for the Kidāra or Little Kuṣana coins, RAPSON, Indian Coins, § 76; for a specimen closely resembling Pravarasena's silver coin, see ib. plate ii, fig. 16.

³⁰ See CUNNINGHAM, Coins of Med. India, pp. 27 sqq.; also Numism. Chronicle, 1893, pp. 184 sqq. It should be noted that the letters Kidāra are found also on the apparently oldest issues of the Toramāṇa coins. If the latter were really struck by Toramāṇa, Mihra-kula's father, we should have to assume as the most likely explanation that the Ephthalite king continued a coin type which had originally been introduced into Kaśmīr by earlier conquerors belonging to the race of the 'Kidāra' Kuṣanas.

³¹ See note iii. 378.

³² See note vi. 137.

³³ For detailed evidence of this identification, see note iii. 383.

Chronicle is meant the same ruler who calls himself Lalikhapa-Udayāditya on his coin. But we have no means at present to account for the difference of the second name, or to explain why this Epithalito prince should have found his place in Kalhana's list so far away from Khinkhila and Mihirakula, with whom his name clearly connects him. It deserves to be noted that Kalhana gives also for Khinkhila the name Narendrāditya as the second (Indian) appellation.

RAṆĀDITYA.

The confusion which displays itself here, warns us that we cannot place full reliance on Kalhana's dynastic list, even where we approach close to the commencement of the truly historical part of the Chronicle. We are taught the same lesson, perhaps even more emphatically, by the strange collection of fables to which Kalhana treats us regarding the next ruler, RAṆĀDITYA.³⁴ 'This king, who is said to be a younger brother of Lalikhapa, is presented to us altogether in the light of a fairy-tale hero. He is credited, as we have seen, with a reign of three hundred years, and the events recorded of it correspond fully to its miraculous length. His queen Raṇārambhā is declared to have been a goddess, and her wooing in a previous existence, with all its wonderful incidents, is described to us at great length. Equally phantastic stories about Raṇāditya's descent to the underworld, the wonders worked by his queen at the consecration of various shrines, etc., fill the rest of Kalhana's account. Leaving aside this superabundant legendary lore we find traces of historical tradition only in the few references to shrines and other sacred objects which were attributed to Raṇāditya and his court.³⁵ The hero of so many marvellous tales is said to have been followed in the rule of Kāśmīr by his son VIKRAMĀDITYA. Of his long reign of forty-one years nothing is related but the foundation of some sacred buildings no longer traceable.

VIKRAMĀDITYA.

BĀLĀDITYA.

BĀLĀDITYA, the brother and successor of Vikramāditya, is introduced to us as the last king from Gonanda's race. The account which Kalhana gives us as to how the rule of the land passed after Bālāditya to the founder of the Kārkoṭa dynasty, bears a very romantic colouring. Bālāditya, having been foretold of his son-in-law being destined to succeed him, is said to have married his daughter Anaṅgalekhā to a small official, Durlabhavardhana, in the hope of forestalling destiny by the selection of an insignificant husband. Durlabhavardhana, however, is believed to have been really the offspring of the Nāga Kārkoṭa, a deity worshipped at several springs of Kāśmīr. By his judicious conduct, Durlabhavardhana rose in the favour of his royal father-in-law, and by his forbearance also won the attachment of the minister Khaṅkha, whom he had discovered guilty of a love intrigue with Anaṅgalekhā. After Bālāditya's death Khaṅkha, out of gratitude, then established Durlabhavardhana on the throne.³⁶ dynasty.

Origin of Kārkoṭa

Divesting this story of its legendary elements, it is clear that Kāśmīr tradition knew the founder of the historical Kārkoṭa dynasty as a man of humble origin, but connected by marriage with the preceding royal family. The story of Durlabhavardhana's miraculous descent looks as if invented to explain the rise of the founder of the dynasty and to please his descendants. Of the real origin of the designation Kārkoṭa given to the family whose reigns fill the Fourth Book of Kalhana's narrative, we can form no certain opinion. It may have been a real family name or 'Kram,' such as used to this day by Kāśmīrian Brahmans.³⁷ Whether Durlabhavardhana's succession was due to the natural extinction of the ³⁴ iii. 386-473.

³⁵ iii. 460 sqq.

³⁶ iii. 487-528.

³⁷ See note v. 218.

male line of the earlier dynasty, or to other causes, is a question which cannot be decided from the available materials.

We have no coin or other independent evidence proving the historical existence of Balāditya, but the references made to various religious foundations by Balāditya, his wife and ministers, seem to rest on genuine tradition.³² As Kalhana's succession list of the Kārkotās may be accepted on the whole as quite historical, we may attach credit also to the traditional record regarding the immediately preceding ruler.

SECTION III.—THE KĀRKOTĀ DYNASTY.

84. The accession of the Kārkotā dynasty, as already explained above, marks an important stage in Kalhana's narrative. From here onwards we can check the majority of the recorded royal names from coins or foreign notices, and the chronology of the reigns, too, becomes, within certain limits, reliable.

To DURLABHAVARDHANA we may attribute with great probability coins bearing the name of Durlabhadeva, and showing a type of bold but rude execution which characterizes all the known issues of rulers of this dynasty.¹ We have possibly also a reference to Durlabhavardhana in a notice of the Chinese Annals, which mentions Tu-lo-pu as a king of India, who, at a certain not defined date between the years A.D. 627-649, controlled the route from China to Ki-pin, i.e. the Kabul Valley.²

DURLABHAVAR-
DHANA.

It appears probable that the visit of Hiuen Tsiang (c. A.D. 631-638) fell within the reign of thirty-six years which Kalhana attributes to Durlabhavardhana. The Life of Hiuen Tsiang records the hospitable reception which the king of Kaśmīr accorded to the pious pilgrim, but, unfortunately, does not state his name.³ The king was well-inclined towards the Buddhist priests, but Hiuen Tsiang himself notes that "at the present time this kingdom is not much given to the faith, and the temples of the heretics are their sole thought."⁴ Hiuen Tsiang's long account of Kaśmīr and its sacred sites and traditions, which has been analyzed elsewhere, contains no reference to its political condition.⁵ But we may conclude from his description that the country was prosperous and peaceful. The extent of the political power of Kaśmīr at this period is strikingly attested by the fact that Hiuen Tsiang found all adjacent territories on the west and south, down to the plains, subject to the sway of the king of Kaśmīr. He thus distinctly records that Takṣaśilā east of the Indus, Uraśi or Hazira, Simhapura or the Salt Range, with the smaller hill-states of Rājapuri and Parnotsa, had no independent rulers, but were tributary to Kaśmīr.⁶ Of Takṣaśilā we are informed that this dependence was of recent date.

Visit of Hiuen Tsiang.

³¹ iii. 481 sqq.

¹ See note iv. 8.

² See CUNNINGHAM, Coins of Med. India, p. 38.

³ Compare Life, ed. Beal, pp. 68 sqq.

⁴ Si-yu-ki, i. p. 158.

⁵ See below, Memoir, § 9.

⁶ See Si-yu-ki, i. pp. 130, 143, 147, 163.

That the power of the ruler of Kaśmīr actually extended to Takṣaśilā and the Indus is proved by the fact that he personally came to visit Hiuen Tsiang when the latter, on his return journey, was stopping with the king of Kapisa, or Kabul, at Udabhanḍa (Waihand, Und) on the Indus; see Life, p. 192.

PRATĀPĀDITYA II.

PRATĀPĀDITYA II., or DURLABHAKA, the son and successor of Durlabhavaradhana, is also known to us from his coins. They show the well-known Kārkaṭa type with the legend S'ripratāpa.⁷ Their frequency is in keeping with the long reign of fifty years which Kallhana attributes to this king. Apart from the foundation of Pratāpapur, the present Tāpar, Kallhana relates of Pratāpāditya only the romantic episode of his marriage with Narendraprabhā, previously the wife of a foreign merchant settled in Kaśmīr. Narendraprabhā bore the king three sons, Candrāpīḍa, Tārāpīḍa, and Muktāpīḍa, who were also known by the names of Vajrāditya, Udayāditya, and Lalitāditya.⁸

CANDRĀPĪḌA.

CANDRĀPĪḌA, who first succeeded his father, has long ago been identified with King Tchen t'o-lo-pi-li mentioned in the Chinese Annals as ruling over Kaśmīr, A.D. 713, and again in 720.⁹ We have already seen that these dates necessitate a correction of about twenty-five years in Kallhana's Chronology of the Kārkaṭas. The Chronicler ascribes to Candrāpīḍa a noble character, and illustrates his high sense of justice by the relation of two anecdotes evidently taken from popular tradition.¹⁰ Also only the foundation of certain little-known shrines is recorded of Candrāpīḍa's reign.¹¹ His death, after a reign of nearly nine years, is attributed by Kallhana to the use of witchcraft on the part of Tārāpīḍa, his wicked brother and successor.

TĀRĀPĪḌA.

TĀRĀPĪḌA himself, after a cruel rule of four years, is said to have succumbed to magic used by the Brahmins whom he had oppressed.¹² The report as to the cause of his death and that of his elder brother may well be derived from contemporary tradition; for superstitious belief in the efficiency of magic rites, etc., forms an ancient feature of Kaśmīrian character.¹³

LALITĀDITYA-
MUKTĀPĪḌA.

85. Of the reign of LALITĀDITYA-MUKTĀPĪḌA, the youngest son of Pratāpāditya and Tārāpīḍa's successor, the Chronicler gives us a very detailed account, which, from several points of view, is of considerable historical interest. He appears in it as a very strong ruler, asserting his power far beyond Kaśmīr and the adjacent territories. Curiously enough no coins of Lalitāditya have yet come to light, but there is fortunately the evidence of foreign notices and of monumental remains which allows us to verify the most important of Kallhana's data.

We have seen that the Annals of the T'ang dynasty know Muktāpīḍa, under the name of Mu-to-pi, as the king of Kaśmīr who sent an embassy to the Chinese court during the reign of the Emperor Hsien-tsung¹⁴ (A.D. 713-755), and after the first Chinese expedition against Baltistan, which occurred some time between A.D. 736-747. As the exact date of the embassy is not given, we cannot ascertain accurately the correction needed in the dates assigned by Kallhana's chronology to the reign of Muktāpīḍa (699-736 A.D.). But the details recorded of the object of the embassy throw, as we shall see, an interesting light on the king's foreign relations as indicated in the Kaśmīr Chronicle.

Expedition against Yaśovarman.

Kallhana represents Lalitāditya as a great conqueror, whose reign was mostly passed in expeditions abroad. In the description of the latter we find a curious mixture of historical and legendary details. The king's first enterprise was directed against Yaśovarman, the ruler of Kanyakubja or Kanauj. This prince is said to have first made a peaceful submission, but to have subsequently incurred Lalitāditya's wrath by the pretension shown in the course of the treaty negotiations and to have lost his throne.¹⁵ Kalhaṇa's incidental mention of the well-known Bhavabluṭi and of Vākpatirāja among the poets of Yaśovarman's court is of interest, as we still possess a poem by the latter celebrating Yaśovarman's victory over a Gauda king.¹⁶ No information can be gathered from this work as to the dominion and time of Yaśovarman. But from notices discussed elsewhere it appears probable that Yaśovarman is identical with the king of central India, T'chi-son-mo, who in A.D. 731 sent an embassy to the Chinese court. It is also possible that we have to recognize in Yaśovarman that king of central India whom, according to the T'ang Annals, Muktāpīlā's ambassador claimed as his king's ally against the Tibetans. From the date indicated for the latter embassy it follows that in case this assumption is correct the war against Yaśovarman and his dethronement must have taken place after A.D. 736.¹⁷

⁷ See note iv. 8.⁸ iv. 42 sq.⁹ See note iv. 45.¹⁰ See the stories of the Tanner and the Sorceress, iv. 55 sqq., 82 sqq.¹¹ iv. 78-81¹² iv. 121.¹³ Compare note iv. 91.¹⁴ For detailed reference on the Chinese record, see note iv. 120.

86. The political conditions of north-western India during the eighth century are too obscure to permit us to guess the circumstances which would account for hostilities between the rulers of Kāśmīr and the distant territory of Kanauj. But it is evident from general considerations that Lalitāditya's attack upon Kanauj presupposes his having been in possession also of territories outside Kāśmīr, particularly to the south and south-east. It is significant that Kalhaṇa particularly mentions the territories of Jālandhara and Lohara, corresponding to the present Kangra and Poonā, as held by Lalitāditya's feudatories.¹⁸ In contrast to the extravagant conquests elsewhere ascribed to the king, the mention of these hill tracts, comparatively unimportant but near to Kāśmīr, bear a distinctly historical look.

Extent of Lalitāditya's power.

The same observation holds good of the incidental reference which Kalhaṇa makes to Śāhi princes who held court-offices under Lalitāditya. The title Śāhi is, as I have shown elsewhere, applied by Kalhaṇa to the family of Turkish origin which ruled in the Kābul Valley and Gandhāra down to the end of the ninth century.¹⁹ Branches of this family may be supposed to have held smaller tracts along the Indus Valley and eastwards,²⁰ and it is by no means improbable that some among them should have acknowledged the suzerainty of a powerful ruler in possession of Kāśmīr and the adjacent hill districts. We know that Arab invasion was threatening Kābul already from the commencement of the eighth century, and that simultaneously the Muhammadan power in Sindh was making efforts to advance northwards.²¹ While the Śāhi rule in Kābul and Gandhāra was exposed to these attacks, Lalitāditya may well have found an opportunity to extend his authority in the direction of the Indus.

These indications of Kalhaṇa's record, brief as they are, justify the assumption that Lalitāditya really asserted authority in one form or the other over the region of the lower hills to the north of the Panjāb. We have seen that a similar condition of things existed already a century earlier at the time of Hiuen Tsiang's

¹⁵ iv. 133-146.

¹⁶ Compare for detailed references regarding Yaśovarman, note iv. 134.

¹⁷ Compare MM. CHEVANNES and LÉVI, Journal asiat., 1896, p. 363.

¹⁸ See iv. 176 and note.

¹⁹ See note iv. 140-143 and references there given.

²⁰ See CUNNINGHAM, Later Indo-Scythians, pp. 57 sqq.

²¹ See REINAUD, Mémoire, pp. 191 sqq. ELLIOT, History, i pp. 444 sqq.

visit, when the hill territories from the Indus to the Ghuab, including the Salt Range, were in dependence on Kaśmīr.²² An extension of this dominion to the east towards the Yamunā is likely to have brought Lalitāditya into collision with the ruler of Kanauj.

Lalitāditya's
'digvijaya.'

87. After Yaśovarman's defeat Kalhana makes Lalitāditya start on a march of triumphal conquest round the whole of India, which is manifestly legendary.²³ The enumeration of the several stages of this wonderful march comprises the countries best known to Indian poetic lore along the coasts of the peninsula, from Bengal and Orissa in the east to Kathiawar and the 'Kāmbhojas' (Afghānistān) in the west. The absence of all historic details, as well as the strict geographical order of the countries named, shows that we have in this account merely a conventional elaboration of the popular belief which attributed to Lalitāditya the customary 'Digvijaya' of an Indian hero. It is only when the Kavi takes the king again northwards into the neighbourhood of his own land, that we are brought face to face with details which seem derived from historical facts.

Caṅkupa, the Tūkhāra.

Thus we find the mention of the Tūkhāras as a nation of the northern region which Lalitāditya defeated, curiously illustrated by the story subsequently told of the minister Caṅkupa.²⁴ The country of the Tūkhāras, from which Caṅkupa is said to have come to the Kaśmīr court, is undoubtedly the Tokharistan of the early Muhammadan authors comprising Badakhshān and the immediately adjoining tracts on the Upper Oxus. We know that this region was inhabited in the eighth century and already earlier by tribes of Turkish race, and accordingly we have every reason to assume that Lalitāditya's minister was a Turk by origin. The historical existence of Caṅkupa, the Tūkhāra, is proved by conclusive evidence. Kalhana attributes to him, besides a Skūpa, the foundation of two Vihāras, and one of these was seen already by the Chinese pilgrim Ou-k'ong, who visited Kaśmīr during the years 759-763 A.D.²⁵ Ou-k'ong's notice, which has been fully discussed by me elsewhere, makes it probable that the strungo-sounding name Caṅkupa was in reality a Chinese title (tsiang-kin, 'general'), which was borne by the Tūkhāra minister in his own land, and which in Kaśmīr was taken for his personal name.

Relation of Turks
to Kaśmīr.

Ou-k'ong in his itinerary indicates also other close relations between contemporary Kaśmīr and Turkish tribes by the references he makes to numerous Buddhist sacred places founded in Kaśmīr by the royal family of the 'Tou-kiue' or Turks.²⁶ It is impossible to indicate with certainty where this Turkish dynasty ruled. But in the present state of our knowledge we are tempted to think of Tokharistan and the valleys leading from there towards the Kabul Valley and the Upper Indus. In any case, it appears from the way in which Ou-k'ong refers to these structures and the names and titles of their Turkish founders, that they were then of comparatively recent date, and thus probably belonged to the period of Lalitāditya's reign.²⁷

Victory over Turks.

It appears that the memory of a particular victory, won by Lalitāditya over

²² See above, § 84.

²³ iv. 140 sqq.

²⁴ Regarding the term Tūkhāra, see note iv. 166.

²⁵ For Caṅkupa and Ou-k'ong's notice of his Vihāra, compare note iv. 211.

²⁶ See L'itinéraire d'Ou-k'ong, Journal asiat. 1895, pp. 354 sq., with note.

²⁷ The titles and names given for members of the royal family of the Tou-kiue show close resemblance to those recorded in the Chinese Annals and in the Orkhon inscriptions about the same period; see loc. cit., pp. 388 sqq.

Turkish foes, lived long in the popular tradition of Kāśmīr. Albērūnī records that the Kāśmīrians of his time celebrated annually on a certain day a festival in commemoration of a victory which Muttai, King of Kāśmīr, was alleged to have won over the Turks. They credited this king with having "ruled over the whole world."²⁸ It is highly probable that Professor BÜHLER was right when he recognized in the Muttai of Albērūnī's text an Apubhrunśa form of Mukṭāpīḍa's name (Muttapir*) misspelt in the Arabic characters. The assertion of the king's universal sovereignty is justly criticized by Albērūnī as unhistorical; but it is, nevertheless, of interest because it agrees closely with the picture presented to us of Lalitāditya's reign in Kalhana's Chronicle.

Muumuni, whose subjection is mentioned after that of the Tukhāras, may possibly, as I have shown elsewhere, have been the chief of a Turkish tribe on the Upper Indus, named here by his title or family designation.²⁹

88. Of the Bhaṭṭas or Tibetans, who figure next in the list of Lalitāditya's conquests, we are able to show that their mention rests on historical fact. From the notice of the Tang Annals, to which reference has already been made, we learn that the ambassador U-li-to, whom Mu-to-pi, or Mukṭāpīḍa, had sent to the imperial court, distinctly claimed for his master repeated victories over the Tibetans.³⁰ In alliance with the king of central India (Yaśovarman?) he is said to have blocked all the five great routes leading into their country. The auxiliary Chinese force of two hundred thousand men which the Kāśmīr king invited to his country and for which he proposed to establish a camp on the shores of the Mahāpadma or Volur lake, was evidently asked for with a view to further operations against that common foe. For Mukṭāpīḍa's ambassador supported the proposal by a reference to the previous expedition, which the Chinese had sent to the neighbouring country of Po-liu or Baltistān between A.D. 736-747, and which we know to have had for its object the expulsion of the Tibetans from that territory. There is evidence to show that the Tibetans of that period had established a powerful empire, capable of aggression westwards.³¹ That Mukṭāpīḍa should have endeavoured to secure against this danger the help of a Chinese alliance was natural enough, seeing that the Tibetan expansion threatened equally the Chinese territories northwards.

Lalitāditya's war against Bhaṭṭas.

The imperial court contented itself with directing the sumptuous treatment of the Kāśmīr envoy without acceding to his master's request. As there is nothing to show that Kāśmīr was either in Lalitāditya's time or subsequently subject to a Bhaṭṭa invasion, we must assume that Lalitāditya's successes in this direction, the reports of which we find preserved both by Kalhana and the Chinese Annals, were real and lasting. The Dards, too, who are next mentioned in the description of the king's march of triumph northwards,³² are likely enough to have come within the range of Lalitāditya's expeditions. The Dard tribes have from very early times to the present day inhabited the mountain territories immediately adjoining Kāśmīr to the north and north-west.³³ The safety of the Valley has also in

Relations with Dards.

²⁸ See note i. 126. Is it possible that the tradition reproduced by Albērūnī was somehow connected with the great festival which Kalhana, iv. 242 sq., mentions as having been established by Lalitāditya at Parihāsepnra, and which was still kept up in his own time?

²⁹ See notes iv. 167 and iii. 332.

³⁰ Compare RÉMUSAT, Nouveaux Mélanges asiat., i. pp. 196 sqq.

³¹ See MM. CHAVANNEZ and LÉVI's references, Journal asiat., 1895, p. 382.

³² iv. 169.

³³ Compare note i. 312.

later times more than once necessitated expeditions against these troublesome neighbours.

The regions to which the Chronicler makes Lalitāditya extend his route of conquest, after vanquishing the Bhaṭṭas and Darads, are purely mythological. The mention here made of the Uttarakurus, the Hyperborean paradise of the Indian Epics; of the 'land of the Amazons' (strirājya), etc., only shows to what extent folk-tales and poetical fancy have permeated Kāśmīrian traditions concerning the foreign achievements of Lalitāditya's reign.³¹ buildings.

Lalitāditya's

89. After relating the king's expeditions abroad, Kālhana proceeds to a detailed account of the numerous buildings and foundations which attested the extent of his resources and his magnificence in Kāśmīr itself.³² It is no longer possible to trace with certainty the sites and remains of all the towns and structures which owed their existence to Lalitāditya. But those among them which can be identified justify by their extant ruins the great fame which Lalitāditya enjoyed as a builder. The ruins of the splendid temple of Mārtaṇḍa, which the king had constructed near the Tirtha of the same name, are still the most striking object of ancient Hindu architecture in the Valley.³³ Even in their present state of decay they command admiration both by their imposing dimensions and by the beauty of their architectural design and decoration. An even more impressive proof of the grand scale on which Lalitāditya's building operations were conducted, is afforded by the remains marking the site of the town of Parīhāsapura. Kālhana describes at length the series of great temples built by the king at this town, which he had founded as his residence. The extensive though much-injured ruins with which I was able to identify those structures at the site of Parīhāsapura, the present Parāspūr, show sufficiently that Kālhana's account of their magnificence was not exaggerated.³⁷

Buddhism under
Lalitāditya.

Kālhana's detailed list of the numerous shrines and sacred images erected during Lalitāditya's reign, is of interest also because it throws light on the religious condition of Kāśmīr at that period. We know that the Chinese pilgrim, Hsüan-tsang, whose visit to Kāśmīr (A.D. 759-763) fell probably only a few years after Lalitāditya's death, found the Buddhist cult there in a very flourishing condition, and the number of Stūpas and Vihāras considerable.³⁴ It fully accords with this contemporary evidence that Kālhana, too, records the construction of Vihāras and Stūpas among Lalitāditya's pious acts and by the side of the numerous Viṣṇu shrines erected by him. Among these Buddhist gifts of the king there was a great Vihāra at Parīhāsapura, with a colossal Buddha image which still existed in Kālhana's time, and another Vihāra at Huṣkapura, which probably served as Hsüan-tsang's first resting-place in the Valley.³⁵ We hear also of other Buddhist endowments made by members of Lalitāditya's court.³⁶

Lalitāditya in popular legend.

It can scarcely surprise us that a king whose historical achievements were so considerable should have become surrounded in Kāśmīr tradition by a halo of ³¹ See iv. 171-175 and note.

³² The description of the various shrines, etc., attributed to Lalitāditya and his court, occupies verses iv. 181-216.

³³ For detailed references regarding this well-known edifice, see note iv. 192.

³⁷ For the identification of Parīhāsapura and a detailed analysis of Kālhana's data regarding its buildings, compare below Note I, iv. 194-204; also Memoir, § 121.

³⁴ See L'Indraire d'On-k'ong, Journal asiat., 1895, pp. 350 sqq.

³⁵ Regarding the Rājavihāra at Parīhāsapura, compare Note I (iv. 194-204), § 8; for the Vihāra at Huṣkapura, see note iv. 188.

³⁶ iv. 210, 211, 216, 259 sqq.

popular legends. Kalhana reproduces several of these, all intended to illustrate the supernatural powers of the king.¹¹ The legend of the miracle worked for the king by his Turkish minister, Chavikha, is of interest because it was connected with a Buddha image still extant in Kalhana's days, which Lalitāditya was supposed to have brought from Magadha.¹²

Another which relates the king's expedition into the 'sand-ocean' and his escape from its dangers through the miraculous production of water, is instructive as showing clearly how earlier folk-tales were transferred to this hero of Kāśmīrian tradition.¹³ The story, which is closely akin to that of Zopyrus, is told in almost identical details by Al-Bīrūnī of Kanik, i.e. Kaṇiśka. That Kalhana's version places the 'sand-ocean' in the 'northern region' is a point which deserves to be noted as betokening a distant knowledge of the great deserts of Central Asia (Taklamakān?)¹⁴ Less legendary are the reports, possibly taken from local tradition, of Lalitāditya's attempt to burn Pravarapura, the older capital, and of the destruction of the Rāmasvāmin image at Parihāsapūra by a party of Gaudas.¹⁵

What Kalhana has to tell us of the end of Lalitāditya bears the same legendary colouring as the rest of his account of the king's reign. Several traditions seem to have been current as to the manner of the king's death, but they all agreed in connecting it with an expedition to a distant northern region.¹⁶ According to one version Lalitāditya perished "through excessive snow in a country called Āryānaka," which cannot be located exactly. Another version made him end his life by suicide in order to escape being captured when separated from his army, and blocked on a difficult mountain route. Others again were satisfied with letting the king and his army retire to the region of the immortals, in the farthest north. From these varying accounts we may conclude that Lalitāditya ended his days on some unsuccessful expedition to the north. But the details of the event had become obscured at an early date. Kalhana makes Lalitāditya, before his disappearance from the scene, foretell in a kind of political testament the events of the immediately succeeding reigns.¹⁷ The maxims of policy which the king is supposed to have set forth on this occasion for the guidance of his successors, are curious as illustrating the principles of political wisdom which influenced Kāśmīr administration in Kalhana's own time—and for long after.

90. Lalitāditya's rule seems to have been followed by a succession of short and weak reigns. KUVALAYĀRĪPA, the elder son of Lalitāditya, is said to have abandoned the throne after one year, and after a life of pious resignation abroad to have attained supernatural perfection (siddhi).¹⁸ VAJRĀDITYA, or BAPPYAKA, the younger son of Lalitāditya from another queen, is described as a cruel and sensuous prince, who succumbed to his excesses after a rule of seven years.¹⁹ He was followed in succession by his sons, PṚTHIVYĀRĪPA and SAṆGRĀMĀRĪPA I.; the first is said to have ruled for four years and one month, and the second only for seven days.²⁰

After these short-lived rulers, none of whom is attested by coins or other independent evidence, the Chronicle presents us once more with the account of a long and powerful reign, that of JAYĀRĪPA, Vajrāditya's youngest son. This king

End of Lalitāditya.

KUVALAYĀRĪPA.

VAJRĀDITYA-BAPPYAKA.

PṚTHIVYĀRĪPA;
SAṆGRĀMĀRĪPA I.

JAYĀRĪPA.

¹¹ iv. 219-309.

¹² iv. 246 sqq.

¹³ Compare note iv. 277.

¹⁴ See iv. 306.

¹⁵ Compare iv. 310 sqq., and iv. 322 sqq.

¹⁶ iv. 367 sqq.

¹⁷ iv. 344 sqq.

¹⁸ iv. 373 sqq.

¹⁹ iv. 393 sqq.

²⁰ iv. 399 sq.

appears in the long and detailed narrative which Kalhana devotes to his reign (iv. 402-658), almost as great a hero of popular legend as his grandfather Lalitāditya. The tales related of him bear so fantastic a colouring that we might be tempted to class Jayāpīḍa with semi-mythic kings like Meghavāhan or Ranāditya, were it not that we possess in his coins an unquestionable proof of his historical existence. Vinayāditya was, according to the Chronicle, another name of the king, and this name we read clearly on mixed-metal coins of the Kārkoṭa type which are still found plentifully in Kāśmīr and the immediately adjacent territories to the south.⁵¹

Early adventures of Jayāpīḍa.

What Kalhana relates of the early part of Jayapīḍa's reign is briefly the following. Soon after his accession the king, stimulated by the ambition of rivalling his grandfather's fame, set out "for the conquest of the world."⁵² Eighty thousand hitters are supposed to have been counted with his army as it passed through the frontier watch-station of Kāśmīr. After the king's departure, Jajja, his brother-in-law, usurped the Kāśmīr throne. Though gradually deserted by his troops, Jayāpīḍa moved down to the Ganges, still rich enough to make a gift of a lakh less one horses (1) to the Brahmins of Prayaga. There he left the remainder of his followers, and set out in disguise on a tour of adventurous travel. While at Paṇḍravarḍhana, the capital of a district of Bengal, he attracted by a deed of great prowess the attention of its king, Jayanta. His disguise being discovered, he was given by the king the hand of his daughter Kalyāṇadevi. Jayāpīḍa defeated the kings of Chūḍa, the over-lords of his father-in-law, and then turned back towards Kāśmīr. Joined by the troops he had left behind, under his faithful minister, Dovaśarman, he defeated on his route the king of Kanauj and entered Kāśmīr. In a fierce contest near S'ṅskaletra, in the Kāśmīr Valley, Jajja was vanquished and slain, after having for three years held possession of the land.⁵³

Usurpation of Jajja.

It is impossible in the absence of other records to ascertain the exact elements of historic truth underlying Kalhana's romantic story. But the general tenour of the latter seems to indicate that Jayāpīḍa had, during the early part of his reign, while engaged in some foreign expedition, temporarily lost his throne to a usurper. The king's wanderings during his exile seem to have taken him to Bengal, and to have subsequently been embellished by popular imagination.

Historical data of Jayāpīḍa's reign.

Of Jayāpīḍa's subsequent reign which, according to Kalhana's calculation, would have to be placed in the years A.D. 751-782, but which in all probability fell much closer to the end of the eighth century,⁵⁴ few authentic details seem to have been recorded. Manifestly genuine and, for literary history important, are the data which Kalhana gives us regarding the various scholars and poets, like Kṣīra, Bhaṭṭa Udbhaṭa, etc., who flourished at Jayāpīḍa's court.⁵⁵ Several of them are known to us from their works and from other references. Of topographical interest is the account we receive of the foundation of Jayapura, marked by the present Anṛkoṭh, which Jayāpīḍa built as his capital in marshy ground towards the Volur, and which has caused his name to be remembered in local tradition down to the present day.⁵⁶ But even this account of an undoubted ⁵¹ iv. 517, and note iv. 402.

⁵² iv. 403 sqq.

⁵³ iv. 473-480.

⁵⁴ See below, § 91, for the correction needed in the dates of the later Kārkoṭa rulers.

⁵⁵ iv. 486-498.

⁵⁶ For detailed notes on Jayapura, see note iv. 508-511.

historical act of the king is interwoven with mythical details, showing that Kalhana must have taken it directly or indirectly from popular tradition and not from contemporary records.⁵⁷

Subsequently Jayāpīḍa is supposed to have set out once more for "the conquest of the world."⁵⁸ But what we are told of this enterprise resolves itself into mere legendary anecdotes regarding the king's marvellous escapes from enemies into whose hands he had fallen.⁵⁹ Neither Bhimasena, "king of the eastern region," nor Aramuḍi, the ruler of Nepāl, who figure as Jayāpīḍa's adversaries and captors in these stories, can be traced as historical persons, while the accounts of the ruses by which the king is believed to have regained freedom, look as if borrowed from earlier folk-lore. In keeping with these tales is the reference to Jayāpīḍa's conquest of the 'land of the Amazons' (strī-rājya).⁶⁰ The legend of the Nāga of the Mahāpadma or Volur lake which Kalhana next relates, is curious as a piece of folk-lore. It is probably of local origin, as the mine of copper which the Nāga was believed to have shown to the king who had saved him from desiccation at the hands of a sorcerer, was still pointed out in Kramarājya (Kamrūz) in the days of Jonarāja.⁶⁰

Jayāpīḍa's
expeditions.

Jayāpīḍa, towards the close of his reign, is said to have become a prey to avarice and to have oppressed the land by his fiscal exactions.⁶¹ These seem to have fallen heavily on the Brahman community in particular, and some satirical verses which Kalhana quotes as illustrating the changed sentiments of the latter towards the king, may well be genuine productions of the period.⁶² Ultimately, after numerous Brahmans had sought death by voluntary starvation (māyopaveśa), Jayāpīḍa is supposed to have fallen a victim to divine vengeance. Kalhana describes with a good deal of dramatic force the final scene when the curse of the exasperated Brahmans at the Tirtha of Tūlamūlya brought on the accident which ended the king's life.⁶³ Whatever the real facts of Jayāpīḍa's death may have been, it seems probable that Kalhana's version had some support in contemporary popular opinion.

Jayāpīḍa's end.

91. LALITĀPĪḌA, Jayāpīḍa's son and successor, is described as an indolent and profligate prince, who squandered during a twelve years' rule the riches amassed by his father.⁶⁴ Neither of him nor of any other of the later Kārkotās do we possess any coins. He was succeeded by his half-brother SAMGRĀMĀPĪḌA II., or Prthivyāpīḍa, of whom only the length of reign, seven years, is recorded.⁶⁵

LALITĀPĪḌA.

SAMGRĀMĀPĪḌA II.

CIPPATĀJAYĀPĪḌA, also called BRIHASPATI, who was next raised to the throne, was the son of Lalitāpīḍa and Jayādevī, a concubine of low origin. As the king was a mere child, the royal power fell wholly into the hands of his maternal uncles, Padma, Utpala, Kalyāṇa, Maṇma, and Dharmā. After a nominal rule of twelve years, Cippatājayāpīḍa was destroyed by his uncles, according to Kalhana, A.D. 813/4.⁶⁶

CIPPATĀJAYĀPĪḌA.

We are indirectly able to check this date, which is the first given by the Chronicler in the Laukika era, by means of the colophon which the Kāśmīrian

Date of Cippatājayāpīḍa

⁵⁷ Compare the tale of the five demons sent by Vibhiṣaṇa, the mythic king of Laṅkā, etc., iv. 503 sqq.

⁵⁸ See iv. 519-586.

⁵⁹ iv. 587 sq.

⁶⁰ See iv. 592 sqq.; Jonar. (Ho. ed.), 1167.

⁶¹ iv. 620 sqq.

⁶² iv. 635-637.

⁶³ iv. 640 sqq.

⁶⁴ iv. 660 sqq.

⁶⁵ iv. 674 sq.

⁶⁶ iv. 687, 703.

poet Rājānaka Ratnākara has attached to his Kavya, the Haravijaya.⁶⁷ Ratnākara there states that he wrote this poem under the patronage of "the young Bhṛhaspati." As Ratnākara is distinctly mentioned by Kallhaṇa among the poets who obtained fame in the reign of Avantivarman (A.D. 855-883), it is clear that the king meant in the colophon of the Haravijaya is the Cippatavijayapada or Bhṛhaspati of the Chronicle. Professor Bühler, who first drew attention to the chronological value of this notice, was undoubtedly right in pointing out that it implied a correction in the date of Bhṛhaspati. For Ratnākara "could not have flourished under Bhṛhaspati and under Avantivarman, if the former had reigned A.D. 801-2-813/4," i.e. fully half a century before Avantivarman. The difficulty disappears if we apply to the date of Bhṛhaspati, as assumed in the Chronicle, the same correction of twenty-five years, which we have already found indicated for Candrāpīḍa's reign by the statement of the Chinese Annals, thus placing Bhṛhaspati's nominal reign about the years A.D. 826-838.⁶⁸

ANANTARĪPA.

It appears to me that Kallhaṇa himself confirms the conclusion just drawn as to the later date of Bhṛhaspati, by the remarkably long reign he assigns to the latter's successor. ANANTARĪPA, a grandson of king Vajraditya Bhappiyaka, whom Utpala put on the throne by armed force after Bhṛhaspati's death, is stated to have remained nominal ruler up to A.D. 850/1, during which time all power was wielded in common by the nuclei of Bhṛhaspati.⁶⁹ The long reign of thirty-seven years thus ascribed to the puppet-king, appears in itself remarkable, considering that Kallhaṇa distinctly refers in the discord and mutual jealousy of the two rulers, Padma and his brothers. Its long duration seems still more strange in view of the account we receive regarding the close of Ajitāpīḍa's reign. The hostility between the regents led to a fierce battle between Maṇḍana and Utpala, which ended with the victory of the former and the overthrow of Ajitāpīḍa.⁷⁰ Considering the comparative shortness of the average Indian generation we can scarcely bring ourselves to believe that the brothers of humble origin, who at the commencement of Bhṛhaspati's reign, i.e. according to Kallhaṇa, A.D. 801/2, were already strong enough to usurp the regal powers, should have been alive to fight a hard-contested battle fully half a century later. It seems far more probable that the reign of Bhṛhaspati fell in reality much nearer to the middle of the ninth century which witnessed the events leading to the extinction of the Kārkotā dynasty and its replacement by Utpala's family.

ANANTARĪPA.

UTPALARĪPA.

Kallhaṇa illustrates the power and wealth attained by Utpala and his brothers during this period, by the enumeration of the splendid foundations they made. Among these we can still trace the towns built by Padma and Utpala.⁷¹ When the rivalry of the brothers had led to the battle already mentioned, Maṇḍana and his victorious faction replaced Ajitāpīḍa by a fresh puppet-king in the person of ANANTARĪPA, a son of Saṅgrāmāpīḍa II.⁷² When three years later Utpala died, his energetic son Sukhavarman raised a successful rebellion, and placed his own nominee UTPALARĪPA, a son of Ajitāpīḍa, on the throne.⁷³

Sukhavarman was on the point of openly assuming himself the royal dignity when two years later (A.D. 855/6) he was killed by a treacherous relative. The ⁶⁷ See BÜHLER, Report, pp. 42 sq.

⁶⁸ See above, §§ 65, 66; Report, p. 43 note.

⁶⁹ iv. 703.

⁷⁰ iv. 704 sqq.

⁷¹ See note iv. 496

⁷² iv. 707.

⁷³ iv. 709.

throne, however, was secured for his family; for at this juncture the influential minister Sūra deposed Utpalāpīḍa, and had Sukhavarman's able son Avantivarman crowned as king.⁷¹

SECTION IV.—THE KINGS OF BOOKS V. AND VI.

92. With the accession of AVANTIVARMAN (A.D. 855/6-883), we reach that period of Kaśmir history for which Kalhaṇa's work presents us with a truly historical record. The use of contemporary accounts from the commencement of the Fifth Book onwards becomes evident, not only from the generally sober and matter-of-fact character of the narrative, but also from the details henceforth furnished regarding many petty events, the memory of which could not have maintained itself in popular tradition, and from the use of exact dates. The fact can scarcely be accidental that Avantivarman, the first king, the date of whose death is shown by Kalhaṇa with year, month, and day, stands at the head of a new dynastic list. It seems to indicate that records based on contemporary annals were contained among Kalhaṇa's sources only from the commencement of the Utpala dynasty onwards.

AVANTIVARMAN
(A.D. 855/6-883).

Avantivarman's reign appears to have brought a period of consolidation for the country which must have greatly suffered, economically as well as politically, from the internal troubles during the preceding reigns. We receive indeed no information as to Avantivarman having reasserted Kaśmirian power abroad. On the contrary, we must conclude from the subsequent statements regarding the expeditions of Saṅkaravarman that even the immediately adjoining hill-tracts, which like Dāvābhisāra had thrown off the Kaśmir suzerainty during those weak reigns, remained independent also in the time of Avantivarman.¹ But, on the other hand, we have ample proof of the internal recovery of the country. It is plainly indicated by the large number of temples and endowments, the foundation of which by the pious king and his court Kalhaṇa records in great detail.² Foremost among these foundations were the town of Avantipurā, the present Vānt'pūr, still preserving the king's name, and the great temples he built there.³ Their ruins, though not equal in size to Lalitāditya's structures, yet rank among the most imposing monuments of ancient Kaśmir architecture, and sufficiently attest the resources of their builder.

Period of internal consolidation.

The minister Sūra, to whom Avantivarman owed his crown, and who during the whole reign seems to have retained a position of exceptional influence, vied with the king in piety and great foundations. His name is preserved to the present day by Hūr'pūr, the ancient S'ūrapurā, and once a place of considerable importance.⁴ The anecdote which Kalhaṇa relates of Sūra's draconic judgment, at the Tirtha of Bhūteśvara, in the district of Lahara, is evidently based on a real incident and possesses historical interest.⁵ It fully illustrates the powerful position

The minister Sūra.

⁷¹ iv. 716.

¹ Compare iv. 712, and below, §§ 94, 95.

² v. 23-31, 37-46.

³ For a detailed account, see note v. 44-45.

⁴ Compare for Sūra's foundations, notes v. 37-40.

⁵ See v. 43-61, and for the accurately indicated locality, note v. 55-59.

of the minister, and introduces to us for the first time a representative of that turbulent class of Dinnāras or fendal landlords which played so important a part in the troubles of Kulluṇa's own time.

Fully in keeping with the conditions which Kulluṇa's narrative indicates for the peaceful and just reign of Avantivarman, are the references to the liberal patronage which scholars and poets enjoyed at his court.⁶ Among those who are particularly mentioned, we find the Kavis Ratnākara and Anandavaridhana. Their extant works occupy a prominent position in the Sanskrit literature of old Kāśmīr.

Regulation of Vitastā.

93. We have an interesting proof of the material benefits attending Avantivarman's strong and peaceful rule in the very full account Kulluṇa gives us of the great engineering operations which were carried out during his reign for the drainage of the Valley and its irrigation.⁷ The topographically interesting details of these operations which are connected with the name of Avantivarman's skilful engineer, Suṇya, have been fully explained elsewhere.⁸ Here it will suffice to point out the main results achieved by them. The systematic regulation of the course of the Vitastā, down to the rock-bound gorge where it leaves the Valley, largely reduced the extent of the water-locked tracts along the banks of the river and the damage to the crops caused by floods. The construction of new beds for the river at points threatened by inundation-breaches was among the measures designed to effect the same object. The change thus made in the confluence of the Vitastā and its most important tributary, the Sindhu, can still be clearly traced, thanks to Kulluṇa's accurate topographical data.⁹ It shows alike the large scale and the systematic technical basis of Suṇya's regulation. The result of the latter was a great increase of land available for cultivation, and increased protection against disastrous floods which in Kāśmīr have ever been the main causes of famine.

According to the account of the Chronicler, Suṇya supplemented these measures by equally important improvements in the system of irrigation which is indispensable for the cultivation of rice, the staple produce of Kāśmīr.¹⁰ The facilities thus secured for cultivation produced a remarkable reduction in the price of rice, the cost of a Khāri being alleged to have fallen from 200 Dinnāras to 30 Dinnāras in consequence.¹¹

It is only natural that the story of this great change in the material condition of the country which so closely affected the welfare of its inhabitants, should have exercised popular imagination, already at the time and still more thereafter. We accordingly find the account of Suṇya's origin and his initial proceedings embellished with details which are manifestly legendary.¹² But though the anecdotes in which we are thus treated, can have no foundation in historical fact, yet they are just such as would readily be accepted by contemporary popular tradition. Suṇya's memory is preserved to this day by the town of Suṇyapura, the present Sūpū which was founded by him at the point where the Vitastā since his regulation leaves the basin of the Volar Lake.¹³

S'ANKARAVARMAN
(A.D. 883-902).

94. Avantivarman died as a devout Vaiṣṇava, at the Tīrth of Tripures which he had sought in his fatal disease.¹⁴ His son and successor S'ankaravarman

⁶ v. 32-36, 66.

⁷ v. 68-121.

⁸ See Memoir, §§ 69-71.

⁹ See Note I, v. 97-100, for a detailed exposition of these data.

¹⁰ See v. 109-112 and note.

¹¹ v. 116-117, and Note II (iv. 495), § 30, for the probable value of the prices indicated.

¹² Compare v. 73 sqq. for Suṇya's supposed mysterious birth; v. 84-89 for the means employed to clear the gorge at Yakṣaḍara.

¹³ v. 118.

¹⁴ v. 123 sqq.

(A.D. 883-902) had at first to contend for the throne with his cousin Sukhavarman, who had been set up as Yuvarāja, as well as with other rivals. When the civil war was successfully ended, Śaṅkaravarman, according to the Chronicler, started on a round of foreign expeditions. Kālhana, with poetic magniloquence, describes these as "reviving the tradition of the conquest of the world," such as he attributes to earlier Kāśmīr heroes. "Though the country had through the action of time become reduced in population and wealth," Śaṅkaravarman is still supposed to have led forth nine lakhs of foot-soldiers from the 'Gate' of Kāśmīr.¹⁵ But Kālhana's subsequent references to the territories invaded show plainly that the king's warlike operations were in reality restricted to the comparatively narrow limits of the sub-montane regions which adjoin Kāśmīr on the south.

From the mention of Dārvābhisāra as the first conquered territory, we must conclude that Śaṅkaravarman's initial efforts were directed towards the recovery of the hill-tract which stretches from the Pir Pātāl range towards the plains of the Panjāb, and which had been lost to Kāśmīr during the rule of the later Kīrkoṭas.¹⁶ At the advance of Śaṅkaravarman's host, Pṛthivīcandra, ruler of Trigarta, the present Kangra, is said to have approached the king in order to offer homage, but to have subsequently fled in terror.¹⁷ Kālhana's words do not indicate an actual conquest of his territory. Considering that Śaṅkaravarman's subsequent route lies towards the Indus, it does not seem probable that any material success was achieved by him in the hills east of the Rāvi. Pṛthivīcandra's name is not found in the genealogical list of the Katōch Rājās who have ruled Kangra from an early period. But its formation, with the ending -candra, agrees with the traditional naming of members of that family.

Sub-montane
expedition.

The main force of Śaṅkaravarman's attack appears to have spent itself in a victory over Alakhāna, the ruler of Gurjara. This territory, the name of which is preserved in that of the modern town of Gujrat, comprised, as I have shown elsewhere, the upper portion of the flat Doāb between the Jehlam and Chināb rivers south of Dārvābhisāra, and probably also a part of the Panjāb plain further east.¹⁸ Alakhāna is said to have saved his kingdom by ceding to Śaṅkaravarman the Takka-land, by which designation a tract adjoining the lower hills east of the Chināb is probably meant.¹⁹ Where 'the superior king' Bhoja is to be located, whose power Śaṅkaravarman is next supposed to have curbed, remains doubtful. His identity with the king Bhoja whose rule over Kanauj is indicated by inscriptions ranging between A.D. 862-883, has been frequently assumed, but cannot be proved.²⁰

We have more light as regards "the illustrious Lalliya Śāhi," whom Kālhana mentions as the support of Alakhāna. According to the description of the Chronicle, he held his own between the Darads and Turuskas as if placed between lion and boar. His glory outshone that of all kings in the north, and his capital Udabhāṇḍa was a safe place of refuge for neighbouring princes. I have shown that we must recognize in this powerful ruler the founder of the 'Hindu Śāhiya' dynasty, which we know from Al-Bīrūnī's account to have succeeded about this time in the rule of the Kabul Valley and Gandhāra to the 'Turkish Śāhiyas' of Kābul.²¹ The last scion

Lalliya Śāhi of Udabhāṇḍa.

¹⁵ v. 137.

¹⁶ See v. 141 note; iv. 712.

¹⁷ v. 143-147.

¹⁸ See note v. 143-144.

¹⁹ See note v. 150.

²⁰ For a detailed discussion, compare v. 151.

²¹ The data bearing on this identification and the history of the Śāhis of Udabhāṇḍa will be found fully discussed in Note J, v. 152-155. For an earlier account, see my paper in Festgruss an R. von Roth, pp. 198 sqq.

of this ancient dynasty was, according to the Indica, deposed by his Brahman Wazir Kallar, who had attained great power and influence, and who ultimately secured the crown for himself and his descendants. Albērunn names Kamalū as the ruler next but one after "Kallar," and this prince is undoubtedly identical with the Sāhi Kamaluka whom Kalhana subsequently mentions as the son of Lalliya (v. 239). This close agreement makes it evident that Albērunn's "Kallar" is nothing but a misreading, easily explained in Arabic characters, for the correct Lalliyā of the Chronicle. In the same way I have proved that the "town of Uḍabhānda," which Kalhana names as Lalliyā's residence, is identical with Hāihund (now Uṇḍ), on the Indus, the historical capital of Gandhāra during the centuries preceding the Muhammadan conquest.

Kalhana refers to Śaṅkaravarman's desire "to remove Lalliyā from his sovereign position," but expresses himself with so much caution regarding the result as to exclude the assumption of any material success of the Kuśmīr arms in this direction. That the limits of Kuśmīr power towards the Indus were not extended by Śaṅkaravarman's expedition, is proved even more conclusively by what we read of the position of the Kuśmīr frontier-line in the Jhelum Valley at the time of the king's death (see below).

Administration under Śaṅkaravarman.

95. Śaṅkaravarman's internal rule appears to have been characterized by excessive fiscal exactions and consequent oppression. The detailed account we receive in the Chronicle of the measures by which the king endeavoured to raise the state revenues, possesses considerable historical interest.²¹ It proves that the elaborate system of taxation which was maintained in Kuśmīr until quite recently, had been fully developed already in Hindu times. Certain new imposts which the king introduced and the collection of which was assigned to special revenue offices, seem to have weighed particularly heavy on temple-endowments and priestly corporations.²² Equally oppressive for the cultivators were the excessive demands made for forced labour. Śaṅkaravarman seems to have organized them on a systematic basis and to have employed them also as a means for fiscal extortion. Used chiefly for transport purposes (rāḍhabhārodhī), this system of "Bēgār" has remained a characteristic feature of Kuśmīr administration up to modern days.²³ Kalhana describes with much bitterness the baneful effects of this régime which favoured only the rapacious tribe of officials (bāyastha) and left men of learning unprovided with emoluments.²⁴ The stress laid upon the latter grievance may, perhaps, be taken as an indication of the source from which the Chronicler had gathered his statements.

Kalhana follows up his censures of Śaṅkaravarman's short-sighted policy by an ironical reference to the fate which has overtaken his only foundation. Śaṅkarapura, the town that was to have borne his name, never rose to significance, though Parihāsapura had been plundered to supply materials, and ultimately, came to be known only by the designation of 'Pattana' (town), the modern Patan.²⁵ towards Indus.

Expedition

Śaṅkaravarman's life and reign found a violent end. In order to avenge the death of his 'Lord of the Marches' (dvārapati), who had fallen in a frontier-affray, he had marched down the Valley of the Vitastā, and subsequently undertaken an expedition to the hill tracts on the banks of the Indus.²⁷ On his march through ²¹ See v. 165-181; also notes v. 167, 170, 171.

²² v. 167-171.

²³ See v. 172-174 with note.

²⁴ v. 177 sqq., 201 sqq.

²⁵ v. 156-162, 213.

²⁷ v. 214 sqq.

Urasā, the present Hazāra district, a conflict arose with the inhabitants in which the king was mortally wounded. The death of the king, which took place on the retreat to Kāśmīr, was kept secret by Queen Sugandhā and the ministers through a stratagem until the troops had in safety reached the frontier of Kāśmīr at Bolyāsaka. This locality is identical with the present Būliāsa on the right bank of the Vitastā, only four marches below Bāramūla.²⁸ This distinct indication of the frontier-line shows us how little the political authority of Kāśmīr had advanced westwards beyond the natural limits of the Valley proper.

The copper coins of Śaṅkaravarman are common enough. From him onwards we find Kalhaṇa's list of kings illustrated by the evidence of an unbroken series of coins.

96. Śaṅkaravarman was succeeded by his son GOPĀLAVARMAN, who, being still a child, was during his short reign (A.D. 902-904) under the guardianship of his mother Sugandhā.²⁹ The minister Prabhākaradeva, who was the widow-queen's paramour, exercised the greatest influence in the state. Kalhaṇa records of him that on a victorious expedition which he led against the seat of the Śāhi power, at the town of Uḍabhāṇḍa, he "bestowed the kingdom of the rebellious Śāhi upon Toramāṇa, Lalliya's son, and gave him the [new] name Kamaluka."³⁰ This reference, brief and incomplete, is yet of historical value. For the Toramāṇa-Kamaluka of the Chronicle is, as already stated, clearly the same ruler as the Kamalū of Albēruni's list of Hindu Shāhiyās. He can also safely be identified with Kamalū, 'Rai of Hindustān,' who figures in a story of the Jāmi'u-l-Ilkayāt as the contemporary of 'Amīn bin Luīq, Governor of Khorāsān (A.D. 878-901). Kalhaṇa does not give us the name of the "rebellious Śāhi" in whose defeat Kamaluka appears to have been aided by a Kāśmīrian auxiliary force. If the conjectural opinion I have expressed elsewhere is correct, we should have to recognize in this nameless Śāhi the Sāmānta (Sāmānta) who appears in Albēruni's list between "Kallar," i.e. Lalliya and Kamalū.³¹

GOPĀLAVARMAN
(A.D. 902-904).

After a nominal reign of two years, Gopālavarman was destroyed by the ambitious and unscrupulous minister, as Kalhaṇa alleges, through magic. SAMKATA, a supposititious son of Śaṅkaravarman, was then put on the throne, but died after ten days.³² SUGANDHĀ then assumed, herself, the royal power (A.D. 904), first with the intention of securing the crown for a posthumous son of Gopālavarman. This child died soon after its birth, and the rule of the land became difficult owing to the growing turbulence of the Tantrins, a military caste of uncertain origin, who during this and the succeeding weak reigns assumed the position of true Prætorians.³³ The queen endeavoured to place on the throne Nirjitavarman, nicknamed Paṅgu, 'the Lame,' who was descended from Śūravarman, the half-brother of Avantivarman. But the Tantrins overruled the queen's council, and by open rebellion obtained the crown for PĀRTHA, the child-son of Nirjitavarman (A.D. 906).³⁴

SUGANDHĀ
(A.D. 904-906).

²⁸ See note v. 225; also Memoir, § 53. Virāṇaka, the place where Śaṅkaravarman's Dvārāpatī had been killed, lay just opposite to Bolyāsaka; compare note v. 214.

²⁹ v. 228 sqq.

³⁰ See v. 232-233 and my note.

³¹ See Note J, v. 152-155, § 2; Festgruss, p. 204. Is it possible that Kalhaṇa's silence as to the name of the "rebellious Śāhi" is caused by some misapprehension on his part or on that of his authority, as to the import of the name Sāmānta? The word is very common in the meaning of "feudatory," but not known as a proper name except in the Shāhiya dynasty. Coins of the latter, very frequent in the Western Panjab, show the legend Ś'ri Sāmāntadeva, and thus attest the existence of a Śāhi ruler of this name.

³² v. 242.

³³ See note v. 248.

³⁴ v. 251 sqq.

PARTHA
(A.D. 906-921)

During the fifteen years of Partha's nominal reign the country was a prey to the Tantrins. Nirjitavarman, who acted as his son's guardian, could maintain himself only by paying heavy bribes to them.³⁵ In the exactions by which they oppressed the land, the soldiery were helped by unscrupulous ministers, among whom the brothers Śaṅkharavardhana and Śaṅkhuvardhana rose to prominence. The queen Sugandhā, who had been banished from the court, endeavoured in the year 914 to recover her power with the assistance of the Ekāṅgas, a body of military organization, who appear in the troubles of the period as the rivals and antagonists of the Tantrins.³⁶ The queen's force was defeated by the latter on the march upon the capital, and she herself made a prisoner, and subsequently executed.³⁷ Three years later a disastrous flood caused a terrible famine, the first event of this kind for which Kālhana gives us an exact date.³⁸

NIJRITAVARMAN
(A.D. 921-923),
CAKRAVARMAN
(A.D. 923-933).

In the year 921 Partha was formally deposed by the Tantrins in favour of his father NIRJITAVARMAN who, however, died two years later.³⁹ CAKRAVARMAN, the child-son of Nirjitavarman, who succeeded, was kept on the throne under the guardianship of his mother and grandmother, until, in the year 933/1 a fresh revolution of the Tantrins raised his half-brother S'UBHAVARMAN I. to the throne.⁴⁰ As the new king could not pay the large sums claimed by the troops he was deposed and Partha once more raised in his place. He enjoyed the nominal royal dignity only for a short time, as the offer of great bribes induced the Tantrins to restore Cakravarmān in A.D. 935.⁴¹ As Cakravarmān, too, failed in raising the promised sums, he had to flee within the same year, whereupon the Tantrins sold the crown to the minister ŚAṅKHUWARDHANA.⁴²

S'UBHAVARMAN I.
(A.D. 933-934).

ŚAṅKHUWARDHANA
(A.D. 935-936).

97. The usurper was not destined to test long the doubtful support of the praetorians. Cakravarmān in his banishment turned for help to the Dāmaras, the feudal landholders, whose interests are likely to have suffered by the prolonged predominance of the soldiery in the city. The powerful Dāmaras Śaṅkriṣṇa took up the cause of Cakravarmān, and succeeded in raising a considerable force of his class-fellows.⁴³ The Dāmaras marched upon Śrinagar in the spring A.D. 936, and after a hotly contested battle near Pahnapura defeated the Tantrins with great slaughter. Cakravarmān once more entered the capital and avenged himself by the execution of Śaṅkhuvardhana, who had been captured.⁴⁴

CAKRAVARMAN
restored
(A.D. 936-937).

Though the power of the Tantrins seems to have been crushed completely by Cakravarmān's victory, the country profited but little by their disappearance. Cakravarmān who, in the struggle for his crown, seems to have displayed personal bravery, abandoned himself, when he had recovered it, to vile cruelties and excesses. He took into his seraglio women of the despised Domba caste, and raised their relatives to positions of consequence. Of one of these parasites, the Domba singer Rūṅga, Kālhana records an amusing anecdote which has the look of being authentic.⁴⁵ The king's excesses and ungrateful conduct led to a conspiracy among the Dāmaras, his supporters, which brought his rule to an early close. In the summer, 937, Cakravarmān was at night treacherously murdered within the arms of his Domba queen.⁴⁶

³⁵ v. 261 sqq.

³⁶ See note v. 249.

³⁷ v. 259-262.

³⁸ v. 271.

³⁹ v. 287.

⁴⁰ v. 292.

⁴¹ v. 295 sqq.

⁴² v. 302 sqq.

⁴³ v. 303 sqq.

⁴⁴ v. 328-330.

⁴⁵ v. 397 sqq.

⁴⁶ v. 405 sqq.

UNMATTĀVANTI ('the mad Avanti'), another son of Pārtha, who was next raised to the throne, appears to have done his best to justify his name.⁴⁷ He surpassed his predecessor in acts of senseless cruelty and wanton license. Parvagupta, an ambitious minister, who was scheming to secure the throne for himself, induced the depraved prince to destroy his own relatives. The old Pārtha, the king's father, was still living with his family at the Jayondravihāra at Śrinagar, where the charity of the Buddhist monks supported him in his helpless poverty. Unmattāvanti first had Pārtha's young sons, his own half-brothers, carried away from there into prison, where he let them die of hunger. Subsequently Pārtha himself, by the king's order, was attacked at night in the Vihāra, which gave him shelter, and cruelly murdered.⁴⁸ The parricide king did not enjoy long the security which he had purchased by the extermination of his near relatives. He succumbed to a consumptive disease in the summer, 939.⁴⁹

UNMATTĀVANTI
(A.D. 937-939).

S'ŪRAVARMAN II., a supposititious son whom Unmattāvanti had crowned at the approach of death, occupied the throne only for a few days. Kamalavardhana, the commander-in-chief, who desired to seize the crown and who was marching upon the city from Maḍavarājya, easily defeated the royal troops, whereupon the child-king had to flee.⁵⁰ Kamalavardhana foolishly did not at once place himself on the throne, but called an assembly of Brahmins to seek from them his election as king. The assembled wisecakes, whom Kalhana describes with much humour, proved refractory and debated for several days while the Purohita-corporations collected on masse, and started a solemn fast to enforce a decision.⁵¹ Ultimately the choice of the assembly fell on the Brahman YASASKARA, the son of Gopālavarma's treasurer, Prabhākara-deva, who had left Kāśmīr in poverty, and had just then returned to his native land with a reputation for learning and eloquence.

S'ŪRAVARMAN II.
(A.D. 939).

98. During the nine years (A.D. 939-948) of Yaśaskara's mild rule the country seems to have obtained a respite from the many troubles which had oppressed it under the rapidly changing reigns following the extinction of Avanti-varman's lineage. Kalhana gives a very favourable account of the wisdom of Yaśaskara's administration, and illustrates the judicial sagacity of the king by two anecdotes, which are intended to show his skill in the interpretation of legal contracts.⁵² A Matha for students from India proper and various other endowments attested his piety.⁵³ From other incidents, however, which are mentioned by the Chronicler, we can see that the Brahman king's record was not altogether unblemished, and that even Kāśmīrian chronique scandaleuse had occasion to occupy itself with his conduct.⁵⁴

YASASKARA
(A.D. 939-948).

When attacked by a fatal illness, Yaśaskara had his relative Varṇaṭa consecrated as his successor, superseding his own child-son Saṃgrāmadeva whom he suspected of having been begotten in adultery. He probably also foresaw that the crown was more likely to remain with his family if his succession fell to a grown-up man and not to a mere child. Varṇaṭa, however, by his injudicious conduct, aroused the dying king's anger, and thus gave scheming ministers like Parvagupta the opportunity to obtain a change of the succession. Saṃgrāmadeva duly received ⁴⁷ v. 414 sqq.

⁴⁸ v. 428 sqq.

⁴⁹ v. 448 sqq.

⁵⁰ v. 451 sqq.

⁵¹ v. 461 sqq.

⁵² vi. 14-41, and vi. 42-67. It is quite possible that the two stories are of a far earlier date and have become attached to Yaśaskara only on account of the reputation enjoyed by him in Kāśmīr popular tradition.

⁵³ vi. 87 sqq.

⁵⁴ vi. 60-84.

the Abhisaka, while the dying Yaśaskara left the palace for his Maṭha where his protracted agony was ended through poison given by his attendants.⁵⁵ Another version which Kālhana, however, refuses, attributed the king's death to magic used by a revengeful Brahman.⁵⁶

SAMGRĀMADEVA
(A.D. 948-949).

SAMGRĀMADEVA, 'the Crooked-footed' (Vakraṅghri), occupied the throne only for a few months (A.D. 948-949).⁵⁷ The minister Parvagupta, who had had his eye fixed on the crown since the days of Unmattavanti and whose power became supreme after Yaśaskara's death, first put his rivals out of the way and then attempted the child-king's life. When witchcraft had failed, Parvagupta, on a day of heavy snowfall, openly forced his way into the palace and killed the boy. His body bound to a stone was thrown into the Vitasta.

PARVAGUPTA
(A.D. 949-950).

PARVAGUPTA, who was descended from a humble family of clerks, did not enjoy long the possession of the crown which he had attained with so much treachery. After oppressing the land by his rapacity he died of dropsy within a year and a half of his accession (A.D. 949-950).⁵⁸ KṢEMAGUPTA, his son and successor, was a youth grossly sensual and addicted to many vices. A court of depraved parasites encouraged him in his excesses.⁵⁹ The building of the temple of Kṣemagaurisvara in Śrinagar, for the benefit of which he plundered the ancient Jyauḍhvāhāra, was the only signal act of his reign (A.D. 950-958).⁶⁰

KṢEMAGUPTA
(A.D. 950-958).

Insignificant as Kṣemagupta was as a ruler, he was yet destined to influence materially the history of Kāśmīr during the next centuries by his marriage with Diddā, the daughter of Siṅharāja, chief of Lohara. This territory which has left its name to the present valley of Lohrīn, comprised, as I have elsewhere proved at length, the mountain districts immediately adjoining Kāśmīr on the south-west and now belonging to the small hill state of Poonch.⁶¹ Kṣemagupta's union with Diddā brought Kāśmīr under the rule of the Lohara family, which continued to hold Kāśmīr as well as its own original home down to the times of Kālhana and later.

Queen Diddā.

Diddā herself has played an interesting and important part in Kāśmīr history. She was from her mother's side a grand-daughter of King Bhīma Śāhi of Uḍabhāṇḍa, who is mentioned in Alberūnī's list of the 'Hindu Shāhiyas of Kābul' as the successor of Kamalū and who is also known to us from his coins.⁶² From the noble stock of the Śāhis, her maternal relations, Diddā appears to have inherited also much of that political capacity and energy which enabled her to maintain herself as virtual ruler of Kāśmīr for close on half a century. Her power made itself felt already during the lifetime of Kṣemagupta, whose mind she is said to have wholly engrossed. We have documentary evidence of this exceptional position in the legend of Kṣemagupta's coins where the Di prefixed to the king's name is undoubtedly, as already recognized by General Cunningham, intended as an abbreviation for Diddā. The wholly unusual procedure of thus showing the queen's name may probably be held to account for the nickname Diddāksma which, according to Kālhana's statement, was borne by the king.⁶³ It may be taken also as an indication of the prominent position attained by the young queen that Bhīma Śāhi, her powerful grandfather, built already during

⁵⁵ vi. 90-107.

⁵⁶ vi. 108 sqq.

⁵⁷ vi. 115-120.

⁵⁸ vi. 130-148.

⁵⁹ vi. 161-170.

⁶⁰ vi. 171 sqq.

⁶¹ Compare for Lohara and its history, Notes, iv. 177.

⁶² See for references, note vi. 177-178.

⁶³ See vi. 177 and note.

Kṣemagupta's lifetime the richly-endowed temple called Bhīmaśaśava, the remains of which have been traced by me in a Muḥammadan Ziārat, near Mārtand.⁶¹

99. Kṣemagupta died in the year 958 of a violent fever contracted on the occasion of a jackal-hunt.⁶⁵ His son, ABHIMANYU II., who succeeded to the crown, was still a child, and Diddā as his guardian exercised herself all royal power. The early years of the queen's regency were full of troubles and risks. She first drove into exile the prime minister Phalguṇa, with whom she had been in enmity during Kṣemagupta's lifetime. When she endeavoured to rid herself in the same way of two grandsons, Mahīman and Pāṭala, who on their mothers' side were descended from Parvagupta, they raised a dangerous rebellion. Diddā could avert defeat only by bribing the rebels' chief supporters.⁶⁶ Yaśodhara, who was one of them and to whom the queen had been obliged to give the chief command of the army, aroused her suspicion by the energy he displayed in a successful expedition against Thakkana, an otherwise unknown Śāhi chief.⁶⁷ When Diddā attempted to banish him, the former league rose once more in rebellion and besieged the queen in her palace. Saved by the opportune arrival of the faithful minister Naravāhana and other supporters, Diddā took terrible vengeance by mercilessly executing all captured rebels and exterminating their families.⁶⁸

ABHIMANYU II.
(A.D. 958-972).

Naravāhana, who after this event became Diddā's chief councillor, did not long enjoy the confidence of the fickle queen. When her insults had driven this faithful adherent into suicide, there arose fresh troubles with restless Dāmaras, which obliged Diddā to recall Phalguṇa.⁶⁹ At that time (A.D. 972) Abhimanyu died; he was succeeded by his young son NANDIGUPTA.⁷⁰ Sorrow over the death of her son apparently softened for a time the heart of the queen-regent. Kalhana dates from this period the foundation of various temples and other buildings which were intended to perpetuate her own memory and that of her family. One of these structures, the Diddāmaṭha, has given its name to the Diddāmar quarter of modern Śrīnagar.⁷¹

NANDIGUPTA
(A.D. 972-978).

The chief feature in Diddā's character, however, the lust for power, had suffered no change. One year after her son's death she destroyed Nandigupta "by witchcraft." In the same way she disposed in the year 975 of TRIBHUVANA[GUPTA], another grandson who succeeded.⁷² There remained now only one more of her male issue, the child BHĪMAGUPTA. During the five years of his nominal reign Phalguṇa died, and the queen throw off all restraint in her personal conduct. Tuṅga, a Khaśa from the hills of Pariotsa or Prūṅts, who had begun life as a herdsman of buffaloes and had found his way into Kaśmīr as a letter-carrier, gained the queen's favour and openly became her paramour.⁷³ The rapid rise of this low-born but valiant hill-man typically illustrates the history of many a foreign adventurer with whose persons and fortunes we become acquainted in the subsequent narrative.

TRIBHUVANA
(A.D. 973-975).
BHĪMAGUPTA
(A.D. 975-980/1).

Assured of her safety by Tuṅga's support, Diddā at last in the year 980/1 had Bhīmagupta put to death by torture, and then ascended the throne in her own

DIDDĀ
(A.D. 980/1-1003).

⁶¹ Compare vi. 178 and note.

⁶⁵ vi. 187.

⁶⁶ vi. 211 sqq.

⁶⁷ vi. 228 sqq.

⁶⁸ vi. 238-258.

⁶⁹ vi. 260-286.

⁷⁰ vi. 289 sqq.

⁷¹ vi. 299 sqq. and note vi. 300.

⁷² vi. 311 sq.

⁷³ vi. 318 sqq.

name.⁷¹ During the reign of twenty-three years which followed, Tunga, who had been made prime minister, maintained an undisputed predominance. Discontented factions repeatedly endeavoured to oust Tunga by stirring up rebellion and inducing the Brahmans to hold solemn fasts (pragayirāśā) against him. But Didda's cunning diplomacy and bribes and Tunga's valour each time defeated these attempts.⁷² Tunga found an opportunity to prove his valour also abroad in an expedition undertaken against Rājapuri, the modern Rajauri. In consequence of Tunga's successful attack, Pṛthivīpālu, ruler of this territory which adjoins Kashmir from the south, was forced to pay tribute.⁷³

The statesmanlike instinct and political ability which we must ascribe to Didda in spite of all the defects of her character, are attested by the fact that she remained to the last in peaceful possession of the Kashmir throne, and was able to bequeath it to her family in undisputed succession. In order to assure the latter, she had taken care to select a capable successor from among her nephews, and had bestowed in her lifetime the rank of Yuvarāja on the young Saṅgrāmarāja, son of her brother Udayarāja, the ruler of Lohara.⁷⁴ Thus when the aged queen at last in the year 1003 departed from the scene of her struggles, the rule over Kashmir passed without any contest or convulsion to the new dynasty, the house of Lohara.

SECTION V.—THE FIRST LOHARA DYNASTY.

SAṅGRĀMARĀJA
(A.D. 1003-28).

100. SAṅGRĀMARĀJA (A.D. 1003-28) is shown by Kallhana's narrative to have been a prudent but personally weak ruler. During the earlier part of his reign Tunga's power remained unchecked, notwithstanding a dangerous revolt which rival ministers had stirred up against him through the Brahmans and temple-Purohitas.¹ Growing age did not weaken Tunga's predominance, but made him apparently less careful in his administrative measures; the employment of rapacious assistants increased fiscal oppression, and thus added to his own unpopularity.²

The period covered by Saṅgrāmarāja's reign witnessed a great upheaval in the political conditions of Northern India, which was destined to fundamentally change the course of Indian history. I refer to the Muhammadan conquest under Mahmūd of Ghazni. The great wave of invasion which swept across the Indus Valley and along the Panjab plains in the early decades of the eleventh century did indeed stop short of the mountain-rumparts protecting Kasmīr. The several expeditions which we know Mahmūd to have led in that direction never seriously threatened the independence of the Valley. Nevertheless, we find a distinct record of these events in Kallhana's Chronicle, which must be appreciated all the more if we consider the narrow territorial limits to which his narrative in its truly historical portions otherwise confines itself.

⁷¹ vi. 330 sqq.

⁷² vi. 335 sqq.

⁷³ vi. 318 sqq.

⁷⁴ vi. 355 sqq.

¹ vii. 13 sqq.

² Compare vii. 38 sqq. for a curious account of Bhadrēśvara, who rose from his hereditary occupation of market-gardener to the position of Tunga's chief revenue official.

This interesting record is supplied by Kalhana in his account of the expedition which was despatched under Tuṅga to the assistance of Śāhi Trilocanapāla.^a The latter is well known to us from Albēruṇi and the Muhammadan historians as the last independent prince of the 'Hindu Śāhiya dynasty,' who succumbed to Mahmūd only after a long and heroic struggle. Mahmūd himself has long ago been recognized in Hammira, king of the 'Turushkas,' whom the Chronicler names as the formidable enemy of Trilocanapāla, the designation Hammira being in fact nothing but an adaptation of the title Amīru-l-Murūmiūn of the Ghaznavide Sultāns.

Expedition in aid of Trilocanapāla
Śāhi.

Kalhana gives us a vivid description of the overhearing assurance with which Tuṅga led the large Kāśmīrian force sent to the Śāhi's support. Neglecting the cautious advice and warning of Trilocanapāla, who had grown experienced in the warfare with the 'Turushkas,' he refused to occupy the safe defensive position assigned to him. Crossing the Tauṣī river, Tuṅga attacked and defeated a detachment of the enemy sent on a reconnaissance. Flattered by this easy success, Tuṅga found himself next morning attacked by the full force of Hammira. The Kāśmīrian troops fled at once from the field in utter confusion; the Śāhi's force, too, was defeated after some resistance. Trilocanapāla himself, who is warmly praised by Kalhana for his great personal bravery, fought his way through the mass of his opponents. When he had left, the Turushkas overspread the country like clouds of locusts. The Chronicler mentions the heroic efforts which the brave Śāhi subsequently made to recover his lost kingdom. But he also shows us plainly that they proved of no avail to avert the complete downfall of that once powerful dynasty.

Battle with Hammira (Mahmūd of Ghazni).

101. It is to be regretted that Kalhana has failed to inform us of the year of Tuṅga's expedition, as this omission makes it difficult to indicate with absolute certainty the particular campaign of Mahmūd to which the record of the Chronicler refers. The Muhammadan accounts we possess of Mahmūd's later expeditions in the Panjāb show considerable discrepancies in regard to the dates and places of the actions fought, and are still in need of critical examination. But several indications point to Mahmūd's campaign of the year 1013 as the most likely occasion when his forces met Kāśmīrian troops as auxiliaries of Trilocanapāla. The locality of Mahmūd's decisive victory in this campaign was in one of the valleys leading towards Kāśmīr from the neighbourhood of the present Jehlam. This agrees well with the mention made in the Chronicler of the Tauṣī, as the river meant is probably the Tohī of Prūts, flowing into the Vitastā near Jehlam.¹ Chiefs on the confines of Kāśmīr are distinctly mentioned by the Muhammadan sources as having made their submission to Mahmūd after this battle. It seems to have been the last occasion on which the brave Śāhi opposed the invader within the Panjāb. The Muhammadan historians, too, in full agreement with Kalhana, refer to the heroic efforts which Trilocanapāla subsequently made to retrieve the fortunes of his house. But these struggles took place far away from the territories neighbouring on Kāśmīr, and in no way affected the decisive character of the battle referred to. We see thus that Kalhana is quite on historical ground when dating the final downfall of the Śāhi dominion from the event he describes.

Destruction of Śāhi kingdom.

The rapid and complete destruction of the powerful Śāhi kingdom must have deeply impressed the mind of all contemporaries. We can still feel this distinctly in the pathetic lines which Kalhana devotes to the memory of the vanished greatness of the Śāhi dynasty.⁵ They reproduce faithfully the very sentiments to which Albērinī, a witness of those great events, has given expression in his closing words on the Hindu Shāhiyas.⁶

^a For a detailed analysis of Kalhana's record and the historical data bearing on Trilocanapāla, see note vii. 47-69.

¹ See note vii. 53.

Mahmūd's expedition against Kāśmīr.

It is unfortunately only a glimpse that Kallhaṇa gives us here of the great historical drama which was played so close to the southern borders of Kāśmīr. After referring to the subsequent "descent of the Turṃkas on the whole surface of the earth,"⁷ he takes us back again to the narrow limits of his own Valley and the petty events of its royal court. Before we follow him there, it will be useful to point out that Kallhaṇa's narrative makes no reference to a subsequent expedition of Mahmūd which brought Muhammadan invasion to the very gates of Kāśmīr. In my note on the Castle of Lohara I have shown that this mountain stronghold, situated on the southern slopes of the central Pir Panjal and not far from the Tūgmaidān Pass, is identical with 'the fort of Loh-kot' which brought Mahmūd's only serious attempt at the conquest of Kāśmīr to a standstill.⁸ The Muhammadan Chroniclers give various dates (A.D. 1015 and 1021) for this unsuccessful expedition, but they agree in all main points regarding the event itself. The Sultan had advanced to the very confines of Kāśmīr when his progress in the mountains was barred by the fort of Loh-kot, which "was remarkable on account of its height and strength." The siege of this stronghold, at which Albērinī too was present, proved fruitless. "After a while, when the snow began to fall and the season became intensely cold, and the enemy received reinforcements from Kāśmīr," the Sultan was obliged to abandon his design and to return to Ghazni.⁹

Kallhaṇa's silence regarding this foreign attack, probably the most serious to which Kāśmīr was exposed from the south during the period comprised in the historical part of his narrative, is all the more curious, as Lohara, as the original home and safest retreat of the dynasty ruling in his own time, plays otherwise, as we shall see, an important part in his records. The observation must warn us that any negative argument drawn from Kallhaṇa's silence on one or the other point can have little or no value even where his relation of events is apparently full and detailed.

Tūṅga murdered.

102. Tūṅga after his defeat seems to have been less able to cope with the incessant intrigues directed against him. The king himself, though afraid of Tūṅga, gave them secret support until a favourable opportunity delivered the minister unprotected into the hands of his enemies. One day on entering the palace Tūṅga and his son were treacherously murdered while their few attendants basely abandoned them.¹⁰ After Tūṅga's death a succession of low favourites rose to power and plundered the people until the weak Śaṃgrāmarāja died in the year 1028.¹¹

HARIRāja
(A.D. 1028).

HARIRāja, his son and immediate successor, who is said to have been a youth of good disposition, died after a reign of only twenty-two days.¹² Śrīlokhā, the licentious mother of Harirāja, to whom general report attributed the death of the young king, then endeavoured to secure the crown for herself. But her design was frustrated by the royal bodyguard, and her young son ANANTA was raised to the throne. Vīgraharāja, a brother of Śaṃgrāmarāja and ruler of Lohara, who had already

⁵ vii. 66-69.

⁶ India, ii. p. 13.

⁷ vii. 70.

⁸ See Note E, iv. 177, §§ 12, 13.

⁹ See ELLIOT, History of India, ii. pp. 455-466 sq.

¹⁰ vii. 79 sqq.

¹¹ vii. 100-127.

¹² vii. 131 sqq.

been intriguing in the latter's reign, made a brave attempt to oust Ananta, but was killed after reaching the capital.¹³

During the early part of Ananta's reign (A.D. 1028-1063) princes of the Śāhi family like Rudrapāla and Diddapāla, who had found a safe refuge in Kāśmīr, exercised great power in the land. Kalhana illustrates the position of these royal refugees by indicating the great subsidies paid to them.¹⁴ Rudrapāla had married a daughter of Indracandra, 'lord of Jālandhara', who is in all probability identical with the Indracandra named in the genealogical list of the Katoch Itjās of Kangra. Subsequently King Ananta was induced to marry Sūryamati, a younger daughter of Indracandra.¹⁵

ANANTA
(A.D. 1028-63).

A dangerous rising of Pāmaras under the leadership of the rebel commander-in-chief Tribhuvana was successfully defeated after a bloody contest in which Ananta displayed great personal bravery.¹⁶ Similarly the king, with the help of Rudrapāla Śāhi, succeeded in repelling an invasion of the Dard ruler Acalamaṅgala and certain Mleccha chiefs allied with him.¹⁷ This victory is alluded to also by the poet Bilhana, Ananta's contemporary. He designates the 'Mlecchas,' who in all probability were Muhammadan tribesmen from the Indus Valley, rightly enough as 'Saktas'.¹⁸

When the Śāhi princes had died, Ananta came more and more under the influence of his able queen Sūryamati, also known by the name Subhāṇā. Her piety found visible expression in numerous endowments and sacred buildings. Prominent among these was the shrine of Sadāśiva, into the neighbourhood of which, on the left river-bank, the royal couple subsequently transferred their residence.¹⁹ The worthy example set by the queen, however, did not prevent Ananta from indulging in great extravagance, which again caused him to become heavily involved in debt with foreign traders. Of one of the latter, who for a time held the royal diadem and throne in pawn, Kalhana tells us incidentally the interesting fact that he acted also as the Kāśmīr agent to King Bhoja of Mālava, so well known for his patronage of literature.²⁰ The anecdote related by Kalhana of King Bhoja's special regard for the Kāśmīrian sacred spring of Kapaṭeśvara, the water of which had to be supplied to him regularly in distant Mālava, is probably based on historical fact. It shows that, notwithstanding the political isolation of Kāśmīr and the Muhammadan conquest of the regions to the south, regular intercourse and trade with the Hindu kingdoms of India proper must have continued. We find the same conclusion indicated also by other incidental references in the last two books.²¹

Predominance of Queen Sūryamati.

From these financial troubles the king was freed only when Queen Sūryamati assumed full charge of the royal affairs. Haladhara, a servant of humble origin, who by her favour rose to be prime minister, proved a strong administrator, and secured for a time prosperity and peace for the land.²² King Ananta seems to have attempted to utilize these favourable conditions in order to assert Kāśmīr

Ananta's expeditions abroad.

¹³ vii. 139 sqq.

¹⁴ vii. 144 sqq.

¹⁵ See note vii. 155 sqq.

¹⁶ vii. 154 sqq.

¹⁷ vii. 167 sqq.

¹⁸ See Vilvam, xviii. 34.

¹⁹ Regarding the position of the royal palace after this transfer, compare note vii. 186-187.

²⁰ See vii. 190-193 and note.

²¹ Compare the references to pilgrimage tours abroad, vii. 485, 897, 1007 sq., viii. 1000, 1626, 2214; also Mañika's mention of foreign ambassadors at the Kāśmīr court, below § 114.

²² vii. 208 sqq.

authority in the neighbouring hill tracts. Bilhana in his Vikramāṅkadevacarita speaks of Ananta's supremacy having been acknowledged in Cāmpā, Dāvābhīṣāra, and adjacent territories. But Kalluṇṇa records only a victory over King Śōla of Cāmpā, who is known to us by his full name of Śaḍaḥmaṇa from a Cūmba copper plate grant.²¹ Of Ananta's expeditions against the hill-states of Uraśā and Vallāpura, we are distinctly told that they ended in failure and ignominious retreat.²²

Ananta's abdication in favour of KALASĀ
(A.D. 1063-89).

103. Ananta's weakness of character made it possible for Queen Śūryamati to obtain in the year 1063 his formal abdication in favour of his son Kalasā.²³ Her object apparently was to put the rule of the land into stronger hands and thus to safeguard the interests of her family. Very soon after the coronation of Kalasā the royal couple came to regret their step, and Ananta resumed charge of the regal functions, while his son's title of king was purely nominal. About this time Ananta's cousin Kṣitirāja, who ruled at Lohara, resigned worldly affairs, and being in enmity with his own son, bestowed the rule over Lohara upon Utkarṣa, the second eldest son of Kalasā.²⁴ This arrangement was destined to lead subsequently, on Utkarṣa's succession in Kaśmīr, to the political union of the two territories.

Conflict between Ananta and Kalasā
(A.D. 1076).

For a number of years after Kalasā's coronation, the arrangement which deprived him of all real power seems to have continued without difficulty. Strongly sensual by nature, the youthful Kalasā then came under the influence of depraved companions and advisers, whose doings are painted by Kalluṇṇa in truly Rabelaisian colours, and grow more and more licentious.²⁵ A jeune, in which the dissolute prince suffered open disgrace, led ultimately to a rupture between him and his parents (A.D. 1076). Instead of imprisoning Kalasā as he intended, the weak Ananta allowed himself to be induced by his wife, who was blindly attached to her unworthy son, to retire from the capital to the sacred town of Vijayāśvara (Vijayavīr).²⁶ There he removed the royal treasures, and was followed also by most of the troops and nobles. Kalasā, though at first much embarrassed by the want of stores and money, gradually availed himself of the free field left to him by this ill-advised step, and raised forces to attack his father. Śūryamati's intervention prevented for a time the outbreak of open hostilities, but at the same time kept Ananta from forcibly deposing Kalasā while he had still the power. He contented himself with calling to Vijayāśvara Harṣa, Kalasā's eldest son, whom he desired to place on the throne.²⁷

Ananta's suicide
(A.D. 1081).

After a brief reconciliation Kalasā resumed his hostile attitude, and by laying fire to the town of Vijayāśvara, deprived his parents of the great treasures and stores guarded there, which had so far helped them to retain the allegiance of their troops and court-followers.²⁸ The references which Kalluṇṇa makes to the quantity of gold at the disposal of Ananta both before and after the burning of Vijayāśvara are of interest in view of what we know otherwise of the modest economic conditions of old Kaśmīr.²⁹ After this event Ananta's position became more and more untenable, and when Kalasā insisted on sending him into exile, the old king, after a violent altercation with his wife, committed suicide in his sixty-first year (A.D. 1081).³²

²³ See note vii. 218.

²⁴ vii. 219 sqq.

²⁵ vii. 233.

²⁶ vii. 256 sqq.

²⁷ vii. 273 sqq.

²⁸ vii. 354 sqq.

²⁹ vii. 390 sqq.

³⁰ vii. 408 sqq.

³¹ See vii. 407, 414 sqq.; also Note II (iv. 496), §§ 33, 34.

³² vii. 445 sqq.

Kalhana describes touchingly the funeral of Ananta, at which Queen Sūryamatī atoned for the baneful results of her influence by her noble death as a Sati.³³ The death of his parents and the acquisition of full power brought about a change for the better in Kalāśa's character and conduct. After effecting a solemn reconciliation with young Harṣa, the king set about to relieve his financial straits by careful administration.³⁴ He was thus able in time to make some rich endowments.³⁵ An expedition sent in support of Saṃgrāmapāla, the rightful chief of Rājapuri, enabled Kalāśa to assert the old Kāśmīr suzerainty over that territory.³⁶ Assisted by capable ministers like Vīṇana and the brave Kandalpa, the 'lord of the Gate' or commander of the frontier defences, Kalāśa gradually succeeded in consolidating his kingdom and making his influence felt among the surrounding small hill-states. This success of Kalāśa's foreign policy received a striking illustration in the winter of the year 1087-8, when the rulers of eight hill territories around Kāśmīr, from Uraśū in the west to Kāṣṭhavāṇa in the east, assembled at his capital.³⁷ Among them was Āsaṇa, the chief of Campā, whose name is found in inscriptional records as well as in the genealogical list of the Candbā Rajas.

Assembly of hill-chiefs (A.D. 1087-8).

The last years of Kalāśa's life were embittered by disunion and suspicion between himself and his son Harṣa. The youthful prince, gifted by nature and inclined towards extravagance, felt annoyed by the scanty regard and still scantier allowances which his father bestowed upon him. Evil-minded parasites took advantage of Harṣa's disposition and implicated him in a conspiracy to murder his father.³⁸ This was betrayed to Kalāśa, who, after vainly endeavouring to obtain from his son a repudiation of the plot, ordered his arrest. This was effected towards the close of A.D. 1088, after Harṣa had been in serious danger of losing his life at the hands of his enraged fellow-conspirators.³⁹ Exasperated by Harṣa's conduct, Kalāśa took again to the licentious life of his youthful days and accelerated his death by fresh excesses. He spared Harṣa's life, notwithstanding the intrigues which some of his court carried on against it, but decided to deprive him of the succession. For this purpose he had Utkarṣa, his younger son, brought from Lohara in order to have him installed as ruler of Kāśmīr.⁴⁰ At the approach of death Kalāśa set out in great torments to the famous temple of Mārtanḍa, where he died, after vainly endeavouring to see once more the imprisoned Harṣa (A.D. 1089, Mārgaśīrṣa).⁴¹

Conspiracy of Harṣa.

104. UTKARṢA, after being crowned, kept Harṣa imprisoned and refused to grant him permission to retire abroad.⁴² Harṣa, justly apprehensive of his personal safety, managed from prison to secure an ally in his younger half-brother Vijayamulla, who felt dissatisfied with Utkarṣa's treatment of himself. Utkarṣa very soon alienated the sympathies of the court and the people by his injudicious and miserly conduct. Thus encouraged, Vijayamulla raised an open rebellion and attacked the king in the capital.⁴³ The cowardly Utkarṣa, in his straits, thought of having Harṣa killed in his prison, but owing to Harṣa's presence of mind and his own vacillation, the murderous attempt failed. Kalhana describes at great length

UTKARṢA
(A.D. 1089).

³³ vii. 461-485.

³⁴ vii. 506 sqq.

³⁵ vii. 524 sqq.

³⁶ vii. 533.

³⁷ vii. 587 sqq.

³⁸ vii. 617 sqq.

³⁹ vii. 653 sqq.

⁴⁰ 703 sqq.

⁴¹ 713 sqq.

⁴² 737 sqq.

⁴³ vii. 762 sqq.

how Harṣa managed to win over his guards by his adroit diplomacy, and was then set free in order to secure a compromise with Vijayamalla. Ultimately Harṣa availed himself of the confusion in the palace to seize the throne, which he could claim by right.⁴⁵ Utkarṣa, whose reign had lasted only for twenty-two days, was made a captive in the palace, and in his disgrace committed suicide by cutting his arteries. He had only reached the age of twenty-four years.⁴⁶

HARṢA
(A.D. 1089-1101).

Harṣa's character.

King HARṢA (A.D. 1089-1101), who young as he was had attained the royal power after experiencing so many changes of fortune, is undoubtedly the most striking figure among the later Hindu rulers of Kāśmīr. His many and varied attainments and the strange contrasts in his character must have greatly exercised the mind of his contemporaries. We see these impressions duly reflected in the elaborate description which Kalhana gives us of Harṣa's character, and which was no doubt based on first-hand information, such as that given by his own father Candapala.⁴⁷ Kalhana pictures to us King Harṣa as a youth of powerful frame and great personal beauty, congenious and fond of display. He was well versed in various sciences and a lover of music and arts. The songs which he composed were still heard with delight in Kalhana's days.⁴⁸ The Chronicler in an eloquent passage emphasizes the strongly contrasting qualities of Harṣa's mind and the equally strong contrasts in his actions.⁴⁹ Cruelty and kindness, liberality and greed, violent self-will and reckless simplicity, cunning and want of thought—these and other apparently irreconcilable features in turn display themselves in Harṣa's chequered life. Kalhana has hit the keynote in Harṣa's character when he insists on the excessiveness with which all these qualities asserted themselves. A modern psychologist could easily gather from Kalhana's account of Harṣa's character and reign the unmistakable indications of an unsound condition of mind, which towards the close of the king's life manifested itself in a kind of dementia imperatoria.

Harṣa's early rule.

At the commencement of his rule Harṣa showed wise forbearance in retaining many of his father's officials and trusted servants, notwithstanding their former conduct towards himself.⁵⁰ It was probably due to this prudent policy that when his brother Vijayamalla became disaffected and conspired against him, no dangerous rising followed. Vijayamalla had to seek refuge across the mountains in Dard territory, where he was soon after killed by an avalanche.⁵¹ This event seems to have consolidated Harṣa's position, and Kalhana gives us a glowing account of the splendour of the Kāśmīr court during the period immediately following.⁵² Harṣa introduced into the country more elaborate fashions in dress and ornaments—perhaps an indication of Western, i.e. Muhammadan influence,—and made his courtiers imitate his own taste for extravagance in personal attire. His munificence towards men of learning and poets is said to have made even Bīlhana, the well-known court poet of the Cālukya king Parmādi, regret that he had left Kāśmīr, his native land, during the reign of Kalāṣa.⁵³ Kalhana's reference to the Dekhan fashions which Harṣa copied in his amusements and also in his coinage is curiously corroborated by some extant gold coins of Harṣa, which in their type unmistakably imitate the contemporary coinage of Karpāṭa.⁵⁴ The description

⁴⁵ vii. 776 sqq.

⁴⁶ vii. 861.

⁴⁷ See above, § 24.

⁴⁸ vii. 941 sqq.

⁴⁹ vii. 869 sqq.

⁴⁹ vii. 886 sqq.

⁵⁰ vii. 890 sqq.

⁵¹ vii. 919 sqq.

⁵² See vii. 935-937 and note.

⁵³ See note vii. 926.

which Kalhana gives of Harṣa's court assemblies and their magnificence, is conventional in many points.⁶¹ But we may all the same conclude from it and other indications like the issue of gold and silver coins, that Kaśmīr did indeed, during the early part of his reign, enjoy a period of unusual affluence and prosperity.

105. It was about this period that Harṣa succeeded also in asserting his authority outside Kaśmīr. From the mountains of the Lohara territory which since Utkarṣa had become attached to Kaśmīr by a kind of 'personal union,' Harṣa sent Kandarpa, the 'lord of the Gate,' on an expedition against Saṃgrāma-pāla, the chief of Rājapuri.⁶² Kandarpa, after a severe contest in which two hundred Kaśmīrians are said to have fallen, carried the town of Rājapuri and forced its lord to pay tribute. But the evil counsellors, with whom Harṣa had already begun to surround himself, were not long in securing the disgrace and banishment of this valiant and faithful adherent.

Expedition against Rājapuri.

Treachery soon began to stir among those nearest to the throne. Jayarāja, a half-brother of Harṣa, from a concubine of Kalāṣa, engaged in a dangerous conspiracy. Harṣa, however, proved to be on his guard on this occasion. With Machiavellian skill he made Jayarāja surrender to Dhammaṭa, a relative from another branch of the Lohara family, who had himself been concerned in the conspiracy. After cruelly executing Jayarāja in the year 1095, he then turned upon Dhammaṭa and had him, as well as his four brave sons, killed by the sword and the hangman.⁶³ Similarly he put out of the way other near relatives, though they had given no cause for suspicion.

Conspiracies against Harṣa.

Extravagant expenditure on the troops and senseless indulgence in costly pleasures gradually involved Harṣa in grave financial troubles. From those he endeavoured to free himself by ruthless spoliation of sacred shrines. Kalhana relates with some humour how the incidental discovery of the treasures hoarded at the temple of King Bhīma S'āhi had turned the king's attention to this method of replenishing his exchequer.⁶⁴ After the temple treasures had been ransacked, Harṣa proceeded to the still more revolutionary measure of confiscating divine images in order to possess himself of the valuable metal of which they were made.⁶⁵ Kalhana records the strange fact that as a preliminary step the sacred images were systematically defiled through outcast mendicants. As Kalhana is particular to specify the few metal statues of gods throughout Kaśmīr which escaped Harṣa's clutches, we cannot doubt the extent and thoroughness of Harṣa's iconoclasm. Can the latter have been instigated or encouraged somehow by the steady advance of Muhammadanism in the neighbouring territories? Kalhana, when relating these shameful confiscations, gives to Harṣa the epithet "Turūṣka," i.e. Muhammadan, and later on makes a reference to Turūṣka captains being employed in his army and enjoying his favour.⁶⁶

Harṣa's temple-
spoliation.

In addition to these violent measures Harṣa found himself reduced to the necessity of imposing new and oppressive imposts. As a characteristic feature Kalhana tells us that even night-soil became the object of special taxation.⁶⁷ While this misgovernment spread discontent and misery through the land, Harṣa abandoned himself more and more to excesses and follies of all kinds. Extravagant

Misrule of Harṣa.

⁶⁴ vii. 943 sqq.

⁶⁵ vii. 987 sqq.

⁶⁶ vii. 1013-67.

⁶⁷ vii. 1081 sqq.

⁶⁸ vii. 1091 sqq.

⁶⁹ See notes vii. 1095, 1149.

⁷⁰ vii. 1107.

acts recorded by Kalhana show the ascendancy gained over him by shameless parasites and impostors, and furnish unmistakable proof of the king's incipient insanity.⁶¹ Equally characteristic for the latter are, perhaps, the numerous acts of incest which he committed with his own sisters and his father's widows.⁶²

Disastrous
expeditions.

Some enterprises which Harsa undertook in the midst of his dissipations, only served to show the progressive decay of his energy. An attempt to invade Rajapuri, personally led by Harsa, ended with an ignominious retreat before the hill-fort of Prthivigiri, the king's want of resources adding as much to the failure as the treason of his trusted minister Sumna.⁶³ A subsequent expedition, undertaken for the capture of the fort of Dugdabhāta which guarded the pass leading into the Dard territory of the Kisanguṅga Valley (the present Dardikhot), ended even more disastrously. An early fall of snow induced the royal forces to beat a precipitate retreat, which under the attack of the Dards ended in a complete rout.⁶⁴ It was on this occasion that Uccala and Sussala, the sons of Malla, who were descended from a side branch of the Lohara dynasty and destined to succeed Harsa, first brought themselves to notice by their personal bravery.

Internal troubles.

106. The year 1099 which followed this defeat, brought new calamities upon the land. While a plague was raging and robbers everywhere infesting the country, there occurred a disastrous flood which brought on a famine and universal distress.⁶⁵ The fiscal exactions of the king, however, continued unaltered. It was probably with a view to still the unrest created by these oppressions that Harsa then proceeded to a relentless persecution of the Damaras or feudal landholders throughout the Valley, most of whom at the time seem to have belonged to the tribal division of the Lavanyas (preserved in the modern 'Kram' Lān).⁶⁶ Kalhana records revolting details of the cruelties perpetrated under the king's orders, of arches and garlands made of Dāmarā heads, etc.

Flight of Uccala
and Sussala.

The Damaras of the Kramarāja division had united and were offering effective resistance to their persecutors, when the king's suspicion was aroused against Uccala and Sussala as possible claimants of the crown. Learning that their murder was planned, the two brothers fled at night from Śrinagar in the autumn of 1100 and escaped with the help of Damaras.⁶⁷ Uccala, the elder, found a refuge with Saṅgrāmapāla in Rajapuri, while Sussala betook himself to Kalha, the chief of the neighbouring hill-tract of Kālikjura. Harsa's futile attempts to possess himself of the person of Uccala only helped to increase the latter's impotence. The rebellious Damaras now opened negotiations with Uccala in order to induce him to claim the crown, and Uccala readily responded. His claims were based on genealogical facts, which Kalhana has taken care to explain to us fully, and which will be found illustrated by the pedigree of the Lohara family shown in Appendix II.⁶⁸ We see from it that Uccala was through Jassarāja, Guṅga, and Malla, the fourth direct descendant from Kāntirāja, the brother of Didda and uncle of King Saṅgrāmarāja of Kaśmīr.

Irruption of Uccala
(A.D. 1101).

Uccala, after having been joined by a small number of exiled Damaras, boldly set out for Kaśmīr, and shook off the troops with which the scheming Saṅgrāmapāla ⁶¹ vii. 1115-38. Harsa's pretended love for Candala, the queen of Parmādi of Karmāṭa, and his insane boasts regarding her may be mentioned as particularly striking illustrations.

⁶² vii. 1147 sq.

⁶³ vii. 1152 sqq.

⁶⁴ vii. 1171 sq. 11.

⁶⁵ vii. 1210 sqq.

⁶⁶ vii. 1227 sqq.; compare note vii. 1171.

⁶⁷ vii. 1248 sqq.

⁶⁸ vii. 1282 sqq.

had endeavoured to prevent his escape. Meeting with no resistance at Lohara, Uccala marched across the mountains in the month of Vaiśākha, A.D. 1101, and owing to his unexpected appearance at a season when the Tōṣmaidān route is ordinarily still closed by snow, easily surprised and captured the Kāśmīrian frontier guard.⁶⁹ Dāmaras and disaffected hill-men joined the pretender from all sides, and aided by the delay and indecision of the king's officers he succeeded in effecting his union with the assembled Dāmara force in Kramarājya. Uccala then successfully led his host against the governor Ananda, who commanded in that tract and occupied a strong position on the plateau of Parihāsapura. The king, roused to activity by the near approach of danger, then attacked the pretender and obtained a victory. Uccala escaped with difficulty, while many of his followers found their death before and within the temple quadrangles of Parihāsapura.⁷⁰

While Uccala, left unpursued by Harṣa, was engaged in again collecting the Dāmaras of Kramarājya in the extreme north-west of the Valley, the king's power was seriously shaken in Maḍavarājya, the eastern portion of the Valley, by the attack of Sussala. Aided by Kalha, this prince successfully fought his way through the frontier guard-station of S'ūrapura (Hūrpūr), on the Fir Pāntsal route, and drove the royal forces before him in the direction of the capital.⁷¹ Though subsequently checked by the brave Candrarāja, Harṣa's newly-appointed commander-in-chief, Sussala's diversion had the important result of enabling Uccala to resume the offensive. Avoiding the open plain, where the king's mounted troops could assert their superiority, the Dāmaras under Uccala marched across the mountains into the Sind Valley or Lohara. There they won a complete victory over the king's forces, which opened to them the road to the capital; while marching upon it Uccala received the Abhiṣeka from the Brahmans of Hīranyapura, the present Ranyil.⁷²

107. While the rebel forces were thus drawing round S'rīnagar from the north, confusion and disaffection reigned in Harṣa's council. The ministers had no better advice to offer to the dispirited king than a speedy retreat to the mountain fastness of Lohara, the original home of his family. This advice the doomed king rejected in scorn, and subsequently even recalled his son Bhoja after he had already started for that safe refuge.⁷³ Open desertion to the pretender thinned the ranks of the troops, and treason became ripe also among the officials and royal attendants. In this critical situation the wrath of the deluded king turned upon the innocent Malla, the father of Uccala and Sussala, who, leading the life of a recluse, had peacefully remained in the city. Harṣa had him ruthlessly attacked and killed. Kalhana gives a spirited account of how his widow Nandī, who had been watching from a high terrace the camp-fires of her sons gleaming far away in the north and south, burned herself after Malla's death, invoking their revenge upon the head of his murderer.⁷⁴

The news of this crime, which took place on the 9th vadi of the Bhādrapada month, 1101, enraged the rebel princes and made them increase their efforts. Sussala, who was operating from the south-east, threw himself upon Vijayēśvara, and defeating the king's troops there under Candrarāja, forced the remainder to surrender. He then marched eagerly upon S'rīnagar, spurred on by the hope of securing the crown for himself. His attack, which was directed against the city

Attack of Sussala.

Treason around
Harṣa.

Harṣa attacked in S'rīnagar.

⁶⁹ vii. 1290-1301.

⁷⁰ vii. 1302-39.

⁷¹ vii. 1348 sqq.

⁷² vii. 1369-85.

⁷³ vii. 1386-1453.

⁷⁴ vii. 1469-94.

from the south and on the left bank of the river, Bhoja, Harṣa's brave heir-apparent, managed to beat off.⁷⁵ But while he was still resting from the combat by his father's side, word came that Uccala had penetrated into the city from the north. The treachery of the town-prefect Nāga, who commanded there, had opened to the pretender the narrow passage which is left in the natural defences of the city on that side,⁷⁶ and soon the Dāmaras, led to the attack by the valiant Janakacandra of Lahara, set foot on the bridge leading over the river in front of the royal palace.

Burning of royal palace.

The king vainly attempted to stem the onslaught at the bridge-head. His fighting elephant was wounded, and turning back upon his own forer caused a panic. Harṣa managed to retire across the bridge to the palace, but the fire which the Dāmaras laid to adjoining buildings, soon forced him to leave it with the mounted troops that remained around him.⁷⁷ Seventeen ladies of the royal household, among them the chief queen Vasantalekha, who was a princess of the Śāhi house, burned themselves on a pavilion of the palace from which they had watched the approaching doom.⁷⁸ Then the palace was sacked and set on fire by plundering Dāmaras who were joined by the city-mob.

Desertion of Harṣa's followers.

The king was anxious to die fighting, but paralyzed by his misfortune could not nerve himself for a resolute step. As swayed by the conflicting counsels of his confidants he moved about helplessly, more and more of the remaining troops deserted. Others who were faithfully attached to him, Harṣa himself despatched to follow up his son Bhoja, who had previously fled with a few attendants. Among those sent on this futile errand was also the faithful Chappaka, Kalhaṇa's father, whose departure at this critical time the Chronicler has taken special care to explain to us.⁷⁹ Curiously enough Uccala, after seeing the palace burned, had retired again to the right river bank, and by this want of prompt resolve had left Harṣa another chance of escape. But the doomed king failed to make use of it. His soldiers dispersed, and after he had vainly endeavoured to find a refuge in the houses of various grandees, he found himself deserted by all but his devoted personal attendant Prayāga, and Mukta, a cook of one of Chappaka's followers.⁸⁰

Harṣa's flight.

Kalhaṇa gives us a pathetic description of the unfortunate king's flight from the city by night and in pouring rain. Its interest is considerably increased by the evident fact that Kalhaṇa, as already explained above, had derived his detailed account of these closing scenes of Harṣa's life directly or indirectly from the only surviving witness, the menial of his father's household.⁸¹ Neglecting in a fatal confusion of mind the last means of reaching a safe retreat, the king was ultimately driven to seek shelter in the miserable hut of a low-class mendicant in some locality near the right river bank below Śrinagar.⁸² While in hiding there, next day Harṣa suffered the fresh grief of hearing the news of the death of Bhoja, who had been treacherously murdered on his flight by his own servant. In utmost anguish and exhausted by hunger he then passed a second night in the mendicant's hut, constantly fearing betrayal.⁸³ He had not to wait long. Prayāga's efforts to obtain food in their desperate straits led to the king's refuge becoming known to a ⁷⁵ vii. 1498-1537.

⁷⁶ See Memoir, § 94.

⁷⁷ vii. 1547-65.

⁷⁸ vii. 1570 sqq.

⁷⁹ vii. 1586 sqq.

⁸⁰ vii. 1597-1623.

⁸¹ See above, § 2.

⁸² The exact position of Harṣa's last refuge cannot be ascertained as the temple of Pratāpavarīśa, near which the mendicant's hut stood, is otherwise unknown.

⁸³ vii. 1650-77.

supporter of Uccala. Soldiers were sent to capture or kill him. When Harṣa saw the hut surrounded, he made Mukta, the cook, leave him and prepared to sell his life dearly. Then, after a desperate resistance which redeemed the disgrace of his fall and flight, Harṣa together with Prayāga was slain fighting, on the 5th day of the bright half of Bhādrapada, A.D. 1101. He had reached the age of forty-two years.⁸¹ His head was cut off and carried before Uccala, who had it burned, while his body, naked like that of a pauper, was cremated by a compassionate wood-dealer.

Harṣa killed
(A.D. 1101).

Kaḷhaṇa in closing his account of Harṣa's tragic end gives us the king's horoscope, and explains how it foretold that he would become a destroyer of his own family. But the birth-date of Harṣa, as recorded by Kaḷhaṇa himself, is not in agreement with the astrological data of the horoscope, and it is thus evident that the latter, as might à priori be suspected, was fabricated after the event.⁸²

SECTION VI.—THE SECOND LOHARA DYNASTY.

108. Kaḷhaṇa's narrative of the half century of Kaśmīr history, which lies between the fall of Harṣa and the date of the composition of the Chronicle, fills not less than 3449 Śloka and thus forms close on one-half of the whole work. We have already elsewhere endeavoured to explain the causes of this diffuseness, which neither the importance nor the intrinsic interest of the events described can justify from the point of view of the modern reader. The advantages of this lengthy treatment have also been already indicated. They lie chiefly in the authenticity and ample detail of the picture which Kaḷhaṇa has given us here of contemporary Kaśmīr in its political and social aspects. The object of our present abstract of the contents of Book viii. cannot be an analysis of these details, but only a synopsis of the leading events of the period and of those incidents which help us best to realize the conditions of contemporary life. We must endeavour to condense our abstract, as otherwise we should experience a difficulty in keeping sight of the main course of events and the true points of interest amidst the maze of court intrigues and petty affairs of state and war which Kaḷhaṇa details to us in such indiscriminate profusion.

In the race for Harṣa's crown, UCCALA, the elder of the two sons of Malla, had proved successful. But his position at the commencement of his reign was very precarious. The leaders of the Dāmaras, to whose rebellion he owed the throne, behaved as the true rulers in the land, and Sussala, his ambitious younger brother, was ready to rise against him. In order to secure safety from Sussala, he ceded to him the Lohara territory as an independent chiefship.¹ Against the great feudal landholders, Uccala protected himself by a dexterous use of Macchiavellian policy. By fomenting among them jealousy and mutual suspicion, he secured the murder or exile of their most influential leaders, without himself incurring the odium. Then, reassured in his own position, he openly turned upon the Dāmaras and forced them into disarmament and submission.²

UCCALA
(A.D. 1101-11).

⁸¹ vii. 1717.

⁸² Compare note vii. 1719-20.

¹ viii. 8 sqq.

² viii. 39 sqq.

Uccala's character.

Kalhana's description shows Uccala, on the whole, to have been a capable and fairly energetic ruler. His considerate regard for the common people and his liberality are particularly praised.⁴ It was probably with a view to securing the attachment of the lower classes as a safeguard against feudal turbulence and ambition, that he carried out a systematic persecution of officials (kīyastha), which Kalhana describes with humour and evident relish.⁵ Uccala's sense of justice and his skill in administering it are illustrated by an anecdote which, whether authentic or not, gives us a glimpse of the conditions affecting petty trade at the period.⁶ Kalhana does not hide from us the defects in Uccala's character, among which jealousy of personal merits in others and harshness of temper and speech seem to have been prominent.⁶ The pleasure he took in forcing those who excited his jealousy into bloody combats with each other, was due as much to innate cruelty as to cunning policy.

Rise of pretenders.

Not much time passed before Uccala's throne was threatened by an invasion of Sussala, who swept down from the mountains of Lohur to oust his brother. But Uccala was on the alert, and after a short campaign Sussala was driven to take refuge in Dard territory from where he regained his own hills with difficulty.⁷ The attempts of other pretenders proved even more futile. But, on the other hand, there grew up abroad a dangerous claimant to the crown in the person of Bhikṣacura, the young son of Bhoja and a grandson of Harsha. Uccala had spared the child at the time of his usurpation, and had him brought up at his own court. Subsequently, when the boy excited his suspicion, he endeavoured to have him put out of the way. But Bhikṣacura was saved by a relative of his family and taken to the court of Naravarman, of Malava, who gave him shelter. It is of interest to note that Naravarman, one of the later Paramara princes, is shown by inscriptional record to have ruled Malava in A.D. 1101/5.⁸ The escape of Bhikṣacura is placed by Kalhana about the same time, when Sussala had a son born, Jayasinha, the future king (A.D. 1105/6).⁹

Conspiracy against Uccala.

The birth of Jayasinha is said to have brought about a reconciliation between the two brothers. But while peace was thus secured to the land a conspiracy developed which was destined to bring Uccala's reign to a violent close. It was started by the city-prefect Chudḍa and his brothers, who, though born in humble circumstances, were ambitious enough to aspire to royal power. Their pretensions were based on their alleged descent from Kāmadeva, the grandfather of King Yaśaskara.¹⁰ The conspirators secured the adherence of several high officials whom Uccala had dismissed and otherwise slighted, and laid a plot for the king's life which at last proved successful. They attacked the king at night in the palace, as unarmed and attended only by a few followers he was proceeding to the seraglio. Uccala fought with desperate bravery, but was soon overpowered by his numerous assailants and cruelly murdered (Decembor 8th, A.D. 1111).¹¹

RAPPA-S'ANKHA-
RĀJA, king for one night (A.D. 1111).

109. Rappa, a brother of Chudḍa, seated himself the same night on the blood-stained throne, assuming the name of S'ankharāja, but held it only till the following morning.¹² Kalhana's narrative, after relating Uccala's murder, shows a lacuna which does not allow us to follow exactly what happened immediately after

⁴ viii. 46 sqq.

⁵ viii. 85 sqq.

⁶ viii. 123-158.

⁷ viii. 182 sqq.

⁸ viii. 191-208.

⁹ See viii. 255 sqq., and note viii. 228.

¹⁰ viii. 238.

¹¹ viii. 256 sqq.

¹² viii. 303 sqq.

¹³ viii. 342, 356.

the murder. We see, however, that Radḍa and his fellow-conspirators' overthrow was effected by Gargacandra, the leading Dāmara of the Lahara district, who under the special favour of Uccala had gained great power.¹³ Gargacandra after a short struggle overpowered the traitors and avenged his master's death in the blood of Radḍa and his chief followers.

As soon as Gargacandra had arranged for the burning of Uccala's queens he looked about for a successor to the crown. Finding no one fit to act as regent for Uccala's infant-son, he then quickly had SALHAṆA, a half-brother of Uccala, crowned as king.¹⁴ Sussala, who had received news of his brother's murder, one day and a half after the occurrence, had lost no time in starting for Kasmīr to assert his claim. He was still on the march when Gargacandra's messenger met him with the report of the subsequent events. Undismayed Sussala pushed forward, but found himself at Huṣkapura opposed by Gargacandra's troops. The small force with which Sussala had undertaken his adventurous march, proved unequal to the contest, and Sussala had to flee. He escaped with difficulty down the Vitasta Valley, and reaching the Kasmīr frontier at Vīrānaka, regained Lohara by difficult marches across the snow-covered mountains.¹⁵

SALHAṆA
(A.D. 1111-12).

Salhaṇa, indolent and helpless, proved a mere puppet by the side of Gargacandra, 'the king-maker,' who was the true power in the land. While anarchy reigned throughout the country, Salhaṇa, with his brother Loṭhana, indulged in low pleasures at the capital.¹⁶ Rival grandees, with the king's connivance, openly attacked Gargacandra there, but failed to destroy his predominance. Retiring to the Sind Valley, the seat of his power, the Dāmara leader then opened negotiations with Sussala.¹⁷ The latter did not fail to seize the favourable moment. He entered the Valley through Varāhamūla, and was soon joined by the troops which Salhaṇa had sent against him. After accepting two daughters of Gargacandra as brides for himself and his son Jayasinha, Sussala occupied the capital and proceeded to besiege Salhaṇa in the palace. After a day passed in apprehension of treachery on the part of Gargacandra, some resolute followers of Sussala at last broke into the barricaded palace and made Salhaṇa prisoner (Vaiśakha, A.D. 1112). His reign had lasted not fully four months.¹⁸

SUSSALA
(A.D. 1112-20)

SUSSALA's character is described by Kalhaṇa as resembling that of Uccala in many points.¹⁹ But his long fruitless struggles seem to have added to his natural harshness and to have developed a leaning towards cruelty, which the Chronicler does not attempt to palliate. The end of his brother was a warning example and fully justified the suspicion with which Sussala surrounded himself. But this, as well as another safeguard he adopted—the hoarding of treasures in the family-stronghold, Lohara—naturally impaired his popularity. His rule was one long succession of internal troubles, caused by rebellions of powerful Dāmaras whom Sussala in vain endeavoured to subdue completely.

Within one month of his entry into Srinagar Sussala had to face a dangerous rising of Gargacandra and his influential relatives who owned large estates in districts outside Lahara. The king had to carry Gargacandra's fortified seats in regular sieges before he could force this great feudal lord into submission.²⁰ Safe

¹³ viii. 43 sq.

¹⁴ viii. 371 sqq.

¹⁵ viii. 379-411; for Vīrānaka, see note v.
214.

¹⁶ viii. 415 sqq.

¹⁷ viii. 427 sqq.

¹⁸ viii. 450-480.

¹⁹ viii. 482 sqq.

²⁰ viii. 502 sqq.

from Gargacandra's side, he was then able to proceed to the Lohara castle, where he imprisoned Sathaya and Lathana, and renewed his alliance with the chiefs of the neighbouring hill-tribes. Sahasramūṣala and other nobles whom Sussala had exiled, then attempted his overthrow by incursions from the Cināb Valley.²¹ But their efforts soon lost importance when a serious pretender appeared on the scene in the person of Bhikṣucara, Harṣa's grandson. The young prince, whose escape to the court of Naravarman of Mālava has already been mentioned, fell in at Kuruksetra (Thānōśvar) with a party of hill-chiefs from Canquā, Vallāpura, and the adjacent valleys, who were on a pilgrimage to that Tirtha.²² The chiefs espoused the cause of the youthful claimant of the Kāśmīr throne, and formed marriage alliances with him. But the invasion they planned into Kāśmīr was frustrated by internal feuds, and Bhikṣucara for a time had to abandon his ambitious aim.²³

110. Sussala seems to have utilized the short interval of comparative rest to increase his resources by a more exacting revenue administration. For this purpose he raised the Kayastha Guṇadeva to the prime ministership, and allowed a free hand to his class-followers whose oppression benighted his treasury, but also fostered discontent.²⁴ About the year 1117 Sussala felt himself strong enough to curb the power of Gargacandra, against whom his suspicion had been aroused by intrigues. For this purpose he raised a rival in Mallakoṣṭha, a Dāmarā of Lohara, who was an enemy of Gargacandra. After several encounters the latter was brought to bay high up in the Sind Valley and forced to surrender.²⁵ When some months later his position in Lohara had become untenable owing to the aggrandizement of his rival Mallakoṣṭha, Gargacandra repaired to the royal court. Sussala then took an early opportunity of imprisoning him together with his three sons, his own brothers-in-law, and finally had them all strangled (A.D. 1118).²⁶

In the same year Sussala led an expedition against Somapāla, chief of Rājapuri, who had invited the pretender Bhikṣucara to his court. Though successful in the attack on Rājapuri, Sussala failed to establish there Nāgapāla, Somapāla's brother and rival, and after an occupation of seven months was obliged to retire to Kāśmīr in the spring A.D. 1119.²⁷ The discontent created by ill-advised measures of administration and oppressive imposts first broke out into open rebellion within the Lohara district. The imprisonment of prominent Dāmaras who happened to be in Sussala's power, failed to allay the general unrest. Prthvīhara, a valiant Dāmarā, formed a league of territorial lords in the eastern part of the Valley, and by the spring of the year 1120 the rising of the Dāmaras was general.²⁸ While the Brahmans, exasperated by these troubles, vainly held their solemn fasts, Sussala's troops suffered repeated defeats at the hands of the rebels. When their attacks threatened the capital, the enraged Sussala had the Dāmaras whom he held as hostages executed with provoking cruelty.²⁹ Mallakoṣṭha then brought Bhikṣucara, who had approached from the Cināb Valley, into Kāśmīr, and thus gave the revolt unity and a well-defined object. Sussala's injudicious conduct disheartened his officers and troops, while the populace of the capital, whose fickleness and credulity Kalhana describes with much humour, was clamouring for the advent of the pretender.³⁰

Operations against Gargacandra.

Rising of Dāmaras,
A.D. 1120.

²¹ viii. 584 sq.
²² viii. 587 sqq.
²³ viii. 549 sqq.
²⁴ viii. 560 sqq.
²⁵ viii. 581-601.

²⁶ viii. 605 sqq.
²⁷ viii. 621 sqq.
²⁸ viii. 661.
²⁹ viii. 676 sqq.
³⁰ viii. 697-711.

A fresh victory of Prṭhivihara induced Sussala prudently to send away his family to the safe retreat of the Lohara castle. In the month of S'rāvāṇa Bhikṣācara joined Mallakoṣṭha in the Sind Valley, and soon after the ring of the rebel forces closed around S'rīnagar.³¹ During the intermittent siege which followed, Sussala defended the city with valour, and the Dāmaras, notwithstanding isolated successes in the environs, failed to penetrate the defences of the capital. In one engagement the loss of the rebels is put at two hundred and fifty men,³² which leads us to suppose that the fighting must have been serious notwithstanding the long-protracted crisis. Inside the city Sussala had to contend with Brahman assemblies which, by holding solemn fasts, endeavoured to assume the direction of affairs. Treachery, too, was ripe among the troops and their leaders, and desertions to the rebels were of daily occurrence.³³ Dissensions among the latter delayed the catastrophe; but ultimately an émeute of soldiers in the city itself forced Sussala to look to his personal safety. On the 6th vadi of Mārgaśīras, 1120, Sussala marched out of S'rīnagar followed by some faithful troops, and after bribing dangerous opponents on the road to gain a free passage, ultimately reached Lohara with a few attendants.³⁴ On Sussala's departure the officials and troops in S'rīnagar made common cause with the Dāmaras, and Bhikṣācara was in triumph installed as king.

Sussala besieged in S'rīnagar.

Sussala retires to Lohara.

BHIKṢĀCARA
(A.D. 1120-21).

111. The restoration of Harṣa's lineage was destined to be of short duration. BHIKṢĀCARA, inexperienced and sensual by nature, was too busily engaged in tasting the pleasures of his newly-gained throne to concern himself with its safety.³⁵ The people throughout the land were at the mercy of Dāmara bands, who brooked no control, while rival ministers contended in the capital for what was left of regal power. The jealousy of the chief leaders of the Dāmaras, Prṭhivihara and Mallakoṣṭha, led to violent quarrels which increased the confusion reigning in all affairs of state. Trade came to a stand-still, and money became scarce.³⁶ In the midst of such troubles Bimba, Bhikṣācara's prime minister, led an expedition against Lohara. He secured the alliance of Somapāla, the chief of Rajapuri, and was joined also by a force of 'Turushkas,' i.e. Muhammadans, under Sallāra (Persian Sālār?) Vismaya.³⁷ In Vaiśākha, 1121, Sussala met the invaders at Parnotsa, the present Pūnch, south of Lohara, and routed them completely. Joined by the Kashmirian soldiers who quickly deserted Bimba, Sussala then started on the march to reconquer Kāśmīr. His return was eagerly awaited by the people, who had lost their illusions about Bhikṣācara's rule. Brahman assemblies, attended by numerous Purohita-corporations, held solemn fasts directed against him, and the helpless prince, who had no resources, failed to appease them.³⁸ On Sussala's approach many of Bhikṣācara's former partisans came over to him. Marching rapidly from Huṣkapura Sussala unexpectedly appeared before S'rīnagar, and unopposed by Bhikṣācara, once more entered his capital after an absence of little over six months (Jyāistha, 1121).³⁹

The ousted pretender then retired under Prṭhivihara's protection to the territory of Somapāla, where he established himself at Puṣyānanāḍa (the present Puṣiāna), at the southern foot of the Pīr Pantgāl Pass. From this convenient place of refuge Prṭhivihara made soon a fresh irruption, and securing the help of

SUSSALA restored
(A.D. 1121-28).

³¹ viii. 723 sqq.

³² viii. 749.

³³ viii. 768 sqq.

³⁴ viii. 807-827.

³⁵ viii. 849 sqq.

³⁶ viii. 882 sqq.

³⁷ viii. 884 sqq.

³⁸ viii. 898 sqq.

³⁹ viii. 954.

some Dāmaras whom Sussala had failed to win over, attacked and defeated the royal troops at Vijayesvara.¹⁰ The victorious Dāmaras burned the famous temple of Cakrudhara, in which many people of the neighbourhood had sought an asylum—an act of sacrilege which Kālhana declares the turning point in Bhikṣaśara's fortune.¹¹

Contest with Bhikṣaśara.

During the fights which followed this event, Bhikṣaśara acquired military experience and displayed personal bravery. But the repeated successes he gained over Sussala's troops led to no decisive result; for his increasing energy and strength roused apprehensions among his Dāmaras partisans, who thought their own interests best protected by a continuance of the civil war.¹² Sussala turned this disposition of the hostile Dāmaras to his own advantage, and ultimately forced Bhikṣaśara to retreat again to Pasyāpanada for the winter. Sussala used this respite to free himself by imprisonment or exile of those Kāśmiri ministers and troop-leaders whose treachery he had learned to fear by experience, and replaced them by foreigners.¹³ Early in 1122 Bhikṣaśara returned with his adherents. Sussala, after gaining some advantages near Vijayesvara, had to retire to Srinagar, and lost heavily on his passage of the Gaubhira river.¹⁴ A protracted siege of Srinagar followed during which Sussala could hold his own only owing to the devotion and courage of his Rajput condottieri, who seem to have come from the hill regions south of Kāśmir and from the Panjab.¹⁵ A great assault which the Dāmaras made upon the city from the south east, led to a defeat of Bhikṣaśara on the Gopidri hill (Pūḡṭ-i-Sulaimān).¹⁶ It did not break the Dāmaras power, but allowed Sussala once more to assume the offensive. The rest of the year passed over fights with varying fortune in different parts of the Valley.

Siege of Srinagar.
Famine (A.D. 1123).

112. The following year, 1123, brought still greater sufferings for the exhausted country. In the spring the host of Dāmaras again gathered around Srinagar and a desperate siege ensued.¹⁷ Its horrors were increased by a great conflagration, which laid the whole city in ashes.¹⁸ Sussala, in this critical situation, succeeded in dispersing the besieging host, but found himself soon confronted by a fresh calamity. The fire had destroyed the great food-stores containing the rice required for the consumption of the city population.¹⁹ As communication with the villages was blocked by the Dāmaras, who also seized the new produce, the capital underwent a terrible famine which cost many lives.

Sussala, disheartened by so many calamities and the death of his favourite queen Meghamāñjari which occurred at that time, was thinking of abdication. With this view he had his eldest son Jayasūmha brought from the castle of Lohara and crowned as king on the first day of Āśāḍha, 1123.²⁰ Sussala, however, changed his mind and retained the government in his own hands. Owing to the denunciations of intriguers he subsequently came to distrust his son, and even placed him under surveillance. After Jayasūmha's formal coronation, Sussala gradually succeeded in effecting at least an outward pacification of the country.

¹⁰ viii. 968 sqq.

¹¹ viii. 971-996.

¹² See viii. 1028, 1032 sq.

¹³ viii. 1040 sqq.

¹⁴ viii. 1063 sqq.

¹⁵ For a list of such foreign soldiers of fortune, see viii. 1083-86.

¹⁶ viii. 1104 sqq.

¹⁷ viii. 1165 sqq.

¹⁸ viii. 1169 sqq.

¹⁹ For the time-honoured system under which the population of Srinagar was fed on the rice collected as revenue and stored in the city, see note viii. 1206.

²⁰ viii. 1127 sqq.

He was aided in this by the want of union among the leading Dāmaras, and at last subdued them in turn. Bhikṣācara, however, remained at large, having found a refuge with some of his Dāmara supporters in the Śamālā district.⁵¹

In order to destroy his arch-enemy Sussala had made a secret pact with Utpala, the treacherous agent of Tikka, a powerful baron in the Devasarasa district. Utpala promised to kill Bhikṣācara and his own master.⁵² In reality, however, he informed the latter of the king's intention and plotted for the death of Sussala. By the intimacy into which the king had allowed himself to be drawn with the scheming traitor, he himself offered the opportunity for the execution of the design. Not heeding the warnings of his trusted servants, he received without them and unattended by guards, Utpala and some other conspirators, and thus fell an easy prey to their murderous plot, on the new moon day of Phālguna, 1128.⁵³ Though the number of Utpala's accomplices was small, a general stampede of the royal guards and attendants ensued, which allowed the murderers not only to retreat in safety, but to carry off their victim's head as well as his body.

It appears from Kalhana's narrative that JAYASIMHA was, at the time of the murder, in the capital, but in a residence distant from the royal palace. To assure his safety he proclaimed a general amnesty, and called to his help Pañcacaandra, who had succeeded to his father Gargacandra's estates in Lahara.⁵⁴ On the day following the murder, Bhikṣācara was marching on Śrinagar, but heavy snowfall delayed him on the road, and in the meantime Pañcacaandra joined the new king. His sudden attack threw Bhikṣācara's rapidly-gathered host into disorder, and their flight left Jayasimha in possession of the capital.⁵⁵ Trusty officers of Sussala were hurrying towards the city with their troops, and when some of these had succeeded in cutting their way through the Dāmara bands which infested the roads, Jayasimha's position became more assured.⁵⁶

When Bhikṣācara, after the melting of the snow, was marching upon the city with the collected Dāmara force, Sujji, the best of Sussala's foreign troop-leaders, met him on the bank of the Gambhīrā and repulsed him with great loss.⁵⁷ Other successes of the royal troops followed, and as Lakṣmaka, Jayasimha's chief adviser, brought over most of the influential Dāmaras by judicious bribes, Bhikṣācara was at last forced to retire from Kāśmīr.⁵⁸ Within four months of Sussala's murder Jayasimha found himself at least nominally master of the land. But Kalhana justly observes that the elements of unrest, "the Dāmaras who were like kings," had remained uncurbed, while the resources of the people and the king alike were well-nigh exhausted by the preceding struggles.⁵⁹

113. Kalhana when attempting a description of Jayasimha's character, justly insists that in judging of his conduct and achievements as a ruler it is necessary to take into consideration the state of affairs which he found at the commencement of his reign.⁶⁰ Since the revolution, which had brought the family of Malla to the throne, the land-holding barons, big and small, had obtained a share of independence, which even in times of comparative peace must have seriously curtailed the king's power and authority. The fortified residences of the Dāmaras, frequently mentioned by the term upavāsana, were, like the castles of medieval feudal lords,

Plot of Utpala.

Sussala murdered
(A.D. 1128).

JAYASIMHA
(A.D. 1128-49).

Condition of Kāśmīr.
Power of feudal lords.

⁵¹ viii. 1259 sqq.

⁵² viii. 1246 sqq.

⁵³ viii. 1287-1348.

⁵⁴ viii. 1349 sqq.

⁵⁵ viii. 1383 sqq.

⁵⁶ viii. 1402 sqq.

⁵⁷ viii. 1437 sqq.

⁵⁸ viii. 1525 sqq.

⁵⁹ viii. 1544 sqq.

⁶⁰ viii. 1548.

centres of territorial divisions in which, though they may have often comprised not more than a couple of villages, the king's authority could assert itself only by armed force at times of unrest. This condition of things continued for centuries after Kalhana's time, far into the Muhammadan period, and its recollection still lingers in the tradition of the agricultural population of Kāśmīr.⁴¹

Sussala's reign of sixteen years had passed in a succession of attempts to break the power of the territorial barons by sheer force of arms. But these endeavours, notwithstanding the personal courage and the perseverance which Sussala had displayed in them, had failed in their object. Jayasinha had succeeded to the throne in the midst of an open rebellion, when the land was still suffering from the many wounds caused by the preceding struggles.

Jayasinha's policy.

If, notwithstanding these ominous predicaments, he was able to secure a footing and to maintain his rule for twenty-seven years in comparative safety, we must ascribe this result mainly to a change of policy closely connected with his personal character. This presents itself clearly enough in Kalhana's detailed narrative. We see from it that what Jayasinha chiefly relied upon in his initial struggles and subsequent political relations was cunning, diplomacy and unscrupulous intrigue. Kalhana has nowhere to tell us of acts of personal bravery of the king, but on the other hand gives us ample proof of his skill in plotting and of his self-possession. By the side of these qualities we note a conspicuous want of firmness and decision which accounts for the ascendancy gained over the king by a succession of favourites. This moral defect, probably, also prevented him from reaping more permanent advantages from otherwise well designed measures, and may explain some acts of striking ingratitude and treachery for which it would be difficult to assign any serious political motives.

Bhikṣācara's return.

Lakṣmaka, who was at the head of affairs during the early period of Jayasinha's reign, had purchased a brief interval of peace from the Dāmaras, during which Utpala, Sussala's murderer, was captured and killed. But in the autumn of the same year fresh troubles broke out and Bhikṣācara returned in rapid marches from the south.⁴² The measures adopted by Sujji, the brave commander-in-chief, discomfited the rebels and forced the pretender once more to retire. Sujji, however, himself was soon driven into exile through the jealousy of Lakṣmaka and other courtiers, and there joined in the schemes which Bhikṣācara and other refugees were preparing for the overthrow of Jayasinha.⁴³ Bhikṣācara, impatient to renew the struggle, proceeded to the Kāśmīr frontier without awaiting Sujji, and was watching for the rising of his Dāmara allies when the approach of a force, sent against him by Jayasinha, obliged him to throw himself into the castle of Bāṇasāla, held by a Khasa chief, at the southern foot of the Bān-lāl Pass.⁴⁴ There he was besieged by the royal troops in the spring, 1130, and ultimately betrayed by the Khasas whom Lakṣmaka had bribed. The Dāmaras, who had followed the royal camp with treacherous designs, were outwitted or bought off by Lakṣmaka and shamefully abandoned Bhikṣācara to his doom. Deserted by the Khasas and his own followers, the unlucky pretender bravely faced the soldiers sent for his capture and sold his life dearly.⁴⁵

Bhikṣācara killed (A.D. 1130).

Rebellion at Lohara.

Jayasinha, who had watched the issue at Vijayaṭvara from a safe distance, ⁴¹ See note viii. 1070 for upaveśana and the tradition about the kottarāṭṭyas* into which the land was divided.

⁴² viii. 1584 sqq.

⁴³ viii. 1626 sqq.

⁴⁴ viii. 1665 sqq.

⁴⁵ viii. 1702-76.

had scarcely received the cut-off head of his most dangerous enemy when news reached him of an unexpected catastrophe and the appearance of a new rival. Loṭhana, who had been imprisoned with his brother Salhana on the accession of Sussala, had outlived his elder brother, and was still kept in captivity in the Lohara castle. A conspiracy among the officials in charge had set him free from his fetters one night while the trusted commander was by chance absent. When the latter hastened back in the morning he found Loṭhana crowned as king and in possession of all the treasure which Sussala had hoarded at Lohara.⁶⁶

Jayasimha, realizing the danger arising from the loss of the family stronghold, despatched a considerable force under Lakṣmaka across the mountains to retake Lohara. The blockade by which the Kāśmīrian leaders endeavoured to reduce the hill-fortress, produced no result, until at last the dangerous summer fevers of the surrounding valleys and the approach of a force from Rajapuri, led by Sujji, obliged the royal troops to boat a retreat towards Kāśmīr.⁶⁷ On the difficult mountain route which they took and which, owing to Kulhana's accurate description, I was still able to trace, this retreat soon developed into a complete rout.⁶⁸ During the stampede of the Kāśmīrians, whose cowardice and previous bravado are humorously described, Lakṣmaka was made a captive.⁶⁹ Of those who escaped to Kāśmīr, thousands are said to have died from fatal fevers contracted during the expedition. Lakṣmaka was subsequently ransomed from the chief of Rajapuri, and returning to Kāśmīr resumed his position as Jayasimha's chief adviser.

114. Loṭhana, who thus remained in undisputed possession of Lohara, made Sujji his minister, and maintained himself with his help for a time against the intrigues by which Jayasimha endeavoured to regain his lost possession.⁷⁰ But already in the following winter (Phālguna, 1131) Loṭhana was deposed by a conspiracy of his former partisans in favour of Mallārjuna, a son of Sussala and half-brother of Jayasimha, who was kept as a prisoner in the Lohara castle.⁷¹ Mallārjuna proved a very feeble ruler and squandered in wanton extravagance the great treasures which had been deposited by Sussala at Lohara. In fear of the troops which Jayasimha despatched against him, Mallārjuna agreed to pay tribute.⁷² His position at Lohara was again and again threatened by attacks of his uncle, the deposed Loṭhana, who had secured the support of the powerful Dāmara refugee Koṣṭheśvara, a son of Pṛthvīhara. The latter, profiting by these feuds between uncle and nephew, established himself practically as master in the valleys around Lohara, and made also Mallārjuna's hold on the castle precarious. Jayasimha then won over Koṣṭheśvara, and, seizing the favourable opportunity, sent a force under Sujji, whom he had previously recalled to Kāśmīr and reinstated in his offices, to retake Lohara. Thereupon Mallārjuna abandoned the stronghold and fled to Rajapuri territory.⁷³ Sujji did not long enjoy the credit of having recovered Lohara. For Jayasimha, whom the calumnies of his courtiers and a feeling of jealousy had rendered suspicious of Sujji, secretly encouraged intrigues against that valiant minister. When Sujji became aware of these, and was taking counter-measures, the king himself had him treacherously murdered through one of his own officers (A.D.

Siege of Lohara
(A.D. 1130).

Loṭhana, ruler at Lohara.

Mallārjuna ousts Loṭhana.

Lohara retaken.

Murder of Sujji
(A.D. 1133).

⁶⁶ viii. 1794 sqq.

⁶⁷ viii. 1865 sqq.

⁶⁸ See Note E (iv. 177), § 10.

⁶⁹ viii. 1879 sqq.

⁷⁰ viii. 1921 sqq.

⁷¹ viii. 1941 sqq.

⁷² viii. 1947 sqq.

⁷³ viii. 1989-2024.

1133).⁷¹ When the foul deed was done, Jayasimha, who had been anxiously awaiting the result, breathed freely again, and turning with vigour upon the relatives and adherents of Snijji, had them cruelly killed. The murderer of Snijji, Kulārāja, was rewarded with the office of city-prefect, while Sanjupala, Snijji's rival and the king's helpmate in the plot, was raised to the position of commander-in-chief.⁷²

Irruption and capture of Mallār-juna (A.D. 1135).

Jayasimha by similar means endeavoured to rid himself of Koṣṭheśvara, the powerful Dāmara, who had returned to Kaśmīr. The attempt at murder failed, but after some fighting the Dāmara was obliged to flee abroad, where he joined Mallārjuna on the occasion of a Kurukṣetra pilgrimage.⁷³ The two then endeavoured to stir up a rebellion in Kaśmīr, and for this purpose betook themselves to a mountain plateau on the Pīr Pāntsal Range. When their roving inroads were checked by the royal troops posted in the neighbourhood of their fastness,⁷⁴ Koṣṭheśvara once more made peace with the king, and Mallārjuna fled southwards. On his retreat he was stopped by a loyal local chief in Lohara territory.⁷⁵ The description of the precautions taken by the envoy whom Jayasimha sent to secure the pretender, shows us clearly that the routes through the mountains forming the southern border of Kaśmīr were entirely at the mercy of marauding Kūṣāṇ hill-men.⁷⁶ Mallārjuna ignominiously surrendered, and was in the autumn, 1135, safely imprisoned at Śrīnagar.

Jayasimha next succeeded by means of a treacherous attack in securing the person of Koṣṭheśvara and his brother Catuska, and subsequently rid himself by murder also of another powerful Dāmara, Vijaya of Kalyāṇapura.⁷⁷ About this time there died Citraratha who after Snijji's death had been Jayasimha's most influential minister, and was succeeded by Śrīgāra.⁷⁸ The latter had risen from a humble position and by doubtful means. But his administration appears to have been effective, and to this we may perhaps partly attribute the period of rest which the country enjoyed during the years immediately following.

Jayasimha's pious foundations.

Kalhana indicates this peaceful interval by describing the various acts of piety performed by Jayasimha, and the numerous pious foundations made about the same period by ministers and others.⁷⁹ It is characteristic that Jayasimha himself is mainly praised for his restorations of ruined temples, Maṭhas, etc. This form of the king's pious activity is easily understood if we take into account on the one hand the great damages which the long civil wars and consequent neglect must have caused to sacred buildings, and on the other the limited extent of the resources which the exhausted land could furnish. Of the structures ascribed to the various ministers and other members of Jayasimha's court, none can be traced in ruins or in other records, and it is highly probable that notwithstanding Kalhana's fulsome praise they were also of a modest description. The friendly relations with distant foreign kingdoms which Kalhana mentions in the same connection as indications of the splendour of Jayasimha's rule at this prosperous period, are, however, curiously attested by the description already quoted which the poet Mañkha gives of the Sabhā held by his brother Alankāra, one of Jayasimha's ministers. Among the Foreign relations.

⁷¹ viii. 2029-2162.

⁷² viii. 2163 sqq.

⁷³ It took place on occasion of a solar eclipse, probably that of the 23rd July, 1134; see note viii. 2320.

⁷⁴ It is of interest that Yavanas, i.e. Mahammadans, are mentioned among Jayasimha's soldiers; viii. 2364.

⁷⁵ viii. 2376 sqq.

⁷⁶ See note viii. 2283.

⁷⁷ viii. 2312 sqq.

⁷⁸ viii. 2357 sqq.

⁷⁹ viii. 2400-44.

persons present there are introduced to us the ambassadors of Govindacandra, king of Kanyakubja or Kanauj, and of Aparāditya, the Śīlāhara prince of the Konkan; both of these rulers are known to us from inscriptions.⁸⁴

115. Sometime before Ś'ṛiṅgāra's death, which seems to have occurred about 1140,⁸⁵ Jayasimha endeavoured to profit by troubles which had broken out among his Dard neighbours in the north after the death of their king, Yaśodhara, in order to extend his power in the direction of that territory.⁸⁶ The attempt proved fruitless, but induced Viḍḍasiha, who had made himself ruler over the Dards, to stir up trouble for Jayasimha himself. Encouraged by the Dards Lothana, the old pretender, who was a refugee in a hill tract outside Kāśmīr, joined in 1143 Alaukārācakra, a powerful Dāmara in the district of Karpāha, on the Upper Kiṣāṅgāṅgā. Relying on the help of the neighbouring Dards, with whose chief he was connected by relationship, this cunning territorial baron rose in open rebellion, nominally for Lothana's cause.⁸⁰ The unrest spread from the Kiṣāṅgāṅgā Valley into Kāśmīr proper and the danger of a general rising of the Dāmaras obliged Jayasimha to take active measures for the capture of his rival.

Lothana, who was accompanied by Vighararāja, a half-brother of Jayasimha, and Bhoja, a son of King Sallhana, at the approach of the royal troops took refuge in Ś'ṛiṣīlākoṭṭa, a hill-castle of Alaukārācakra on the Kiṣāṅgāṅgā.⁸⁷ In this stronghold, the position of which I succeeded in tracing, on a rocky ridge some miles below Ś'ardī and close to the border of the Dard portion of the Kiṣāṅgāṅgā Valley, Lothana and his princely followers underwent a memorable siege which Kulhapa describes in great detail. When Dhanya, Jayasimha's minister, had overcome the serious difficulties to military operations arising from the alpine climate of the locality and the lateness of the season, the fort was closely invested.⁸⁸ Alaukārācakra, its owner and defender, was looking upon Lothana and his relatives as hostages for his own safety, and took care to prevent their escape when it might still have been possible. After the siege had continued for some time, the food supplies of the defenders became exhausted, and even their access to water difficult. Bhoja, the most active of the rebel princes, made a desperate attempt to escape, but failed in his attempt to descend the precipitous cliffs which guarded the fort towards the river, and secretly again sought its shelter. The hard-pressed Dāmara then agreed to purchase the raising of the siege by delivering up Lothana and Vighararāja, while he retained Bhoja for future eventualities. Thus these two princes, too, came into the power of Jayasimha (Phalguṇa, 1144).⁸⁰

Bhoja who, after the betrayal of his relatives, saw good reason to distrust the Dāmara's intentions, managed to escape from the latter's stronghold with a few followers, and after an adventurous journey across the snow-covered mountains in the depth of winter, reached the Dard territory in safety.⁹⁰ Hospitably received by Viḍḍasiha, its ruler, he then received the offer of Rājavadana, an influential and discontented officer of Jayasimha, to raise a rebellion in his favour. Bhoja did not hesitate to accept the pact, and soon powerful Dāmaras like Trillaka and Catuška were in open revolt.⁹¹ While the king's ministers were attempting to suppress the

Expedition against
Dards.

Irruption of Lothana.

Siege of Ś'ṛiṣīlā Onṭle.

Lothana captured
(A.D. 1144).

⁸⁴ See note viii. 2453 and Report, p. 51.

⁸⁵ Compare viii. 2481 for the interval between Ś'ṛiṅgāra's death and the irruption of Lothana.

⁸⁶ viii. 2454 sqq.

⁸⁷ viii. 2481 sqq.

⁸⁸ viii. 2492 sqq.

⁸⁹ For a detailed explanation of the incidents of the siege, see Note I, viii. 2492.

⁹⁰ viii. 2641.

⁹¹ viii. 2704 sqq.

⁹² viii. 2718 sqq.

Invasion of Bhoja. revolted barons and disorder was rapidly spreading through the land, Bhoja approached from the north to claim the crown. He was accompanied by the Dard king, who had espoused his cause, and by allied Mleccha chiefs from the Upper Indus. Rājavadana guided the invading force, which reached unopposed the vicinity of the Volur lake.⁹² An ill-advised attack of the Dards met with a check and produced confusion. When subsequent intrigues of Nāga, a personal enemy of Rājavadana, had spread distrust against the latter, Bhoja's allies turned back to their native hills, and finally left Bhoja once more in the hands of Alanikāraṇkra, the Dāmara.⁹³ These events took place in the autumn, 1141.

Rājavadana's initial success had excited the jealousy of Triloka and other influential Dāmaras, who distrusted him as he was not one of their own class. They accordingly put up another leader of rebellion in Loṭhuka, a son of Sussala's old adversary, Prthivihara. His attack coming from the south of the Valley seriously threatened Jayasinha. But the efforts of the faithful minister Rihuna led to a defeat of the Dāmara just about the same time when the Dards retreated.⁹⁴

Intrigues of Rājavadana.

116. That these successes were not sufficient to completely reassure the king's cause is clearly indicated by the fact that Rājavadana and the rebellious Dāmaras were allowed to make their peace and to retain their possessions. Rājavadana did not abandon his intrigues, and in order to levy blackmail from the king, secured the person of Bhoja and placed him in a Kharu fort situated in the mountains west of Kramarājya.⁹⁵ The control Rājavadana thus had over a dangerous rival prevented Jayasinha from using any forcible means to break his ascendancy. The winter, 1144-45, passed in a protracted game of diplomatic moves between the king and Rājavadana in which Bhoja formed the prize. In this Rājavadana had the best, for he not only kept hold of the pretender, but also managed to rid himself, with the direct aid of the beguiled king, of Nāga, his old adversary.⁹⁶ The murder of the latter in the royal camp caused great commotion among his Dāmara relatives who now flocked to Rājavadana's side. It also alarmed Bhoja, who thereupon endeavoured to assure his safety by secretly treating with Jayasinha for his own surrender.

Surrender of Bhoja.

Kalhana's narrative, which in these concluding portions has suffered in clearness owing to the textual defects noted in a previous chapter,⁹⁷ treats us in somewhat wearisome detail to all petty incidents of the negotiations between the king and Bhoja.⁹⁸ The latter distrusting, not without good reason, Jayasinha's diplomacy, insisted on Kalhanikā, the chief-queen, mediating between them and acting as surety.⁹⁹ This rôle was accepted by the queen, who moved into camp towards the north-western frontier district to receive Bhoja on his surrender. This was not effected without much delay and mutual alarms; for the Dāmaras, gathering round Rājavadana, were eager for a fresh revolt and unwilling to let Bhoja slip out of their power. When the royal troops sent in advance to receive Bhoja were at last within close reach of the Dāmara camp, the danger of an open conflict seemed imminent. Finally, while the king's ministers were troubling for their safety, Bhoja put an end of the strained situation by open flight into the royal camp (Jyaisṭha, 1145).¹⁰⁰

⁹² viii. 2761 sqq.

⁹³ viii. 2844 sqq.

⁹⁴ viii. 2792-2840.

⁹⁵ viii. 2916 sqq.

⁹⁶ viii. 2962 sqq.

⁹⁷ See above, §§ 42, 43.

⁹⁸ viii. 3018 sqq.

⁹⁹ viii. 3068 sqq.

¹⁰⁰ viii. 3096-3179.

Jayasinha received his relative, who had ceased to be a dangerous rival, with kindness in the capital, presented him to the royal ladies and provided for his maintenance on a scale suited to his rank. Kalhana, who throughout shows sympathy for Bhoja, very distinct from his contemptuous treatment of the other pretenders, Lothana and Mallarjuna, draws a very favourable picture of his subsequent conduct at Jayasinha's court.¹⁰¹ When Bhoja had made his peace with Jayasinha, the incipient Dāmara rising collapsed. The powerful Trillaka, whom the king wished to curb, resisted at first with success the open attack made upon him by the royal troops, but was subsequently forced to humbly sue for his life. Rājavādāna, who had risen in rebellion, was also defeated, but bravely continued the struggle until treacherously murdered by bravos in Jayasinha's employ.¹⁰²

Disposing by similar means of other Dāmara leaders whom he had learned to fear, Jayasinha seems to have secured peace for the few remaining years which are dealt with in Kalhana's work. The coronation of Gulhana, Jayasinha's eldest son, who was still a child, as ruler of Lohara, took place at this time and was probably intended to secure his succession against future risks.¹⁰³ The Chronicler then records the death of several royal servants, who had played a part in his previous narrative, and furnishes us with some curious glimpses of contemporary municipal administration in the obituary of Kularāja, the worthy city-prefect, who had gained this position by his services at the murder of Snjji.¹⁰⁴

Subjection of Dāmaras.

References to some pious endowments of Jayasinha are followed by a longer list of various religious foundations made by members of his court and their families. This list, which looks like a supplement to the one previously given, furnishes some indications as to Kalhana's personal connections, and is of interest also as mentioning Mañkha, Kalhana's fellow-poet.¹⁰⁵ The concluding verses of Kalhana's work are devoted to an encomium on Jayasinha's queen Raddā and his children.¹⁰⁶ The four sons, who were born to him from Raddā besides Gulhana, were still in infancy. The names of three of them taken from kings prominent in Kāśmīr tradition, Jayāpīḍa, Lalitāditya, Yaśaskara, must obviously remind us of the grand names of Roman history which we find revived in the last reigns of the decaying Empire. Of Jayasinha's daughters one, Menilā, was married to Bhūpāla, the young chief of Rājapuri. Ghaṭotkaca, the husband of Rājyaśrī, seems to have been a princeling from the neighbouring hills, and to have distinguished himself by successful raids in the direction of Ūraśā or Hazāra.

Jayasinha's family.

The brief mention of these exploits closes Kalhana's account of contemporary Kāśmīr history which brings us down to the twenty-second year of Jayasinha's reign, A.D. 1149-50. From Jonarāja's work we learn that Jayasinha ruled for five years longer, during which he undertook a successful expedition against the 'Yavanas'.¹⁰⁷ But the later Chronicler's record is very brief and does not offer any supplement to the picture which Kalhana has drawn for us of Jayasinha and contemporary Kāśmīr.

¹⁰¹ viii. 3208-77.

¹⁰² viii. 3278-3315.

¹⁰³ viii. 3301 sqq. Coins of Gulhana are still extant.

¹⁰⁴ viii. 3333 sqq.

¹⁰⁵ See viii. 3343 sqq.; also above, § 6; for Mañkha, compare note viii. 3354.

¹⁰⁶ viii. 3371-3403.

¹⁰⁷ Jonar. 27-38.

SECTION VII.—KĀŚMĪR AFTER KALHAṆA.

117. The preceding analysis of the contents of Books vii. and viii. must have shown how small were the events, how limited the political interests and influences of that period of Kāśmīr history for which Kallhaṇa's work furnishes the fullest and most trustworthy information. Petty as a great part of this narrative must appear to us, its value from a historical point of view does not lie merely in the truthful picture it presents of contemporary life and local conditions. It also helps us considerably to understand the subsequent course of the political destinies of the country and to realize in it some leading features of Kāśmīr history generally.

We have seen that the century and a half which passed from the accession of the Lochara dynasty to the date of Kallhaṇa's Chronicle, represent a period filled for the greatest part by a succession of rebellions and internal disturbances of all kinds. Yet notwithstanding the signs of progressive political disorganization and consequent economical decay which are so manifest in Kallhaṇa's narrative, we look in vain for an indication of the serious risks of foreign conquest to which such a chronic condition of internal disorder might be supposed to have exposed the country, particularly from the south where, in the meantime, Muhammadan power had spread irresistibly through the whole of the Indian plains.

Later Hindu rule. Jonarāja's record shows that for nearly two centuries after Kallhaṇa's time Hindu rule maintained itself in Kāśmīr, though the princes were weak and helpless and the material prosperity of the Valley more and more failing. When at last Shāh Mir, a powerful condottiere who had come to Kāśmīr from the south, deposed Queen Koṣī, the widow of the last Hindu ruler, and founded a Muhammadan dynasty (A.D. 1339),¹ the change marked no revolution either in the foreign relations of Kāśmīr or in its internal conditions. Islām made its way into Kāśmīr not by forcible conquest but by gradual conversion, for which the influx of foreign adventurers both from the south and from Central Asia had prepared the ground.

Introduction of Islām.

118. The adoption of Islām by the great mass of the population which became an accomplished fact during the latter half of the fourteenth century but which probably began already towards the close of the Hindu rule, did neither affect the independence of the country nor at first materially change its political and cultural conditions. The administration remained as before in the hands of the traditional official class, the Brahmans, for whom a change of religion presented no advantage and who accordingly retained their inherited status, together with its literary traditions.² The fanatical bigotry of a single Muhammadan ruler, Sikandar, who

¹ Compare for Shāh Mir's usurpation, Jonar. (Bo. ed.), 339 sqq., for his origin, ib. 142 sqq.

² The conditions here indicated are illustrated by the frequent references found in Jonarāja's and Śrīvara's Chronicles to Brahmans holding high official posts under the early Sultans. That Sanskrit remained for a considerable period after the end of Hindu rule the medium of official communication and record in Kāśmīr is shown by the Loka-prakāśa (compare for this text, below Note II, iv. 495, § 10, and Memoir, § 26). The manifold forms for official documents, reports, etc., which are contained in this remarkable hand-earned for himself the characteristic epithet Būtsūkast, "the Idol-breaker," helps only to put into stronger relief the tolerance—or may we say, indifference—of the princes who preceded and followed him. Under the long and exceptionally peaceful rule of his son Zainu-l-'abidin (A.D. 1420-70) who was a patron of Sanskrit learning and—occasionally a pilgrim to the ancient Tirthas of the Valley,³ Hindu traditions distinctly reasserted themselves while the country enjoyed something like a return of its old prosperity.

A series of weak Sultāns followed. During their nominal reigns the land became again divided among rival factions of territorial barons whose intrigues and contests form the closest parallel to those of the turbulent Dāmaras of Kalhaṇa's time. In the midst of this period falls the first direct conquest of Kāśmīr by a foreign invader of which we have a distinct historical record. Mirzā Haidar's invoad from Ladāk (A.D. 1532) which brought Kāśmīr for a time into the power of the brave Turkish leader and of which he himself has left us a graphic account,⁴ was not a mere episode. It forms part of the great movement which carried the last wave of Northern conquerors, the Turks of Bābar into India. Mirzā Haidar had to leave Kāśmīr for other fields of exploit, but the Mughal empire he had helped to found, did not abandon its claim to the Valley. Mirzā Haidar himself, A.D. 1540, regained possession of Kāśmīr from the south, nominally on behalf of the fugitive Emperor Hūmāyūn, and ruled it until his death, eleven years later.⁵ After his regency Kāśmīr became once more the scene of long-continued strife among the great feudal families which set up and deposed their puppet-kings in rapid succession. When the great task of consolidating the Mughal empire in Northern India had at last been accomplished, Akbar's forces crossed the mountains and finally incorporated Kāśmīr in the Mughal dominion (A.D. 1586).

Mughal conquest
of Kāśmīr.

119. Akbar's conquest marks the commencement of the modern history of Kāśmīr. However interesting to the historical student the subsequent period may be which saw Kāśmīr as the cherished summer residence of an imperial court ruling the whole of India, its conditions are too different to help us much in comprehending the peculiar aspects of Kāśmīr history in its earlier epochs. Though the conservative instinct of the population was bound to maintain much of the old traditions and customs, yet the close political connection with a great empire and the free intercourse with other territories subject to it necessarily transformed in many ways the political and economical situation of the country.

book of Kāśmīrian administrative routine, are drawn up in a curious Sanskrit jargon full of Persian and Arabic words which must have become current in Kāśmīr soon after the introduction of Islām. The character of these forms leaves no doubt as to their faithfully reproducing in style as well as in contents the actual official correspondence of the period intermediate between the commencement of Muhammadan rule and the adoption of Persian as the official language of Kāśmīr administration.

The continued popular use of Sanskrit even among Muhammadans is strikingly proved by the Sanskrit inscription on a tomb in the cemetery of Balhū-d-din Shāhib at S'rinagar, which was put up in the reign of Sultān Muḥammad Shāh, and which bears a date corresponding to A.D. 1181 (see Z.D.M.G., xi. p. 9, and Ind. Ant., xx. p. 153). Brief Sanskrit inscriptions, without dates, have been found by me on a number of old Muhammadan tombs at S'rinagar, near Martand, and elsewhere.

³ Compare for Zainu-l-'abidin's literary patronage, Jonar. (Bo. ed.), 1047 sqq.; S'riv. i. 464 sqq.; for his visits to places of Hindu pilgrimage, Jonar. (Bo. ed.), 1056 sqq., 1233 sqq.; S'riv. i. 474 sqq.

⁴ See Tārīkh-i Rashidī, pp. 423 sqq.

⁵ Compare Tārīkh-i Rashidī, pp. 483 sqq.; ib. Introd. pp. 18 sqq.

Continuity in historical conditions of Kāśmīr.

It is otherwise with the period which lies between the Mughal annexation and the time of Kālhaṇa. Here we see the historical conditions of Kāśmīr such as they appear to us in the later portion of the Rājatarāṅgiṇī, maintained in all essential points. It is in the light of the ample and accurate information that Kālhaṇa's work supplies regarding these conditions, that we have to interpret the scanty and and often disjointed accounts that we receive of the above indicated period in the later Sanskrit Chronicles. The historical continuity which thus manifests itself is most striking in respect of the independence preserved by the country notwithstanding centuries of internal weakness, and also in respect of the social and administrative organization which even the introduction of Islām was unable to modify materially.

It is not difficult to realize the ultimate cause of this continuity with the guidance of Kālhaṇa's record. It shows us clearly that it was solely the protection offered by the great mountain ramparts which had secured to the country for so long a period, immunity from foreign aggression irrespective of the want of internal resources. The peculiarity of the geographical position which we shall have occasion to discuss elsewhere in detail,⁶ explains equally that remarkable individuality which characterizes the historical development of the country and constitutes its chief interest. The results of this isolation still strike us everywhere in modern Kāśmīr after centuries of foreign dominion, and the deep traces it has left in the character and habits of the people, are not likely to be effaced for a long time to come.

⁶ See below, Memoir, §§ 30-40.

NOTE i.—§ 6.

KALHAṆA AND THE HARṢACARITA.

The following list gives a selection from the large number of passages which by close agreement in the use of rare words and phrases and in other peculiarities of style illustrate the relation between Bāṇa's Harṣacarita and Kalhaṇa's Chronicle. The list has been prepared from materials collected for me by Paṇḍit Govind Kaul. The close lexical affinity of the Rājatarāṅgiṇī, with the work of Bāṇa has been duly noticed already by Mr. THOMAS, the translator of the Harṣacarita; compare Vienna Oriental Journal, xii. p. 33; J.R.A.S. 1899, p. 485.

The passages of the Harṣacarita are quoted according to the pagination of the Nirṇaya-sāgara Press edition, Bombay, 1892.

PAGE	Harṣacarita.	Rājatarāṅgiṇī.
20.	jñātivargam aganayyāpyavaganā	saganō 'vaganō	viii. 2126.
50.	samphullamallikādhavalāṭṭhaśo ma- hākūlah	utphullabakulacchaviḥ aṭṭhaśaḥ kṛtāntasya	iv. 460.
69.	kalyāṇabhīnivesī	kalyāṇabhīnivesina	iv. 467.
69.	savinayam abhāṣata āgacchata pra- viśata	āgacchata pravīśatetyucyamāno	iii. 232.
77.	tejasah paramāṇubhir iva kevalair nirmitam	tajassair eva saṣṛjo paramāṇu- bhīḥ	vii. 874.
79.	bhāsvadbimbādharoṇa prasannāvalo- kitena caudramukhena kṛṣṇakēṣena vapuşā sarvadevavatāram iva	bhāsvadbimbādharām kṛṣṇake- ṣim sarvadevamayim iva	iii. 418.
84.	kāṣṭhāmūnir	kāṣṭhāmūnir iva	viii. 2391.
85.	caṭvurudadhikēdāra kuṭumbī	nihśeṣakṣmāksdārakuṭumbinām	iii. 101.
119.	alamkāram ahamkārasya	alamkāram ahamkṛteḥ	viii. 1749.
127.	suḥṣaṭbhujajayastambhaviśaśāla- bhañjikām	yadbhujastambho jayaśśiśāla- bhañjikām	ii. 64.
128.	svapne 'pyasambhavitām	svapne 'pi yaś sambbhāvyam	vii. 67.
148.	atikramati kālē	atikramati kālē	iii. 82.
172.	°prasādavittamanoratha°	prasādavitto bhūbhartur	vii. 290.
179.	avandhyaprasāde	tasya'avandhyaprasādatvam	i. 78.
186.	°cāmaramaruccala°	cāmaramarullola°	i. 81.
189.	anūmartum ivodyatāsu	anugantum ivodyatāḥ	vii. 465.
190.	°nirmānaparamāṇūn	nirmānaparamāṇavaḥ	vi. 274.
217.	tanūnapāti pītasarpīṣi	pītasarpir ivānalaḥ	iv. 638.
217.	narṇantu śīrāṁśi dhanūṁśi ca	dhanūṁśi śīrāṁśyadya nama- yanto	viii. 924.
217.	kṛpānapadarpaneṣu	kṛpānapadardpane	iii. 68.
218.	munooṣṭhāṇi śayanatāle	śayaniya vimuktāṅgas	viii. 832.
220.	bhṛtyatām apyaparibhūtaṁ	bhṛtyatām nīparibhāvāḥ	vii. 224.
226.	aṅganavedi vasudhā	grhāṅganam iva kṣopim	iii. 100.
228.	kramopacyamāna°	kramopacyamāna	iii. 161.
229.	sthānapala°	sthānapalair	viii. 811.
241.	dantavinivādyodyame	dantavinivādyodyame	viii. 2580.
247.	°grāmagrahaḥvaghāsmarasya	vīragrāmagrahaḥvaghāsmarāḥ	viii. 1519.
269.	asamtāpārhatā	asamtāpārhatām	i. 41.
288.	yuktāyuktavīcārāśūnyatvācca	yuktāyuktavīcārābhāhyamanasaḥ	vi. 208.

Compare also for close correspondence in purport and phraseology the verses found in Harṣacar. pp. 106 (śl. 1), 207, with Rājatar. viii. 1216, 1401.

APPENDIX I.

CHRONOLOGICAL AND DYNASTIC TABLES OF KALHAṆA'S RECORD OF KĀŚMĪR KINGS.¹

FIRST BOOK.

Gonanda I.	}	Accession assumed Kali Saurvat 653 (Lankika S. 628). ²
Dāmodara I.
Yasovati
Gonanda II.
Thirty-five kings 'lost'
Lava	}	Aggregate length of reigns 1200 years {Lankika S. 628—1894}. ³
Kuśa Khagendra
Surendra
Godhara
Suvarṇa
Janaka
Śacīnara
Aśoka
Jalauka
Dāmodara II.
Huṣka, Juṣka, Kanīṣka
Abhimanyu I.

¹ In these tables the dates and chronological figures which are directly named by Kalhaṇa, are shown in Roman type. Those dates and figures which have been derived by calculation from other statements in the Chronicle, are printed in Italic type.

² Compare Rājat. i. 51 and note §. 56-58; also above, Introd. § 58.

³ See i. 54 and above, § 59.

GONANDĪYA DYNASTY.

	Calculated Laukika Dates of Accession.	Duration of Reign.
		Years.	Months.	Days.
Gonanda III.	1894-0-0	35	—	—
Vibhisaṇa I.	1929-0-0	53	6	—
Indrajit	1982-6-0	35	—	—
Rāvapa	2017-6-0	30	6	—
Vibhisaṇa II.	2048-0-0	35	6	—
Nara I. (Kīrānara)	2083-6-0	40	9	—
Siddha	2124-8-0	60	—	—
Utpalakṣa	2184-3-0	30	6	—
Hiranyakṣa	2214-9-0	37	7	—
Hiranyakula	2252-4-0	60	—	—
Vasukula	2312-4-0	60	—	—
Mihirakula	2372-4-0	70	—	—
Baka	2442-4-0	63	—	13
Kṣitinanda	2505-4-13	30	—	—
Vasunanda	2535-4-13	52	2	—
Nara II.	2587-6-13	60	—	—
Akṣa	2647-6-13	60	—	—
Gopāditya	2707-6-13	60	—	6 ⁴
Gokarna	2767-6-19	57	11	—
Khīṇkhila-Narendraditya	2825-5-19	36	3	10
Yudhiṣṭhira	2861-8-29	34	3	1 ⁶
Aggregate length of reigns		1002	—	—

SECOND BOOK.

	Calculated Laukika Dates of Accession.	Duration of Reign.
		Years.	Months.	Days.
Pratāpāditya I.	2896-0-0 ⁵	32	—	—
Jalaukas	2928-0-0	32	—	—
Tuṇḍina I.	2960-0-0	36	—	—
Vijaya	2996-0-0	8	—	—
Jayendra	3004-0-0	37	—	—
Samdhimati-Āryarāja	3041-0-0	47	—	—
Aggregate length of reigns		192	—	—

⁴ According to the text of A₁ and L; see note i, 345.

⁵ The duration of Yudhiṣṭhira's reign, which K. has omitted to state, has been computed from his total of 2268 years for the aggregate length of reigns from Gonanda I. to Yudhiṣṭhira I.; see note on colophon of Book i.

⁶ This date is indicated by K.'s statement, i, 43.

THIRD BOOK.

RESTORED GONANDIYA DYNASTY.

	Calculated Laukika Dates of Accession.	Duration of Reign.
		Years.	Months.	Days.
Meghavahana	3088-0-0	31	—	—
Śreṣṭhasena-Pravarasena I. (Tuijina II.)	3122-0-0	30	—	—
Hiranya, with Toranāpa	3152-0-0	30	2	—
Mārguṣṭa	3182-2-0	1	9	1
Pravarasena II.	3186-11-1	60	—	—
Yudhiṣṭhira II.	3246-11-1	397	3	—
Lohikhaṇa-Narendraditya	3386-2-1	13	—	—
Ranaditya (Tuijina III.)	3399-2-1	300	—	—
Vikramāditya	3509-2-1	12	—	—
Balāditya	3641-2-1	30	8	—
Aggregate length of reigns		589	10	1

FOURTH BOOK.

THE KARKOTA DYNASTY.

	Calculated Laukika Dates of Accession.	Duration of Reign.
		Years.	Months.	Days.
Durlabhavardhana-Prajñāditya	3677-10-1	33	—	—
Durlabhaka-Pratāpāditya II.	3713-10-1	50	—	—
Candrapīḍa-Vajraditya	3763-10-1	8	8	—
Tarapīḍa-Udayāditya	3772-6-1	1	—	24
Muktapīḍa-Lalitāditya	3776-6-25	36	7	11
Kuvapīḍa	3818-2-6	1	—	15
Vajraditya-Bappiyaka-Lalitāditya	3814-2-21	7	—	—
Prthivīpīḍa	3821-2-21	4	1	—
Samgrāmapīḍa I.	3825-3-21	—	—	78
Jajja	3825-3-28	8	—	—
Jayapīḍa-Vinayāditya	3828-3-28	31	—	—
Lalitapīḍa	3859-3-28	12	—	—
Samgrāmapīḍa II (Prthivīpīḍa)	3871-3-28	7	—	—
Cippatajayapīḍa-Bṛhaspati	3878-3-28	12	—	—
Ajitapīḍa	3880 ⁷	37	—	—
Ananapīḍa	3926	3	—	—
Utpalapīḍa	3929	9	—	—
Total length of reigns		254	5	27

⁷ According to the reading of A₁ and L; see note iii. 379.

⁸ According to the reading of A₁ and L adopted in text; comp. note iv. 400.

⁹ The difference between the indicated date of Ajitapīḍa's accession (Laukika S. 3889) and the one which we should get by adding the twelve years of Cippatajayapīḍa's reign to the calculated date of his accession, Laukika S. 3878-3-28, is 1 year, 3 months and 28 days. This difference is due to K. having adopted a 'rough' calculation for the aggregate length of reigns in Books ii.-viii., as fully explained in Introd. § 58, note 15.

The doubts as to the accuracy of the date named by K. for the death of Cippatajayapīḍa and the accession of Ajitapīḍa (iv. 703) have been explained above, Introd. § 91.

FIFTH BOOK.

THE DYNASTY OF UTPALA.

A. D.		Laukika Dates of Accession.	Duration of Reign where specified.
			Years.	Months.	Days.
855/6	Avantivarman	3981	—	—	—
883	S'amkaravarman	3959 Āṣāḍha śu 3	—	—	—
902	Gopālavarman	3977 Phālguna va 7	2	—	—
904	Samkṛta	3979	—	—	10
904	Sugandha	3979	2	—	—
906	Partha	3981	—	—	—
921	Nirjitavarman (Paṭigu)	3997 Pauṣa	—	—	—
923	Okṛavarman	3998 Māgha	—	—	—
933	S'ūravarman I.	4009	1	—	—
934	Partha (restored)	4010	—	—	—
935	Okṛavarman (restored) . .	4011 Āṣāḍha	—	—	—
935	S'amkaravardhana	4011 Pauṣa	—	—	—
936	Okṛavarman (restored) . .	4012 Jyāṣṭha śu 8	—	—	—
937	Unmattavanti	4013 Jyāṣṭha śu 8	—	—	—
939	S'ūravarman II	4015 Āṣāḍha	—	—	—

SIXTH BOOK.

A. D.		Laukika Dates of Accession.	Duration of Reign where specified.
			Years.	Months.	Days.
939	Yaśaskaradeva	4015 Āṣāḍha śu ¹⁰	9	—	—
948	Varmata	4024	—	—	1
948	Samgrāmadova	4024 Bhādrapada va 3	—	—	—
949	Parvagupta	4024 Phālguna va 10	—	—	—
950	Kṣemagupta	4026 Āṣāḍha va 18	—	—	—
958	Abhimanyu	4034 Pauṣa śu 9	—	—	—
972	Nandigupta	4048 Kārttika śu 3	—	—	—
973	Tribhuvana[gupta]	4049 Mārgaśīrṣa śu 12	—	—	—
975	Bhimagupta	4051 Mārgaśīrṣa śu 5	—	—	—
980/1	Didda	4056	—	—	—

¹⁰ The exact date of Yaśaskaradeva's election to the throne is not indicated; it took place "five or six days" after the flight of S'ūravarman II.

on the 7th of the bright half of Āṣāḍha (see v. 435, sqq.).

SEVENTH BOOK.

FIRST LOHARA DYNASTY.

A.D.		Lanka Dates of Accession.	Duration of Reign where specified.
			Years.	Months.	Days.
1008	Sanigramaraja	4079 Bhādrapada śu 8
1028	Hariraja	4101 Āṣāḍha va 1			22
1028	Ananta	4101 Āṣāḍha śu 8
1068	Kalaśa	4139 Kārttika śu 6
1080	Utkarṣa	4165 Margaśīrṣa śu 6			22
1080	Harṣa	4165 Pauṣa va 13

EIGHTH BOOK.

SECOND LOHARA DYNASTY.

A.D.		Lanka Dates of Accession.	Duration of Reign where specified.
			Years.	Months.	Days.
1101	Uccala	4177 Bhādrapada śu 5	—	—	—
1111	Raḍḍa-S'ankharaja . .	4187 Pauṣa śu 6	—	—	1
1111	Salhara	4187 Pauṣa śu 7	—	3	27
1112	Sussala	4188 Vaiśākha śu 3	—	—	—
1120	Bhikṣācara	4196 Margaśīrṣa va 6	—	6	12
1121	Sussala (restored) . .	4197 Jyaiṣṭha śu 3	—	—	—
1128	Jayasinha (Sinhadova) .	4203 Phalguṇa va 15	22 ¹¹	—	—

¹¹ Twenty-two years of Jayasinha's reign had passed in Lanka S. 4225, A.D. 1149-50, when Kalhana completed his work; see viii. 3404.

APPENDIX II.

GENEALOGICAL TABLES OF KAS'MĪR DYNASTIES ACCORDING TO KALHAṆA.¹

FIRST BOOK.

KINGS TAKEN FROM THE NĪLAMATAPURĀṆA.

Gonanda I.
|
Dāmodara I. m. Yaśovati.
|
Gonanda II.

Thirty-five kings 'lost.'

KINGS RECORDED BY HELĀRĀJA.

Lava.
|
Kūśa.
|
Khagendra.
|
Surendra.

Godhara, "of another family."
|
Suvarṇa.
|
Janaka.
|
S'acinara.

¹ The names of those members of the Kaśmīr throne, are distinguished in these several royal families who did not occupy the tables by print in Italics.

KINGS RECORDED BY CHAYILLAKARA.

Asoka, son of S'acumara's grand-nephew and great-grandson of S'akuni.
 |
 Jalauka.

 Hämudra II.

Huška, Juška and Kaniška.

Abhimanyu.

GONANDĪYA DYNASTY.

Gouatula III.
 |
 Vihangana I.
 |
 Indrajit.
 |
 Huvana.
 |
 Vihangana II.
 |
 Nara I.
 |
 Siddha.
 |
 Uplakṣa.
 |
 Hiranyākṣa.
 |
 Hiranyakula.
 |
 Vasukula.
 |
 Mihirakula.
 |
 Baka.
 |
 Kṣatrinandā.
 |
 Vasunandā.
 |
 Nara II.
 |
 Akṣa.
 |
 Gopālityn.
 |
 Gokarna.
 |
 Khinkila-Narendrāditya.
 |
 Yudhiṣṭhira I.

SECOND BOOK.

Pratāpaditya I., "a relative of Vikramaditya."

|
Jalsaukas.

|
Tuñjina I.

Vijaya.

|
Jayendra.

Samdhinati-Āryarāja.

THIRD BOOK.

GONANDĪYA DYNASTY RESTORED.

Yudhiṣṭhira I.

....

....

Gopāditya

Meghavāhana

S'reṣṭhasena-Pravarasena I. (Tuñjina II.)

|
Hiranya

|
Toramāna, Yuvarāja

|
Pravarasena II.

|
Yudhiṣṭhira II.

|
Lahkhana-Narendraditya

|
Rupāditya-Tuñjina (III.)

|
Vikramaditya

|
Bālāditya

Anaṅgalekhū m. Durlabhavar

FOURTH BOOK.

THE KĀRKOṬA DYNASTY.

Durlabhavardhana-Prajñaditya m. Anaṅgalekhā

Maṭhana	Durlabhaka-Pratāpaditya II.
----------------	-----------------------------

Candraṇḍī-Vajraditya	Tārāṇḍī-Udayaditya	Muktāṇḍī-Lalitaditya
----------------------	--------------------	----------------------

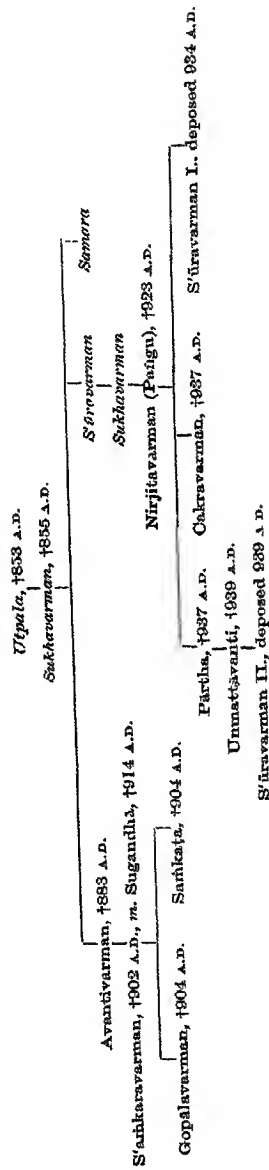

Kuvalayaṇḍī	Vajraditya-Bappiyaka-Lalitaditya
-------------	----------------------------------

Tribhuvanāṇḍī	Prthivīṇḍī	Saṅgrāmāṇḍī I.	Jayapīṇḍī-Vinayaditya
Ajitaṇḍī
Utpalāṇḍī

	Lalitāṇḍī	Saṅgrāmāṇḍī II.-Prthivīṇḍī	Anaṅgāṇḍī
	Cīpīṇḍī	Bṛhaspati

FIFTH BOOK.

THE DYNASTY OF UTRALA.

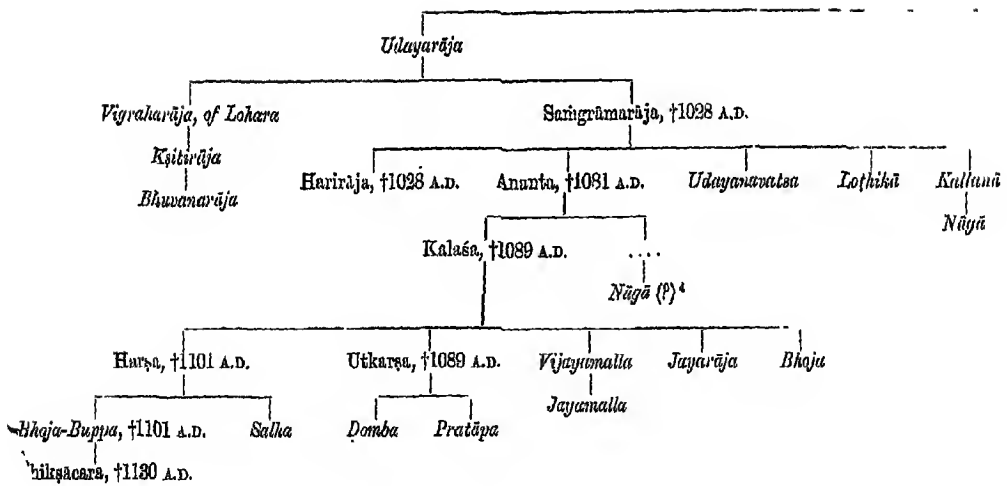

SIXTH BOOK.

GENEALOGICAL TABLES.

FIRST LOHARA DYNASTY

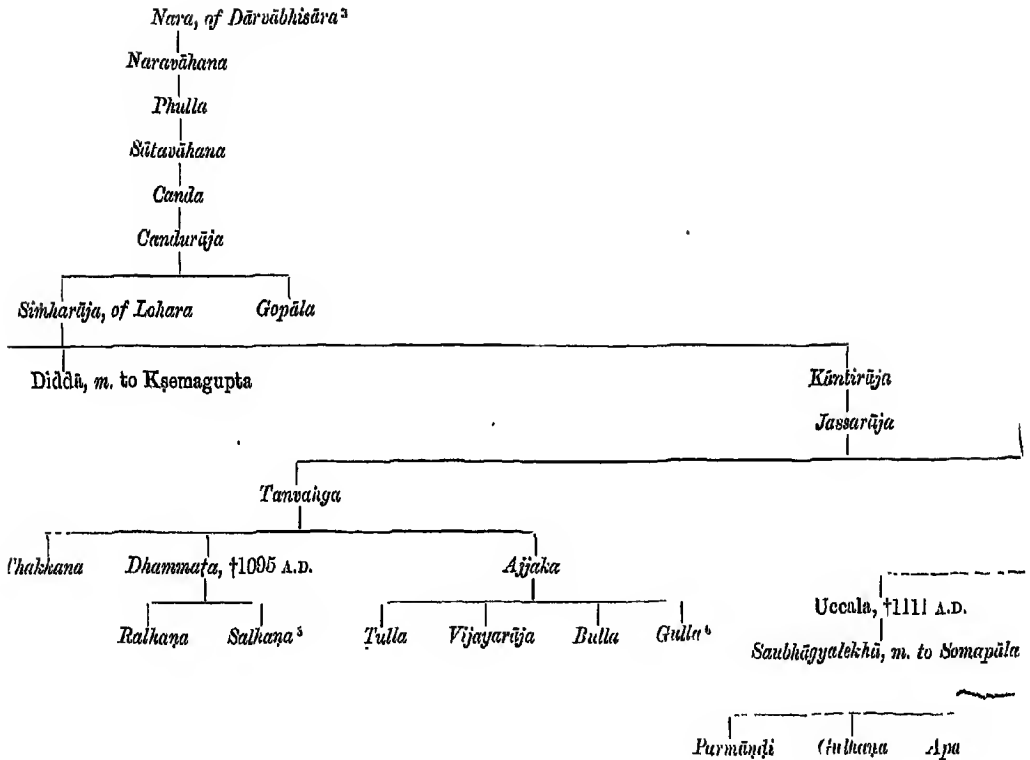

⁴ Compare for the earlier part of the Lohara family, vii. 1282-87.

⁵ This ancestor of the Lohara family is probably identical with Nara, a descendant of Bhisāra, mentioned iv. 712.

SEVENTH AND EIGHTH BOOKS.

THE LOHARA DYNASTY.²

⁴ It is doubtful whether the Nāgā referred to, vii. 1148, is not identical with the princess of that name mentioned as a daughter of Ananta's sister Kallanā in vii. 293; compare note vii. 1148.

⁵ It is not quite certain whether Ralhaṇa and Salkhaṇa mentioned in vii. 1053 as grandsons of Tanvaṅga, were sons of Dhammaṭa, as suggested by the context.

⁶ The context of vii. 1065 makes it probable that Vijayarāja Tanvaṅga's "son" is "The Jonar."

SECOND LOILARA DYNASTY.

and Gulla, "grandsons of vers of Tulla, whose doy stated in vii. 1038.
 death is given by

THE RĀJATARANĠINĪ OF KALHAṆA.

FIRST BOOK.

REVERENCE TO GAṆEŚA.

1. Reverence to Hara who [grants his worshippers' desires] like the tree of paradise; who is beautified by a seam of light emitted by the jewels on the hoods of the serpents adorning him, and in whom those freed [from mundane existence] find eternal rest.

INTRODUCTION.

2. May both the halves of the God whose cognizance is the bull, and who is united with one half of his spouse, give you glory,—the left whose forehead wears a saffron Tilaka, who near the ear displays the joyous tremour of numerous dangling earrings, the complexion of whose throat is fair like the glitter of the oceanborn [shell], and whose breast wears a faultless bodice,—the right whose forehead wears a flame of fire, who displays near his ear the gaping mouths of numerous playfully moving snakes, the beauty of whose throat is not impaired by the darkness of the oceanborn [poison], and whose chest is enveloped by the lord of snakes as by an armour.

1. The two epithets bhūṣābhogī° and pralīna° apply equally to S'iva and the tree of paradise. With reference to the latter they are to be rendered: "which is beautified by the seam of light proceeding from the jewels [taken] from the hoods of serpents and [borne] by those blessed ones who form [that tree's] adornment, and which bears pendants of pearls."

The Kāśmīrians, being S'aivas, consider S'iva to be the universal soul and expect to be absorbed by him. BÜHLER.

2. S'iva is invoked here, and in the introductory verses of the other Taranāgas, under the form of Ardhanārīśvara, representing his union with Pārvatī. A description of both halves is given in the first three pādas by words which apply equally to the left half (Pārvatī) and to the right half (S'iva).

In the description of the left half sambhṛta-kriṣṭakundalī is to be taken as a separate adjective qualifying jṛmbhitam; as applied to the right half these words form a compound.

jaladhījacchāyāchha [kanṭhacchaviḥ] is to be dissolved in the first case, with Prof. Buhler, into jaladhījacchāyavā āccha; in the second case I take it as jaladhījacchāyayā āccha, whereas he explains it by jaladhījacchāyayā cha or āccha, i.e. ācchādita.

In the description of S'iva ahina must be dissolved into ahinām ina, 'the lord of snakes,' Vāsuki, who serves S'iva instead of the Jambvi. The ocean-born poison is the Halūhala which S'iva swallowed. B.

INTRODUCTION.

3. Worthy of praise is that power of true poets, whatever it may be, which surpasses even the stream of nectar, in as much as by it their own bodies of glory as well as those of others obtain immortality.

4. Who else but poets resembling Prajāpatīs [in creative power] and able to bring forth lovely productions, can place the past times before the eyes of men?

5. If the poet did not see in his mind's eye the existences which he is to reveal to all men, what other indication would there be of his possessing divine intuition?

6. Though in view of the length of the narrative diversity could not be secured by means of amplification, still there may be found in it something that will please the right-minded.

7. That noble-minded [poet] is alone worthy of praise whose word, like that of a judge, keeps free from love or hatred in relating the facts of the past.

8. If I narrate again the subject-matter of tales of which others have treated, still the virtuous ought not to turn their faces from me without hearing my reasons.

9-10. What is the skill required in order that men of a later time should supplement the narrative of events in the works of those who died after composing each the history of those kings whose contemporaries they were? Hence my endeavour is to give a connected account where the narrative of past events has become fragmentary in many respects.

Earlier Chronicles.

11. The oldest extensive works containing the royal chronicles [of Kāśmīr] have become fragmentary in consequence of [the appearance of] Suvrata's composition, who condensed them in order that [their substance] might be easily remembered.

3. The nectar (sukhā) secures immortality only to the person who drinks it.

4. The Prajāpatīs are fourteen in number. They caused the successive creations of the world. B.

7. The earlier Ed. read wrongly bahiṣkṛtaḥ* for bahiṣkṛtā. This reading has induced previous interpreters to take stheyasyeva as stheyasi eva. The gloss of A₂, dīḍhā, seems to suppose the latter interpretation.

9-10. These two verses are marked as a couplet or ṭupalaka, forming an unit in syntactical construction. They contain, as already pointed out by Prof. Bühler, the reasons alluded to in verse 8. The meaning of those verses I take to be as follows: It requires but little skill to continue the series of chronicles of individual reigns earlier writers have left, by adding a narrative of more recent events. But Kallhana has set himself an additional and more difficult task, viz. that of clearing up and putting into right order the fragmentary records regarding the earlier reigns.

K. seems to me to allude here to historical compositions, similar in character to the subsequent continuations of his own work by Jonarāja, Śrīvara, and Prājyabhaṭṭa, which took up the narrative of events from the point where the earlier narrative had closed.

For another interpretation, which, however, does not appear to take into account the real significance of the form of interrogation contained in dakṣyam hiyaḍ idam (comp. viii. 2118), see Report, p. lxvii.

11. Prof. Bühler, whose translation is otherwise reproduced above, renders chinmāḥ by "have been lost," and adds the note: "Suvrata apparently wrote a handbook of the history of Kāśmīr, to be committed to memory in the schools, which, as usual in India, caused the loss of the more ancient books on the subject." I prefer to translate chinmāḥ by "have become fragmentary" or "have

12. Suvrata's poem, though it has obtained celebrity, does not show dexterity in the exposition of the subject-matter, as it is rendered troublesome [reading] by misplaced learning.

13. Owing to a certain want of care, there is not a single part in Kṣemendra's 'List of Kings' (Nṛpāvali) free from mistakes, though it is the work of a poet.

14. Eleven works of former scholars containing the chronicles of the kings, I have inspected, as well as the [Purāṇa containing the] opinions of the sage Nīla.

15. By looking at the inscriptions recording the consecration of temples and grants by former kings, at the laudatory inscriptions and at written works, the trouble arising from many errors has been overcome.

16. Among the fifty-two rulers whom those [former scholars] do not mention, been disturbed in their order," in view of the statement made below, i. 14, as to the twelve earlier chronicles which K. had himself inspected; see also the references actually made by him to earlier writers, i. 17-20. We may then assume that on account of Suvrata's compilation the study of the older chronicles was discontinued, and that complete copies of these works were no longer to be found in K.'s time.

13. Regarding the poet and polyhistor Kṣemendra, also called Vyāsādāsa, see Prof. Bühler's Report, p. 45 sqq. He lived under King Anantadova (1029-1084 A.D.) and his son Kalāśa († 1082 A.D.). For a list of the numerous works composed by Kṣemendra, see Prof. Aufrecht's Cat. Catalog. s.v. No copy of Kṣemendra's Nṛpāvali has yet been discovered, nor have I come across any other reference to the work by a Kāśmīrian author.

14. For an exhaustive analysis of the extant Nilamata-purāṇa, see Prof. Bühler's Report, pp. 37 sqq., and pp. lv-lx. From the Nilamata, which is an important source of information on the sacred antiquities of Kāśmīr, K. obtained, according to his own statement i. 10, the names of the first four kings. A comparison of his narrative, i. 57-82, with the fragments preserved of the opening chapter of the Nilamata shows "that K. took over some portions of his narrative almost literally from the Purāṇa" (Report, p. 38).

15. In the note appended to the translation reproduced above, Prof. Bühler rightly distinguishes four kinds of records as referred to by K.: (i.) The pratiṣṭhāsāna edicts, i.e. inscriptions recording the erection and consecration of temples or other buildings and monuments, such as are to be found on almost all temples, religious or even profane buildings (such as palaces), on images, funeral monuments, and so forth; (ii.) the vastuśāsana edicts, i.e. inscriptions recording grants of things, chiefly of land, and, perhaps, also of allowances, such as are found engraved on copper-plates; (iii.) prāśastipattas, tables containing laudatory inscriptions of persons or places, such as now are found sometimes in temples or other public buildings (regarding such inscriptions, comp. now Prof. Bühler's remarks in the Vienna Oriental Journal, Vol. ii. p. 80); (iv.) the śāstras, the works on the various sciences, or, to use a short expression, the Manuscripts of Sanskrit books, which in Kāśmīr mostly give at the end some information regarding the author and the king under whom the author wrote, together with the date.

Of the first class of documents only a small number of specimens has been found in Kāśmīr, and none of them, except a fragmentary inscription of the time of Queen Diddā in the Lahore Museum, can be ascribed with certainty to a period earlier than K. For some brief undated inscriptions of this kind, seen by Prof. Bühler at Khumrah and Varāhamūla, comp. Report, pp. 6, 12. Others of a similar character have been found by me at Vijābrār, Bavan (Mārtand) and a few other places. It is likely that K. obtained a portion of the ample data his work contains as to the foundation of particular temples, Mathas, Viharas, and other religious buildings, from such inscriptional records.

No inscription of the kind described under (ii.) and (iii.) has come to my knowledge in Kāśmīr. That inscriptions, probably on copper-plates, were used for the record of land-grants also in Kāśmīr, we see from the story of Raṅga related v. 397 sq.

16. The four rulers meant here are Gonanda I., Dāmodara I., Yaśovati, and Gonanda II. In the extant text of the Nilamata we find references to Gonanda I., Yaśovati, and Gonanda II., though only the last is mentioned by name; see vv. 6-9. The on account of the loss of tradition, four, viz. Gonanda and [his successors], have been taken [by me] from the Nīlamata [Purāṇa].

INTRODUCTION.

17-18. Having read the opinion of the Pāsupata Brahman Helārāja who formerly composed a 'List of Kings' (pārthivāvalī) in twelve thousand S'lokas, Padmamihira entered in his work the eight kings beginning with Lava, who preceded Aśoka and his successors.

19. The five kings also, among whom Aśoka is the first, the illustrious Chavillākura has declared [to have been recovered] from the fifty-two [lost ones]. For his verse is as follows:—

20. "The five [rulers] from Aśoka to Abhimanyu who have been named, were obtained by the ancients from among the fifty-two [lost ones]."

21. This narrative [of mine] which is properly arranged and which resembles a medicine, is useful where the [accounts regarding the] place and time of kings are fluctuating (lit., growing and diminishing).

22. Or if [another aspect be considered], what intelligent man's heart would not be pleased by such a composition which treats of numberless events of ancient times?

23. When [the hearer] has well pondered over the sudden appearance of living beings that lasts for a moment only, then let him judge of the sentiment of resignation (śānta) which is to rule supreme in this work.

24. Imbibe, therefore, straight with the folds of your ear-shells this 'River fragmentary state of the text in all accessible MSS. accounts for the omission of Dāmodara's name which K. must have found in his own copy.

17-18. I have followed Prof. Buhler in translating mahāvratin by 'Pāsupata'; regarding the use of the term for this particular sect of ascetics, see P. IV. s.v.

A Helārāja, who was a Kāśmīrian and lived probably in the 9th or 10th century, has written a commentary on the Vākyapadīya, of which fragments are still extant; see Kielhorn in the Ind. Ant., iii. p. 285. B.

The name given in Ed. with A₁ as Pūrvamihira, has been corrected by A₂ into Padmamihira. I now prefer to accept the latter form, in view of the observations recorded p. x of my edition. These show that the corrections of A₂ are based on a careful collation of the original of Ratnakarṇṭha's Codex.

See for the kings, from Lava to Sacinara, i. 84-100, and regarding the peculiar character of the royal names taken from Helārāja, note i. 84.

21. I understand K. here to say that his narrative is to restore order and certainty where the statements as to the residence, extent of rule and date of various kings were previously subject to doubts. Prof. Buhler translates: "This narrative (of mine), which is arranged (in proper order) and resembles a medicine, is useful for increasing as well as diminishing the (statements of previous writers regarding) kings, place, and time." The context does not seem to me to necessitate this interpretation, which would place an awkward and unnecessary confession in the mouth of the author. However much the views and aims of a Hindu Kavi may differ from the standards of critical history, we can scarcely expect him to boast of the liberties he may have taken with the records of earlier authors.

23. Śānta is one of the nine Rasas or 'sentiments' which the Alaṅkāraśāstra distinguishes in poetic compositions. K.'s work, dealing with so many events and containing such varied descriptions, must exhibit different Rasas. But inasmuch as his narrative teaches the instability of everything human, the poet declares 'the sentiment of resignation' to be the characteristic (pradhāna) Rasa of the work.

of Kings' (Rājataranginī), which is rendered pleasant by under-currents of powerful sentiments.

INTRODUCTION.

25. Formerly, since the beginning of the Kalpa, the land in the womb of the Himālaya was filled with water during the periods of the [first] six Manus [and formed] the 'Lake of Sati' (Satisaras). Description of Kāśmīr.

26-27. Afterwards when the present period of the [seventh] Manu Vaivasvata had arrived, the Prajāpati Kaśyapa caused the gods led by Druhiṇa, Upendra and Rudra to descend, caused [the demon] Jalodbhava, who dwelt in that [lake], to be killed, and created the land known by the name of Kāśmīr in the space [previously occupied by] the lake.

28. That [land] is protected by Nīla, the lord of all Nāgas, whose regal parasol is formed by the circular pond [of the Nilakunḍa] with the Vitastā's newly rising stream as its stick.

29. There Gaurī, though she has assumed the form of the Vitastā, still keeps her wonted inclination. [For in her river-shape] she turns her face towards the ravine (guhā), just as [in her godlike form] she turns it towards [her son] Kumāra (guha); [in her river-shape] the mouths of the Nāgas (nāgamukha) drink her abundant water (apītabhūripayāḥ), just as [in her godlike form her] elephant-faced [son Gaṇeśa] (nāgamukha), drank her abundant milk (āpītabhūripayāḥ).

J 25. The Nilamata gives a lengthy account of the legends relating to the Satisaras, the demon Jalodbhava who had made it his habitation, the desiccation of the lake by the gods at the prayer of Kaśyapa and the demon's destruction. A careful abstract of these stories, accounting for the creation of Kāśmīr, has been given by Prof. BÜHLER, Report, pp. 38 sqq.

26-27. In representing Brahma, Viṣṇu and Śiva as the leaders of the gods who assisted Kaśyapa in the defeat of Jalodbhava, K. follows the narrative of the Nilamata.

The name Kāśmīra is explained in the Nilamata by fanciful etymologies based on the above legend; see vv. 217 sq.

Road tatsarobhūman for tatsaro bhūman of Ed.

28. The description of the Tirthas of Kāśmīr begins with the Nilanāga, who is placed by ancient tradition, surviving to this day, at the head of all the Nāgas or Spring-deities of the land (see Nilamata, vv. 69, 901). He is considered a son of Kaśyapa (ib. 95). His residence is the famous fountain near the village of Vērnāg, situated in the Shāhābād Pargana, at the foot of the Bāu'hāl Pass, 75° 17' long, 33° 32' lat. For a description of this magnificent spring, enclosed by the Emperor Jihāngir in a fine stone basin, see ABÜ-İ-FAZL's Ain-i Akb., ii. p. 361; FORSTER, Journey, ii. p. 4; MOONROFT, Travels, ii. p. 250; VIGNE, Travels, i. p. 332; INCE, Handbook, p. 184.

Near the Nilanāga Viṣṇu is said to have first placed the ploughshare with which the Satisaras was drained, Nilamata, 381; and there Pārvatī was brought to light in the form of the river Vitastā by a stroke of Śiva's trident. Comp. ib. 248 sqq., and the full account of the legends regarding the origin of the Vitastā given in Haracar. xii. Hence the Tirtha bears the threefold name of Nilakunḍa, Vitastā and Sūlaghātā (Nilamata, 1290, and Haracar. xii. 17). The Nilanāga is now commonly known by the name of Vērnāg, which is evidently derived from the old designation Vēr of the present Shāhābād Pargana (see Ain-i Akb., l.c., and gloss of A.).

The pond, which is now of an octagonal shape, must, as the use of the term Nilakunḍa shows, also in ancient times have approached a circular form. It is, therefore, compared by K. to a 'royal parasol.' The stream which issued from it, and which is conventionally taken as the origin of the Vitastā, is described by the poet as the stick supporting the parasol. [Another tradition takes the neighbouring spring of Vitastātara or Vithvutur as the source of the river; see note i. 102.]

29. The above translation, given by Prof.

INTRODUCTION.

30. That [country] is attended by the Nāgas Saṅkha, Padma and others resplendent with various jewels, just as the town of Kubera [is attended] by the [nine] guardians of treasures [among whom are Saṅkha and Padma].

31. To protect, forsooth, the Nāgas who came [to seek shelter] afraid of Garuḍa, it has stretched out its arms high above in the guise of mountain-walls.

32. There [worshippers] touching the wooden image of the husband of Umā at the Tirtha of Pāpasādana, obtain comfort [in life] and final liberation [thereafter] as their rewards.

Buhler, conforms to the gloss of A. In the guhā or ravine, towards which the Vitastā turns her face, we may see with him an allusion to the mountain gorges through which the river passes on leaving Kāśmīr.

30. By the name of Nāga are designated in Kāśmīr the tutelary deities which are supposed to reside in the springs and lakes of the Valley. From early times considerable importance must have been attached to their worship, as is proved by the long account given of them in the Nilamata, by the numerous temples erected near the more famous springs, and the popularity and undoubtedly ancient origin of the pilgrimages directed to the latter. The belief in Nāgas is fully alive also in the Muhammadan population of the Valley, which in many places has not ceased to pay a kind of superstitious respect and ill-disguised worship to these deities.

The popular conception of the Nāgas, as now current, represents them under the form of snakes, living in the water of the springs or lakes protected by them. That this belief is not modern, is shown, e.g. by Rājat. iv. 601; vii. 171. They can, however, also appear in human shape (see the legend of the Nāga *Suśrava*s and his daughters, i. 203 sqq.), or may take the form of clouds and hail-storms, see notes i. 179, 239; iii. 16 sqq. Springs, generally are called to this day nāg in Kāśmīr.

The two Nāgas named in our passage do not occupy a particularly high position in the hierarchy of Kāśmīrian springs. Saṅkha is mentioned as the fourteenth in the list of Nāgas in the Nilamata, 902. I have not been able to trace his name elsewhere in the Māhātmyas and similar texts. Two Padma Nāgas are referred to in the Nilamata, 904, in the twenty-sixth place, besides two Mahā-padma Nāgas.

The Saṅkha Nāga I am unable to locate at present. [The statement in P. Sahibram's Tirthasamgraha, quoted by Prof. Buhler, refers to a Saṅkhapāla Nāga, which is a different spring deity.] The Padma Nāga has been assumed by Prof. Buhler to be identical with the Mahāpadma Nāga, which is considered the tutelary deity of the Volur lake and has actually given his name to the latter; see note iv. 603.

I am induced to adopt this identification, notwithstanding the difference of the names, in view of the following passages. S'rivara, i. 236, speaks of a flood in Kramarājya as uniting itself with the waters of the Padmanāgasaras, by which only the Volur can be meant. In the Fourth Chronicle, 85, the Padmanāga is referred to in connection with a battle which takes place near Bharatunga, i.e. the village of Bōting close to the W. shore of the Volur in the Zainagir Pargana. Finally, the Vitastīmāhātmya, xxiv. 35, speaks of the Ratnacūḍanāga uniting itself with the Padmanāga at the village of Aryaka; the latter is shown in a gloss of my Manuscript as the village of Ahus on the N.W. shore of the Volur, in the Khuyāhōm Pargana.

31. The Nilamata relates in its initial chapter, vv. 47-70, the origin of the enmity between Kadrū and Vinatā, wives of Kaśyapa, and their descendants. The Nāgas, children of Kadrū, being persecuted by Garuḍa, son of Vinatā, flee to the Satisaras, where Viṣṇu grants them an asylum.

The mountain-ranges enclosing the Valley to the north and south are compared to the arms raised by the personified Kāśmīr above the heads of the supplicant Nāgas.

32. At the sacred spring of Pāpasādana Śiva is worshipped under the name of Kapaṭakvara, having shown himself there according to the legend under the disguise (kapaṭa) of pieces of wood floating on the water. The Tirtha is situated close to the village of Kōṭhēr (derived from Skt. Kapaṭakvara; comp. Kā. Jyēṭhēr < Skt. Jyēṭhēkvara, Note C, i. 124) in the Pargana of Kutāhār, 75° 18' long, 33° 40' lat. It consists of a large circular tank fed by springs and enclosed by a massive stone wall, which the tradition, referred to by K. in vii. 190 sqq. and still locally remembered, ascribes to King Bhoja of Malava. For a detailed account of the extant remains at Kapateśvara, see note vii. 190.

33. There the goddess Samhyā produces on an arid hill[side] water which serves as an indication of the presence of merit and the absence of sin.

34. There the 'Self-created Fire' (Svayambhū), rising from the womb of the earth, receives with numerous arms of flame the offerings of the sacrificers.

The legend of the Tirtha is related in Nilamata, vv. 1150-68, and at considerable length in Haracar. xiv., from which the extant Kapateśvaramahātmya is taken; comp. also S'rikāṇṭha. iii. 14.

ALBERUNI had heard of the Kapateśvara Tirtha and its legend. He records, India, ii. p. 181, the story told by people from Kāśmīr that pieces of wood sent by Mahadeva appear annually in "a pond called Kūḍaishahr to the left of the source of the Vitasta, in the middle of the month Vaiśākha." كوديشهر, the form in which the name is given by the MS. of the India, is, as my friend Prof. Seybold has been kind enough to point out on my inquiry, easily accounted for as a clerical error for كوديشور, i.e. *Kavadeśvar, a prakritized form of the name. The date given for the miracle coincides with that indicated for the pilgrimage, Haracar. xiv. 122. The indication as to the position of the Tirtha is also approximately correct.

ABU-ʿL-FAZL, Ain-i Akb., ii. p. 358, mentions "in the village of Kotihar, a deep spring surrounded by stone temples. When its water decreases, an image of Mahadeva in sandal-wood appears." The story related by K. in vii. 190 sqq., together with the legend heard by me on the spot in September, 1891, as to the miraculous cure of King Mueukund (see note loc.) seems to indicate that healing powers were once ascribed to the water of the Tirtha.

33. The goddess Samdhya shows herself in the famous spring commonly known to Kāśmīr Brahmans as Trisamdhya. It is situated in a side valley opening to the S. of the village of Devalgōm in the Bring Pargana, circ. 75° 22' long, 33° 32' lat. The small hamlet close to the spring takes its name Sund'brār from the name of Samdhya-devī (Kāś. brār < Skt. bhātārīkā 'goddess').

The spring is supposed to flow intermittently in the months of Jyaisṭha and Āṣāḍha, three times in the day and three times during the night, and has, on account of the analogy thus presented with the three-fold recitation of the Gayatri (Samdhya), been the object of a pilgrimage evidently since very early times. It is mentioned in the Nilamata, 1288, and its legendary origin and miraculous powers are described in the Tri- samdhya-mahātmya; comp. also Fourth Chron. 843.

Dr. BERNIER, who visited the spring in May, 1665, at the desire of his patron Dānighmand Khān, in order to examine 'les merveilles,' has described the phenomenon with his usual accuracy, and has recorded a very ingenious explanation based on a close observation of the topographical features of the neighbourhood; see Bernier's Travels, ed. Constable, pp. 410 sqq., also VIGNE, Travels, i. 339.

A curious passage from the Dābistān, referring to Trisamdhya, is quoted in full by TROYER, i. p. 382; comp. also Ain-i Akb., ii. p. 355.

puṣya-pāṇām anvaṇṇyati rekayoḥ. K. seems to allude here to the belief, still current at the present day and referred to Haracar. iv. 60, according to which the 'miracle' does not show itself if any wicked or incredulous person happens to visit the spring. When Colonel Miān Singh, the Sikh Governor, came to Trisamdhya, the goddess remained hidden until he had subjected himself to a lengthy 'upavāsa.'

34. Svayambhū, or in the language of the villagers Suyam, is the name of a spot, situated half a mile to the S.W. of the village Nich'hām, circ. 74° 10' long, 34° 22' lat., in the Mach'pir Pargana, where volcanic phenomena are observed in a shallow hollow formed between banks of clay and sand. In certain years vapours issue here from fissures of the ground, then sufficiently hot to boil the S'rāddha offerings, which the pilgrims place there. When I visited the site in September, 1892, the phenomenon was said not to have taken place for the last fifteen years. But the soil of the hollow appeared even then bright red, like burned clay, and was furrowed by narrow fissures. P. Govind Kaul attended a pilgrimage to Svayambhū in the year 1876, when the symptoms were noticeable for about ten months. VIGNE, Travels, ii. p. 280, mentions occurrences of the phenomenon at the beginning of the present century. For an earlier reference, see Ain-i Akb., ii. p. 365; comp. also LAWRENCE, Valley, pp. 42 sq.

The Svayambhūmahātmya relates at length the legend how Śiva (Svayambhū) at the request of the gods who were hard pressed by the Asuras, took there the incarnation of Kālāgnirudra; comp. also Nilamata, 1010.

INTRODUCTION.

35. There the goddess Sarasvatī herself is seen in the form of a swan in a lake [situated] on the summit of the Bheḍa-hill (Bheḍugiri) which is sanctified by the Gaṅgā-source (Gaṅgodbheda).

36. There even to this day drops of sandal-ointment offered by the gods are to be seen at Nandikṣetra, the [permanent] residence of S'iva.

37. There when visiting the [shrine of the] goddess S'ārādā, one reaches at once the river Madhumatī, and [the river of] Sarṣvatī worshipped by poets.

A pilgrimage of King Uccala to Svayambhū is mentioned by K., vii. 260.

35. For an account of this long-forgotten Tirtha, which has been traced by me at the present Buḷ'brūr (Bheḍādevī) in the hills west of S'upiyan, see Note A in Appendix.

36. The name Nandikṣetra is given by the Nilamata, the Nandikṣetra and Haramukuta Māhātmya, to a high alpine valley at the foot of the east Glaciers of the Haramukh Peaks, which contains the sacred Kālodaka Lake, popularly known as Nand-Kāl. This lake, situated circ. 76° long. 34° 23' lat., at an altitude of about 13,000, forms one of the chief stations on the pilgrimage to the sacred Gaṅgā Lake (Uttaramānasa), which lies a short distance above it. According to a legend told at length in the Nilamata, vv. 1001-1181, Nandin, born as son of S'ilāde, performed in the Kālodaka a great penance, whereupon S'iva took up his permanent abode there by the side of his faithful attendant. The inner portion of the lake, showing a deep blue colour, is supposed to mark the residence of Kāla or S'iva; the outer portion, of a light green colour, that of Nandin. S'iva is worshipped there under the name of Nandīśa; comp. Rājat. i. 113, 123 sq., 130, 150; ii. 170.

K. extends the term of Nandikṣetra so as to include the neighbouring site of Bhūteśvara, or Buth'śer, in the Kank'nai Valley below Nand-Kāl (comp. note i. 107), when speaking of the erection of a temple in honour of Bhūtośa at Nandikṣetra, i. 148; also in vii. 964; vii. 77, 2365. Nandikṣetra is mentioned besides in ii. 170; vii. 646; vii. 2439, and referred to as Nandīśakṣetra, i. 113.

I have not been able to trace, either in the texts or in oral tradition, the legend alluded to by K. as to the drops of 'amrita' left from a sacrifice of the gode performed at Nandikṣetra.

37. The Tirtha here referred to is the ancient shrine of S'ārādā, traced by me in September, 1892, at S'ardi in the upper Kiṣangāṅgā Valley, circ. 74° 15' long. 34° 48' lat. For a detailed account of the identification and a description of the extant temple, see Note B in Appendix.

The shrine of S'ārādā is situated on a small hill, above the junction of the Kiṣangāṅgā River with a small stream known to this day as Madhumatī, which flows from the mountain range to the S.E. Almost opposite to S'ardi a large stream, coming from the snowy range towards Gilas, meets the Kiṣangāṅgā from the N. It is called Kankatori on the map, but designated as Sarṣvatī by the S'ārādā-māhātmya and local tradition. Our verse contains an allusion to the union of these three streams, the Kiṣangāṅgā, which is also called simply Gaṅgā or Nindhu in the Māhātmya, being represented by S'ārādā, a form of Parvati-Gaṅgā.

K. has occasion to mention the shrine of S'ārādā (S'ārādīśthāna) in connection with Jayasiṃha's siege of the fort of S'irāḥḥāll, traced by me some miles below S'ardi; comp. vii. 2556, 2700, with Note K, vii. 2492.

The pilgrimage to this shrine must have enjoyed considerable renown in old days, as even ALBERUNI heard of it. "In inner Kashmir, about two or three days' journey from the capital in the direction towards the mountains of Bolor, there is a wooden idol called S'ārādā (sic) which is much venerated and frequented by pilgrims;" see India, i. p. 117. ABU-Ḥ-FAZL, Ain-i Akb., ii. p. 366, also mentions the shrine of S'ārādā, adding a story according to which the temple began to shake on the 8th S'udi of each month.

The upper Kiṣangāṅgā Valley was practically independent territory or Yaghistan during the Moghul and Pathan rule. This circumstance, in connection with the distance of S'ardi from Kashmir proper and the difficulty of the paths leading to it, explains why the Tirtha has become practically unknown among the Brahmans of the capital. It is nowadays frequented only by the Brahman families living in the neighbouring Parganas of the Kamraz. For the convenience of the worshippers a substitute of the ancient shrine of the goddess has now been provided in the close neighbourhood of S'rinagar. At the time prescribed for the S'ārādā pilgrimage, a Naga called S'ārādā-kundā, near the village of 38. In that [country] which Keśava (Viṣṇu) and Īśāna (Ś'iva) adorn as Oakrabhṛt and Vijayēśa, as well as in other [forms], there is not a space as large as a grain of sesamum without a Tirtha.

39. That country may be conquered by the force of spiritual merits, but not by forces of soldiers. Hence its inhabitants are afraid only of the world beyond.

40. There the rivers are free from dangers and aquatic monsters, provided with warm bath-houses for the winter, and furnished with comfortable embankments [for descending] into the water.

41. Out of respect, as it were, the sun does not burn fiercely, during summer

Tsatsa, some four miles to the N. of the Dal lake, is visited by numerous pilgrims.

I am unable to trace the locality Harel, which the gloss of A. mentions as the site of S'aradā. According to Prof. Bühler's note, "Hiril is found on the Survey Map in the Pargana Khuyahām, to the north of the Volur Lake, into which the Madhumatī falls, as marked on the native map." But the name Hiril does not occur on the maps accessible to me. [The Madhumatī referred to in this note is another river of identical name which K. mentions elsewhere; see note vii. 1179.]

The shrine of S'aradā is indicated as the northern boundary mark of Kāśmir in the Deśavyavasthā; see my Catal. of Jammu MSS., p. 307.

33. The above translation follows the interpretation given by the gloss of A. K. refers particularly to Viṣṇu-Oakradhara and Ś'iva-Vijayēśa as two famous images of the two gods located close to each other.

Viṣṇu-Oakradhara had an ancient shrine on the alluvial plateau or Uḍar, which lies on the left bank of the Vilastā, one mile below the town of Vij'brūr. The plateau bears to this day the name of Tsāt'dar Uḍar; comp. regarding the site, Report, p. 18. K. mentions frequently the temple and hill of Oakradhara, which also served in times of trouble as a fortified position; see o.g. i. 261; iv. 191; vii. 971 sqq.

The Nilamata, 1170, mentions Oakradhara in the first place among the forms of Viṣṇu and gives, vv. 189 sqq., a fragmentary account of the legend connected with this place of worship; comp. for the latter also Haracar. viii. 81 sqq. For a suggestion as to the exact position of the temple, see note vii. 971. The site is no longer an object of pilgrimage.

The temple of Ś'iva Vijayēśa or Vijayēśvara, since ancient times one of the most famous shrines of the Valley, has given its name to the town in which it was situated, Vijayēśvara, the modern Vij'brūr, 75° 8' long. 33° 48' lat.

Kā. brūr 'god,' a derivative of Skr. bhaṭṭā-raka, corresponds to iśvara; comp. note ii. 184, also Kā. brūr as the equivalent of Skr. devi, note i. 33. A reconstruction of the temple is mentioned by K. in the reign of Aśoka; see note i. 105, where some account has been given of the existing remains. Different legends connected with Vijayēśvara are related at length in the Haracar. and in the Vijayēśvaramāhātmyas. For an account of the modern Vij'brūr, see VIANE, Travels, ii. pp. 23 sq., and INOS, Handbook, p. 175. [The name 'Bijbihara,' 'Bijbiara,' etc., given to the town in European books and maps is based on a faulty Panjābi pronunciation and partly on 'popular etymology.']

39. Note the pun in paralokāl, which may also mean 'host of enemies.'

40. soṣmasnānagṛhāḥ. The hot-bath rooms or Hamāms play a great part in the winter life of Kāśmirians of all classes. They serve not only for the purpose of ablutions, but also as comfortable dwelling-rooms during the season of severe cold. The poorer people, as far as they are Muhammadan, resort to the public Hamāms, which are attached to almost every larger mosque of the country. In the city of S'rinagar these Hamāms are found in particularly large numbers close to the river-bank, where they can be conveniently supplied with water. A similar custom seems to have existed in K.'s time. This explains why reference is made to these 'warm bath-houses' in connection with the description of the rivers.

svasthatirāspadāḥ. The banks of the Vilastā are to this day within S'rinagar and other large towns lined with stone Ghāṭs, used by the whole population for bathing purposes. Their Kā. name, yū'thal ('friends' meeting place'), shows the great part those embankments play in the daily life of the people. K. may also think of the wooden bathing huts on the river, regarding which see note vii. 703.

INTRODUCTION.

even, in that [country] which has been created by his father (Kāśyapa), as he knows that it ought not to be tormented.

42. Learning, lofty houses, saffron, icy water and grapes : things that even in heaven are difficult to find, are common there.

43. In the three worlds the jewel-producing [earth] is to be extolled ; on that the region of Kubera (the North) ; there [next] the mountain range, the father of Gauri ; and [lastly] the country that is enclosed by that [mountain range].

Fifty-two kings lost.

44. In that [country] fifty-two rulers up to (preceding) Gonanda [the Third], who in the Kaliyuga were contemporaries of the Kurus and of the sons of Kuntī (Pāṇḍavas), have not been recorded.

45. In those times there were assuredly in consequence of the desert of those rulers of Kaśyapa's land (Kāśmīr), no poets of creative power who would produce their bodies of glory.

46. We pay reverence to that naturally sublime craft of poets without whose favour even mighty kings are not remembered, though the earth, encircled by the oceans, was sheltered under the shadow of their arms as in the shade of forest-trees.

47. Without thee, O brother composer of true poetry, this world does not even in its dreams know of the existence of those ornaments of the earth who once rested their feet on the temples of elephants, who possessed wealth, and in whose palaces maidens dwelt, moons of the day,—without thee the universe is blind, why [praise thee] with a hundred hymns ?

Chronology.

48-49. The kings Gonanda [the First] and his successors ruled Kaśmīr during twenty-two hundred and sixty-eight years in the Kaliyuga. This calculation of the duration of these [kings' reigns] has been thought wrong by some [authors] who were misled by the statement that the Bhārata [war] took place at the end of the Dvāpara [Yuga].

42. vidyā vṛśmāni turgāni. I now prefer to read thus instead of vidyāvṛśmāni ¹⁰ of Ed., as 'lofty halls of learning' are nowhere specially mentioned by K. nor otherwise ascribed to the country. The above was evidently also the interpretation of the glossator A₁. The abundance of excellent timber and the difference of the climate explains why ordinary dwelling-houses in Kāśmīr, even in villages, are constructed of far greater height than generally found in India proper.

Kāśmīr has long been famous for its saffron, chiefly cultivated in the neighbourhood of Padmapura (Pāmpar); comp. Fourth Chron. 926 sqq., and LAWRENCE, Valley, p. 342. Regarding the cultivation of grapes, comp. Valley, p. 361.

K. refers repeatedly to the Kāśmīrians' delight in the cool water of their rivers; see iii. 362; viii. 1863.

43. The father of Gauri is the Himālaya.

44. As K. distinctly includes i. 16 Gonanda I. among the fifty-two lost kings, ⁴ Gonandāt can refer only to Gonanda III., with whom the list of known rulers begins, and cannot be translated 'beginning with Gonanda.' The correct interpretation is indicated by the gloss of A₁.

48-49. The above translation of the Yuga conforms to the view set forth by Dr. Hultzsch in his able discussion of the passage, Ind. Ant., xviii. p. 99. It also agrees with the earlier renderings of TROYER, i. p. 388;

50. If the years of those kings, the duration of whose reigns is known, are added up, leaving aside the above [2268 years of Gonanda I. and his successors], no rest remains from the passed period of the Kaliyuga, as [will be seen] from the following.

51. When six hundred and fifty-three years of the Kaliyuga had passed away, the Kurus and Pāṇḍavas lived on the earth.

52. At present, in the twenty-fourth year of the Laukika [era], one thousand and seventy years of the S'aka era have passed.

ii. pp. 7, 366, and of Wilson, Essay, p. 97. K. accepts the calculation of 2268 years for the aggregate of the reigns from Gonanda I. to Yudhiṣṭhira I., i.e. for the reigns contained in the first Taraṅga. He does not indicate its source, but uses it as one of the bases of his chronology.

According to Prof. BÜHLER's rendering, K. would declare also the calculation of 2268 years as erroneous. But if this interpretation were adopted we could neither calculate the duration of the reign of Yudhiṣṭhira I., for which K. does not specify the number of years, nor explain properly the meaning of the next verse. K.'s aim in the whole argument is to prove Kali 653 as the starting point of Kāśmīr chronology. He, therefore, a limine, refutes the opinion which placed Gonanda I. and the Bhārata war at the commencement of the Kali era.

For a full discussion of K.'s computations, as contained in i. 48-56, and their bearing on his system of chronology, comp. the Introduction.

50. This verse, as I understand it, gives K.'s reason for accepting the calculation of 2268 years for the reigns contained in the i. Taraṅga. Dr. Hultzsch, loc., has shown that if we add up the figures given by K. in Taraṅgas ii.-viii. for the reigns from the dethronement of Yudhiṣṭhira I. to his own time, we get a rough total of 1328 years (the odd months and days in the totals of the reigns of the ii. and iii. Taraṅgas being disregarded). If to this total are added the 2268 years for the i. Taraṅga, and the result deducted from the 4249 years which had elapsed of the Kali era at the time of K.'s composition (see verse 52 below), there remain 653 years. This is exactly the number of years which had elapsed according to the statement accepted by K. (i. 51) between the commencement of the Kaliyuga and the date of the Bhārata war, i.e. Gonanda I. Thus the whole period of the Kali era up to the author's time is accounted for, and 'no rest remains.' The equation of K., as indicated in this verse, is therefore:—

A	B
Years of the Kaliyuga elapsed in 1070 S'aka	Reigns of kings from Gonanda I. to Yudhiṣṭhira I. (i. 48)
= 1070	Reigns of kings mentioned in Taraṅgas ii.-viii., up to S'aka 1070
+ 3179	Kali years passed up to Gonanda I.
4249	653
	4249

Prof. Buhler's rendering differs partly on account of his interpretation of i. 48, 49, and partly owing to the reading tadvivarjitā adopted by him. This reading, which Prof. B. seems to have taken from the former editions, is found also in L, and deserves, therefore, consideration. If it were adopted, taḍ would have to be taken as referring to Bhārata in i. 49. As this construction seems harsh and as the translation given above better satisfies the context, I prefer to adhere to the reading tadvivarjitā as found in A.

evam refers to the statement of the next verse, by which K. corrects the error indicated in i. 49 as to the date of the Bhārata war; comp. the similar use of evam in v. 55.

52. Regarding the Laukika or Saptarṣi era, which has remained in current use among the Brahman population of Kāśmīr to the present day, comp. the remarks of Prof. BÜHLER, Report, pp. 59 sq. He was the first to bring the initial date of this era, viz. Caitra śuklī 1 of Kalisaṁvat 25 (expired) or the year 3070-75 B.C., to the notice of European scholars and to account for the equation given in our verse.

The following calculation shows that the year in which K. wrote his introduction, was *Laukika*saṁvat 4221:—

Distance between Kali 25 (initial date of Laukika era) and the initial date of the S'aka era	3154
Distance between S'aka saṁvat 1 and Kalhaṇa's time	1070
Total of Saptarṣi years	4224

INTRODUCTION

53. On the whole, at this time two thousand three hundred and thirty years have passed since [the accession of] Gonanda the Third.

54. Twelve hundred and sixty-six years are believed [to be comprised] in the sum of the reigns of those fifty-two [lost] kings.

55. On this [point] a decision is furnished by the [words of the] author of the [Bṛhat]samhitā who [with reference to the fact] that the Great Bear moves from one Nakṣatra to the other in a hundred years, has thus [indicated] its course:

56. "When King Yudhiṣṭhira ruled the earth, the Munis (the Great Bear) stood in the [Nakṣatra] Maghāḥ. The date of his reign was 2526 years [before] the S'aka era."

GONANDA I.

57. The glorious king of Kāśmīr Gonanda was worshipped by the [Northern] region which Kailāsa lights up [with its dazzling snow], and which the tossing Gaṅgā clothes with a soft garment.

58. The earth, afraid, as it were, of the infusion of Śeṣa's poison, left the body of the serpent, and took up a resting-place in the king's arm that was adorned by the jewel sacred to Garuḍa.

The omission of the centuries in giving Laukika dates is an ancient custom, as shown by the dates recorded in this era in inscriptions and MSS. For a full discussion of the facts connected with the Laukika cycle and its use in the hill regions neighbouring on Kāśmīr, see CUNNINGHAM, Indian Eras, pp. 6-17.

53. The expression prāyāḥ seems to indicate a 'rough' calculation such as assumed in note i. 50. If we add to the rough total of 1326 years for the reigns of the Taraṅgas ii-viii. the 1002 years which remain for the reigns of Gonanda III.-Yudhiṣṭhira I., after deducting from the total figure 2268 for the i. Taraṅga (i. 48) the 1266 years of the fifty-two 'lost' kings, we obtain as result the above aggregate of 2330 years for the reigns from Gonanda III. to Kaṭhapa's time.

54. The expression mata seems to be used in order to show that the figure 1266 for the aggregate of the reigns of the 'lost' kings was deduced by K. himself by means of a computation based on the traditional figure given in i. 48 and the rough sum of 2330 years (i. 53).

55-56. K. gives by the quotation from Varāhamihira's Bṛhatsamhitā, xii. 3, the evidence for his statement (i. 51) regarding the date of the Kuru-Pandavas and Gonanda I. The year 2526 before S'aka corresponds to 653 Kali.

This date of Yudhiṣṭhira's coronation is taken by K. also as the first year of Gonanda I., and consequently as the starting point of his chronological calculations.

The statement (i. 52) which makes Gonanda II., the grandson of Gonanda I., a contemporary of the Great War, is not in contradiction herewith (see Report, p. lxxv note), as some time is supposed to have elapsed between Yudhiṣṭhira's abhiṣeka and the commencement of the war.

Regarding the theory which makes the Great Bear move within each lunar mansion for one century, see Bṛhatsamhitā, xiii. 4; ALBERUNI, India, i. pp. 301, 393, and CUNNINGHAM, Indian Eras, p. 11.

57. Under the name of Gaṅgā the Sindhu or Sind River is referred to. The Sind River, which drains the mountain ranges to the north of the Valley from Drās to the Haramukh and is the greatest tributary of the Vitastā within Kāśmīr, is distinctly identified with the Gaṅgā by the Nilamata, vv. 297 sqq.: (Gaṅgā Sindhu tu vijneyā Vitastā Tamunā tathā). See also Jonar. 864 (where the construction of a canal from the Sind into the Manasbal Lake is meant), Haruar. xii. 40, and Vitastāmāhātmya, xx. 15. The source of this Sindhu-Gaṅgā is placed by ancient tradition in the sacred Gaṅgā Lake (Gangabal) below the N.E. glaciers of the Haramukh Peaks; see note i. 36 and the Harāmukha-gaṅgā and Nandikētra Māhātmya.

Numerous springs and rivulets in Kāśmīr are considered by local tradition as manifestations of the Gaṅgā, but are too unimportant to be alluded to in our passage.

58. The jewel sacred to Garuḍa, the destroyer of serpents, is the emerald. B.

The faulty reading deham of the earlier edd (instead of deham) is found already in I.

59. Called for help by his relative Jarāsandha, he besieged with large forces Mathurā, [the town] of the enemy of Kuṁsa (Kṛṣṇa).

60. When he pitched his camp on the bank of the Kūṁdī (Yamunā), the fame of the [hostile] warriors disappeared, together with the smiles of the women of Yadu's race.

61. Once he whose ensign is the plough (Balabhadra), engaged that warrior in battle, in order to save his utterly shattered forces.

62. While the combat of these two [warriors] of equal strength [continued] with doubtful issue, the triumphal wreath of the goddess of victory faded, since it remained long in her hand.

63. Finally, on the field of battle, with limbs wounded by [each other's] weapons, the king of Kaśmīr embraced the earth and the scion of Yadu the goddess of victory.

64. When that good warrior had gone the road which great heroes easily find, his son, the illustrious Dāmodara, ruled the earth.

65. That proud prince, though he had obtained a kingdom which offered in profusion the means of enjoyments, did not find peace as he brooded over his father's death.

66. He whose arm, [strong] like a tree, was burning with pride, heard that the Vṛṣṇis (Yādavas) had been invited by the Gāndhāras on the banks of the Indus to an approaching Svayamvara and had come.

67. Then, when they were near, he led against them, [impelled] by excessive wrath, an expedition obscuring the sky with the dust that the horses of his army raised.

68. In that battle the maiden who was impatient for the wedding and about to choose herself a husband, became dependent [on one who would choose her]; while [instead of her] the celestial maidens chose husbands in Gandhāra-land.

69. Then the valiant ruler of the earth-disc, attacking in the battle with the GONANDA I.

DĀMODARA I.

59. Jarāsandha, king of Magadha, was the father-in-law of Kuṁsa, whom Kṛṣṇa slew.

62. I have followed the reading of A, kīh jayasrag, as the particle kīh seems required to bring out the Utprekṣānāṁkāra of the verse. The v. l. entered by A, varajasrag, is found also in L.

64. The road to Svarga is meant. B.

66. Regarding the country of the Gāndhāras, in the valley of the lower Kabul River, see CUNNINGHAM, Anc. Geography, pp. 47 sqq.; LASSEN, Ind. Alt., i. pp. 502 sq.; H. pp. 150; Si-yu-ki, i. pp. 97 sqq.

68. The reading nighnati of A, has been doubted (also by myself in Ed.) without sufficient reason; it has since been confirmed by L and admits, as shown above, of a satisfactory explanation. The first half of the verse contains a virodhābhāsa. She who was expecting to choose from among many wooers, found after the battle no one to choose, and became dependent (nighna) on the choice of others. nighnati comes from a denominative √nighna (nighnībhavati). The v. l. recorded by A, nighnyate, is evidently a lectio levior, due to the conjecture of some puzzled reader.

The 'celestial maidens' are the Apsaras who receive the brave men fallen in battle.

69. The numerous puns on the word cakra, disc, make this verse dear to the Pandit.

DĀMODARA I.

god whose weapon is the war-disc, the disc-like array of his enemies, went to heaven by the road of the edge of the battle-disc.

YASOVATĪ.

70. Then Kṛṣṇa, the descendant of Yadu, had the [king's] pregnant widow Yaśovatī installed on the throne by the Brahmins.

71. When his advisers at that time were grumbling [at the coronation of a woman], the slayer of Madhu (Kṛṣṇa) appeased them by reciting this verse from the [Nīlamata]-Purāṇa :

72. "Kāśmīr-land is Pārvatī; know that its king is a portion of S'iva. Though he be wicked, a wise man who desires [his own] prosperity, will not despise him."

73. The eyes of men which [before] showed no respect for women as [being only] objects of enjoyment, looked [after Kṛṣṇa's words] upon her (Yaśovatī) as the mother of her subjects and like a goddess.

74. Then in the proper month that queen bore a son distinguished by divine marks, a new sprout of the family tree which had been consumed by fire.

GONANDA II.

75. For this [son] the Brahmins performed the coronation and kindred rites in conjunction with his Jātakarma and other ceremonies.

76. The infant king received in due course, together with his regal dignity, the name of his grandfather Gonanda.

77. Two nurses were engaged in bringing up the child, the one gave him her milk, the other all her wealth.

78. The ministers of his father, who took care that his being pleased should not remain without results, bestowed wealth upon his attendants even when he smiled without cause.

cakradhārādhanā, 'by the road of the edge of the battle-disc,' may also be dissolved, cakradhārah kṛṣṇaḥ, sa eva panthāḥ, tena, and be translated 'the road (being opened to him by) Kṛṣṇa, the bearer of the war disc.' To be slain by a person as holy as Kṛṣṇa would, of course, ensure heaven to the victim. Perhaps, Kalhana intended it to be taken both ways. B.

70. K.'s words appear here to contain a reminiscence of the corresponding passage of the Nīlamata, vv. 7-8; antarvatnīn īasya patnīn Vāsudevo 'bhyaśecayut || bhaviṣyatput-rarījyārthan tasya deśasya gauravāt |. The extant text of the Nīlamata does not contain the name of Yaśovatī. The latter form of the name is confirmed by L against A₃, Yaśomatī; comp. viii. 3408.

71. For vinayavivrat, comp. the gloss of A₂, śamayām āsa, and K.'s use of the expression, viii. 777.

72. The verse is not found in this form in the present text of the Nīlamata; but it can scarcely be anything else but a reference to, or free quotation of, the passage which now reads, śl. 287: Kāśmīrāyān tathā rājā tvayā jñeyo harāṇśajāḥ | trayāvajñā na kartavyā matan bhūim icchatā. The verse is quoted, in the form given by K., Jonar. 184.

76. The nāmakarma here referred to follows, according to the present Ācāra of the Kāśmīrians, one day after the jātakarma.

77. The second nurse meant is the earth (dhātṛi). The reading of A₂, prasavini, for prasavini A₁, L, deserves consideration, a kind of amuprāsa being, perhaps, intended with the following sarvasamprat prasūh.

78. It is the custom and duty of kings to give presents whenever they are pleased. The ministers watched lest the custom should be neglected in the case of the infant king, and gave presents whenever he smiled. B.

79. When his officers, unable to understand the child's indistinct [words], did not carry out his orders, they considered themselves guilty of a crime.

80. When the infant king ascended his father's throne, he, with his legs dangling in the air, could not remove (i.e. fulfil) the desire of the footstool [to bear his feet].

81. The ministers placed him whose locks were moved by the wind from the Chowries, on the royal throne, and attended [in his presence] to the legal and religious disputes of his subjects.

82. Thus [it came about that] the king of Kāśmīr, being an infant, was taken neither by the Kurus nor by the Pāṇḍavas to assist them in their war.

83. Thirty-five kings who followed after him, have been immersed in the ocean of oblivion, their names and deeds having perished through the destruction of the records.

84. After them Lava, an ornament of the earth, a favourite of Victory that wears the flowing robe of fame, became king.

85. The roar of his army which kept away sleep from the universe, sent—O wonder—his enemies to their long slumber.

86. Constructing eighty-four lakhs of stone-buildings, he founded the town of Lolora.

87. After bestowing on a community of Brahmans the Agrahāra of Levāra on the Ledurī, this valiant [king], the glory of whose heroism was blameless, ascended to heaven.

GONANDA II.

Thirty-five kings forgotten.

LAVA.

80. The verse, as I take it, is intended to describe that the child-king, though he sat on his throne, was unable yet to make use of its necessary adjunct, the royal footstool.

For another interpretation, see Report, p. lxxviii.

82. Comp. in the Nilamata the question of Janamejaya śl. 4; kathanā Kāśmīriko rājā nāyūtas tatra kirtaya | Pāṇḍavair Dhārtarīṣṭraiśca na yrtah sa kathanā upah ||; and the last line of the fragmentary answer of Vaiśampayana, śl. 10: bālabhāvāt Pāṇḍusutair nānitah Kauravair na vā.

86. I am unable to indicate on the map the real or supposed position of this magnificent town. Nor have I been able to trace a local name resembling Lolora. It is, however, noteworthy that a tradition of some antiquity and extant to this day, has connected the name of King Lava and of the town founded by him with that of the Lōlan (Lōlah) Pargana, in Kamrāj. This tradition can be traced in the gloss (probably to be read Lolara), written in A by an old hand; in the remark of ABU-L-FAZL (Ain-i Akh., ii. p. 381) and the notes of the Persian Chronicles of Rafi'ud-din and Muhammad 'Azim (Wilson, Essay, p. 17); comp. also Report, p. lxxix. The old Skr. name of the Lōlan district is, however, Laulāha (see vii. 1241), the form Lalavaka of the Lokapr. ii. and P. Sāhibrām's Lalava being clearly modern adaptations.

Dr. Hultzsch has already called attention to the evident fact that the connection of certain local names with Lava and the other seven kings whose names K. took from Padmanihira (i. 18), is based on popular etymology; see Ind. Ant., xviii. p. 66. The tendency to explain local names by their apparent relation to names of kings, real or imaginary, continues to influence popular tradition in Kāśmīr to the present day. This fact supports Dr. Hultzsch's conclusion as to the unhistorical character of Padmanihira's list.

87. The Ledari is the modern Lid'r, one of the principal tributaries of the Vitastā; it drains the mountains south of the upper Sind Valley, and flows into the Vitastā between Anantardg and Tij'brōr. The Ledari is mentioned S'rin. 221; Jonar. 106, 118.

Kṛtā.

88. After him followed his son Kuśa, lotus-eyed and expert in [deeds of] prowess, who granted the Agrahāra of Kuruhāra.

KHAGENDRA.

89. After him his son, the illustrious Khagendra, obtained the throne, the destroyer of the elephant array of his foes, a leader [of men], an abode of valour.

90. He established the two chief Agrahāras, Khūyī and Khonamuṣa, and then ascended to that world [above] which he had purchased by deeds bright like [the glitter of] Siva's [teeth in] smiling.

SURENDRA.

91. Then ruled his son Surendra, possessed of priceless greatness, who was far removed from sinfulness (or, whose state resembled that of Indra, though lacking its continuity), and whose deeds astonished the world.

92. The lord of the gods (surendra) could not be compared to this Surendra, [since he bears the epithets] śatamanjyu, 'the harbourer of a hundred grudges,' and gotrabhīd, 'the shatterer of the mountains,' [while King Surendra deserved to be called] śāntamanjyu, 'he whose anger is appeased,' and gotrarakṣin, 'the protector of the Gotra (or, of the mountains).'

Agrahāra is the regular term used by K. for designating a 'Jāgīr' village or piece of land, the revenue of which is assigned to an individual, corporation or religious institution. For Agrahāras granted to corporations or individual Brahmins, see i. 307, 311, 314, 341; iii. 8, 316, 481, 639; v. 403, 442; vi. 89, 336; vii. 139; viii. 398 sqq. etc. (comp. Index); for the Agrahāra of a non-Brahmin, see v. 397.

Regarding the grant of Agrahāras for the maintenance of sacred shrines, comp. notes ii. 132; v. 168 sqq.

The custom of bestowing 'Jāgīrs' has continued in Kāśmīr through the times of the Muhammadan and Sikh rules to the present day, the condition of tenure being manifold.

Levāra can be identified with the modern village of Liv'r, situated on the right bank of the Lid'r in the Daohūngpūr Pargana, 75° 18' long. 33° 53' lat. Passing through the village in September, 1891, I was not able to trace in or near it any remains of antiquity.

88. The gloss of A. identifies Kuruhāra with the modern Kular, which is probably correct. Kular is a fair-sized village on the western side of the Lid'r Valley, some four miles to the N. of Liv'r.

89. ripunāgakuṇṭantakaḥ admits of a double interpretation, according as Khagendra is taken as the king's name or as that of Garuḍa, 'the lord of birds' and the destroyer of the Nāgas.

Khūyī must be identified with the modern Khāy, a considerable village situated in the Biru Pargana, 73° 36' long. 34° lat. It is mentioned again, i. 340, as an Agrahāra of Gopaditya under the name of Khūyikā. [The identification with Kūh'pūr, on the Vitastā above Pāmpūr, found in the Chronicles of Haidar Malik, Narayana Kōl, etc., is not supported by any evidence.]

Khonamuṣa is well-known as the modern village of Khun'moḥ, situated about three miles to the N.N.W. of Pāmpūr (Pāmpoor of Map), 75° 1' long. 34° 3' lat. It is famous for its saffron cultivation, and is the birth-place of the poet Bilhana who has described it in his Vikramādhikādevacarita, xviii. 70-72. Gen. CUNNINGHAM first identified the place, Ann. Geogr., p. 98. For a very accurate and full account of the village and its antiquities, see Prof. BÜHLER's Report, pp. 4 sqq.

91. dirghamaghavattābahishkṛtāḥ, of which a double translation has been given, may be taken as two words, dirgham and aghavattābahishkṛtāḥ, or as a compound dirghamaghavattā-bahishkṛtāḥ. The author, like a good Kavi, loves his pun dearly, and intends it to be taken both ways. B.

In regard to the second meaning I have been obliged to depart from B.'s rendering 'who far surpassed Indra's state,' in view of the ordinary meaning of bahishkṛta; see P.W. s.v.

92. Indra's ancient epithet gotrabhīd, which in Vedic mythology refers to the opening of the Gotra or pen of the cows (the waters liberated by Indra), is in post-vedic literature connected with the story of the cutting of the mountains' wings; comp. the passages quoted P.W. s.v. In the case of the Kāśmīrian Surendra the epithet gotrarakṣin

93. That illustrious [king] founded in the neighbourhood of the Darav country a town called Soraka, and built the Vihāra called Narendrabhavana.

SURENDRA.

94. In his own kingdom that [ruler] of great fame and of pious works, established a Vihāra called Saurasa, which was distinguished by religious merit.

95. When this king had died without issue, Godhara, the scion of another family, protected the earth, together with the finest of mountains.

GODHARA.

96. This noble-minded, pious king went to heaven after bestowing on Brahmans the Agrahāra of Godharū-Hastisālā.

97. After him his son Suvarṇa was a giver of gold (suvarṇa) to the needy, he who brought to Kurīlu the canal (lulū) called Suvarṇamāni.

SUVARṆA.

may refer either to the protection of his family or to the rule over the mountains (gotra), i.e. Kāśmīr.

93. Neither the town nor the Vihāra mentioned here can be traced with certainty. From the reference made to the country of the Dards and the expression svamāṇḍale used in contrast in the following verse, it appears that Soraka should be looked for outside Kāśmīr proper. The term bhavana 'residence' is found in the designations of other Kāśmīr Vihāras; comp. Aṃṣṭabhavana, iii. 9; Skandabhavana, vi. 137; Morākabhavana, iii. 356; also Notes on On-K'ong, p. 9.

For Sorakākhyaṃ L reads Saurakā°. Regarding the Darads, see note i. 312.

94. The Vihāra Saurasa may, perhaps, as suggested by P. Govind Kaul, be located at the modern village of Suras, situated on the Sangsafed (Chatskan) River in the Nāgam Pargana, 74° 45' long. 33° 51' lat. It is evident that the attribution of the localities Soraka and Saurasa to a king Surendra rests on popular etymology; see note i. 86.

96. The Agrahāra here named has hitherto remained unidentified owing to the faulty text of the previous Edd., which read Godharo Hastisālākhyam (thus also L). The gloss of A₂ (Godhar Astihil), in conformity with the text of A, shows that the Agrahāra bore a compound name and was called after two localities, Godharā and Hastisālā. These I was able to identify on my tour of September, 1891, with the modern villages of Gudar and Ast'hil in the Div'sar Pargana. Gudar, a village of about twenty houses, is situated on the right bank of the Viśokā (Vesau) River, 75° 1' long. 33° 36' lat. Close to the W. of the village the Viśokā is joined by the sacred rivulet Godāvari, which forms a well-known Tirtha. The Godāvarimūhātmya mentions the village of Gudar under the name Godara, and connects this name with the legend relating to the appearance of the Godāvari: yasmin girau

mahādevi Gantamena mahātmanā | gaur vā vidārītā prakto Godaro girisattamāḥ || yasmin grāme Godaro vai parvataḥ saṅgratiṣṭhātāḥ | sa grāmaḥ prathīto 'dyāpi Godarākhya mahesvari || gaur vai vidārītā yutrotthitā Gaṅgājaloḥṣītā | sū vai Godāvari nāma Gaṅgā parvamapīvanī ||

A local tradition communicated to me by the Purohita and the Mīan Jāgirdār of the place, tells of a town 'founded on this site by a King Gudar.' No old remains, however, could be shown to me, and the locality is far too confined for a larger settlement.

Hastisālā, the Ast'hil of the gloss, is represented by the hamlet of Ast'hil situated about one mile to the N.E. of Gudar, on a sandy island of the Viśokā.

It is possible that in the above local tradition we have the very legend which gave rise to Helārāja's notice regarding a king Godhara, copied by Padmamihira and Kalhana. The legend itself is evidently based on popular etymology. The village name, whether taken as Godharā, 'the land of the cow,' or Godara, 'the [place of the] cow-slaughter,' shows an unmistakable connection with the story of the Godāvari. The variation of the Sanskrit form is explained by the fact that the Kā. pronunciation makes no distinction between Skr. ḍ and dh; comp. note viii. 1861.

97. The position of Karālā is clearly indicated by Jonar. 861-2, and S'riv. iii. 194, where mention is made of the foundation of the town Jainapuri by Sultan Zain-ul-'abidin in the Karālā vāṇya (Pargana). Jainapuri is the modern Zain'pūr which has given its name to the tract of the Aḍ'vin Pargana situated on the alluvial plateau to the S. of the Rembyār River. The identification of Karālā with this tract is confirmed by the gloss of A₂, which places Karālā in Arḍhāvane, i.e. Aḍ'vin. The latter locality is also mentioned by Haidar Malik in connection with the works of King Suvarṇa.

Suvarṇamāṇikulyā is explained by A₂ as

JANAKA.

98. His son Janaka, comparable to a father (janaka) of his subjects, established the Vihāra and Agrahāra of Jālora.

S'ACINARA.

99. Then his son the illustrious S'acinara, who was like an earthly Indra (śacipati), protected the earth; he was of a forgiving disposition, and his orders were never broken.

100. This king founded the Agrahāras of S'amāṅgāsā and S'anāra; [dying] without male issue, he obtained one half of Indra's seat [in heaven].

Suvannamay nādo. On a visit paid to Zain'pūr-Āḍ'vin in September, 1895, I ascertained that the name Suvannamay Kūl, the exact derivative of Suvarṇamayakūṭā, is borne to this day by a large irrigation canal (nōi) which leaves the Viśokā (Vesau) River above the village shown as 'Larpoo' on the map, at a point circ. 74° 57' 30" long, 33° 38' 30" lat. The Suvannamay Kūl flows along the east scarp of the Zain'pūr plateau through the villages marked Nillon, Pargama, Koojoo, and after a course of about twenty miles rejoins the Viśokā a short distance above the village of Āḍ'vin (Arvin of map).

98. P. Govind Kaul identifies Jālora with the village of Zolur, shown on the map as Zohur, in the Zain'gūr Pargana, 74° 24' long, 34° 23' lat. I have not been able to visit the site or to obtain other evidence supporting this identification apart from the similarity of the names. Haidar Malik places 'Zālurak' in the district of 'Vihī,' i.e. Vihī.

99. K., in his list of kings, viii. 3411, names S'aci as the mother of S'acinara.

100. S'amāṅgāsānāravajoh. A., who in this instance has rewritten older glosses, probably of A., renders the two names by S'vāṅgas and S'nār. The first locality can be identified without hesitation with the modern S'āngas, a large village situated on the left bank of the Ar'path River in the Kuṭ'hār Pargana, 75° 22' long, 33° 42' lat.

It is more difficult to account for the position of the second Agrahāra. Considering that the names of the localities, the foundation of which is attributed to the eight kings taken from Holarāja's Parthivāvali, show invariably the same initial consonant as the corresponding royal names, the second name in the compound must be taken as S'anāra, not as Asanāra, as hitherto supposed. This division is clearly indicated by the danḍa placed by A. after S'amāṅgāsā.

The old gloss on this name is written S'nār by A., but reproduced in R as Chār, two forms which can scarcely be kept distinct in S'arada characters. Neither of them have I been able to trace as the actual name of a locality. An examination, however, of the phonetic peculiarities of the old names and their more recent equivalents as given by the glosses, leads to a satisfactory identification.

The form S'vāṅgas or modern S'āngas for S'amāṅgāsā shows the initial palatal sibilant preserved which, under a general phonetic law, is regularly replaced in Kā. by k; comp. e.g. Ṭiur'pūr for S'ūranpura, Ṭiur'parrat for S'ūr-kāparrata, Ṭamaṭ for S'anūṭā, etc. A similar preservation of the initial s, as ś or ch, is found elsewhere only in cases where the initial consonant was protected by immediate contact with a following consonant. Thus we have S'rinagar for S'rinagara; śrāvan (name of month, used by all classes of Kāśmīris) for śrāvanā; Chirāṭh for S'rāṭh (name of a Pargana); Chāmbār, near Lohara, for S'ārcanlara, see note viii. 187d. These analogies make it probable that we have to assume a contracted form, S'māṅgāsā*, in which the vowel of the first syllable has been eliminated under the influence of the stress accent placed on the penultimate. The phonetic history of the name may thus be represented: S'amāṅgāsā (Rājat.) > S'māṅgāsā* > S'vāṅgas (gloss) > S'vāṅgas (modern).

By the same process of phonetic conversion we should have to expect for the old name S'anāra a modern form S'ār, through S'anāra (Rājat.) > S'nāra* > S'nār (gloss) > S'ār. This form S'ār is actually found as the name of a village in the Vihī Pargana, 75° 4' long, 34° 1' lat., and with the latter I accordingly propose to identify the second Agrahāra mentioned in our verse.

When this identification first suggested itself to me, I was unaware of its being also indicated by traditional authority. Haidar Malik notices of King 'Sacinara' that he built the town of 'Shanalkās' in the Kuṭ'hār district and Sharār in Vihī. There can be no doubt that we have got here the modern name of S'ār imperfectly rendered in the Persian MS.

Regarding S'ār, which was once the seat of an iron industry, and is still a considerable village, see INCE, Handbook, p. 172, and VIENNE, Travels, ii. p. 35. When visiting it in September, 1891, I found ancient slabs of 101. Then the son of that king's grand-uncle and great-grandson of S'akuni, the faithful Āśoka, reigned over the earth.

102. This king who had freed himself from sins and had embraced the doctrine of Jina, covered S'uskalettra and Vitastāttra with numerous Stūpas.

103. At the town of Vitastāttra there stood within the precincts of the Dharmāranya Vihāra a Caitya built by him, the height of which could not be reached by the eye.

104. That illustrious king built the town of S'rīnagarī, which was most important on account of its ninety-six lakhs of houses resplendent with wealth.

great size built into the Zīrat, which stands in the centre of the village, and in a Nāga close by some sculptured Stēles like those described Report, p. 5.

For an account of S'angas, which is a large and prosperous place, see VIGNE, Travels, i. p. 340, and INCE, Handbook, p. 182. Though it is traditionally believed to be an old site, I was unable to discover, during a rapid visit paid in September, 1891, any traces of antiquity, except some large sculptured slabs built into a Zīrat erected about 1580 A.D.

S'amāṅgāsa is mentioned again, viii. 651; comp. also note i. 340.

101. The names of Āśoka and the next four kings were taken by K. from Chavillakara; see i. 19 sq. The survival of the name of Āśoka in Kāśmīr tradition may be taken as an indication that the sovereign power of the historical Āśoka was acknowledged also by Kāśmīr. Regarding Āśoka's connection with Kāśmīr in Buddhist tradition, see Si-yu-ki, i. p. 150 sq.; Notes on Ou-Kong, p. 22.

102. S'uskalettra can be identified on the basis of the gloss of A₂, Hukhaletra, with the modern village of Hukhālitr (map Hukhlitr) in the Dūnta Pargana, 74° 42' long. 34° lat.; comp. also i. 170. The place was visited in 1891 on my behalf by P. Kāśi Rām, who, however, failed to trace antiquarian remains in or near the village.

Vitastāttra, which the gloss of A₂ on the following verse renders by Vithavatra, is the modern Vithavatur, a small village situated about one mile to the N.W. of the famous Vernag spring (see i. 28) in the Shāhabād Pargana, 75° 16' long. 33° 33' lat. A large spring which issues in a pond close to the village, forms the object of a local pilgrimage, and is traditionally considered the main source of the Vitastā: comp. VIGNE, i. 335. In the Vitastāmāhātmya, ii. 40, it is referred to under the name of Vitastāvartika.

Of the Stūpas and the great Caitya which Āśoka is said to have erected here, I have not been able to trace any remains above ground. Vithavatur, though scarcely a site for a large town on account of the confined nature of the valley, must have always derived some importance from its position at the foot of the Bān-hāl Pass on the route to the eastern Panjāb. Vitastātrapura is mentioned in the time of Anantadeva, vii. 364; comp. also note viii. 1073.

The faulty reading °vitastādru of the earlier Edd. is found already in L, and is due to a mistake in transcription.

104. Gen. CUNNINGHAM, Anc. Geogr., p. 95, has proposed to locate Āśoka's S'rīnagarī at the site of the present village of Pāndrūṭhan, Kalhana's Purāṇādhisthāna, on the right bank of the Vitastā, some three miles above the modern S'rīnagar (comp. note iii. 99). His proposal is based on i. 124, where K. relates the foundation by Jalauka of the shrine of Jyēṣṭharudra at S'rīnagarī. This shrine Gen. CUNNINGHAM identified with the existing temple on the top of the Takht-i-Sulaimān Hill, below which, at a distance of about two miles to the S.E., Pāndrūṭhan is situated. Though the genuineness of the tradition by which Gen. CUNNINGHAM supported his identification, has rightly been questioned by Prof. BÜHLEK, Report, p. 17, and though the real date of the temple on the Takht is subject to great doubt (comp. FERNUSSEN's History of Indian Architecture, p. 282), yet the evidence recorded below in note C, i. 124, proves that Jalauka's Jyēṣṭharudra must be looked for either on the very hill or in its close proximity.

In this neighbourhood we must accordingly place Āśoka's S'rīnagarī. Whether at Pāndrūṭhan or elsewhere, is a question which our available materials do not permit us to decide with absolute certainty, however tempting the proposed identification is in view of the significance of the name Purāṇādhisthāna, 'the ancient capital.' The general conclusion here indicated receives further confirmation

ASOKA.

105. This sinless [prince], after removing the old stuccoed enclosure of the shrine of Vijayeshvara, built [in its stead] a new one of stone.

106. He who had overcome [all] lassitude, erected within the enclosure of Vijayesa, and near it, two temples which were called Asokesvara.

107. As the country was overrun by Mlecchas, the pious [king] obtained from [S'iva] Bhūteśa, whom he had pleased by his austerities, a son in order to exterminate them.

by the evidence given in note C, i. 124, regarding the position of the Sodara spring near Srinagari.

The transfer of the old name Srinagari to the new capital built by Pravarasena II. on the site of the present Srinagar, and properly called Pravaragura (see note iii. 339 sqq.), has been satisfactorily accounted for by CUNNINGHAM (i.e., p. 97), who justly refers to the analogies furnished by the history of other Indian capitals.

Srinagara (neuter) is in the Rajāt, as well as in other Kāśmīrian texts by far the most common form of the name for this new capital, and has as such remained in general use to the present day. But the form Srinagari is by no means unknown; comp. iv. 6; Jonar. 81; Fourth Chron. 240; Mahādeva-māhātmya, iii. 8.

In the face of the arguments recorded above it still deserves to be noted that the Persian Chroniclers, Haidar Malik, Muhammad 'Azim, etc., place Asoka's capital at Str, on the left bank of the Lid'r in the Khavurpūr Pargana. To this tradition refers probably Prof. Bühler's remark: 'Some Pandits think it lay near Islāmābād.'

105. The famous old shrine of S'iva Vijayeshvara has given its name to the surrounding town, the modern Vijēbrēr (see note i. 38). The ancient temple occupied, according to the tradition of the local Purohitas, a site about a hundred yards from the left river bank and opposite to the bridge over the Vitastā. From there Mahārāja Ranbir Singh obtained stone materials for his new temple, built some thirty years ago. The old site, which lies considerably below the level of the surrounding houses, showed on the occasion of my first visit, in 1889, only a few broken slabs and shapless dēbris. It has since been partly built over. Some sculptures of apparently late workmanship, which were found here, are now placed in front of the new temple, built some distance higher up the river. The temple of Vijayesa was burned down under King Anantadeva, and restored by his successor, Kalāśa; see vii. 524 sq.

The Prākāras, or quadrangular enclosures which form a very striking feature in the architecture of most Kāśmīrian temples, have been discussed in detail by CUNNINGHAM, J.A.S.B., 1848, pp. 310 sqq.

The old Prākāra, which is called here sudhāmaya, may be supposed to have been built of brick or rough stones, and covered with 'chumann,' the material so largely affected by Indian architects of all periods.

106. No trace or tradition survives of these structures at Vijēbrēr. Repairs effected at those buildings in K.'s own time are probably referred to in viii. 3301; see note. (Cf. CUNNINGHAM'S remark (Ind. Geogr., p. 96) that certain insignificant ruins found at Phaulohynk, some two miles above Pāndrāpān, "are said to be the remains of the two Asokesvara temples," must be based on some misunderstanding.)

Asokesvara must be explained as a madhyamapadālapi compound, by Asokena nirmita śvara, 'the (temple of) S'iva, built by Asoka.' The same remark applies to the numerous names of temples ending in śvara [or śā], and beginning with the name of a person, which occur further on. B.

For further information on the nomenclature of Kāśmir temples, see my Notes on Ourk'ong, p. 5.

107. The worship of S'iva Bhūteśa, 'the lord of the beings,' localized near the sacred sites of Mount Haramukuta, has played an important part in the ancient religion of Kāśmir. The legend relating how S'iva came to take up his residence in that neighbourhood in the form of Bhūteśa, is given in the Nīlamata, vv. 1049 sqq., and is closely connected with the story of Nandin, as indicated in note i. 36. The tradition, recorded in the Nandikeśetra and Haramukuta-gangā Māhātmyas, and still current among Kāśmīrians, has located S'iva Bhūteśa's residence on the mountain spur which stretches south-east from the Haramukh Peaks. This spur bears to the present day the name of Būthēśer, i.e. Bhūteśvara.

In the narrow gorge of the Kank'nai River (Kanakavāhini) which flows past the south foot of this spur, and some two miles above

108. Then this [son] called Jalauka became king, an Indra of the earthly regions, who by the [white] stucco of his fame made spotless the universe.

109. Verily the tales of his divine power, since they reached the ears of the gods, kept them [ever] bound in astonishment.

110. He was, forsooth, able to fill the void of the mundane egg with his presents of gold, having obtained a magic substance which could permeate (transform) crores [of less precious metals].

111. He entered the lakes of the Nāgas by arresting the waters and gave charm to his youth by intercourse with the Nāga-maidens.

112. His instructor in the doctrines was the saint Avadhūta, the vanquisher of crowds of Bauddha controversialists, who at that time were powerful and flushed [with success].

113. That truth-speaking king had made a vow that he would ever worship [S'iva] Vijayeshvara and Jyeshthesa [residing] at Nandiśakṣetra.

the hamlet of Vangath (Vasiṣṭhārama), 75° 2' long, 34° 21' lat., are found the ruins of some seventeen temples of various age and dimension. Those ruins, which are now almost hidden by the luxuriant vegetation of the forest, have been described by Bishop Cowie, J.A.S.B., 1886, pp. 101 sqq., and Major Cole, Ancient Buildings in Kashmir, pp. 11 sqq., under the name of 'Temples near Wangat.' Their identity with the buildings which Kāśmīrian kings had at different periods raised in honour of S'iva Bhūtesa and of the neighbouring Liṅga of S'iva Jyeshthesa (comp. note i. 113), was ascertained by me on a visit paid to the site in August, 1891. For an attempt to identify the principal ruins of But'hér see note v. 55-59.

Jalauka, Aśoka's son, is said, i. 148, to have erected to Bhūtesa a stone temple with rich endowments. Gifts at the sacred site are recorded of Narendraditya, i. 347, and Lalitaditya, iv. 189. Avantivarman also appears as a benefactor of Bhūtesvara, v. 46, and one of his visits was the occasion of the interesting episode related v. 48-61. In the disturbed reigns of the later period Bhūtesvara shared the calamities of other Kāśmīrian shrines. Under Saṅgrāmadeva its treasury was plundered by a powerful minister, vii. 106. Bhūtesvara seems to have escaped the sacrilegious confiscations of King Harṣa, but under his successor Uccala it suffered greatly by a conflagration, viii. 77, 110. During the rebellions under Jayasinha the temples were sacked by marauding hillmen, viii. 2756. The last mention of Bh. in the Rājat., viii. 3350, records the building of a Maṭha there.

Of the later fate of the shrine no record is left in the Chronicles. ABU-L-FAZL does not refer to it, but HAIDAR MALIK, in reproducing our passage, correctly renders Bhūtesa by Bhūtisar, i.e. But'hér. The pilgrims' route on their return from the sacred lakes on the Haramukuṭa still leads past the site. But no attention is paid to the temples, which, to judge from their condition, must have long ceased to be places of worship.

The fine spring now called Nārān Nāg, which lies at the N.E. corner of the ruins, and which forms now the final stage of the Haramukuṭa pilgrimage, is the Sodara Tirtha of Kalhane; comp. below note i. 128.

It has been assumed that the Mecchas here referred to are, perhaps, the Greeks; see LASSEN, Ind. Alt., ii. p. 285.

109. I have followed above A, āścaryacaryatūh, which appears to give a better sense than āścūryācaryatūh of A, and L.

110. koṭivedhini vase. The philosopher's stone is meant. The gold-producing vasa is referred to also in Lalitaditya's story, iv. 240 eq., 363, and under Sikaandar (Būṭshikast), Jonar. 578 sqq.

112. Avadhūta, which designates 'one who has thrown off all worldly fetters,' may possibly not be a proper name here. predāha must be explained as prakarṣeṇa iddha; comp. the similar use of √jval, i. 294; iii. 509, etc.

113. Jyeshthesa. A careful examination of all passages in Kāśmīrian texts in which S'iva Jyeshthesa is mentioned, shows that the god was once worshipped under this name, or its equivalents Jyeshthesvara and Jyeshtherudra, in three distinct localities of Kāśmīr, viz. (i.) below Mount Haramukuṭa in the

JALAUKA.

114. A Nāga out of kindness would not allow him to ride [in stages] with horses kept ready from village to village, but carried him always himself.

115. He who was endowed with mighty courage, expelled the Mlecchas who oppressed the land, and conquered in victorious expeditions the earth up to the encircling oceans.

116. The place where the Mlecchas who occupied the land, were routed (ujjhaṭilās) by him, is called by the people even at the present day Ujjhaṭaḍimba.

117. Having conquered the earth, including Kaṇyākubja and other [countries], he settled from that region people of all four castes in his own land, and [particularly] righteous men acquainted with legal procedure.

118-119. Up to that time there existed in this land, which had not yet reached its proper development in legal administration, wealth and other [respects], a government like in most countries. There were [only] seven main state-officials: the judge, the revenue superintendent, the treasurer, the commander of the army, the envoy, the Purohita, and the astrologer.

120. By establishing eighteen officers (karmasthāna) in accordance with traditional usage, the king created from that time onwards a condition of things as under Yudhiṣṭhira.

sacred territory called Nandīśākṣetra or Nandīkṣetra, see note i. 36; (ii.) near Tripuresvara, the modern Triphar, see v. 123; and (iii.) in the close neighbourhood of Srinagar, see i. 124.

By prefixing Nandīśākṣetra to the name Jyēṣṭheśa, K. makes it quite clear that he means the god worshipped in the first-named locality. In the same way he takes care to designate the second Jyēṣṭheśa as Tripuresā-draivīṣṭha, 'residing below the hill of Tripuresa,' when first referring to him in v. 123. To the Jyēṣṭheśa of Nandīkṣetra refers the Nilamata, vv. 1134-36. There we read, in connection with the story of Śiva and Nandin (see note i. 36), of an ancient Linga known as Jyēṣṭheśa, which was situated at the residence of Śiva Bhūteśvara, i.e. at Butiśār (see note i. 107). In the same way the old Nandīkṣetranā-hātmya, vv. 146 seq., speaks of Jyēṣṭheśvara or Jyēṣṭhanātha as worshipped in the close vicinity of Nandīśa and Bhūteśvara.

To this Jyēṣṭheśa relates the passage i. 151, where K. mentions Jyēṣṭharudra (the equivalent of Jyēṣṭheśa) in evident connection with the sacred sites of Nandīkṣetra. Still more clear is the reference in iv. 190, where the erection of a temple in honour of Jyēṣṭharudra is distinctly said to take place at Bhūteśa. In viii. 2430, too, it is evident from the allusion to Vasiṣṭha, whom the Nilamata and the *Māhātmya*s make reside at Vāṅgath (Vasi-ṭhāśrama), close to Butiśār, that the Jyēṣṭheśa of Nandīkṣetra is intended.

The expression used in the last-named passage, śrayambhūh . . . Jyēṣṭharudra, shows that the Linga worshipped under that name was a natural stone, and not a sculptured symbol of the god. Such śrayambhū Lingas are still to this day worshipped at several Tirthas, e.g. on the Śāṅkikāparvata in Srinagar, at Suresvār, etc.

For an account of the temple ruins at Butiśār above Vāṅgath, see note i. 107. From the evidence indicated in note v. 55-59, it will be seen that of the two separate temple groups which are found in that locality, the first or western one was probably dedicated to the worship of Śiva Jyēṣṭheśa.

114. A legendary explanation how the king could regularly attend every day to the worship of Tirthas so distant from each other. The journey from Vijayaśvara to Jyēṣṭheśa in Nandīkṣetra may be put at fully four daily marches.

116. The position of this locality I have not been able to trace. To the name Ujjha-ṭaḍimba would correspond phonetically a *Kā. Ujyārḍemb. ujyār means in modern Kā. 'an uninhabited (desolate place)'; ḍemb, found frequently at the end of local names, 'moor,' 'bog.'

120. Prof. JOLLY, Weber-Festgabe, p. 84,

121. With the wealth which his courage and vigour had obtained for him, that high-minded [king] established the Agrahāra of Vārabāla and others.

122. His noble queen Īśānadevi placed 'circles sacred to the Mothers' (mātṛcakra) which were distinguished by their spiritual power, at the 'Gates' [of Kāśmīr] and other places.

123. The king having heard the Nandipurāṇa [recited] by some pupil of Vyāsa, frequented Sodara and other [sacred springs] as vying [in holiness] with Nandiśa.

points out that these eighteen offices evidently correspond to the 'eighteen Tirthas,' or court officials mentioned in Mahābh. ii. v. 38; comp. below iv. 141.

121. Vārabāla can be safely identified in view of the close agreement of the names with the modern hamlet of Baravul, situated on the right bank of the Kāṅkṇini River, about a mile above its confluence with the Sind, 74° 57' long. 34° 17' lat. This identification has already been made by the glossator of R, who transcribes the name by Dāra-vala.

When passing through the hamlet on my way to Bhūteśvara in August, 1891, I found close to the path a sculptured linga-base or bhadrapiṭha of considerable dimensions, and was shown, on further inquiries, another large carved slab lying in the fields below the houses. According to the statement of the aged Muqaddam, Baravul had formed for a long time the Jāgir or Agrahāra of a Pirzāda family of Srinagar, until it was resumed by Mahārāja Gulāb Singh. [Baravul is not marked on the Survey Maps, unless its name is hidden under that of 'Bāllānkallar,' shown in a corresponding position. The latter name is quite unknown on the spot.]

The special mention of this unpretending Agrahāra by K. may, perhaps, be due to its position on the route to the shrine of Bhūteśvara. We know that Caṇṇaka, Kaṭhapa's father, was a regular visitor of the latter (see vii. 954). It is, therefore, probable that Kaṭhapa himself has passed more than once the site of Baravul.

122. dvārādhipati pradeśesu. It is very probable that K. refers here to one or several of the main passes which give access to the Valley of Kāśmīr. These entrances have always played an important part in Kāśmīr history, and have until quite modern times been specially guarded by watch-stations. The general use of the term dvāra for these localities is proved by the passages quoted below, and by the employment in the Rājat. of the title dvārādhipati, dvāreka, or dvārādhi-kārin. The high officials thus designated were entrusted as 'Lords of the Marches' with the guardianship of these frontier passes (see note v. 214).

The best known and by its position most important of these stations was situated in the narrow gorge of the Vitastā below Vārhamūla. This is mentioned repeatedly in the Chronicle, see e.g. viii. 413, 451, and is referred to also by ALBERŪNĪ, i. p. 207, under the very name of 'Dvāra'; comp. also Life of Hsien-Tsang, p. 68, and Notes on Ou-k'ang, pp. 22 sq.—In i. 302 Dvāra means the Pir Pantāl Pass, in viii. 140 the watch-station at the foot of the Toṣamaidān Pass, marked to this day by the village of Drang. For the terms draṅga, ḡhakkā, synonymous with Dvāra, see note iii. 227. For further information regarding these 'Gates,' comp. my Notes on the Pir Pantāl Route, J.A.S.B., 1895, p. 382.

I am unable to account for the gloss of A, Hastīśālādipu. The only locality known to me under the name of Hastīśālā is the one discussed above, i. 96, the modern Aethel in the Divēsar Pargana. This does not lie on any of the routes over the mountains, and would be a most unlikely place for a frontier-station.

Mātṛcakras are mentioned by K. i. 335, 348; iii. 99; v. 55, in the last two passages in connection with temples. In i. 333 the term devīcakra is used as an equivalent. The mystical diagrams may be supposed to have been carved in stone like the S'ricakras and Rājācakras, which are prepared and worshipped to this day in Kāśmīr according to the rules of the Tantrasāstra, both in private houses and temples. Of supposed natural ('svābhāvika') Cakras of this kind the S'ricakra on the S'rikāpārvata in Srinagar and the Jvālāmukhicakra on the rocky hill above Uyen (Skr. Orana) in the Vihī Pargana receive special reverence.

The worship of the 'Mothers,' which is identical with that of the S'aktis, plays a great part in the Tantra ritual flourishing in Kāśmīr from ancient times.

123. For the identification of the Sodara spring, the miraculous reappearance of which near Srinagari is the subject of the legend

JALAUKA.

Legend of Sodara spring.

124. While engaged in erecting a [shrine of] Jyēṣṭharudra at S'rinagari, he recognized that without the Sodara [spring] it could not rival Nandīśa.

125-126. When once he had forgotten his daily observance in the distraction of business, and [accordingly] felt dismayed at not being able to take his bath in the waters of the far-off Sodara spring, he noticed that from a waterless spot a spring was suddenly breaking forth, which was alike to Sodara in colour, taste, and other respects.

127. Then when he had bathed in that newly appeared Tirtha, that earnest-minded [king] felt satisfied in his desire to equal Nandirudra (Nandīśa).

here related, we have to rely on a few passages of the Nilamata and the Nandikētramāhātmya. In a fragmentary passage, vv. 1137 sq., of the first named text, the Sodaranāga is mentioned in connection with the shrine of Bhūteśvara (Buth'ār) and the Kanakavāhīnī River (see notes i. 107 and i. 150). In śl. 1148 allusions in the Sodara spring are recommended to the pilgrim visiting the Tirthas of Bhūteśvara, Jyēṣṭhoda and Nandin. In śl. 1331 again the pilgrimage to Sodara is prescribed along with that to the Samyama of the Kanakavāhīnī River. Finally, we find in the following verse of the Nandikētramāhātmya Bhūteśvara distinctly placed at Sodara: uttīrya Nandikūṭāl tu svayam mat-Sodara sthitaḥ | Bhūteśvara itī khyātāḥ kṛtanāpāyapranodanāḥ ||

These references make it clear that Sodara is but the ancient name of the sacred spring now called Nārān Nāg, which has been mentioned in note i. 107 as situated in close proximity to the temple ruins of Bhūteśvara. The old name of the spring has been entirely lost in the tradition of the Purohitas. But the late P. Sāhibrām was evidently aware of it, as he says in his notes on the Haramukūṭa-gaṅgā pilgrimage in the Tirthas: tataḥ (the Haramukūṭagaṅgā Lake) pratyāṣṛtya Vāṅga-tākyapradēśe (Vāṅgaṭh) prathamam Bhūteśvarapūjām vidhāya Sodaranāge yastim (viz. the long stick used on the mountain pilgrimage) kṣiptvā vasiṣṭya pratyāyāt.

The conclusion drawn from the above passages is fully confirmed by K.'s reference, ii. 169, to the Sodarāmbutirtham Nandīśā-dhāruṣitam.

Nandīśa is the designation of the S'iva worshipped in the Nund-Kōl Lake. But by a more extended use the term, like that of Nandikētra and Nandīśakētra (see note i. 36), is applied to the whole sacred territory from the lakes on the Haramukūṭa down to Bhūteśvara.

124. Regarding the position of the Jyēṣṭharudra at S'rinagari, see Note C.

125-126. In order to give full sanctity to the new Jyēṣṭharudra which Jalauka had established near S'rinagari, the presence of the Sodara spring was also needed. The Tirth which the legend represents as an Avatāra of the latter, must, after what has been said regarding the position of Jalauka's Jyēṣṭharudra (Note C), be looked for in the vicinity of the present S'rinagar. I have, therefore, no hesitation in connecting the name Sodar, which appears in the designation of a portion of Dal, called Sudar^akhum, and in the name of the neighbouring village Sudar^abal, with this legend. The Sudar^akhum (khum from Skr. kupa) is a narrow inlet on the west side of the Dal, stretching between the suburban villages of Arūmpōr and Sudn^abal. It is apparently the deepest portion of the lake.

On visiting Sudar^abal in June, 1895, I was shown on the very shore of the Sudar^akhum, and close to the village Masjid, two small pools which were then covered by the water of the lake, but according to the uniform statement of the villagers, are fed by two perennial springs. A tradition, which I gathered from the old men of the village, relates that "many hundred years ago" Brahmins were in the habit of making pilgrimages to these springs. The name Buṭṭipōr, which survives to this day as the name of a now deserted part of the village area, was pointed out to me as evidence of the former habitation of Buṭṭas, i.e. Purohitas (Skr. bhṛtta). No ancient remains can now be traced near the springs, but large carved slabs are said to have been carried away from that site to serve as building material for the new temple erected by Mahārāja Ranbir Singh at Rām^apōr in S'rinagar.

I cannot find any reference to the Sodara spring of S'rinagar in the texts accessible to me, nor can I trace any tradition relating to it among the Brahmins of the capital. The marginal gloss of G (Sodarabal Cugaribal), however, indicates that the same identification, as proposed above, has already been made by some modern reader of the Rajāt.

128. Once in order to test [the identity of the two springs], he threw into the Sodara [spring] an empty golden cup closed at its mouth with a lid.

129. When this cup appeared after two and a half days in the spring rising at S'rīnagarī, it removed the doubts of the king.

130. It seems that the king was Nandīśa himself, who had descended in an Avatāra to enjoy the pleasures [of the earth]. Not otherwise could such a miraculous event take place before [men's] very eyes.

131. Once upon a time, when the king was proceeding to Vijayēśvara, a woman [whom he met] midway on the road, begged food from him. Story of the Kṛtyā.

132. When he had promised to give her such food as she should desire, she changed her form and disclosed a desire for human flesh.

133. When he who had renounced the killing of living beings, gave her permission to please herself with flesh from his own body, she thus addressed him :

134. "O king, you must be a Bodhisattva, whose observance of vows is supported by absolute goodness (sattva), since you show, O high-minded one, such deep compassion with living creatures."

135. The king, who being a worshipper of S'iva did not understand the Bauddhas' ways of expression, asked her : "O fair one, who is the Bodhisattva for whom you know me?"

136. Again she spoke to the king : "Listen to my case. I have been sent forth by the Bauddhas whom in your anger you have injured."

137. "We witches (kṛtyakāḥ) living by the side of Mount Lokāloka (which divides light and darkness), belong to the darkness (sin). Putting our whole trust in the Bodhisattvas we long for liberation from the darkness."

138. "Know that Bodhisattvas are certain beings, who since [the coming of] the blessed 'Lord of the Worlds' (Buddha) have freed themselves in this world from the [five] afflictions."

139. "They being bent on supporting all beings, do not feel anger even towards the sinner, but in patience render him kindness and are bound to bring about their own final enlightenment (bodhi)."

129. The distance from Bhūteśvara (Sodara) to S'rīnagar, roughly calculated about thirty-two miles, is put nowadays, too, at two and a half marches of the customary length.

131. The legend contained in vv. 131-147 has been discussed by me in Notes on Oukany, pp. 18-48. It was probably a local legend attaching to the Kṛtyāśrama Vihāra, see note i. 147, and bears an unmistakably Buddhist colouring.

137. Verse 147 shows that kṛttikāḥ of the MSS. is but an old mistake, caused by graphic error or mispronunciation, for kṛtyakāḥ. Retaining the reading kṛttikāḥ, 'the Pleiades,' it cannot be explained why the Bauddhas should send as their avenger one of the stars forming that constellation, and why the latter should be called tāmasyaḥ (i.e. tamo-guṇamayāḥ).

138. The five kleśas meant are aviṛyā, asmitā, rāga, dveṣa, and abhīniveśa.

139. The above translation follows A and L. If the text of A₁ is adopted, the third pāda has to be rendered : "and do not desire their own benefit."

JALALKA.

140-144. "When you had lately been kept from sleep by the noise of the music of a Vihāra, you had at the instigation of wicked persons caused in your anger the destruction of the Vihāra. The excited Bauddhas thought of me and sent me forth to kill you. But then the Bodhisattvas called me and gave me the following directions: 'That king is a great S'ākya (Mahāśākya). You cannot hurt him; but in his presence, O good one, you will obtain liberation from darkness (sin). In our name you shall exhort him who has been led into guilt by wicked people, to give up his hoarded gold and to build a Vihāra. If he does so, no misfortune shall befall him in consequence of the destruction of the Vihāra, and atonement shall thus be made for him and his instigators.'"

145. "Therefore, I have tested in that [former] disguise your abundant goodness. To-day I have been freed from sin. Farewell! I depart."

146. After she had made the king promise to build a Vihāra, the divine sorceress (kṛtyā) disappeared with eyes beaming with joy.

147. Thereupon the king built the Kṛtyāśrama Vihāra, and worshipped there the divine sorceress who had been freed from the darkness.

140-144. These verses form a Kulaka. This form is found in Kāśmīrian MSS. after five or more Ślokaś connected in syntactical construction; comp. Mahākāśa: kulakam ślokaśamcaye.

141. I prefer the reading mahāśākyaś, as corr. from A, śakyaś (also L) by a later hand, to A, mahāsattvaś because of the Yauaka formed with the following śakya. S'ākya stands for S'ākyaṃ, i.e. Buddha; comp. P.W., s.v. mahāśākya.

147. The correct reading vandayāt is supplied by L; A, has śandhayāt, A, bandhayāt. kṛtyāśrame of Ed. is a misprint for kṛtyāśramam.

In my Notes on Ou-k'ong's Account of Kāśmīr I have shown that the Vihāra of Kṛtyāśrama is identical with the 'monastère du mont Ki-tché', which the Chinese pilgrim mentions among the Vihāras he had seen during his visit to Kāśmīr, A.D. 759-763 (see L'Itinéraire d'Ou-k'ong, transl. by Messrs. Lévi and CHAVANNES in the Journal Asiatique, 1895, vol. vi. p. 354).

The name Kṛtyāśrama, lit. meaning 'the abode of the witch (kṛtyā)', survives in that of the present village of Kiś'hōm, situated near the left bank of the Vitastā, about five miles below Varāhamīla (Bāramīla) and circ. 74° 20' 30" long. 84° 10' 40" lat. This identification is proved beyond doubt by a passage of the Fourth Chron. 240, which speaks of Kṛtyāśrama as a village in the vicinity of Varāhamīla, the same locality being referred to under its more recent name as Kiś'hōm in vv. 231, 381. The latter form is a Sanskritized reproduction of the modern Kiś'hōm, which is the direct phonetic derivative of Skr. Kṛtyāśrama (> Pr. Kicāśśama* > Kicāśama* > Kā. Kiś'hōm, in obl. cases Kiś'hām). Kā. -hōm, very frequent at the end of Kāśmīr local names, is the regular representative of Skr. āśrama, as shown loc. cit. Ou-k'ong reproduces the first part of the name which in his time must have already sounded Kicāś* or Kicā, by Ki-tché, and renders the second part by a Chinese word meaning 'hill.'

Ou-k'ong's designation of the Vihāra as the 'monastery of the Ki-tché (or Kṛtyā) hill,' is accounted for by the situation of Kiś'hōm. The village lies on a small plateau between the river and the foot of a high wooded spur. On a short visit I paid to the village in May, 1896, I could trace sculptured remains near the two village Mosques, and a little to the N. of the village what appeared to be the basement of a rough quadrangular enclosure, about 115 yards square. In the centre of this enclosure there is a raised mound known as the gaddi or 'throne,' and outside its S.E. corner a smaller one about fifteen feet high, which might be the remains of a Stūpa. The absence of more conspicuous remains is easily explained. The valley was closed here in Pathān times by a stone wall, which stretched across the level ground about a quarter of a mile to the east of Kiś'hōm. This wall, the ruins of which were considerable enough in 1885 to attract the attention of Baron Hügel, travelling on the other side of the river, was certainly built with stones taken from the Kits'ān plateau. The mounds of the latter have also supplied ample materials for the new carriage road when under construction some ten years ago.

148. This king erected a stone temple at Nandikṣetra for [Ś'iva] Bhūteśa, and offered [to the god] a sacrifice of precious stones together with [other] treasures.

149-150. The pious king passed many a night in ascetic exercises at the Tīrtha of Cīramocanu, taking up the position adapted for meditation, with his body motionless in contemplation, and thus slowly relaxed his desire of touching Nandīśa on account [of the presence] of the Kanakavāhīnī River.

It is very probable that the legend related by K. of Jalauka and the Kṛtyā owed its origin to a popular explanation of the name of the village, Kṛtyāśrama. This locality we must assume on Kalhana's and Ou-k'ong's joint evidence to have been the site of an ancient Vihāra, traditionally attributed to Aśoka's son. And to this Vihāra belong in all probability the scanty remains still extant at Kits'ān.

148. Regarding the employ of the term Nandikṣetra for Bhūteśvara-Buṭh'ār, see note i. 30. It is probable that the temple of Bhūteśa, which the tradition here recorded ascribed to Jalauka, is identical with the principal temple of the eastern group of ruins at Buṭh'ār; see note v. 55-59.

The offering of flowers made of precious metals and stones is mentioned in various Śaiva Paddhatis still in use in Kāśmīr.

149-150. The second line of the couplet is ambiguous, and would permit also of the following rendering: "The pious king [by means of his ascetic practices] . . . made the Kanakavāhīnī River slowly relax its desire of touching Nandīśa."

In both translations I adhere to the reading of A, Kanakavāhīnyā against L avāhīnyā, taking the former in the first case as Abl. s., in the second as Gen. s.

The Kanakavāhīnī can be identified with certainty, on the clear evidence of viii. 3356, with the stream flowing past Bhūteśvara (Buṭh'ār), which at present is called Kānk'-nai (or Kānk'-nāz). It is fed by the waters of the valleys which lie to the E. and S.E. of the Haramukh, and below the watershed towards the Kiṣanguṅgā. The meeting of the Kanakavāhīnī with the Sind River is referred to in the Nilamata, 1334. Another passage mentions the Kanakavāhīnī as flowing to the south of the Sodaratīrtha. The Kanakavāhīnī receives the stream which issues from the sacred Nund-Kōl and Gangā Lakes on the Haramukhā, and is therefore described in the Nandikṣetramāhātmya as bearing first the name of Kālodaka before it is called Kanakavāhīnī.

The only passage of the Nilamata (vv. 1331 eqq.) in which the Tīrtha of Cīramocana is referred to, seems to place it in proximity to the Kanakavāhīnī. Its name is there derived from the bark-clothes (cirāpi) which the Seven Rsis left there when ascending to heaven. The Nandikṣetramāhātmya, vv. 133 sqq., indicates the same legend, and distinctly connects the Kanakavāhīnī with the Tīrtha of Cīramocana. The latter name is no longer known to the Purohitas of the Haramukhā pilgrimage, but the position of the Tīrtha can yet be ascertained with great probability.

The Haramukhāttagangimāhātmya, which is the manual at present in use at this pilgrimage, knows the Kanakavāhīnī by the name of Karāṅkanadi or Karāṅkilā. The place where the Karāṅka stream flows into the Vitastā, is designated by the Mah. as the Karāṅkatīrtha, "near the village of Karāṅka," and the visit to it is prescribed previous to the ascent to the Haramukhā lakes. Inquiries among the local Purohitas have shown me that the Tīrtha meant is below the village of Praug, on the right bank of the Sind River, circ. 74° 55' 30" long. 34° 16' 45" lat. (close to the hamlet marked Larri on map). Just below the few houses of Praug a small stream, which has branched off from the Kanakavāhīnī-Kānk'-nai River near Bāravūl (see note i. 121), falls into the Sind. It is at this 'Sangama' that the ablutions prescribed for the Karāṅkatīrtha are performed, and it is highly probable that we have to place there the Cīramocatīrtha of the older texts.

The comparatively recent date of the extant Haramukhāmāhātmya is amply proved by the modern names it gives to various sites of the pilgrimage (Bhūteśvara for Bhūteśvara, Ambhorukavana for Amareśvara, the present Amburhār, etc.). Just as the Kanakavāhīnī has been turned into Karāṅkanadi (an evident adaptation of Kānk'-nai), so the old name of Cīramocana has been replaced by Karāṅka. It speaks strongly for our identification that the Nilamata, the Nandikṣetramāh., and the

JALAUKA.

151. A hundred among the ladies of his seraglio, who had risen to dance [in honour of the god] at the time fixed for dancing and singing, he gave out of joy to Jyeshtharudra.

152. After enjoying supreme power, the king at the end of his life repaired to Īramocana, and along with his queen obtained communion with the husband of Pārvati.

DĀMODARA II.

153. Then a king named Dāmodara [II.] who was descended from Aśoka's race, or belonged to some other family, ruled the earth.

154. Of the power of this [king], who was the S'iva-worshippers' crest-jewel illuminated by good fortune, one hears [stories] to this day as of a wonder of the world.

155. Vaiśravaṇa (Kubera) himself kept friendship with this fortunate [ruler] who was the recipient of S'iva's favours and wholly given up to a life of virtue.

156. The Guhyakas obeyed this leader of kings, like Kubera himself, and directing them he constructed the long [dam called] Guddasetu.

Rājat. which mention the Īramocanātīrtha in connection with the Kanakavāhini, know nothing of Karañka, whereas the Harṇan-kutaṃśāh, which does not know the name Īramocana, mentions instead the Karañka-tīrtha along with the Kāñkai River.

The position thus ascertained for the Īramocanātīrtha explains the double meaning of verse 150 as above indicated. K. either wishes to say that the opportunity of bathing in the Kanakavāhini, which receives the water of the Nund-Kōl Lake or Nandīśa, made the king abandon his desire of worshipping at that more distant Tīrtha. Or the meaning intended may be that owing to the great spiritual merits of the king's austerities at Īramocana, the Kanakavāhini became even more anxious to bathe him than to flow past Nandīśa. With reference to this second interpretation, it should be noted that K. has already above, i. 130, alluded to the king as an Avatāra of S'iva Nandīśa.

151. hlāḍodayit can be taken either as referring to the king or the dancers. Regarding Jyeshtharudra, see note i. 113.

156. Guddasetu; Sūda Dāmodariya. The legends related here of King Dāmodara cluster to this day, as in K.'s times, round an arid alluvial plateau to the south of S'rīnagar, which has preserved the name of the king—or, perhaps, furnished the starting point for the stories concerning him.

This plateau, called 'Dāmodara's Sūda' by K., and now known as Dām'dar Uḍar, resembles in its natural features the other numerous alluvial plateaus of the Valley designated by the Kā. term Uḍar, or the Persian Karvāna (see Vīṇa, ii. p. 39; Darw. Simmoo, pp. 187 seq.). It lies in the Yech Paragan, and stretches from the large village of Yak'tōr (about seven miles due S. of S'rīnagar) in a north-westerly direction. Its length is about six miles, with a breadth varying between two and three miles. Being entirely devoid of water this plateau is cultivated only in patches with meagre crops of Indian corn. Otherwise it is a dry and barren waste, a haunt of jackals, as in the days when King Kṣemagupta hunted over the 'Dāmodarāranya,' vi. 183. [In viii. 1519, K. refers to it simply as Dāmodara.]

The small village of Gup'santh, 74° 50' long. 33° 58' lat., K.'s Guddasetu and the Gudasetu of the glossator, is situated at the south foot of the plateau. Just there the latter shows its greatest relative elevation, and rises in a precipitous bank to a height of over one hundred feet above the fertile valley irrigated by the Yechāra River.

It was possibly this wall-like appearance of the cliff which gave rise to the story regarding an attempt of King Dāmodara to bring water to the plateau from the rising ground to the south by means of a setu or embankment. No trace of an artificial dam which could serve such a purpose, could be found by me when visiting the site in October, 1891. It must also be borne in mind that the name Gup'santh which K. Sanskritizes by Guddasetu, signifies in Kā. 'the first (yud) dam,' and might have eventually formed itself, through popular etymology, the basis of the above story.

157. By means of this dam (setu) he wished to bring water into the town which he had himself built on the Dāmodara-Sūda.

158. When a high-minded man wishes to execute some beneficial work of an extraordinary character, there arise, alas! obstacles, owing to the deficiency of men's spiritual merits [from former births].

159. He, indeed, endeavoured to get long stone-lined dykes built in his country by the Yakṣas, in order to guard against inundations.

160. Beyond conception is the power which austerities gain for those mighty Brahmins, who are capable of reversing the fortune of even such great [rulers].

161. One has seen the royal fortune when it had been lost through the power of [rival] heirs and others, restored again; but [when once lost] in consequence of disrespect shown to Brahmins, it never returns.

162. Once hungry Brahmins asked the king, when he had risen to bathe on account of a S'raddha, to give them food before taking his bath.

163. When he refused this in his eagerness to enter [the waters of] the Vitastā, they brought by their spiritual power the river before him.

164. They said to him: "Here is the Vitastā. Having it before your eyes give us [now] food." Yet even then he thought that the river brought [before him] was [mere] jugglery.

165. "I do not give food till I have bathed. Brahmins, take yourselves off (sarpata) at once." When he thus spoke to them, they cursed him: "Be you a snake (sarpa)."

166. When implored for mercy, they spoke: "When you will hear the whole Rāmāyaṇa [recited] in a single day, thon our curse will cease."

The legend of King Dāmodara's transformation into a snake haunting the Dāmḍar Uḍar still lives all through Kāśmīr in popular tradition, and had been already recorded from the latter by VIGNÉ, i. p. 41. The story of the setu commenced by the king is, on the other hand, known only to those who are acquainted with the Rājast. or its abstracts. The illiterate villagers, both Brahmin and Muhammadan, examined by me at Guḍ'suth and the neighbouring hamlets, knew it not. Sat'rās Teng, a waste spot high up on the Uḍar, about a mile to the N. of Guḍ'suth, was named by them as the site of Dāmodara's palace. A Dāmodar Nāg in the adjoining hamlet of Lālgām is pointed out as the place where the king performed his ablutions.

The Guhyakas are a class of demigods who are in attendance on Kubera like the Yakṣas.

157. The gloss of A, (Dāndur oḍar) rightly takes sūda as the equivalent of Kā. uḍar. Maikhā's Kōśa distinctly gives to the word sūda the meaning 'place where the soil is barren.' The commentator illustrates this meaning by quoting the fragment of a verse which contains the name of the Dāmodariga Sūda, and evidently relates to the same legend as recorded in the Rājast. (Sūda Dāmodarige hi vipraśīpād ulan-yayā).

Artificial irrigation channels of ancient date are found on other 'alluvial plateaus,' thus on the Uḍars of Martand and Zainpūr (see note i. 97). For another method used by Lalitāditya for raising water to the Uḍar of Tsakḍar (Cakradhara), see iv. 191, where the same expression 'ambhaḥpratāraṇa' is employed as in our passage.

166. The popular legend, as at present current in Kāśmīr, has rendered the unfortunate king's deliverance even more difficult.

DĀMODARA II.

Legend of Dāmodara-Sūda.

DĀMODARA II.

167. Even to this day people recognize him by the steam of his breath, which the curse has made hot, as he rushes about in search of water far and wide on the Dāmodara-Sūda.

HUṢKA, JUṢKA, KANĪṢKA.

168. Then there were in this land three kings called Huṣka, Juṣka and Kanīṣka, who built three towns named after them [Huṣkapura, Juṣkapura, Kanīṣkapura].

169. That wise king Juṣka, who built Juṣkapura with its Vihāra, was also the founder of Jayasvāmīpura.

He is not to leave his snake-form until some charitable Brahman recites to him the whole Rāmāyaṇa during the single night of the Sīkharātri festival (Phālguna vadi 13) on the snow-covered plain of the Dāmodar Uḍar.

167. Misfortune makes the breath hot, luck makes it cold; comp. e.g. iv. 316, 361; v. 14, etc.

168. From Chavillākara's verse, quoted i. 20, and from K.'s own expression, viii. 3112, it follows that the three Turuṣka kings are supposed to have ruled simultaneously. The order in which their names are given can, therefore, not be intended to indicate an order of succession. The Kanīṣka of the Rājat. was recognized already in 1883 by Prinsep as the KANĪṢKI of the coins, and identified with Kanīṣka, famous in Buddhist tradition. The Huṣka of the Rājat., too, has long ago been identified with Kanīṣka's successor, the Huṣka of the inscriptions, and the OOṢKI of the coins, but it is only recently that Prof. Bühler has actually discovered Huṣka as the equivalent of Huṣka in an inscription from Mathurā; comp. Epigr. Ind., ii. p. 206.

The second name Juṣka has not yet found any confirmation from other sources. For recent notices of the historical data relating to these earliest Indo-Scythian rulers, comp. Von Gutschmid, in Encycl. Brit., xviii. p. 606; Drouin, Les Rois Indo-Scythes, pp. 46 sqq. Buddhist tradition connects Kāśmīr specially with the rule of Kanīṣka, by placing there the third great Council held by that king; comp. e.g. Sī-yu-ki, i. pp. 151 sqq. It may be noted that the copper coinage of Kanīṣka and his immediate successor is found to this day in abundance in Kāśmīr.

Huṣkapura, Juṣkapura, Kanīṣkapura. The town called after Huṣka has been rightly located by Gen. CUNNINGHAM, Anc. Geogr., pp. 99 sq., at the modern Uṣkār, a small village about two miles to the S.E. of Varāhamūla, on the left bank of the Vitastā, 74° 26' long. 34° 12' lat. This identification, which is already indicated by the glosses of A₂, Uṣkaro in our passage, and Varāhamūla, v.

259, is put beyond doubt by K.'s own words, vi. 186, which place Huṣkapura clearly in Varāhakeṭṭra. For other passages fully supporting this location, see vii. 1311; viii. 300, 718, 822, 911. For the Vihāra and Stūpa built there by Laṭitāditya, and their remains, comp. note iv. 188. Minen-tsiang stopped at Uu-se-kia-to (round Huṣkara by Julien) after passing "the stone gates, the western entrance of the kingdom," i.e. the ancient dwāra of Varāhamūla; see Life of Minen-tsiang, p. 68, and above note i. 122. Al-Bīrūnī also notices Uṣkkārā as lying opposite 'Baramūla,' India, i. p. 207.

For Juṣkapura Gen. CUNNINGHAM was referred by his Brahman informants to the modern Zukur, a large village to the N. of Srinagar, about four miles from the Hār-purvat. This identification is intended, too, by the gloss of A₂, Jukoro. Gen. CUNNINGHAM in 1847 traced the remains of ancient buildings in the materials used for Muhammadan tombs and mosques. These remains were seen also by me in considerable number.

Finally, Kanīṣkapura I prefer to identify on the basis of the gloss of A₂, Kānespur, and of the forms by which the name is rendered in the Persian Chronicles, with the village of Kānispūr, 74° 28' long. 34° 14' lat., situated between the Vitastā and the high road leading from Varāhamūla to Srinagar. Under the name of Kanīṣkapura the village is mentioned by P. Śahibram in his Tirthas. According to the information collected for me by P. Kāśīrām in 1891, the tradition of the local Brahmins ascribes the foundation of the place to a king called 'Kanīṣṭharāja.' An old mound near the village from which carved stones and ancient coins are occasionally extracted, is believed to mark the site of his residence. Gen. CUNNINGHAM's proposed identification of Kanīṣkapura with 'Kānpur,' on the road from Srinagar to S'upriyan, must be abandoned. The name of that place is in reality Khāmpūr.

169. Read svihārasya in Ed. for sa vī. The position of Jayasvāmīpura, which the 170. These kings who were given to acts of piety, though descended from the Turnṣku race, built at Suṣkaletra and other places Maṭhas, Cuṭtyas and similar [structures].

171. During the powerful reign of these [kings] the land of Kaśmīr was, to a great extent, in the possession of the Baṇḍihas, who by [practising] the law of religious mendicancy (pravrajyā) had acquired great renown.

172. At that time one hundred and fifty years had passed in this terrestrial world since the blessed S'ākyasiṃha (Buddha) had obtained complete beatitude (Nirvāṇa).

173. And a Bodhisattva lived [then] in this country as the sole lord of the land, namely the glorious Nāgārjuna, who resided at Śaḍarhadraṇa.

174. Then the fearless Abhimanyu, who knew no foes (kaṇṭaku), and was like a second Indra (S'atumanju), became king. He was the donor of the Agrahāra of Kaṇṭakotsa.

175. That illustrious king founded [the town of] Abhimanyupura, which abounded in wealth, calling it after his own name and giving it a [temple of] S'iva as its crest-ornament.

176. Under his instructions Candrācārya and others brought the Mahābhāṣya,

HUṢKA, JUṢKA,
KANISKA.

ABHIMANYU I.

gloss of A. renders by Jihāsapura, I am unable to trace.

170. The recollection of the Turkish descent of Kaniṣka and his Hinduized successors has long survived in popular tradition; comp. Albertini's India, ii. p. 10 sq., and my paper Zur Geschichte der Čāhīs von Kābul, passim.

Regarding Suṣkaletra, see note i. 102.

171. The tradition of the patronage bestowed by Kaniṣka on the Buddhist church, still lived in Gandhāra at the time of the Chinese pilgrims Fahian, Sung-yun and Hinon-tsiang; see Si-yu-t'i, i. pp. xxxii, ciii, 117, 151, etc. There are coins of ΚΑΝΗΣΚΙΕ exhibiting the figure of ΒΟΥΔΔΟ, but far more frequent are representations of divinities from the Zoroastrian and Hindu Pantheon; see GARDNER, Catalogue of Greek and Scythic Kings in India, pp. 180 sqq., and my notes, Ind. Ant., xvii. pp. 89 sqq.

172. mahilokadhātav. K. seems to avail himself here of an expression proper to Buddhist literature; comp. P.W., s.v. loka-dhātu.

173. According to a passage quoted by Dr. Hultzsch from Schiefner's Tibetische Lebensbeschreibung Sākyamuni's, p. 310. Nāgārjuna, who figures in Buddhist tradition as the thirtieth patriarch, was born in the time of Kaniṣka. This agrees with K.'s mention of Nāgārjuna in connection with the Tuṣka kings.

As the tradition of the northern Buddhists, as recorded by Hsuen-tsiang (Si-yu-t'i, i. pp. 99, 151), places the commencement of Kaniṣka's rule four hundred years after Buddha's Nirvāṇa, the date assigned here to Nāgārjuna is rather curious.

Śaḍarhadraṇa, 'the wood of the six Saints,' if rightly identified by the glossator A. (Ilaran grāme), is the modern village Ilārran, situated about one and a half miles to the N.W. of the gardens of Shālimār near Srinagar. On the hill-side to the south of Ilārran ancient remains have come to light in the shape of highly ornamented brick pavements, which were dug up in the course of excavations conducted at the site in connection with the new Srinagar waterworks. (See Proc. A.S.B., 1885, p. 2.)

174. Kaṇṭakotsa is identified by the glossator A. with Kaṇḍor, i.e. the village now called Kaṇḍor, situated in the Biru Pargana, 71° 34' long. 33° 59' lat., not far from Hukhrūt.

175. Abhimanyupura is, perhaps, to be located at the present village of Binyun, situated in marshy ground about four miles to the S.W. of Srinagar. 31° 4' lat. 74° 40' long. For another Abhimanyupura founded by Queen Didda, see vi. 260.

176. This verse has been much discussed which was at that time difficult of access [for study], into general use, and [also] composed their own grammar.

ABHIMANYU I.

177. At that period the Baudddhas, whom the wise Bodhisattva Nāgārjuna protected, obtained preponderance in the land.

178. After defeating in disputation all learned opponents, these enemies of tradition brought to an end the [observance of the] rites prescribed in the Nīla[mata]pūraṇa.

179. When the traditional customs were broken in the land, the Nāgas, who had lost their [accustomed] oblations, sent down excessive snow, and thus destroyed the people.

180. As deep snow was falling every year to cause distress to the Baudddhas, the king resided for six months in the cold season in Dārvābhisāra and in other [neighbouring regions].

on account of its supposed bearing on the history of the Mahābhāṣya, but its interpretation is not certain. In the above translation I have followed the reading labdhvādeśam tasmāt, as corrected in A by A₁ or A₂, and evidently found in the original of that codex. It is also given by L. taddāgamam must be resolved into tadd āgamam, the latter word being used in the sense of āgama, see P. W., s.v. gama, and N. P. W., s.v. agama. The reading labdhvā deśāt tasmāt, which is found as a correction of A₂, is in all probability, as suggested by Prof. BÜHLER, Report, p. 70, a conjectural emendation. It may have been made by some reader who took tad āgamam as the object of labdhvā, and hence found it difficult to account for the accusative ādeśam. The passage, as I understand it, is intended to say that Candra and other grammarians under Abhimanyu's instructions set again on foot the study of the Mahābhāṣya, which, owing to the absence of competent teachers or a correct text, had become difficult and disused. K. refers to a similar restoration of the study of Patañjali's great grammatical work under Jayapīḍa in iv. 488, where the expression vicchinnam corresponds to the āgamam of our passage. There the means adopted for that purpose, the calling-in of competent expositors from abroad, is also clearly indicated.

Prof. KIELHORN, who has analyzed the passage in Ind. Ant., iv. p. 107, proposed to emend labdhvā deśantarāt and to translate "Candrabhāṣya and others brought into use the Mahābhāṣya, having obtained its traditional interpretation (āgama) from another country, and composed their own grammar." This emendation, in support of which K.'s similar expression, iv. 488, was adduced, has been accepted also by Prof. BERNER, loc. cit. I miss in the text thus corrected an indication of the connection between the labours of Candrabhāṣya and the rule of King Abhimanyu.

Prof. Korn has proposed to read labdhvādeśam tridhūme; see Mélanges Asiatiques de l'Académie de St. Pétersbourg, vii. p. 472.

Regarding the grammarian Candra, whose full name is Candragomin, see AURENOUR, Cat. Catalog., p. 180; for the Candrayāṅkūṛa, which has survived, comp. ib. p. 181, and EGGLING's Catalogue of Sanskrit MSS. in the India Office Library, p. 193.

179. Oblations (balli) to the Nāgas generally, and to particular Nāgas on specific festivals, are frequently described in the Nilamata; comp. e.g. vv. 214 sq.; 405 sqq.

Regarding Nāgas taking the form of clouds, comp. i. 289; iii. 21; Si-yu-ki, i. p. 122, etc.

180. The combined names of the Dāruva and Abhisāras are mentioned in various ethnographical lists, furnished by the Mahābhārata, the Purāṇas and Bṛhatsaṃhitā, along with those of tribes belonging to the Panjab. The position of their country was first correctly ascertained by WILSON, Essay, pp. 118 sq. Comp. also LASSEN, Ind. Ant., ii. p. 147; P. W. s.v.; LASSEN, Pentapet. Ind. p. 18; V. DU SAINT-MARTIN, Mém. de l'Académie des Inscri., Sav. Étrang. I. série, v. pp. 299 sq.; Ind. Ant., xiv. pp. 321 sqq.

From the evidence available it appears that Dārvābhisāra as a geographical term comprised the whole tract of the lower and middle hills lying between the Vitastā and Candrabhāga. [The Candrabhāga seems to mark the eastern limit of the territory in the 181. At that time there manifested itself some miraculous power through which the Brahmans, who offered oblations and sacrifices, escaped destruction, while the Bauddhas perished.

ABHIMANYU I.

182. Then a Brahman named Candradeva, who was descended from Kaśyapa, practised austerities to please Nīla, the lord of the [Kāśmīr] Nāgas, and protector of the land.

183. Nīla having manifested himself to him, removed the affliction of excessive snowfall, and revealed anew the rites proscribed in his own Purāṇa.

184. As the first Candradeva had stopped the plague of the Yakṣas, thus the second brought to an end in this land the intolerable plague of the Bhikṣus.

185. King Gonanda the Third, who ascended the throne at that time, reintroduced the pilgrimages, sacrifices, and other [worship] in honour of the Nāgas, as they had been before.

GONANDA III.

186. When the rites originating from Nīla had been re-established by this king, the Bhikṣus and snow calamities ceased altogether [to give trouble].

187. From time to time there arise on account of the merits of the subjects kings who reconstruct the kingdom when it has gone far [on the road] to ruin.

188. Those kings whose only object is to oppress their subjects, perish together with their descendants, whereas royal fortune attends the race of those who will repair what has been destroyed.

passage of the Viṣṇupur., iv. p. 223.] From Rajāt. viii. 1631 and the topographical point discussed in note viii. 1861, it is clear that the hill-state of Rājapuri (Rajauri) was included in Dāvābhisāra.

It must, however, be noted that the gloss of A, on our passage, Bhimbhar Dānagale deśe, would restrict the application of the term to the lower hills between the limits above indicated. Bhimbhar, the first locality named by the glossator, lies at the foot of the outer hills, in the centre of the tract between the Vitastā and the Cināb, and was the centre of a little hill-state; see CUNNINGHAM, Anc. Geogr., p. 134. The name Dānagal appears to survive in that of an old Ghakkar fort in the lower hills near the Vitastā. I have, however, been able to obtain only oral information regarding this place.

The passage iv. 712 seems to show Dāvābhisāra as subject to Kāśmīr in the time of Utpalapiṇḍa. But S'ankaravarman has again to conquer this territory before he proceeds against Gūjara, the modern Gujrāt, to the south of Bhimbhar; comp. v. 141 eqq., also v. 208. During the weak reigns which followed, this acquisition was certainly soon lost again.

For a curious passage throwing light on the character of the inhabitants, see viii. 1531.

✓184. K. refers here to the legend told in the Nilamata (vv. 325 eqq.) regarding the liberation of the land from the Pisācas. The latter, for whom K. curiously enough substitutes the Yakṣas, occupied Kāśmīr under a sentence of Kaśyapa during the six months of winter, while men lived there for the remaining six months only, and emigrated each year before the month of Āśvayuja. The deliverance of the country from the Pisācas and excessive cold was effected after four Yugas through the observance of the rites which Candradeva, an old Brahman, descended from Kaśyapa, had learned from the Nīla Nāga. For an account of this legend see Report, p. 40.

The story told by K. in i. 178-184 is obviously in all particulars a mere rechauffé of the ancient legend. The charitable comparison between Pisācas and Bauddhas leaves no doubt as to the source from which K. borrowed it.

185. L. trīyagonandak prāpturāṇas°, as corrected in A.

GONANDA III.

189. Wise men who have observed this distinctive feature of every [king's] story in this land, will foresee the fortune or misfortune of future kings.

190. Thus after this [king] had reconstructed the kingdom, the land remained long in the possession of his descendants, Pravarasena [I.] and the rest, who possessed supernatural powers, and did pious works.

191. This king, who was the first of the Gonanda race, just as Raghu was of the race of the Raghus, ruled the land for thirty-five years.

VIBHĪṢAṆA I.

192. Gonanda's son Vibhīṣaṇa [I.] protected the earth during sixty years diminished by six years and six months.

INDRAJIT.
RĀVAṆA.

193. Then ruled in succession Indrajit and Rāvāṇa, father and son, for thirty-five years and for thirty years and a half.

194. The Liṅga called Vateśvara, which served for Rāvāṇa's worship, is [still] shining brightly, and the light [to be observed] in its dots and lines foretells future events.

195. To the Vateśvara [Liṅga] which he had placed within a Maṭha forming a quadrangle, the king vowed the whole land of Kuśmīr.

VIBHĪṢAṆA II.

196. Vibhīṣaṇa the Second, the strong-armed son of King Rāvāṇa, ruled then the earth for thirty-five and a half years.

NARA.

197. Then Vibhīṣaṇa's son Nara, who also bore the name of Kinnara, and whose prowess was sung by the Kinnaras, became king.

198. Though this king followed the right customs, still when the fortune of his subjects turned, he brought about a series of great calamities under the baneful influence of sensuality.

199. A Buddhist ascetic (śramaṇa) who was living alone in a Vihāra, situated at Kinnaragrāma, seduced the [king's] wife through magic power.

200. In his wrath over this the king burned thousands of Vihāras, and granted the villages which had belonged to them, to Brahmins residing in Mudhyamaṭha.

201-202. On the sandy bank of the Vitastā he built a town where the markets were kept full of supplies by the highroads [leading to it], and where the coming and going of ships gave splendour to the river. With its gardens

194. I am unable to trace any other reference to this miraculous Liṅga or the Maṭha built around it. Figures formed by the natural veins of the marble are to this day considered as features of beauty in Liṅgas.

199. The position of Kinnaragrāma is doubtful. The gloss of A₁ identifies it with the modern village of Kāmīr, in the Nāgām Pargana, circ. 74° 48' long. 33° 53' lat. (shown on map as Kāmīl).

200. Madhyamaṭha is clearly the name of a locality, but no certain identification can be proposed for it. Skr. maṭha > Kā. mar is frequently found at the end of Kāśmīr local names, particularly in designations of city quarters; comp. e.g. Diddāmaṭha, the present Dīdmar, vi. 300; Bhātārakamaṭha, Braṭmar, vi. 240; Ahlādamaṭha, the present Ahalmar.

201-202. The position of the town founded by Nara, which is called Kinnara- full of swelling flowers and fruits it was, as it were, a synonym for 'heaven,' and it surpassed even Kubera's town by the riches amassed [there] through the conquest of the world.

NARA.

203. There in a grove was a pond of limpid and sweet water, the habitation of a Nāga called Suśravas. Legend of the Nāga Suśravas.

204. Once upon a time a young Brahman, Viśākha by name, who was fatigued by a long march, went at midday to the bank of that pond to seek the shade.

205. When he had been refreshed by the breezes at the foot of a shady tree, and had bathed his limbs, he slowly proceeded to eat his porridge.

206. Just when he was taking it in his hand he heard the sound of foot-rings, which had already before been noticed by the swans disporting themselves on the banks.

207-209. Then he saw before him two sweet-eyed maids wearing blue cloaks, who had stepped forth from a grove of creepers. The corners of their eyes were captivating, and illuminated by a very thin line of antimony, which appeared to play the part of the stem to the ruby-lotuses of their ear-ornaments; to their shoulder-pairs were attached their faces, as it were, like flags, of which their fascinating eyes appeared to be the ends floating in the light swing of the breeze.

210. When he saw the two moon-faced maidens slowly approaching him, he stopped commencing his dinner, and became again and again benumbed with confusion.

pura, i. 274, and Narapura, i. 244, is fixed in the immediate vicinity of Vijayēśvara or Vij'brōr by K.'s references to the neighbouring shrine of Cakradhara, i. 261, 270 (see also viii. 991), as well as by the actually surviving popular legend. The small alluvial plateau or Uḍar, one mile below Vij'brōr, which bears to this day the name of Tsak'ḍar, has already been indicated in note i. 38 as the site of the Cakradhara temple. It is correctly marked in the larger Survey map as occupying the base of the small peninsula formed here by the Vitastā. Close below the S.E. corner of this plateau a dry depression in the ground was pointed out to me, on the occasion of my visits in 1889 and 1895, as the original habitation of the 'Suśram Nāg,' the Suśravas Nāga of our narrative.

The main features of the legend, as told by K., still live in the tradition of the inhabitants of the neighbourhood. All look upon the barren plain between the mound of Tsak'ḍar and Vij'brōr as the site of the old town burned by the Nāga. Ancient coins reaching back to Greek and Indo-Scythian rule are found in considerable quantities on this ground, and particularly near the river. These finds leave no doubt as to the antiquity of the site. The latter is liable to annual inundation from the river. It is, therefore, possible that excavations below the alluvial surface might yet bring to light some of the ruins which, judging from i. 270, appear to have been still visible in K.'s times, and which, perhaps, formed the starting point of the legend related here.

✓203. The 'Suśrava Nāga' is mentioned in the vicinity of the Vijayēśvara Tirtha in Haracar. x. 248, and in Nilanata, 912. No reference is made to our legend in either place.

207-209. These three verses form a Tilaka, being connected in syntactical construction (comp. Mañbhakāśa: triślokyām . . . tilakam). The shoulders are compared to the flagstaff; the face is the flag, and the eyes the ends of the flag.

NARA.

211. Then again taking a furtive glance he saw in front the lotus-eyed ones eating the pods of the kacchaguccha [grass].

212. "O shame, such food for such beauty." Thus he thought, and moved by pity he invited them and made them partake of his porridge.

213. And fetching the pure and cold water of the fountain in leaves which made to form a cornet, he brought it for them to drink.

214. When they had sipped in water after the [meal], and thus cleansed had ken their seats, he fanned them with fans made of leaves, and thus spoke to them :

215. "Your humble servant who had obtained the sight [of you] through some good works done in a previous [birth], wishes with the indiscretion not unusual in Brahman to question you."

216. "Which happy family is adorned by you lovely ones, and where did you, ll into such misfortune that you eat this tasteless [grass]?"

217. One of them answered him: "Know that we are the daughters of the Nāga] Susravas. Not having got anything pleasant to eat, why should we ot take to such food?"

218. "I am Irāvati, who am promised by my father to the lord of the idyādhara, and this is Oandralekhā, his younger daughter."

219. Again spoke the Brahman: "Whence then your wretched poverty?" They answered: "Our father knows here the reason. Him you should ask."

220. "When he comes to visit the Takṣaka [Nāga] on the twelfth day of the dark half of Jyaiṣṭha, you will recognize him straight by his hair-tuft dripping with water."

211. According to the gloss of A₂ (kachya-kānye hima iti dhārayā) kacchaguccha is the name of a grass called in Kā. kach'dūn. It grows plentifully on the meadows of the valley. Kā. him (plur. hima) < Skr. śimbi pod.

213. The rare word caṭasa, which is not found in the dictionaries accessible to me, is well explained in a note of A₂ as kumbhā-lyabhāve kṛtrimam udakotkṣepanabhāṇḍam. I am unable to identify the passage quoted in evidence of this interpretation from some Kāvya or Drama.

220. The Takṣaka Nāga is worshipped on this day in the large pool of limpid water situated close to the village of Zavan (or Jayavana, see vii. 607) in the Vihā Pargana, 74° 58' long. 84° 3' lat.; comp. Report, p. 5. It is happily described by the poet Bilhana, who was born in the neighbouring village of Khonamuṣa (Khun'moh), in his Vikramānka-devacarita, xviii. 70 (as translated by Prof.

BÜHLER): "At a distance of a gavyūti and a half from Pravarapura (Srinagar) lies a place with high-rising monuments called Jayavana (Zavan), where a pool filled with pure water, and sacred to Takṣaka, lord of snakes, cuts like a war-disk the head of Kali bent on the destruction of Dharma."

From the Takṣaka Nāga the cultivation of the saffron flowers which flourishes in this neighbourhood, is supposed to have originated; comp. Fourth Chron. vv. 981 sqq.; Tirtha. The Āin-i Akh, ii. p. 358, mentions a pilgrimage to the spring at the commencement of the saffron cultivation, i.e. in Jyaiṣṭha. The Mahātmya of the neighbouring Harṣeśvara Tirtha, sl. 80, mentions the Takṣaka Nāga and indicates Jyaiṣṭha Pūrṇimā as the day on which he is to be visited in connection with the Harṣeśvara pilgrimage. The references to the Takṣaka Nāga, below iv. 218 and Nilamata, 904, supply no particulars.

221. "At that time you will also see us two standing near him." After these words the Nāga-maids suddenly disappeared.

222. Then in due time came on the great festival of the [Takṣaka] pilgrimage, frequented by dancers and strolling players, and thronged by crowds of spectators.

223. The Brahman too was attracted there by curiosity, and was hastily moving about among the crowd of onlookers, when he came face to face with the Nāga, whom he recognized by the sign which the maids had indicated.

224. The prince of Nāgas then offered greeting to the Brahman whom his daughters standing by his side had previously announced [to him].

225. Then in the middle of their discourse, when the Brahman had asked him somehow about the cause of his misfortunes, the Nāga related to him in confidence [the following]:

226. "For people who have self-respect and know how to distinguish between proper and improper, it does not seem right to expose misfortunes which must needs be borne."

227. "A truly noble-minded man when he hears of the misery of another person without being able to alleviate it, feels pained in his heart."

228. "A common person [again] when he hears of misfortune, makes much of his own sustenance; puts pain into the heart by his words of consolation; openly questions the [other's] fitness while praising himself, though of weak intellect; advises recourse to improper expedients; represents the calamity to be permanent, and [thus only] aggravates the heartrending pain."

229. "Hence wise men let their fortune and misfortune be consumed in the end by their funeral pyre, after digesting it in their own mind while life lasts."

230. "Who would notice outside the misfortune of naturally discreet persons if children and servants would not expose it?"

231. "Since then this matter has come to light through the childish ways of these two [girls], it would not be proper for me either to make a secret of it before you, O worthy one."

232. "So may you too, O noble one, who are honest by nature, make some small effort to help us if you can."

233. "That ascetic there whom you see seated at the foot of the tree, with his head shaved and carrying only one tuft of hair, that is the field-guard who drives us to despair."

234. "As long as the fresh crop is not touched by those [who watch the fields] with their spells (māntrika), the Nāgas too may not touch it. That one there does not eat it, and under that rule we are ruined."

NARA.

235. "As long as he guards the fields, we cannot eat the rich produce though it is before our eyes, as the ghosts [cannot drink] the water from the river."

236. "Now you bring it about that this [ascetic] who has vowed abstinence for ever [from fresh produce], should break his observance. We, too, know how to reward fitly our benefactors."

237. The Brahman promised this to the Nāga, and full of eager zeal thought day and night of how he might outwit the field-guard.

238. Then while the latter was keeping inside his hut out on the fields, he secretly dropped fresh corn into his food-dish which was cooking outside.

239. As soon as the field-guard took the food, the Nāga lord at once carried off the abundant rich harvest by sending down hail and heavy rain.

240. Freed from misery, he took on the next day the Brahman who had helped him, and who had come [again] to the pond, into his own place.

241. Honoured there by the two maids at their father's bidding, he enjoyed day for day the pleasures which are easily obtained [only] by the immortals.

242. Then after some time when he had taken leave from all, and was ready to return to his own land, he asked Candralekha from the Nāga who had promised him a boon.

243. The Nāga obeying the commands of gratitude, bestowed his daughter and wealth on the Brahman, though he was not entitled to this [matrimonial] alliance.

Destruction of Narapura.

244. The Brahman who had thus obtained fortune through the boon [granted to him] by the Nāga, passed a long time at Narapura in manifold never-ceasing festivities.

245. The Nāga daughter, too, possessed of infinite beauty, made as a devoted wife her husband happy by her noble character, exemplary conduct and other virtues.

246. Once, at a time while she was standing on the top of her mansion, a loose horse was eating the rice which had been left outside the courtyard to dry in the sun.

247. As the servants whom she called to keep the horse off, were not in the house, she came down herself, jingling with her graceful anklets.

235. The souls of the wicked are driven about by eternal thirst, which they cannot quench with water; comp. e.g. Padmapur., v. xxvii. 18.

239. That the Nāgas were supposed to take the form of hailstorms, and to obtain food by destroying the crops, is seen from the story told iii. 18 sqq. For the storm-producing powers of Nāgas, see also the end of the tale, i. 259; Si-yu-ki, i. pp. 64, 122 sq.

240. According to Nilamata, 222, the permanent residence of all Nāgas is the town of Bhogavati, conceived as a part of the underworld; comp. P.W., s.v.

246. Dhānya means in the Chronicle everywhere 'rice,' the staple produce of the Valley, Kā. dānyā.

248. Holding with one hand the end of her head-dress, which in the hurry had slipped off, she ran up and slapped the horse with her lotus-hand.

249. When the horse, after being touched by the Nāga lady, left the food and moved away, there appeared on its body the golden imprint of her hand.

250. At that time there arose love [in the heart] of the king who had heard already before through his spies of the Brahman's beautiful-eyed wife.

251. When his passion broke away like an elephant in rut, no fear of reproach could hook-like hold it back by force.

252. Upon the rising flames of the king's love the story of the horse acted again like a furious storm.

253. The golden mark of her hand showing the beauty of her straight fingers, made him overstep the moral limits, just as the moon makes the sea [overstep its limits].

254. Throwing off the fetters of shame he then alarmed the fair lady by trying to seduce her through messengers who intimated his wishes.

255. As she was not to be gained by all artifices, he in his covetous passion asked her even from her husband, the Brahman. Whence should shame [come] to those who are blinded by love?

256. When the king had more than once been repulsed also by the Brahman, he sent soldiers to carry her off by force.

257. While those attacked the house in front, the Brahman left it with his wife by another way, and fled for protection to the Nāga's habitation.

258. The lord of the Nāgas thereupon, when those two had approached him and had told their story, rose blind with fury from his pool.

259. Casting about dense darkness by thundering clouds of sinister look, he burned the king with his town in a rain of fearful thunderbolts.

260. The Vitastā which carried the marrow, blood and fat flowing from the bodies of the burned men, looked as if adorned with the eyes of peacocks' tails.

261. Thousands of terrified people who had fled for protection before [the image of Viṣṇu] Oakradhara, were burned in a moment.

262. Just as of yore the fat of the [demons] Madhu and Kaitabha had covered the 'Bearer of the Disc' (Oakrin) on his thighs, so then his whole body was covered by the fat of the burned human beings.

261. Regarding the temple of Viṣṇu Cakra-dhara, see notes i. 38, 201; comp. also viii. 990 sqq.

262. Retaining A, tattattadā, one tat must be referred to medas, the other to sarvāṅgam.

The v.l. of A, tam tu tadā, would also permit of a satisfactory explanation.

According to a well-known tale of the Purāṇas, Viṣṇu (Oaka-in-Cakra-dhara) smashed the two demons named in the text on his

NARA.
Story of Ramanyā.

263. Then the sister of Suśranas, the Nāgi Ramanyā, came forth to assist him from the depth of the mountains carrying along masses of stones.

264. When she learned from afar [at a place] where more than one Yojana yet remained of her way [to Nrupura], that her brother had accomplished his work, she left that hail of stones among the villages.

265. For five Yojanas from that place the village-land became a waste buried under mighty boulders, and known to this very day as the Ramanyūtavi ('the forest of Ramanyā').

266. After completing this frightful carnage the Nāga, pained also by remorse and wearied by the reproaches of the people, left at daybreak that habitation of his and moved away.

267. The lake of dazzling whiteness [resembling] a sea of milk, which he created [for himself as residence] on a far-off mountain, is to the present day seen by the people on the pilgrimage to Amareśvara.

thighs, which were alone stained with their blood.

✓ 263-265. The legend told here of the Nāga's sister Ramanyā refers to the *Rambyār River, whose modern name is derived from Skt. Ramanyūtavi, i. 265. For Kā. r < Skt. r comp. note iii. 11.

The *Rambyār unites the streams coming from the mountains between the Pir Pantēūl and Rūpri Passē, and flows past Hirpōr and Sūprian to the N.E. It joins the Vitasta at Gambhīrasamgama, some three miles below Tsakdar (Cakradhara). From Hirpōr (Hirpur of the maps) it flows divided in many small channels within a gradually widening bed of rubble and boulders, which for the most part is dry, except in times of flood. After attaining near Tguran a width of over two miles, this bed contracts above the village of *Lit. For the remainder of its course the *Rambyār flows in a single narrow channel deeply cut in the alluvial soil. In the stony waste above *Lit I recognize the place where, according to our verse, the Ramanyā is supposed to have dropped her stones. The distance between it and Tsakdar is about eight miles, which corresponds exactly to the expression of the text (yojanūdhike kege mārgasya).

The 'five Yojanas' which the next verse mentions as the length of the ground laid waste by the Ramanyūtavi, seem a less accurate measurement. From above Hirpōr to the locality near *Lit above indicated the map shows only a distance of about twenty-two miles, which is considerably less than the five Yojanas, or twenty Krośas of verse 265. The modern Kruh (Kōs) of Kāśmīr is about one and a half miles, and to judge from the evidence of vii. 303, and of Bilhana's measurement, 17kruś, xviii. 70, the ancient Krośa in Kāśmīr could not have been less.

Similar stories explaining the origin of stone-wastes, 'Murren,' and other peculiar features of alpine orography, abound in the folklores of Switzerland, the Tyrol, Transylvania, etc.; comp. e.g. VERNALEXEN, Alpen-sagen, p. 39 eqq.

✓ 267. The mountain lake in which the legend locates the Nāga Suśranas after his migration, is situated near one of the sources of the *Lit River at 75° 34' long, 34° 5' lat. It is popularly known by the name of S'aganāga, and forms one of the stations of the great Amareśvara pilgrimage; comp. VIJNA, ii. p. 10, and INOM, Hand-book, p. 193. The legend told in chapter vi. of the Amareśvaramahātmya, it is true, identifies the lake with the serpent S'aganāga. But in the same chapter the lake is also designated by the name of Suśrama Nāga, which evidently reproduces the older form Suśranas in its Kā. pronunciation of 'Suśram.' As 'Suśram Nāg,' the lake is still known among the older Purohitae of Amareśvara, and under this name it is also referred to in the appropriate gloss which A. gives on our passage. The white colour of the lake's water is noticeable, and is possibly due to the surrounding limestone rocks.

A narrow inlet of the lake opening to the south towards the glacier of the Kohenār Peak, is popularly known by the name of Jāmatan Nāg*, 'the son-in-law's Nāga,' and corresponds to the Jāmatīśvaras of our narrative. It is mentioned as Jāmatnāga along with the Suśramanāga in the route directory

268. And in that locality there is also another lake well-known as the Jāmātṣaras ('the son-in-law's lake'), [the habitation] of the Brahman who by his father-in-law's favour had been transformed into a Nāga.

269. There appear at times without apparent cause such gods of death who, under the pretext of protecting their subjects, bring about their unexpected destruction.

270. To this day that tale is remembered by the people when they behold close to Cukradhara that town destroyed by fire and that pond which has become a [dry] hollow.

271. How small a fault is love-passion in kings according to the view of people of narrow perception? Yet by that [love] of this [king] was brought about what had not happened to any other anywhere.

272. Verily we learn from every story that the destruction of the universe even [may be caused] by the wrath of even a single virtuous woman, deity or Brahman.

273. After enjoying the earth for forty-one years less three months, this king perished through his evil conduct.

274. That [town of] Kimnarapura, after having been visible for a short time with its encircling walls and battlements, became similar to the town of the Gandharvas (i.e. a mirage).

275. One son, however, of the king, had in the wondrous course of events been [previously] taken by his nurse to Vijayakṣetra (Vijayēśvara), and thus did not lose his life.

276. This king called Siddha then revived the thoroughly exhausted nation as the cloud [revives] the mountain which has been parched by a forest fire.

277. The astonishing story of his father, as [told] above, served for this thoughtful [king] as a guide to a pious life by teaching him the vanity of mundane existence.

of the Amareśvara-pilgrimage as given in the Tirthas.

The Amareśvara-yātrā is directed to the famous cave of Amarnāth (Kā. Ambunāth) situated at a considerable altitude, 75° 33' long, 84° 13' lat. In it Ś'iva Amareśvara is believed to have manifested himself to the gods who entreated him for protection against death. The god is worshipped in a liṅga-shaped ice-block. For a description of the locality and the route leading to it, see VIGNA and INCZE, ll. cc.

This pilgrimage, notwithstanding its hardships, now ranks amongst the most popular in Kāśmīr, and attracts in great numbers pilgrims from other parts of India. In old times, however, this Tirtha can scarcely have claimed such importance, if we may judge from the scanty references made to it in the Nilamata (sl. 1824), and in the Rājat. [The passages vii. 183, 185, probably relate to Amareśvara-Amburhēr, see note vii. 183.] For a brief but accurate description, comp. Fourth Chron. 875.

275. Vijayakṣetra is an abbreviation for Vijayēśvarakṣetra, and a frequent designation of the sacred site around the temple of Vijayēśvara, including the town of Vijābrōr; comp. e.g. vii. 336 sqq., 431, 524, etc. For Vijayēśvarakṣetra, see e.g. Haracar. x. 191.

SIDDHA.

278. As the moon reflected in the slough [remains] untarnished, so he, though standing in the midst of enjoyments, could not be led into sin by their influence.

279. Amidst kings who were consumed by the fever of pride, he alone recovered full health by thinking day and night of Him who carries the crescent of the moon as his diadem (S'iva).

280. This virtuous [prince] cast away his jewels as if they were grass, and found the perfect adornment in the worship of S'iva.

281. This king alone was followed to the other world by royal fortune, because he had cunningly attached her to himself by unfailing righteousness.

282. After he had ruled the earth for sixty years, he ascended bodily to the worlds of S'iva together with his near attendants.

283. The servants who had attended Nara, found a deplorable end; those on the other hand who attached themselves to his son as their lord, became objects of praise in the world.

284. A dependant follows the way taken by his master, be it blamed by the world or praised by all people. A string of grass if used in working a well, goes down; if wound round flowers it is raised to the heads of the gods.

285. "Here is Siddha who has obtained the state of a demigod (siddha) in his own body": this announcement the gods proclaimed in heaven, beating the drums for seven days.

UTPALĀKṢA.

286. His son, who received the name of Utpalākṣa ('lotus-eyed') on account of his beautiful eyes, ruled the earth for thirty and a half years.

HIRANYĀKṢA.

287. His son Hiranyākṣa founded a town named after himself and ruled the earth for thirty-seven years and seven months.

279. L has nirāhyāyato bhīṣam.

285. The reading of A, prāghoṣayamstā^o, received into the text is, perhaps, only an attempt to eliminate the augmentless form prodghoṣayamstā*^o, which, on the evidence of A, prodghoṣayamstā^o and L prodghoṣayamstā^o, may be accepted as the original reading. For augmentless forms compare notes ii. 159; viii. 2200.

✓ 287. The gloss of A, places the town founded by Hiranyākṣa at Ranyil, a village situated circ. 74° 52' long. 31° 12' lat., close to the high road which leads from Srinagar to Gand'rabal and the Sind Valley. A Naga near this village, which is visited by the pilgrims proceeding to the Haramukuta Tirthas, is referred to in the Tirthas, and the Sureśvarimāhātmya as Hiranyākṣanāga, and in the Haramukutamāhātmya, ii. 7, as Hiranyagangā. More conclusive evidence in favour of the above identification is furnished by the two passages in which K. directly mentions this place under the name of Hiranyapura.

While Bhikṣacara is encamped at Mayagrāma, the modern Man'gām, not far from the mouth of the Sind Valley, the rebels from Lahara (Lar) who support him, defeat at Hiranyapura the royal forces, viii. 729 sqq. As the quarters of the latter are said to be at Amareśvara, i.e. Amburhār, about two and a half miles to the south of Ranyil, it is clear that this last named place is meant by Hiranyapura. Similarly, vii. 1385, when Uccala marches from Lahara, i.e. the Sind Valley, to the siege of the capital, he has his abhiseka ceremony performed en route by the Brahmins of Hiranyapura.

WILSON, Essay, p. 27, has already pointed out that Hiranyākṣa figures in the Kathasaritsāgara as the hero of a fairy tale. see 288. His son Hiranyakula, the founder of Hiranyotsa, ruled for sixty years, and the son of the latter, Vasukula, also for sixty years.

289. Then his son Mihirakula, a man of violent acts and resembling Kāla (Death), ruled in the land which was overrun by hordes of Mlecchas.

290. In him the northern region brought forth, as it were, another god of death, bent in rivalry to surpass the southern region which has Yama [as its guardian].

291. The people knew his approach by noticing the vultures, crows and other [birds] which were flying ahead eager to feed on those who were being slain within his armies' [reach].

292. This royal Vetāla was day and night surrounded by thousands of murdered human beings, even in his pleasure-houses.

293. This terrible enemy of mankind had no pity for children, no compassion for women, no respect for the aged.

HIRANYAKULA.

VASUKULA.

MIHIRAKULA.

lxv. 215 sqq. His father Kanakākṣa is there called king of Kāśmīr, and said to reside in Hiranyapura, the capital of the country.

288. The position of Hiranyotsa is unknown.

The name of Hiranyakula has been read by Gen. Cunningham on coins closely resembling some of the issues of Mihirakula; comp. Later Indo-Scythians, p. 114, and pl. viii. figs. 9, 10.

289. Kalhana's Mihirakula is undoubtedly identical with the great ruler of the White Huns or Ephthalites, who calls himself Mihirakula or Mihiragula on his coins, and whom Kosmas Indikopleustes mentions under the name of Gollas. To Mr. FLEET belongs the merit of having placed our knowledge of the historical facts connected with Mihirakula's rule on a safe basis by combining the evidence of the inscriptions of Erān and Mandasūr with the data furnished by Kalhana, Hiuen-tsiang (Si-yu-ki, i. pp. 167 sqq.), Sung-yun and the coins; see Ind. Ant., xv. pp. 245 sqq. (where also a translation of Rājāt. i. 289-324 is given) and Corpus Inscr. Ind., iii. pp. 10 sqq.

The main points which may be accepted as certain, are that Mihirakula succeeded about A.D. 515 to his father Toramāna in the rule of the territories conquered by the White Huns from Kābul to Central India, and that after extensive campaigns he was defeated by Balāditya of Magadha and Yaśodharman, and forced to retire about A.D. 530 to Kāśmīr and the adjoining regions. From there he appears till the end of his reign (about A.D. 544-550) to have been engaged in endeavours to recover his lost dominions in the direction of the Lower Indus. Compare with the above papers of Mr. Fleet the materials collected by Sir A. CUNNINGHAM in Later Indo-Scythians, pp. 86 sqq., and the far more lucid synopsis given of the latter by Mr. V. A. SMITH, J.A.S.B., 1894, pp. 185 sqq.

K.'s account is too much interwoven with legendary matter to be of value as an independent source for the history of Mihirakula. But the close resemblance between certain of the stories related in it and the picture of Mihirakula's character, as drawn by Hiuen-tsiang, shows that the Chronicle has at least preserved faithfully some features of the popular tradition regarding this ruler, such as it had developed within the first century after his death. Thus the description of his cruelties, i. 290-293, 302, 303, 318-323, may be compared with the story told by Hiuen-tsiang, Si-yu-ki, i. p. 171 sq., and the notice of favours shown to Brahmins and their worship, i. 306, 307, 312-314, with Hiuen-tsiang's record of his enmity against Buddhism, Si-yu-ki, pp. 168, 171.

That this popular tradition had some foundation in historical facts is shown by Sung-yun's graphic description of the interview he had with the "cruel and vindictive" king, A.D. 620, in his camp on the borders of Gandhāra (Si-yu-ki, i. pp. xcix. sqq.). Similarly, the impression which this tradition retained of Mihirakula's religious propensities, is in full accord with the evidence of his coins which, in the emblems of bull and trident and in the legends jayatu vṛṣa, jayatu vṛṣadhvarja, display a distinct leaning towards Śaivism.

The name Mihirakula contains in its first part certainly the Iranian name of the sun-god, corresponding to the Avestic Mithra,

MIHIRAKULA.

Expedition to Ceylon.

294. When he once noticed that the breasts of his queen who was wearing a jacket made of cloth from Simhala (Ceylon) were marked with golden footprints, he flamed up in anger.

295. When told on inquiry by the chamberlain that the cloth made in Simhala was marked with the stamp of the king's foot, he thereupon set out on an expedition.

296. The southern ocean when it was swelled by the streams of the juice flowing from the temples of his war-elephants, showed a desire of embracing (extending to) the Yamunā.

297. At last he removed in violent onslaught the king of Simhala [from his throne], and at the same time [from his own heart] the wrath which had arisen from the sight of his queen touched by the foot [of that king].

298. When the demons from the palaces of Iankā saw his army in the distance, they feared another attack of Nāghava (Nāma) and fell to trembling.

299. After this [king] of mighty power had installed there another ruler, he brought away [from there] the cloth called by the name of Yamuṣadeva which was stamped with an image of the sun.

300. On his return he scattered the Coli, Kārnāṭa, Lāṭa and other kings as an elephant in rut [scatters the other] elephants by his mere odour.

301. When these kings returned on his departure, their cities announced to them their capture by the broken girdle of their battlements.

302. When on reaching the 'Gate (dvāra) of Kāśmīr' he heard the terrified cry of an elephant which had fallen over a precipice, he was thrilled with delight.

MIPO of the Indo-Scythian coinage, Pers. Mihir. The significance of the termination kula, or, perhaps earlier, gula is doubtful.

294. The story here told of Mihirakula's expedition against Ceylon and its cause closely agrees with the less legendary one recorded in the Mujmal-ul-Tawārikh, of a king of Kāśmīr; see REINAUD, Fragmente arabes et persans, pp. 42 sqq. (also Mr. Fleet's abstract, Ind. Ant., xv. p. 260). The king of Kāśmīr's name is not given there, and as his opponent there figures King Hāl of Sindh, who at length forces the invader to come to terms of peace. Reinaud already recognized Mihirakula in 'the king of Kāśmīr.'

299. No satisfactory explanation has been found for the name Yamuṣadeva. A popular legend might have connected the cloth so called with Mihirakula, perhaps only on account of the apparent relation between the sun-mark and the king's name. It is a curious coincidence, that some varieties of the copper coinage issued by Mihirakula, as well as by his father, show the emblem of a sun-wheel either alone or with the S'ivaio symbols above mentioned; comp. J.A.S.B., 1894, pp. 198 sqq., 206 sq.

, 300. The territories named in the text correspond to the modern Tanjore, the Carnatic and Central Gujrat; see e.g. Ind. Ant., xxii. pp. 176, 181, 183.

302. The concurrent evidence of the gloss of A., the Ain-i Akbari, the Persian Chronicles and the actually surviving tradition, enables us to fix with accuracy the place in which the story told in i. 302, 303 has been localized since early times. The glossator says: "Since that occurrence the route by which Mihirakula returned, is commonly known by the name of Hastivāṇja." In the MSS. of the Ain-i Akb., which reproduces this anecdote in its abstract of the Rājat. (ii, p. 383), the name of the locality is with a clerical mistake recorded as Hastivatar. But the Persian Chronicles of Haidar Malik, Narayan Kōl, and Bir'bal Kāiser give the locality correctly

303. The perverse-minded king was in raptures with joy over this sound, and had then a hundred other elephants rolled down by force.

304. As the touch of wicked men defiles the body, so the relation [of their deeds] defiles the speech. Therefore yet other inhuman acts of his are not narrated [by me].

305. Who can understand the conduct of men who do astonishing acts and are [withal] of a low mind? Since even he took to piety for the sake of collecting religious merits.

as Hastivanj, and place it on the Pir Pantāl route.

This indication induced me to pay a visit to the Pir Pantāl Pass in Sept., 1891, in the course of which I could trace the locality intended and the tradition yet attaching to it. A full account of this identification has been given by me in my paper Notes on the ancient topography of the Pir Pantāl Route, J.A.S.B., 1895, pp. 376 sqq., of which the following is an abstract.

The present route to the pass, which follows mainly the track chosen for the old 'Imperial road' of Akbar, has been fully described in Vigne, Travels, i. pp. 261 sqq., and INOX, Land-book, pp. 60 sqq. It leads for some distance, after leaving Īlir'pūr, the ancient S'irapura (iii. 227), along the right bank of the Rembyār¹ River. It then crosses to the heights above the left or northern bank, on which it continues up to the old Moghul Sorai of 'Alīābād. On the opposite (southern) side of the narrow defile, and about half a mile below 'Alīābād, is seen a high mountain ridge, which falls down in precipitous cliffs to the river bed. This projecting ridge bears, according to the uniform testimony of the mountaineers frequenting the route, the name of Hast'vanj. They all have heard the tradition that once the elephants of a king fell down from the height of Hast'vanj into the gorge below. The name of the king is not known, nor whether the elephants came to grief by accident or were thrown down.

In the times before Akbar constructed the 'Imperial road,' the old route is said to have led over the Hast'vanj ridge and throughout along the right bank of the river. This agrees fully with the remark of Abu-l-Fazl, who, when describing in another passage (Āin-i Akb., ii. p. 847) the several routes from Bhimbhar to Kāsmir, clearly distinguishes the route of "Hastivanj" (MSS. Hastivatar) which was the former route for the march of troops," from the "Pir Pantāl route" used by Akbar. This evidence regarding the antiquity and importance of the Hast'vanj route is borne out by topographical considerations.

At 'Alīābād Serai the ordinary or 'Imperial' route over the Pir Pantāl vid Pošiana and Bahramgalla is joined from the south by a route which leads past the Nandan Sar lake over the Durhāl Pass to the territory of Rajauri (Rajapuri). As it affords the most direct communication to the south it is still much frequented, and was used with advantage by the Sikh forces in 1814 and 1819. The natural continuation of this route lies to the south of the Rembyār², i.e. over the Hast'vanj. Keeping on this side the crossing of the river is altogether avoided.

It must also be noted that the old position of the frontier watch-station on this route was, according to iii. 227 (see note), at Kramavarta. As this place has been identified by me with the site of the existing watch-tower of Kāmela Kōh, which lies on the south bank of the Rembyār³ some three miles below Hast'vanj, it is clear that the old main route which this watch-station was intended to close, must also have led on that side. The Hast'vanj is crossed by a path which leads over the steep grassy slopes of the east and west side of the ridge, and is practicable for laden animals even in its present neglected condition.

The name Hast'vanj is, as its first part hast, i.e. the Kā. derivative of Skr. hastī, 'elephant,' clearly shows, connected with the story recorded by K. The second part vanj is rendered by the Persian Chroniclers with raftan, 'going.' It was evidently connected by the local tradition with vanj, 'to go,' which is found in Western Panjāb.

303. It is curious that both Sung-yun and Kosmas Indikopleustes lay stress on the great number of war-elephants possessed by the ruler of the White Huns. The former mentions 700 well-armed and trained elephants in his force, and the latter speaks of Gollas as "going forth to war with not less than a thousand elephants"; see Si-yu-ki, i., p. c., and CUNNINGHAM, Later Indo-Scythians, p. 70.

MIBIRAKULA.

306. Thus, evil-minded as he was, he founded at S'rīnagarī the [shrine of Śiva] Mihireśvara, and in Holadā the large town called Mihirapara.

307. Brahmins from Gandhāra, resembling himself in their habits and verily themselves the lowest of the twice-born, accepted Agrahāras from him.

308. The gathering of the clouds pleases the peacocks though it spreads darkness, while the wild goose is pleased by the breaking up of the clouds which brings clearness. From the mutual regard which the giver and recipient [of a gift] show for each other, there appears in the highest degree a resemblance of tastes.

End of Mihirakula.

309. After ruling the land for seventy years this terror of the earth became afflicted in his body with many diseases, and immolated himself in the flames.

310. When he sacrificed his own body there issued from the sky a voice which declared: "This destroyer of three eras [of human beings] has attained salvation, since he has shown no mercy for his own person either."

311. In the opinion of those who report this, he figures as a liberal patron who has made amends for his cruelties by gifts of Agrahāras and similar deeds.

312-316. Some excuse the cruelty of this lion among men by [referring to] a tenacious popular tradition, which maintains: "After killing the inhabitants of Āryadeśa he performed a terrible penance, and re-established pious observances in this land which, overrun by impure Dāradas, Bhāṭṭas and Mlecchas, had fallen off

306. No information is available regarding the temple or Līṅga of Mihireśvara.

Holadā can be shown with certainty to be the Pargana now known as Vular, which comprises the valley opening to the N.E. of the Vitastā between the Parganas of Dachampūr and Vihī. Its present administrative centre is Trāl, 75° 11' long. 33° 56' lat. The mention of Holadā in viii. 3115, along with Lakara (Lār) and Devasarasa (Div'sar) proves it to be the name of a district. The passage vii. 1228 places it clearly in Maḍaverūjya, i.e. Mariz, the eastern portion of Kāśmīr. The position is still more distinctly indicated by viii. 1430, where we read of two officers of King Jaya-sinha being besieged by the rebel Dāmaras of Holadā within the temple of Avantisvāmin at Avantipura. The latter place belongs still to the Vular Pargana. The above identification is further supported by the passage viii. 733, which mentions the Dāmaras of Holadā along with those of Khaṣṭivā, i.e. Khruv in the neighbouring Vihī Pargana, and by Jonar. 548.

A₁ writes in three passages, viii. 733, 2308, 3115, the name as holakā, using the letter ॠ (which in Kā. is called buḍ rakara, 'the big r') to mark the pronunciation of ॠ as r. This as well as the reading holarā, Jonar. 548, brings Holadā still nearer to the modern representatives of the name.—In view of the five passages quoted above, I consider the correction holadāyām for holatāyām of A. and L. indispensable.

The position of Mihirapara I have not been able to ascertain. No local name resembling this appellation is now known in Vular.

✓307. The Gandhāra Brahmins are included in the anathema pronounced in the Kernapuran of the Mahābhārata against the inhabitants of the land of the Five Rivers, on account of their unorthodox Ācāra; comp. the extract given by LASSEN, Pentapot. Ind., pp. 67 sqq.—Hsien-tsiang mentions the conquest of Gandhāra by Mihirakula, Si-yu-ki, i. p. 171.

After this verse the Calc. and Paris Edd. insert two Ślokas, which are not found in A, L or any Kāśmīrian MS. They attribute to the 'descendants of Mlecchas' intercourse with their sisters, to the Dāradas illicit relations with their daughters-in-law, and to the Bhāṭṭas (Bhāṭṭas?) sale of their wives and licentiousness of their women-folk.

I have not been able to trace the origin of this interpolation, which looks like a marginal note intended to illustrate the remark made in the first half of i. 313.

312-316. The construction of the first two lines of this Kulaka offers some difficulty, which the authors of the P.W. thought to remove by reading āryadeśāt sa for āryadeśān sa, from the sacred law. When determined to burn himself in the flames he offered an atonement. It was on this account that he bestowed a thousand Agrahāras on Brahmans from the Gandhāra-land at Vijayaśvara. Then finally he bravely gave up his body to the flames on an iron board which was studded with razors, swords, knives and other [sharp instruments]."

317. Others have declared that his above described acts were intended for the destruction of the Khaśas, who had obtained predominance when the city [of Nara] had been burned through the wrath of the Nāga.

and construing samsthāpya with ācārapravartanam (see s.v. samsthā, 6). Translating as above the text given, I assume that the popular tradition here recorded represented the bonofices given to the foreign Brahmans as an atonement for Mihirakula's cruel deeds abroad.

The Dāradas are the modern Darīs regarding whose territory and ethnography DREW, Jummo, pp. 393 sqq., may be consulted. Their seats, which do not seem to have changed since the times of Herodotus, extend from Citral and Yasin, across the Indus regions of Gilgit, Cilas, and Bunji to the Kisanganā Valley in the immediate north of Kāśmīr. The tribes inhabiting the latter valley are meant in most of the passages in which the Chronicle mentions the Dāradas or Darās; comp. o.g. vii. 1171 sqq.; viii. 2709 sqq. For ancient notices of this people, see LASSEN, Ind. Alt., i. pp. 498 sqq.; McCrindle, Ptolemy, p. 107.

The name Bhautta or Bhatta (also rarely Bhotja) is applied by K. and his successors, like its derivative the modern Ké. Būt, to the population of Tibetan descent generally, inhabiting the regions immediately to the E. and N.E. of Kāśmīr, i.e. the modern mountain districts of Drās, Ladākh, perhaps also Skardo; comp. iv. 168; Jonar. 148, 158, 167 sq., 835; S'riv. i. 71, 82; iii. 32, 401, 445 sqq. etc. From viii. 2886 it appears that the Zoji-Lā Pass, on the high road to Drās and Ladākh, was then as now the ethnographic watershed between Kāśmīr and the territory of the Bhauttas. For some notices of the form, comp. St.-MARTIN, Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscri., Sav. Étrang. I. série vi., i. p. 266; DREW, Jummo, p. 231.

The various opinions recorded by K. in vv. 310-321 seem to reflect an uncertainty of contemporary popular opinion regarding Mihirakula's character, which may be traced also in Hsien-tsiang's narrative (Si-yu-ki, i. pp. 167 sqq.).

317. From the notices collected and discussed by LASSEN, Ind. Alt., i. p. 1020, it appears that the name Khaśa has been used since early times in Skr. literature for the designation of tribes settled in widely different parts of the Himalaya regions. Accordingly in numerous instances the exact application of the term remains doubtful.

No such difficulty arises as regards the Khaśas so frequently mentioned in the Kāśmīr Chronicles. It can be shown from a careful examination of all the passages that their seats were restricted to a comparatively limited region, which may be roughly described as comprising the valleys lying immediately to the S. and W. of the Pir Pansal range, between the middle course of the Vitastā in the W. and Kāṣṭavāṭa (Kishtvār) in the E.

In numerous passages of the Rājat. we find the rulers of Rājapuri, the modern Rajauri, described as 'lords of the Khaśas,' and their troops as Khaśas; see vii. 979, 1271, 1276 sqq.; viii. 837, 1468, 1868, 1895. Proceeding from Rajapuri to the E. we have the valley of the upper Āns River, now called Panjabbar, referred to in S'riv. iv. 213 under the name of Pañcagahvara, as a habitation of Khaśas. Further to the E. lies Bapaśālū, the modern Bān'hāl, below the pass of the same name, where the pretender Bhikṣācara sought refuge in the castle of 'the Khaśa-lord' Bhāṅika, viii. 1665 sqq. The passages viii. 177, 1074 show that the whole of the valley leading from Bān'hāl to the Candrabhāgi, which is now called 'Bichlāri,' and which in the Chronicle bears the name of Tiyālūtī, was inhabited by Khaśas.

Finally we have evidence of the latter's settlements in the valley of Khaśālaya, which is several times referred to in the Fourth Chron., 56, 58 sq., 281, 290, 299 (see particularly the second passage). Khaśālaya is certainly the valley of Khaśāl (marked on the map as 'Kashur'), which leads from the Marbal Pass in the S.E. corner of Kāśmīr down to Kishvār.

An old name of Khaśālaya is probably Khaśāl, vii. 399; S'riv. iv. 556.

Turning to the W. of Rajapuri, we find a Khaśa from the territory of Parotsa or

MIHIRAKULA.

Story of Candrapāṇi.

318. When he was diverting the river called Oandrakulyā, a rock in the middle which could not be moved, impeded the work.

319. Then the king performed a penance, and was told by the gods in a dream that a powerful Yakṣa, who observed the vow of chastity, lived in that rock.

320. If a chaste woman were to touch it, he could not cause [further] obstruction. Hence on the following day the king had that what the dream had revealed to him, tried at the rock.

321. The attempts of ever so many women of good birth having failed, the mighty rock then moved when touched by a potter's wife named Candrapāṇi.

322. Thereupon the king in his anger over this depravity slaughtered three crores of women of respectable birth, together with their husbands, brothers and sons.

323. Such is the account as current in the tradition of others. But, in truth, the destruction of living beings, even if it has some reason, is a misdeed of the gravest kind.

324. That a king of such wickedness was not killed by a rising of his subjects, can only be due to his having been protected by the gods who caused him to act in this manner.

Prinṭis mentioned, vi. 318, in the person of Tuṅga, who rose from the position of a cowherd to be Queen Diddā's all-powerful minister. The queen's own father, Siṃharāja, the ruler of Lohara or Loharīn, is designated a Khaṣa, vi. 175, and from vii. 773 it is seen that his descendants, who, after Diddā, occupied the Kāśmīr throne, were looked upon as Khaṣas.—That there were Khaṣas also in the Vitastā Valley below Varāhamūla, is proved by the reference to Pirānaka as 'a seat of Khaṣas,' viii. 409. Of this locality it has been shown in note v. 214 that it was situated in the ancient Dvāravati, the present Dvārbidi, a portion of the Vitastā Valley between Kathai and Muzaffarabad.

The position here indicated makes it highly probable that the Khaṣas are identical with the modern Khakha tribe, to which most of the petty hill-chiefs and gentry in the Vitastā Valley below Kāśmīr belong. The name Khakha (Pahāri; in Kā. sing. Khukh, plur. Khakh) is the direct derivative of Khaṣa, Skr. kṣ being pronounced since early times in the Panjāb and the neighbouring hill-tracts as kh or h (comp. Kā. h < Skr. kṣ).

The Khakha chiefs of the Vitastā Valley retained their semi-independent position until Sikh times, and, along with their neighbours of the Bomba clan, have ever proved troublesome neighbours for Kāśmīr; comp. CUNNINGHAM, Anc. Geogr., p. 131. Of the marauding inroads which the Khakha made during the troubles of the Pathān rule, and later still, in Shaikh Imām-ud-dīn's time, 1846, popular tradition in Kāśmīr has retained a vivid recollection. That the Khaṣas already in earlier times deserved the character of expert plunderers, will be seen from S'riv., 446, 456, 498, 571, 638, 646; Fourth Chron., 326, and also K.'s allusions, viii. 1895, 2289.

In the Kāśmīr Census Report of 1891, p. 141, the 'Khakhe' are entered with 4046 souls as a subdivision of the Muhammadan Hill-Rajpūts. For some data regarding the modern history of the Khakha, see LAWRENCE, Valley, p. 201.

[Whether the Karia xάρη and Karia ὄρη of Ptolemy can be connected with our Khaṣas, as supposed by St.-Martin, Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscri., Sav. Étrang. I. série vi., i. pp. 264 sq., seems very doubtful.] ✓

318. I am unable to identify the Candrakulyā of the above story.

322. The story here told is to account for Mihirakula's by-name of 'Trikotīhan,' i. 310. In its point it is identical with that related by Herodotus, ii. 111, of Pheron (Wilson). In Hiuen-tsiang's account there corresponds to it the story of the nine hundred thousand

325. When he had at last found his death through the superior effect of his subjects' merit, his virtuous son Baka was crowned by the citizens.

326. After the experience of the former [reign] the people felt even before his throne the terror [previously] described, just as [one might] in a pleasure-house built on a burning ground.

327. Born from an arch-tormentor, he became a reliever of humanity, as the burst of rain [which follows] after an excessively hot day darkened by the clouds.

328. Then the people thought that Law had returned, as it were, from another world, and that Safety had come forth again as from an inaccessible retreat.

329. This most glorious [prince], after founding the town called Lavanotsa at Bakasabhva, constructed the [shrine of S'iva] Bakesa and the Bakavati canal.

330. There the king passed sixty-three years and thirteen days as ruler of the earth.

331. Then a certain sorceress, Bhattā by name, having assumed the appearance of a lovely woman, approached the king one evening.

332. Losing his sense over her various captivating words, he joyfully accepted an invitation to view the wonders of [her] sacrificial feast.

333. Then when in the morning the sovereign came to that place followed by his hundred sons and grandsons, she made of him a sacrificial offering to the 'circle of the goddesses.'

334. To this day there is seen on a rock the double impression of her knees, showing [where], on attaining by that act supernatural power, she had risen to the sky.

335. Even to this day the recollection of this story is kept alive in the people destroyed by Mihirakula on the conquest of Gandhāra. "Then he slew three ten myriads of people of the first rank by the side of the Sintu river; the same number of the middle rank he drowned in the river, and the same number of the third rank he divided among his soldiers as slaves." (Si-yu-ki, i. p. 172.)

325. The conjectural emendation bakas for ekas of all Kāśmīr MSS. is indispensably required by the context. It appears to have been made already by the writer of the modern Poona transcript used by Dr. Hultzsch. The corruption is easily explained from the S'arada characters, ॐ with a following ॐ resembling closely the initial ॐ.

329. The position of Lavanotsa is uncertain, though the place is several times mentioned by K. From the passage vii. 702 sqq. it appears that Srinagar could be reached by a single forced march from Lavanotsa, and that Padmapura, or Pāmpar, lay on the route. From the passages vii. 1537, 1658, which mention Lavanotsa in connection with a siege of Vijayotsvara, we can only conclude that the distance between these two places was not great. Finally, vi. 46, 57 seem to show that Lavanotsa was situated near one of the high roads leading to Srinagar from abroad.

Nothing is known of the Bakosa and Bakavati of the text.

333. Regarding the devicakra or mātṛ-cakra, see note i. 122.

335. From viii. 1260, and S'rio. iii. 190; iv. 452, it is evident that Akari was the name of

- BAKA. Maṭhas of Kheri by [the image of] the god S'atakapūleśa, the 'circle of the Mothers,' and by that rock.
- KṢITINANDA. 336. Then Kṣitinanda, the son of this king, whom the goddess had spared as the root-bulb of the family tree, ruled the earth for thirty years.
- VASUNANDA. 337. His son called Vasunanda, who composed a well-known work on erotics (smaraśāstra), protected the earth for fifty-two years and two months.
- NARA II. 338. His son Nara [II.] was king for sixty years, and for the same [period] the latter's son Akṣa, who founded the village of Akṣavāla.
- AKṢA. 339. Then the earth, together with the islands, was under the protection of Gopāditya, whose care for [all] castes and orders brought back the first Yuga before the eyes [of men].
- GOPĀDITYA. 340. He established the Agrahāras bearing the names of Khola, Khāgikā, Hāḍagrāma, and Skandapura, as well as [the Agrahāra of] S'amājūsā and others.

a district. This, I think, can be identified with the Pargana, now known by the double name of Khur-Nārāvāy, which comprises the fertile valleys descending from the Gulabgarh and Muli Passes of the Pir Panjal to the Vāsau river. The village of Khur (marked Koori on larger Survey map) from which the first part of the name is taken, lies 70° 50' 45" long. 33° 37' lat. For a description, see VIGNE, i. p. 304 sq.

This identification is based, apart from the relation between the names Kheri and Khur, on the evidence of the passages viii. 1260, and S'rio. iv. 452, which mention Kheri in connection with the Parganas of Devasarasa (Div'sar) and Ardhavana (Ād'vin) respectively. Both these Parganas immediately adjoin Khur-Nārāvāy, to the north of the Vāsau. The administration of Kheri, perhaps as a royal allodial domain, appears to have formed a special charge, as K. refers repeatedly to the 'Kherikūrya' in the sense of a high office; see viii. 960, 1118, 1482, 1824. The Sikh and Dogra rule, probably continuing an earlier arrangement, has established in Khur-Nārāvāy Jāgirs for members of the ruling family; comp. VIGNE, i. p. 307.

It is uncertain which particular localities are referred to here by K. under the term of maṭha. Through Khur-Nārāvāy led once much frequented routes to the above named passes, and the Maṭhas mentioned might, therefore, have been roadside 'Dharmasālas.' Thus S'riyara, iii. 190, relates the establishment of a 'dharmamaṭha' in Kheri in the times of Ḥassan Shāh.

Of the legend which, according to our text, was once localized there, no trace seems to have survived.

337. As no mention is found elsewhere of Vasunanda's ars amatoria, it might perhaps be better to read with L prakhyātāṣ smaraś, "known as the author of a work on erotics."

338. Akṣavāla is undoubtedly the modern Ach'vāl in the Kuṭṭhar Pargana, 75° 17' long. 33° 41' lat., famous for its beautiful springs described by BERNIER, Travels, p. 413; VIGNE, i. p. 347, etc. The fountain is named in the Nilamata, 917, Akṣipālānaga.

340. Khāgikā is identical with Khāgi, the modern Khag; comp. note i. 90.

Khola is possibly the present village of Khuli, situated in the Vular Pargana, 75° 10' long. 33° 55' lat.

Hāḍagrāma can be identified on the evidence of the gloss Āḍagrām given by A₂, with the modern Ār'gām, a village of the Nāgām Pargana, 74° 45' long. 33° 56' lat. It is referred to as the site of several fights in viii. 672, 1583, 2196. Some remains of temples were traced there by P. Kāśī Ram in 1891.

The gloss of A₂, Khāndūr, enables us to identify Skandapura with Khondur, a considerable village situated in the Kuṭṭhar Pargana, about midway between Tālvān and Naugām, 75° 19' long. 33° 42' lat. It is not marked on the Survey maps, but was visited by me in Sept., 1891. For Kā. kh in place of an original initial sk, comp. Khānd'bhavan < Skr. Skandabhavana, vi. 137.

The last name given in the Ed. as S'amājūsā in accordance with A₁, is probably more correctly preserved in the reading of A₂ S'amājūsā. This form is supported by L S'amājūsā, in which the substitution of s for ś and of m for s is easily explained by faulty transcription of the S'aradā characters. The 341. After consecrating a [shrine of] Jyesthēśvara on the Gopa-hill (Gopādrī) this wise [king] bestowed the Gopa-Agrahāras on Brahmans born in Āryadeśa.

342-343. He removed those who ate garlic to Bhūkṣīravāṭikā, and transferred the Brahmans who had broken their rules of conduct to Khasaṭā. Other Brahmans again of a holy life, whom he had brought from pure countries, he settled in Vāścikā and other Agrahāras.

344. He received in laudatory poems (prasaśti) the epithet of 'supreme guardian of the world'; the killing of animals he did not tolerate except at sacrifices.

345. After protecting the earth for sixty years and six days, he went to the worlds of the pious to enjoy the ripe fruits of his good deeds.

gloss of A₂ renders the name by S'min-Jūsav, evidently the name of a modern locality, which, however, I have not been able to trace. The reading S'amāṅgāsa of A₁ is probably due to a reminiscence of the passage i. 100, which contains this name corresponding to the modern S'āngas.

341. The passage viii. 1104-10 makes it quite certain that we have in Gopādrī the ancient designation of the conspicuous hill now popularly known as Takht-i Sulaimān,¹ immediately to the east of Srinagar. The gloss of A₁ renders accordingly Gopādrī by Gopākār, i.e. the name of the modern village of Gup'kār, situated between the N.E. extremity of the Takht hill and the Dal lake.

In Note C, i. 124, it has been shown that S'iva under the name of Jyesthēśvara has been worshipped from early times to the present day at Jyēthēr, in the immediate vicinity of the Takht hill. The shrine of Jyesthēśvara mentioned in our passage was evidently connected with this sacred site, and may possibly have occupied the same place on the top of the hill, where the extant temple referred to in the above note stands. The superstructures of this temple certainly belong to a late period, as rightly shown by FERGUSSON, History of Indian Architecture, p. 282, against CUNNINGHAM'S and COLLE'S assumptions (see J.A.S.B., 1848, pp. 247 sqq.). But the high base on which the temple stands, and the stairs leading up to it, are clearly of a far earlier date, and may well have formed part of a building which the tradition of K's time ascribed to King Gopāditya. Whether this tradition was based on historical fact, or was perhaps merely due to an old popular etymology connecting the name of the Gopādrī hill with that of the king, cannot be decided now. It must be noted that there is at present no other place on the steep rocky hill showing ancient remains, apart from the site of the extant temple. This occupies, in fact, the only convenient position available for a structure of any dimensions.

The 'Gopa-Agrahāras' may have been situated on the fertile plateau at the E. foot of the Takht hill, which is now occupied by the vineyards and fruit-gardens of the Gup'kār village.

342-343. Buch'vōr, with which Bhūkṣīravāṭikā can be safely identified on the basis of the gloss of A₂ (Buchyerādū iti bhūkṣayā prasādhasthale), is the name of a narrow strip of land which lies between the foot of the rocky N.W. face of the Takht hill and the Gagribal portion of the Dal. This low-lying shore, which is liable to frequent inundations, is now occupied by a few gardens belonging to the suburb of Drug'jan, distant about half a mile. Regarding Kā. vōr, corresponding to Skr. vāṭikā at the end of local names, see note iii. 11.

Khasaṭā, too, according to the gloss of A₂, would have to be looked for in the immediate vicinity of Srinagar, viz. at Sudar'bat; comp. note i. 125-128. I know, however, of no evidence in support of this location.

Vāścikā, which the gloss of A₁ renders by Vacyā, is in all probability the modern village of Vach' on the lower Rambyar river (map Woochi), 75° 6' long. 33° 49' lat. Some broken sculptures, found there by P. Kāśi Rām in 1891, show that the place is not of recent date.

For the prohibition of garlic, comp. e.g. Manusmṛti, v. 5.

344. Regarding the meaning of prasaśti, see note i. 15.

345. A₂ reads saṣaṣmūśvān "and six months." L agrees with A₁. As the length of GOKARṆA.

346. His son Gokarṇa, who established the [shrine of S'iva] Gokarṇeśvara, ruled the earth for fifty-eight years less thirty days.

NARENDRĀDITYA I.

347. His son Narendrāditya [I.], who bore the second name of Khinkhila, consecrated shrines to [S'iva] Bhūteśvara, and founded a permanent endowment [for the feeding of Brahmins].

348. His Guru, Ugra by name, who was the recipient of divine favours, and whose stature was raised by dignity, constructed the [shrine of S'iva] Ugreśa and a 'circle of the Mothers.'

349. After having ruled the earth during thirty-six years and a hundred days, this pious [king] attained the sinless worlds by his far-reaching merits.

YUDHIṢṬHIRA I.

350. Then his son Yudhiṣṭhira [I.], whom the people called Andha-Yudhiṣṭhira ('the blind Yudhiṣṭhira') on account of his small eyes, became king.

351. He followed for a short time in the footsteps of his [immediate] predecessors, and ruled his inherited kingdom with care.

352. Some time thereafter an evil fate caused that he intoxicated by the regal splendour, fell into a capricious conduct.

353. He [henceforth] showed not favours to those who deserved them, did not honour the wise, and did no longer as before kindness to those who had grown experienced by service.

354. The wise whom he had deprived of their dignity by treating them alike with his ignorant attendants, shunned him in his depravation.

reign is not given for Yudhiṣṭhira I., the correct figure cannot be ascertained here by means of calculation.

346. The name of a king Gokarṇa occurs on an unique Kāśmīr coin of the so-called 'Kidāra' type, figured by CUNNINGHAM, Coins of Med. India, pl. iii. 6.

347. CUNNINGHAM describes, Later Indo-Scythians, pp. 97, 110, and pl. vii. fig. 11, an unique silver coin with the legend Deva Sāhi Khinkhila, and attributes it to Narendrāditya I. The type of this coin is unmistakably that of an Ephthalite ruler, and closely resembles that of the coin of Lakṣhaṇa mentioned in note iii. 383. Two coins bearing the legend S'ri Narendra (figured Coins of Med. India, pl. iii. 5) show the 'Kidāra' type, and seem to belong to another later ruler; but the legend is scarcely certain.

Regarding Bhūteśvara, see note i. 107.

In the translation of the ἀπαξ λεγ. akṣayinī, I have followed the interpretation given by the gloss of A. The glossator sees in akṣayinī a perpetual endowment for providing food to Brahmins. In a second gloss he refers to such endowments as known in the hills near Kāśmīr under the name of 'Achhyinī.'

S'rivara mentions, i. 408, such an endowment made by Zain-ul-'Abidin on the road of S'ūrapura (Hūrpōr), i.e. on the Pir Panjal route, at which wayfarers without distinction received food. He uses for its designation the expression annasattra avicchinna, which corresponds exactly to the avicchinnam annadānam of our gloss. Compare also Rājat. ii. 58; viii. 571 (avicchinnasattra) and S'riv. i. 402. With the expression akṣayinī may be compared the term akṣayanivī, frequently used for a permanent endowment in the Nasik Cave inscriptions and elsewhere; comp. Ind. Ant., ix. p. 187.

Endowments of this kind still exist in connection with Dharmasālās in various parts of India, e.g. at the Raghunātha Mandir of Jammu, where it is known by the name of Sadābharat. Bounties consisting of a certain amount of food are given to this day on the pass of Bān'hāl and at Būnyār on the Jehlam Road, from the proceeds of an endowment of the late Mahārāja to mendicants and pilgrims passing on to Kāśmīr.

355. True, for a Yogin it is right to see the same in every person; but for a king it is a great fault, and the source of disgrace.

356. By parasites who turned faults into virtues and virtues into faults, he was gradually deprived of his intellect, and rendered like a slave of women.

357. His words were painfully wounding, his jests protracted, his converse with parasites most frequent; even his amusements, which were unbecoming for a king, caused fright.

358. The king who full of deceit praised [a person's] good qualities in public, and discussed his faults behind his back, and who was fickle in his attachments, became an object of hatred to his servants.

359. While the king thus carelessly blundered in small things, the affairs of the kingdom soon fell into disorder.

360. Then the civil councillors who felt free of control and had attained power, strove for the destruction of the [king] whom the well-disposed had forsaken.

361. By reducing the king's authority, and conducting themselves without any restraint, they made the rulers of the neighbouring countries eager to seize the kingdom.

362. Encouraged by them all the [rulers] of the various regions showed eager haste to throw themselves on the kingdom like vultures on the carrion.

363. The frightened king was then unable to restore his own position, as the artisan [is unable to replace] the stone-block when it has once fallen from the machinery [by which it is to be moved].

364. When the king's rule, which had been undermined for a long time, was tottering, there appeared to him no device of any kind which could maintain it.

365. His own ministers did not accept the conciliation [offered] by him, thinking: "He has seen our guilt. When he has recovered his position he will undoubtedly destroy us."

366. Then united with their forces they invested the king's palace, drowning the walls of the people with the terrible sound of their kettle-drums. Checking the rays of the sun with the shade of the standards [carried] on their elephant-hoofs, they kept the palace-roofs enveloped by darkness though it was day-time.

367. Refraining from battle they allowed him to leave his land. The king thereupon, whom fortune had deserted, departed with this object from the city,

363. K.'s simile evidently alludes to the pulleys or other mechanical contrivances required for the moving of large blocks of stone, such as were used till his time in the construction of temples and other public buildings in Kāśmīr. The glossator A., who probably knew only the brick or wooden architecture of the Muhammadan period, seems to take the simile as referring to a catapult or similar weapon. The expression kāru does not speak for this interpretation. The Ks. term yandṛavat, used in explanation of yantra, is now unknown.

YUDHIṢṬHIRA I.

while the citizens, who were agitated by seeing the royal ladies setting out covered with the dust which the well-bred horses [raised], covered the high road with their tears, which took the place of parched grain.

368. As the fallen king was pursuing his way his enemies carried off repeatedly young women of his household, his treasure and other [possessions],—just as the tree which falls from the top of the high mountain, is stripped quickly by the boulders of its creepers, fruits and the rest.

369. Marching on the lovely mountain paths, and seeking, when tired, the shade of the trees, he forgot by dint of his [daily] halting and marching his truly great misfortune. But when roused by the shouts of the low [hill-]folk, which reached his ear from afar, he appeared to sink back, as it were, into depths along with the waters of the mountain-torrents.

370. When his wives, whose figures were as delicate as the beautiful young shoots of the lotus-stalks, had passed through the forest-regions, strongly scented with the fragrance of the various shrubs and herbs, and through the slippery [beds of the] mountain-streams with their rocks beaten by the tossing water, they bent their bodies over their laps and swooned from fatigue.

371. When the king's wives, after casting a long glance at the distant land from the height of the mountain-boundary, threw all-at-once handfuls of flowers

369. pāt-kr is used here, as also viii. 2317, 2562, 2939, in the sense of the Panjābī and Pahari pukārnā, 'to shout to a distance,' 'to call to a far-off person.'

I have translated according to A, L punaḥ svadhve; A, manaḥsvadhve.

Colophon. After the above Colophon A and L contain a verse which, according to the text adopted in the Ed. says: "One thousand and fourteen years, nine months and nine days passed under the twenty-one kings [mentioned] in this [Taraṅga]." A, puts the number of years at 1024, while the reading of A, and L mentions thirty-eight kings. The latter figure is obtained by adding to the twenty kings whose length of reign is stated and Yudhiṣṭhira I., the seventeen kings mentioned by name before Gonanda III.

It is clear that with this reading there can be no connection between the sum of years given and the number of kings, as the total of the actually stated reigns from Gonanda III. to Narendraditya I. already amounts to 987 years, 8 months, 29 days (or 988 years, 2 months, 23 days, according to the v.l. of A, in i. 345). This would leave for the other eighteen reigns only a maximum margin of circ. 66 years.

It is evident that whoever added this verse, wished to state in it the total length of the reigns from Gonanda III. to Yudhiṣṭhira I. But this total does not agree in either of the two readings with the avowed basis of K's chronology. According to i. 48 the kings from Gonanda III. to Yudhiṣṭhira I. ruled for a total period of 2268 years. Deducting from this number the 1266 years given by K. to the fifty-two 'lost' kings (i. 54), there remain 1002 years for the aggregate of the reigns in this Taraṅga from Gonanda III. onwards. Against this figure we have, in the verse here discussed, 1014 or 1024 years plus 9 months and 9 days, i.e. an excess of 12 or 22 odd years.

I am no more able to explain this difference than TROYER, who has discussed the point quite correctly, i. p. 396. It is probable that this verse, as well as the similar summaries found after Taraṅgas ii. and v.-vii., are late additions.

Deducting from the sum of 1002 years the total length of the reigns from Gonanda III. to Narendraditya, as given above, there remain for Yudhiṣṭhira I.'s reign 34 years, 3 months, 1 day, or 33 years, 9 months, 7 days, according as we accept the text of A, or that of A, in i. 345.

as a farewell offering, even the swarms of birds nesting in the mountain-ravines cried plaintively in their excitement, and buried their beaks in their plumage spread out on the ground.

YUDDIṢṬHIRA I.

372. With their slipped-off head-dress resting on their bosom, and their hands raised to their heads, the royal ladies looked back on their far-off home, turning their shoulders in unsteady movement. As they wept, there flowed on the path a torrent [produced] by their tears.

373. Well-meaning princes in whose country the king took refuge, alleviated out of kindly feeling his sorrow for the loss of his kingdom by firm friendship, by consolations put into proper words, and by various attentions which carried weight as [showing] an unreserved accommodation to his desires.

Thus ends the First Taraṅga of the Rājatarāṅgiṇī, composed by Kaḥaṇa, the son of the illustrious minister of Kaśmir, Lord Carpaka.

SECOND BOOK.

1. Glory be to that formation of the body of the lord (S'iva) which consisting of a female and a male half is fit for him who imbued with fondness for diverse combinations holds by his side the bow, constructed from the horns of a goat and a bull, as well as Gaṇa (Gaṇeśa) whose body unites the halves of a man and an elephant.

2. Old age and the advice which reached his ear from men who had freed themselves from passions, induced King [Yudhiṣṭhira I.] to abandon the attempt for the recovery of his kingdom.

3. This distinguished prince who excelled in modesty, forgot along with his country (viṣaya) also the objects of the five senses (viṣaya).

4. Some, however, have reported that as he moved about restlessly with the aim of [recovering] his realm, he was after some time put in captivity by his own ministers at Durgālikā.

PRATĀPĀDITYA I.

5. Then they brought Pratāpāditya [I.], a relative of King Vikramāditya, from abroad and inaugurated him as king in this [country].

6. Others under the mistaken notion that this [Vikramāditya] was Vikramāditya, the enemy of the S'akas (S'akāri), have wrongly written in this [connection] a conflicting [account] which has been left aside as worthless.

7. From that period onwards this country which had suffered from its internal dissensions, was for some time subject to Harṣa and other [foreign] kings.

1. S'iva is praised in his form of Ardhanārīśvara, see note i. 2; his bow Ajaṅga and his attendant Gaṇeśa are alluded to.

4. Durgālikā is identified by the gloss of A₂ with Drug'jan, a suburb of Srinagar, situated between the W. foot of the Takht hill and the 'Gate' of the Dal lake. The tradition of a king having been imprisoned at Drug'jan still lives in some portions of the Srinagar population.

6. This verse has been fully discussed by Dr. HOLTZMAN, Ind. Ant., xix. p. 281. K. means by Vikramāditya S'akāri the king from whose supposed victory over the S'akas an old but erroneous theory derived the establishment of the S'aka era; comp. M. MÜLLER, India, etc., p. 291 sqq. Between the commencement of the S'aka era (78 A.D.) and the date (180 B.C.) which on the basis of K.'s chronology we should have to assign to Pratāpāditya I.'s accession, there is a difference of 258 years. This may have been the reason which induced K. to repudiate the above identification of Pratāpāditya's relative with Vikramāditya S'akāri.

7. It is not clear which King Harṣa is referred to here. He can scarcely be meant for the great Harṣa of Ujjayini, also called

8. This king cherished the land as if it had belonged to his forefathers, though it had not,—just as a considerate husband [cherishes] his newly-married wife [as if she had long belonged to the family].

PRATĀPĀDITYA I.

9. When after a reign of thirty-two years he had ascended to heaven, his son Jalaukas became the ornament of the earth.

JALAUKAS.

10. He shone forth for the same length of time as his father for the country's benefit, just as the full moon at the equinox [shines as long] as the sun.

11. Then his son Tuñjina ruled the earth and delighted the people, along with the queen Vākpuṣṭā, who was possessed of divine gifts.

TUÑJINA I.

12. This couple adorned the earth just as the Gaṅgā and the crescent [adorn] the hair-knot of S'iva.

13. These two maintained the land which was made fair by its various castes (varṇa), as the lightning and the cloud [maintain] the rainbow which is made fair by its various colours (varṇa).

14. These two most happy [rulers] built the temple of S'iva [called] Tuṅgeśvara, a graceful embellishment of the earth, as well as the town called Katikā.

15. At a certain place in Maḍavarājya, which is warmed by a fierce sun, trees just planted were by their supernatural power made to bear fruit.

Vikramāditya, whose relations with Kaśmīr K. mentions (iii. 126) in the time of Maṭyagupta, i.e. 268 years later according to his own reckoning, and whose real date fell in the first half of the 6th century A.D. If Harṣa of Kanauj, tho Harṣavardhana of Hsien-tsiang and the inscriptions (circ. 606-650 A.D.), is intended, the chronological aberration is quite as great as that already noted in the case of Mihirakula.

14. The position of the Tuṅgeśvara temple is not certain. If the Tuṅgeśvarāṇa ('the mark of Tuṅgeśvara') mentioned vi. 190 received its name from this shrine, the latter must have stood somewhere in S'rinagar or its immediate vicinity. A Tuṅgeśvatirtha is mentioned in the Nilamata, 1856, apparently in connection with the Tirtha of Viṣṇu-Varāha at Varāhamūla.

Katikā (or Katika) is identified by the gloss of A₂ with the village of Kai situated not far from the right bank of the Vitastā in the Vular Pargana, 75° 7' long. 33° 52' lat. Kai immediately adjoins the village of Chachpūr shown on the map.

15. Kaśmīr from ancient times to the present day has been popularly divided into two great parts, whose modern names Kamrāz and Marāz are derived from the terms Kramarājya and Maḍavarājya used by K. and his successors. According to the generally prevailing notion Kamrāz comprises the Parganas on both sides of the Vitastā below S'rinagar, and Marāz those above.

This boundary of the two divisions can be traced clearly in Abū-l-Fazl's list of Parganas (see Ain-i Akh., ii. pp. 368 sqq.), and an examination of all passages in the Rājāt. shows that it existed already in K.'s time. Gen. CUNNINGHAM, Anc. Geogr., p. 91, has correctly indicated the general meaning of the modern terms, but was wrongly informed when placing the boundary at the junction of the Vitastā and Sindhu rivers. The term Kamrāz is occasionally used also in a more restricted sense for the designation of seven Parganas in the extreme N.W. of the Valley (Khuythōm, Zainagir, Lōlau, Uttar, Machpūr, Hamal, Kruhin). This explains the varying accounts referred to by Prof. BÜHLER, Report, p. 11.

The identity of Maḍavarājya with Marāz is known to some of the S'rinagar Pandits. It has also been correctly pointed out by Dr. HOLTZSCH, Ind. Ant., xix. p. 264.

TUṢṢĪNA I.

16. At that time there lived the great Kavi Candaka who was a descendant (or incarnation) of the Muni Dvaipāyana (Vyāsa), and who composed a play worthy of the attention of all people.

Great famine.

17. As if intended to test the greatness of the spiritual power of these two, by the will of the gods there once arose a calamity most trying for the people.

18. In the month of Bhādrapada, when the fields in the land were covered with the autumnal rice-crop which was just ripening, unexpectedly there fell heavy snow.

19. Under this [snow] which resembled [in its whiteness] the grim laughter of Death bent on the destruction of all beings, there sank [and perished] the rice-crops, together with the people's hope of existence.

20. Then came a terrible famine, which resembled a kind of hell, with the masses of starving people [moving about] like ghosts.

21. Tormented by hunger, every one thought only of his belly, and forgot in his misery love for his wife, affection for his children, and tender regard for his parents.

22. Inspired by selfish craving for food and struck by misfortune's [sinister] glance, in the pain of hunger people forgot shame, pride, and good birth.

23. The father deserted his emaciated and dying son notwithstanding his entreaties, or the son his father, to provide for his own maintenance.

24. Men preserved their selfishness in their loathsome bodies which were mere sinews and bones, and fought like ghosts for their food.

25. Uttering coarse words, emaciated by hunger, terrible to look at, and rolling his eyes in all directions, each person strove apart to keep himself alive at the cost of [all other] living beings.

26. In that great and terrible affliction which was almost unsupportable for men, no one but that ruler showed compassionate devotion.

27. He put aside his guards and, merely by his glance, which was auspicious like that of jewels and healing herbs, removed the despondency which this misfortune produced in the weak.

28. He bought food with his own treasure and with the accumulated wealth of the ministers, and together with his wife put by day and night fresh life into the people.

29. Not a single starving person was overlooked by the prince, whether in the forests, cemeteries, highways or houses.

16. For references to, and quotations from, a poet Candaka or Candraka, see Cat. Catalog., p. 179.

18. The usual time for the rice-harvest in Kāśmīr is the bright half of Kārtika.

20. Read with A, prākāro for A, prākāro. The spirits of the dead are supposed to suffer from hunger and thirst.

22. Read lokolakṣmīkaṭākṣitaḥ, as indicated by A.

30. Then when he had exhausted his riches and saw the earth bare of food, he thus spoke once at night to the queen in his sorrow :

31. "Surely, such a calamity which admits of no remedy, must have come over the innocent people through some fault of ours."

32. "Shame on my helplessness ! that before my eyes those people, tormented by pain and finding no refuge on the earth, should perish, when they ought to be rescued."

33. "Why should I live if in this calamity I cannot save these subjects who have no refuge and who mutually abandon their relations ?"

34. "By exertions I have somehow helped everyone over these days, and not a single person has [yet] perished."

35. "This land, whose resources have been exceeded, has under the affliction of evil times now become exhausted and of no account."

36. "What means then could now preserve this people, on all sides sinking in the cruel sea of distress ?"

37. "In darkness is now this world with the sun shrouded by heavy clouds, and enveloped, as it were, on all sides by the dense night of final destruction."

38. "While the routes over the mountains are closed by impassable snow-drifts, the people are helpless like birds when the opening of their nest is closed."

39. "Look, men of valour, sense and wisdom have lost their capacity through the misery of these times."

40. "What regions on the surface of the earth are not covered with plentiful buds of golden flowers ? What country is not adorned with persons worthy to be served spreading around themselves the nectar of benevolence ? What men of note who have distinguished themselves by long service, do not find the roads [open for their advancement] ? Those only among them whom fate has deceived, are hidden away in this land with their good qualities."

41. "Therefore, since help has vanished, I offer up my body in the flames. I am not able to look on such a destruction of my subjects."

42. "Blessed are those rulers who sleep at night in happiness, having before seen their citizens in comfort everywhere as [if they were their own] children."

43. After these words the king, overpowered by compassion, covered up his head with his dress, and sinking down on his bed wept in silence.

44. Then the queen spoke thus to the lord of the earth, while the lights, sheltered from the wind and motionless, raised themselves and seemed to gaze at her with eager attention :

45. "O king, what perversity of thought is this, [produced] by the subjects'

TUNJINA I.

evil acts, that you like a common person should voluntarily attempt what does not become the brave?"

46. "O protector of the earth, if the great had not the power to remove difficulties [which appear] insurmountable, what would be the mark of their greatness?"

47. "How could Indra or Brahman or the weak Yama oppose the commands of kings who truthfully keep to their duty?"

48. "Devotion to their husbands is the duty of wives; faithfulness is the duty of ministers; the duty of kings is to have no other aim but the protection of their subjects."

49. "Raise yourself, O foremost of the dutiful! Does my word ever fail? O protector of the people, verily thy people are no longer in danger from hunger."

50. When she had thus ardently spoken with her thoughts turned to the gods, there fell on each house a flight of dead pigeons.

51. When the king beheld this [wonder] in the morning, he abandoned his desire to seek death, and the people lived on the pigeons which daily reached them.

52. Surely these were not [real] pigeons, but some other substance which that saintly lady produced in order to keep the people alive.

53. Those who like her are sincerely imbued with compassion for all living creatures, could not, indeed, have their pious conduct stained in any way by the destruction [of life].

54. Gradually the sky became as bright as the deeds of the queen, and the famine passed away together with the king's grief.

55. That pious and sinless [queen] established for Brahmans the Agrahāra of Katīmuṣa, eminent by its wealth and prosperity, and that of Rāmuṣa.

56. When her husband died after [a rule of] thirty-six years, she freed herself from the fever caused by the separation in the flames of the pyre which [to her] were like a bed-cover formed of lotus[-fibres].

52. Pigeons are forbidden food, see e.g. Padmapurāṇa, i. lvi. 33. Hence the explanation given by K.

55. The glosses of A., Kaimoh and Rāmoh, show that Katīmuṣa and Rāmuṣa are identical with the modern Kaimuh and Rāmuh. Skr. $\frac{1}{2}$ between vowels appears in Kā. always as h. The first named place is a considerable village in the Ād^ovin Pargana, on the left bank of the Visokā (Vesau) River, 76° 9' long, 33° 43' lat. In Sept., 1895, I could trace a few ancient slabs near the largest of the village Zicrata.

Rāmuh is a place of some importance, situated midway on the high road from S'rinagar to S'upiyan, 74° 54' long, 33° 42' lat. The lands around it have formed for some time back the Jāgir of the Dars, a well-known Brahman family of S'rinagar. Near a Naga which is close to the village, I found in Oct., 1891, several old sculptures. For another mention of the place see viii. 2818.

56. "The fibres of the stalks of the water-lily are used as a cooling application; see vv. 57, 66 and 74 of Kalidasa's Abhijñānaśakuntala (Ed. Böhtlingk). K. boldly compares with them the flames of the pyro on which the queen became a Sati." Dr. HUTTON, Ind. Ant., xix. p. 265.

57. The place where this lady of saintly life followed her husband into death, is to this day known to the people by the name of Vākpuṣṭāṭavi.

TUNJINA I.

58. At the hospice (sattra) which this charitable [queen] established there, multitudes of indigent people coming from all parts receive food even at the present day.

59. The fastidious Creator did not grant them a child, no doubt, because he thought: "Who could do more than these two?"

60. The Creator shows himself the foremost of discerning judges, when he exerts himself in making the sugar-cane itself the fruit (or, when he does not take the trouble of producing a fruit of the sugar-cane). After making it capable of surpassing in taste even the strongest nectar, what use would there be in his doing anything beyond this?

61. Some say that this queen gave herself up to the flames, because she thought that a fault of her own had caused the land to be deprived of the sun in a long succession of dark days.

62. Then Vijaya, descended from another family, was king for eight years. It was he who surrounded the [shrine of] Vijayēśvara with the town [of that name].

VIJAYA.

63. Then the son of that king who had been like an Indra on earth, the long-armed and far-famed Jayendra, ruled the earth.

JAYENDRA.

64. His arm, [strong] as a pillar, bore the image of the goddess of victory made resplendent by fluttering garments which were [formed by] the waves of his steadfast fame.

65. This king had a minister called Samudhimiti, the greatest of sages, who was distinguished by his wonderful life and devotion to S'iva.

Samudhimiti's story.

66-67. There is no device in the world which could stop the ears of kings and of rutting elephants from moving unsteadily. Thus [it came about that]

57. The position of Vākpuṣṭāṭavi, 'the forest of Vākpuṣṭā', is uncertain. It is mentioned again, Jonar. 343, as the place near which Prince 'Allā-ud-din (Allesvara) had an adventure with a witch. As the latter is said to dwell in a 'girigahvara,' Vākpuṣṭāṭavi must be supposed to be somewhere near the mountains. P. Govind Karṇ has thought that the name could be recognized in that of the modern village Putti, situated in the Khur-Nārvaṇ Pargana, 74° 52' long. 33° 38' lat., at the foot of a spur reaching down from the Gulabgarh Pass. I visited the place in Sept., 1891, without being able to trace there the above traditions. The phonetic relation of the two names is also doubtful.

58. Comp. regarding such charitable endowments note i. 347.

60. The above double rendering of the second Pāda rests on the possibility of reading either phalaprajananena or phalaprajanane na. I believe that K. intended it to be taken both ways. If he had only wished to express the sense of the second version, he would have found it easy to replace na kṛtāśramo by a more idiomatic expression. The allusion is in either case to the fact "that the sugar-cane does not bear seeds and can be propagated only by slips" (HULTZSCH, l.c.).

udetya, rightly explained by A, gloss utpādayitvā, is a gerund with causative sense; comp. nipatyā, ii. 159 (v.l. nipātya); iv. 361, also pratipadya, iv. 485, and utthāya, vi. 63.

63. Comp. regarding Vijayēśvara notes i. 83, 105.

JAYENDRA.

97. After speaking thus he stayed at that very place in his anxiety to see the fulfilment of the prediction, and watched the skeleton.

98. Then once in the middle of the night, while he was kept awake by the thought of this mystery, Īśāna smelt a heavenly perfume of incense.

99-100. On hearing a terrific noise [produced] by the ringing of many bells struck with big clappers and by the violent beating of drums, he opened the window and saw on the burial ground witches enveloped by a halo of light.

101. Noting their concourse and that the skeleton had been abstracted, Īśāna went forth to the burial ground trembling, with his sword drawn.

102. Hidden behind a tree he then saw that the skeleton had been placed by the troops of witches in the midst of their circle, and was being fitted up with all its limbs.

103. Intoxicated by drink, they had felt the desire for sportive enjoyment of a lover, and not finding a [living] man, had carried off that skeleton.

104. Each one of them put [upon the skeleton] one of their own limbs, and then procuring from somewhere a membrum virile, they quickly completed his body.

105. Next the witches attracted by magic the spirit of Samdhitati, which was still roaming about without having entered another body, and put it into that [body].

106. Resembling a person just risen from sleep, he was covered by them with heavenly ointments, and then they enjoyed themselves with him, as the master of their band, to their full desire.

107. Īśāna feared with terror when the night was growing short, that those goddesses would take back again the limbs which they had lent him.

108. In order to guard these [limbs], he resolutely approached that place with a shout, and at once the band of witches disappeared.

109. Then their voice was heard: "May you not be in fear, O Īśāna. We miss no limb, and do not defraud him whom we have chosen as our lover."

110. "He who, when chosen by us, was joined (samdhitu) with a heavenly body, will be known on earth [by the name of] Samdhitat and on account of his noble character as Āryarāja."

111. Then Samdhitat, who wore a magnificent dress and a wreath, and was

99-100. The term lāṇanādaṇḍa, which I take to mean a 'bell-clapper,' is not known to the dictionaries, but is used also Jonar. 845; for the rare laṇḍ see vii. 927. The gloss of A. is, perhaps, intended to convey the same sense, but the word āṇṭu is not known in modern Kś. The Kś. trāu, 'window,' given by A. gloss in explanation of tamori, is now quite obsolete.

108. I follow in the translation the reading madyamadena tāh, quoted by A. as 'from another manuscript,' instead of the madya-padevatāh of the text. L. madyamadenu tāh, with the common mistake of ३ for ३, confirms the v.l. of A.

106. The caḥraṇyāyaka of the witches is evidently the counterpart of the 'Hexenmeister' of German folklore; comp. yoginīnāyaka, Jonar. 848.

adorned with heavenly ornaments, recovered the memory of his past and reverently greeted his Guru.

JAYENDRA.

112. Who could describe the feelings of Īśāna when he embraced him whom he could not even have dreamt of recovering?

113. While these two there reflected together over this mundane existence, vain and yet wondrous, their discourse flowed on brightly, with clear judgment.

114. As soon as the citizens had somehow learned this story, they betook themselves to the spot, accompanied by young and old and joined by the ministers.

115. The doubt which arose as to his identity owing to his appearance being different from the former one, was removed when in conversation he addressed questions to all.

116. At the bidding of his Guru he being free from desires, with reluctance consented to the prayer of the citizens to rule the country which had no king.

SAMPRITAT (ĀRYABĀJA).

117. Brahmans conducted him resplendent in his divine appearance close to a grove, and to the sound of music made him take the bath of the inauguration ceremony (abhīṣeka).

118. He did not require to be instructed as to the conduct fit for a new king, but reformed all procedure from his knowledge of public business.

119. In right royal attire and accompanied by his army he entered the city which was rendered auspicious by the blessings uttered by the citizens, while there poured a rain of parched grains from its mansions [as a greeting].

120. While he who was free from passions, occupied the great throne, no calamity came over his subjects either from the gods or from men.

121. The heart of this [king] who had pacified [the senses], was captivated by the forest-regions with their beautiful mountain slopes and their heights round which the birds never cease flying,—but not by women.

122. Himself scented with camphor and incense, he was delighted when touched by the arms of hermits which bore a holy fragrance from the touch of the forest flowers.

123. When not visiting the [shrines of] Bhūteśa, Vardhamāneśu and Vijayeśa, he devoted himself day by day entirely to his royal duties.

121. The words śṛṅgārahitavibhramāḥ and nitambīnyo can also be taken as epithets of women 'possessed of coquetry which favours love' and 'kallipygian'; comp. the gloss of A₃ on the first word.

122. Camphor is used for purposes of worship. For the incense (dhūpa) used in Kāśmīr, the dried root of a mountain herb called dupa (Jurinea macrocephala) supplies the chief ingredient.

123. For the sacred sites of Bhūteśa and Vijayeśa, see notes i. 107 and i. 38.—The shrine of Ś'iva Vardhamāneśa is supposed by the local tradition to have stood on the right

JAYENDRA.

97. After speaking thus he stayed at that very place in his anxiety to see the fulfilment of the prediction, and watched the skeleton.

98. Then once in the middle of the night, while he was kept awake by the thought of this mystery, Isāna smelt a heavenly perfume of incense.

99-100. On hearing a terrific noise [produced] by the ringing of many bells struck with big clappers and by the violent beating of drums, he opened the window and saw on the burial ground witches enveloped by a halo of light.

101. Noting their concourse and that the skeleton had been abstracted, Isāna went forth to the burial ground trembling, with his sword drawn.

102. Hidden behind a tree he then saw that the skeleton had been placed by the troops of witches in the midst of their circle, and was being fitted up with all its limbs.

103. Intoxicated by drink, they had felt the desire for sportive enjoyment of a lover, and not finding a [living] man, had carried off that skeleton.

104. Each one of them put [upon the skeleton] one of their own limbs, and then procuring from somewhere a membrum virile, they quickly completed his body.

105. Next the witches attracted by magic the spirit of Saṁdhimati, which was still roaming about without having entered another body, and put it into that [body].

106. Resembling a person just risen from sleep, he was covered by them with heavenly ointments, and then they enjoyed themselves with him, as the master of their band, to their full desire.

107. Isāna feared with terror when the night was growing short, that those goddesses would take back again the limbs which they had lent him.

108. In order to guard these [limbs], he resolutely approached that place with a shout, and at once the band of witches disappeared.

109. Then their voice was heard: "May you not be in fear, O Isāna. We miss no limb, and do not defraud him whom we have chosen as our lover."

110. "He who, when chosen by us, was joined (saṁdhita) with a heavenly body, will be known on earth [by the name of] Saṁdhimat and on account of his noble character as Āryarāja."

111. Then Saṁdhimat, who wore a magnificent dress and a wreath, and was

99-100. The term lāṇanādaṇḍa, which I take to mean a 'bell-clapper,' is not known to the dictionaries, but is used also Jonar. 345; for the rare √laṇ see vii. 927. The gloss of A₂ is, perhaps, intended to convey the same sense, but the word āṇṭu is not known in modern Kā. The Kā. trāṇ, 'window,' given by A₂ gloss in explanation of tamori, is now quite obsolete.

103. I follow in the translation the reading madhyamadena tāḥ, quoted by A₂ as 'from another manuscript,' instead of the madhyapadevatāḥ of the text. L. madhyamadena tāḥ, with the common mistake of ३ for २, confirms the v.l. of A₂.

106. The caṅkanāyaka of the witches is evidently the counterpart of the 'Hexenmeister' of German folklore; comp. yajināyaka, Jonar. 348.

adorned with heavenly ornaments, recovered the memory of his past and reverently greeted his Guru.

JAYENDRA.

112. Who could describe the feelings of Isāna when he embraced him whom he could not even have dreamt of recovering?

113. While these two there reflected together over this mundane existence, vain and yet wondrous, their discourse flowed on brightly, with clear judgment.

114. As soon as the citizens had somehow learned this story, they betook themselves to the spot, accompanied by young and old and joined by the ministers.

115. The doubt which arose as to his identity owing to his appearance being different from the former one, was removed when in conversation he addressed questions to all.

116. At the bidding of his Guru he being free from desires, with reluctance consented to the prayer of the citizens to rule the country which had no king.

SAKSHINAT
(ĀRYABHĀṢA).

117. Brahmans conducted him resplendent in his divine appearance close to a grove, and to the sound of music made him take the bath of the inauguration ceremony (abhiṣeka).

118. He did not require to be instructed as to the conduct fit for a new king, but reformed all procedure from his knowledge of public business.

119. In right royal attire and accompanied by his army he entered the city which was rendered auspicious by the blessings uttered by the citizens, while there poured a rain of parched grains from its mansions [as a greeting].

120. While he who was free from passions, occupied the great throne, no calamity came over his subjects either from the gods or from men.

121. The heart of this [king] who had pacified [the senses], was captivated by the forest-regions with their beautiful mountain slopes and their heights round which the birds never cease flying,—but not by women.

122. Himself scented with camphor and incense, he was delighted when touched by the arms of hermits which bore a holy fragrance from the touch of the forest flowers.

123. When not visiting the [shrines of] Bhūteśa, Vardhamāneśa and Vijayeśa, he devoted himself day by day entirely to his royal duties.

121. The words śṛṅgārahitavibhramāḥ and nitambinyo can also be taken as epithets of women 'possessed of coquetry which favours love' and 'kallipygian'; comp. the gloss of A₃ on the first word.

122. Camphor is used for purposes of worship. For the incense (dhūpa) used in Kāśmir, the dried root of a mountain herb called *dup (Jurinea macrocephala) supplies the chief ingredient.

123. For the sacred sites of Bhūteśa and Vijayeśa, see notes i. 107 and i. 38.—The shrine of Śiva Vardhamāneśa is supposed by the local tradition to have stood on the right

SĀMUDRIMAT (ĀRYAĀJĀ).

135. By [erecting] at every spot palaces fitted with Maṭhas, statues of gods and Liṅgas, he gave splendour to Thedā, Bhīmādevī and other localities.

136. This wise and devout [king] alone know how to enjoy the land of Kaśmīr, which is rendered holy by self-created [objects of worship] and Tīrthas.

137. The king bathing in the water of the mountain torrents passed the spring month in the forest-regions, over the festive worship of Liṅgas which were formed of flowers.

138. And the most delightful Kaśmīr summer which is not to be found [elsewhere] in the whole world, was used to good purpose over the worship of Liṅgas formed of snow in the regions above the forests.

139. Reaching the banks of the ponds covered on all sides by multitudes of blooming lotuses, this favourite of Fortune gave himself up wholly to the contemplation of S'iva.

140. The autumn he enjoyed in worship of S'iva, while plunging into the lotus-ponds which the rise of Agastya had rendered free from infection.

141. The nights of Māgha did not pass fruitlessly for this king, who [then] in company with various ascetics celebrated religious festivals connected with wakes.

The site of Iś'bar was at an earlier period sacred to Sureśvari; comp. note v. 37.

✓ 135. Thedā and Bhīmādevī are identical with the modern villages of Thid and Brān, both situated on the E. shore of the Dal. Thid lies in the midst of vineyards and orchards about a mile to the N. of Jyēṭher (see note i. 124). ABU-L-FAZL, l.c., says: "In the village of Thid is a delightful spot where seven springs unite; around them are stone buildings, memorials of bygone times." Of these buildings I could not find any certain traces, but the seven springs are still pointed out, and are also referred to in Sahibram's Tīrthas. as 'the Saptapuṣkarinītīrtha at the village of Theda (sic).' In the Haracar., iv. 40 sqq., a legend is told connecting these seven springs with the austerities performed by Parvatī at the neighbouring Tīrtha of Bhīmādevī.

Proceeding about one and a half miles further N. along the lake shore we reach in a strath covered with fruit trees a cluster of small villages (Krūr, Dāmpōr, Manz'gām, Pohl) which bear jointly the name of Brān (Vigne's 'Bryn,' Travels, ii. p. 110; map 'Brain'). The identification of Brān with Bhīmādevī is supported by the Nīlamata, 1032, which mentions this Tīrtha in conjunction with that of Sureśvari. The latter Tīrtha lies at a distance of about two miles to the N. on the ridge of the hill-range above Brān; see note v. 37.

The austerities performed at Bhīmādevī by Parvatī are referred to in Haracar. iv. 47 sq. The Tīrtha of Bhīmādevī is no longer known, but it may be located with some probability at the fine spring issuing from the hillside near the hamlet of Dāmpōr, at a spot now marked by a Muhammadan shrine.

✓ 136. A distinction is indicated between 'svayambhūis' and Tīrthas. The former term is used for natural objects of worship such as liṅga-shaped rocks, springs showing special phenomena, etc., the latter for shrines created by man or sites which have been rendered holy by previous acts of spiritual merit performed there; comp. regarding Svayambhū-liṅgas, viii. 2430.

✓ 138. By vanānta, literally 'the limit of the forest,' must be meant the alpine valleys and plateaus lying above the highest limit of forest vegetation (in Kaśmīr circ. 10,000' above the sea-level), where the snow remains in gullies and sheltered places till late into the summer.—Regarding the worship of a liṅga-shaped ice-block in the cave of Amarnāth see note i. 287.

✓ 139. The lotus-flowers are in full bloom on the lakes of the Valley in the months of Āṣāḍha and S'rāvana.

✓ 140. The rising of Agastya, the star of Canopus, in the month of Bhādrapada, is supposed to mark the end of the rainy season which renders the streams impure and turbid.

142. Making thus pious use of the royal power he had gained in a most extraordinary manner, he passed fifty years less three.

143. As wholly addicted to quietism he did not look after the affairs of the kingdom, his subjects became then disaffected.

144. When they looked about for [another] king they heard that there lived of Yudhiṣṭhira's family an ambitious and eminent prince.

145. The king of Gandhāra guarded indeed at that time a great-grandson of Yudhiṣṭhira, called Gopāditya, with a view to vanquishing the king of Kāśmīr.

146. While residing there without obtaining the sovereignty this [prince] begot in due course a son, Meghavāhana by name, who bore marks of a divine character.

147. By the advice of his father that [youth] went to the land of the king of Prāgyotiṣa who was descended from the race of Viṣṇu, for the Svayamvara of [that king's] daughter.

148. There in the presence of kings he received from the princess Amṛtaprabhā the bridegroom's garland while the parasol of Varuṇa cast its shade upon him.

149. By this sign the people knew his future greatness as by the west wind the gathering of the clouds.

150. Because this parasol, which King Naraka had carried away from Varuṇa, cast its shade on no one but a sovereign of the whole globe (cakravartin).

151. When he returned to his father accompanied by his wife and by fortune, the ministers [of Kāśmīr] offered to him the land which was fit for his race.

152. Āryarāja knowing that his throne was undermined by dissension, made no resistance though capable of it, but showed himself anxious to abandon [the throne].

153. And he thought: "In truth, the creator of the beings is pleased with me as he is preparing to remove those long-borne hindrances of salvation."

154. "Thanks to heaven that when much has yet to be accomplished, I have not been beguiled by sleep, like the wanderer in the rainy season who from fatigue sinks into idle rest."

155. "Thanks to heaven that abandoning fortune at the right time, like a woman who has become indifferent, I escape the shame of a forcible expulsion."

156. "Thanks to heaven that though I have long acted like a dancer on this regal stage, the onlookers have not even at the end lost their interest."

157. "Thanks to heaven that after proclaiming aloud at all times my

147. The half-mythical town of Prāgyotiṣa figures in the Purāṇas as the capital of Kāmarūpa or Assam; for the legends as to its founder Naraka, a son of Viṣṇu, comp. Viṣṇu-pur., v. pp. 88 sqq.; JASSEN, Ind. Alt., i. pp. 655 sq.
156. For A, nirvyūḍhamapi read with A, L nirvyūḍhāvapi.

SAMDHITAT
(ĀRYABHĀṢA).

contempt of fortune, I do not feel fear at the time of renunciation like a braggart in the battle."

158. Filled with such thoughts and ready to renounce every thing, the king rejoiced in his heart like the beggar who builds himself kingdoms in his thoughts,

159. The next day, after collecting all his subjects in an assembly, he delivered to them the government like a well-guarded trust.

160. And after he had once abandoned it of his own account, nobody was able even by entreaties to induce him to resume it, [as little] as a snake [can be got to resume] its [cast-off] skin.

161. Then taking with him the Liṅga which he used at his worship, the king, dressed in spotless clothos and bareheaded, set out on foot towards the north,

162. Weeping noiselessly, the citizens followed the path of their lord, who proceeded with his eyes turned downwards and observing a strict silence.

163. After he had passed on for one gavyūbi he sat down under a tree and bade with gentle words each one of those [who had followed him] with tears in their eyes, to return.

164. Whenever he stopped on the path at the foot of a mountain he was seen to dismiss people and to ascend subsequently with a reduced following,—just as a river when, after filling the deep-lying places, it rises and passes over its proper bed, is followed [there only] by small quantities of water.

165. Stopping his foot in the midst of the forest, he dismissed from his side with kindly greetings the numberless people who, overcome by grief, shed tears and uttered faltering words. Then he penetrated into the forest, the cave-dwellings of which were illuminated by the light issuing from the jewels in the diadems of those many saintly wanderers who had been sent to sleep [there] by the rustling of the breeze catching in their birchbark-clothes.

166. Then when the day was spent, he made himself a resting-place under a tree on the bank of a forest pool, where he had water poured into the hollow of vessels formed of leaves, and a high couch made up from twigs of holy trees.

167. The near mountains within view—on whose peaks there rested bright light, whose shaded slopes were coloured by verdant grass, and under whose jasmine trees, flowering with white blossoms, the cowherdesses slept together,— pratyarpayat for which Durgapr. proposes pratyārpayat*, may be taken as an augmentless form like prodghosayāhe i. 285.

159. For sahnipatyā read with L. sahnipātyā.

164. The mass of the water flows downwards even when the river in flood oversteps its banks.

165. The gloss of A, bhomaḥoro, connects the above allusion to cave-dwellings with the small cave-temple at the locality now called Bumzu; comp. note vi. 178. There is nothing in the text to justify this interpretation.

166. The putakaghaṭodara corresponds to the putakais caṭasikṛtaik of i. 213.

167. The conjectural reading of Ed., *vanapālavenu*², is actually found in L. brought sleep to the tired [wanderer] by their noises, which proceeded both from the water of the torrents and the music of the flutes [played] by the herdsmen of the forests.

SĀMĀHINAT (ĀRYAŚĀSA).

168. Eager to move on, he knew that the night had vanished [when he heard] on all sides the cries of the crane and the roars of the wild elephants, which resembled the noise of drums.

169. Next day, after having performed his morning devotion according to the proper rite, and having thrown off sleep [by a bath] in the neighbouring lotus-pond, the lord of the land reached the Tirtha of Bhūteśvara (Bhūteśvara) with its familiar Sodara spring, situated near Nandīśa.

170. While he stood there at Nandīśetra before the lord of the three worlds (S'iva), he attained the condition which he had proposed to himself to reach. Smiling, as it were, in his ashes, having his hair bound in a well-arranged knot, carrying a rosary, and adorned with [strings of] Eloocarpus berries (rudrākṣa), he was viewed with complacency by the aged Munis.

171. When he went about to beg [his food], he was welcomed with much respect as a follower of the observances ordained by S'iva, and the wives of the ascetics vied eagerly in every hermitage to give him alms. As [however] the trees filled his begging-bowl in abundance with pure fruits and blossoms, he who deserved to be honoured, was not, even when practising the law of mendicancy, put to the humiliation of begging from others.

Thus ends the Second Tārāṅga of the Rājatarāṅgiṇī, composed by Kaṭhaṇa, the son of the illustrious minister of Kāśmīr, Lord Caṇṇaka.

168. The description of the mendicant-king's journey to the Tirtha of Bhūteśvara follows closely the conventional lines of the vanavarṇana in the classical Kāvya. Hence the mention made in it of wild elephants need not surprise. The reading vaṇakari^o of A, is confirmed by L. vanakari^o, the v.l. of A₂, could not well be explained as referring to lions or monkeys, as in either case the addition of the term vana would be meaningless.

✓169. The sites of the Bhūteśvara Tirtha with the Sodara spring and of Nandīśa have been fully discussed in the notes i. 107, 123, 36. The king's previous visits to Bhūteśa are alluded to in ii. 123. Divide in text °Sodaraṁbu tirtham.

170. The white colour of the ashes with which the king has covered himself after the fashion of ascetics, is compared to the whiteness of the teeth shown in smiling.

Colophon. After the colophon A and L give the following verse: "In this second Tārāṅga six kings of well-known excellence have been treated [who ruled] during two hundred years less eight." The aggregate duration of the reigns here indicated agrees with the lengths of the individual reigns as stated in the text.

THIRD BOOK.

1. May S'iva protect you who in his form [of Ardhanārīśvara] composed of two halves (a male and a female one) gives these replies [to Pārvatī's words]: "Cast off the elephant hide"—"In the cavity of his frontal protuberances are pearls which are fit [to adorn] the front of your breasts"; "What is the use of the fire on your forehead?"—"From there may be taken collyrium for your eyes,"—and who even, if objection were raised by his beloved to the snake, would be prepared to meet it with an answer.

MEGHAVĀHANA.

2. Then the subjects, guided by the ministers, proceeded to the land of Gandhāra and brought Meghavāhana, whose name shone afar.

3. Subsequently the people learned the love of mankind [which lived] in this king, who was attached to his subjects, as [one learns the colour of] pure linen after washing it.

4. This high-minded [ruler] once more surpassed the doings even of those comforters of the beings, the Bodhisattvas, by his noble acts.

5. At his very inauguration the officials, who had received an order [to this effect], proclaimed everywhere by the beating of drums the law against the killing [of living creatures].

6. This virtuous [king], after he had prohibited the slaughter of living beings in his country, helped the butchers and others to a sinless livelihood [by grants] from his own treasury.

7. In the reign of this king, who hated killing like a Jina, the [effigy of an] animal in ghee was used at the sacrifice (kratu) and one in pastry at the 'offering to the spirits' (bhūtabali).

8. He, the founder of Mayuṣṭagrāma, established the Agrahāra called Meghavana, and further the Meghamafha, rich in religious merit.

1. The Mangala is addressed to S'iva Ardhanārīśvara (see note i. 2), and represents him as answering questions raised by his consort regarding his costume. S'iva wears the elephant's skin round his shoulders, on his forehead a third eye made of fire, and round his neck and other parts of the body snakes.

7. By kratu are meant religious sacrifices in general, by bhūtabali the oblation to the spirits, as prescribed among the pañca yajñāḥ of the Purāṇas and Smṛtis. Representations of a paśu in pastry are still used at certain rites of the Kāśmīrian Śaivas.

8. None of these three localities is mentioned elsewhere.

9. His queen Amṛtaprabhā caused a lofty Vihāra called Amṛtabhavana to be constructed for the benefit of foreign Bhikṣus.

MUGHAVĀNA A.

10. The spiritual guide (guru) of her father, who had come from a foreign country called Loḥ, and who in the language of that [country] was designated as Stunpā, built the Stūpa [called that of] Lo-stonpā.

11. Yūkadēvī, [another] wife of the king, who was eager to compete with her rivals, built at Naḍavana a Vihāra of wonderful appearance.

9. In my Notes on Ou-k'ong, pp. 9 seq., I have already shown that the Vihāra of Amṛtabhavana is identical with the 'monastery of Ngō-mi-t'o-p'o-wan' mentioned by the Chinese pilgrim. The name intended by Ou-k'ong's transcription is Amitabhavana or Amitabhavana, which again can be shown to reproduce a Prakrit form of the name, Am'ta-bhavana* or Am'tabhavana*. This Prakrit form is exactly the one which we have to assume as an intermediary stage between the Skr. Amṛtabhavana and its modern Kś. derivative Ant'avan. The latter is actually found as the name of a small village situated about three miles to the north of Srinagar, close to the suburb of Vicār Nāg.

Skr. amṛta at the commencement of compounds is regularly represented in Kś. by ant', derived under the influence of the stress-accent (āmṛta > am'ta* > āmta* > ānta* > ant'); for full evidence as to the phonetic laws underlying this process of conversion, see the paper above quoted.

When visiting Ant'avan in June, 1895, I found in the open ground between it and the canal called Lach'm-kul (Lakṣmīkūḷā) a ruined site which would well correspond to the remains of a Vihāra. Round a solid mound of about 20' height whose form and construction distinctly resembles that of a Stūpa, there can be traced a square enclosure marked by large slabs yet in situ. About 30 yards to the E. lies a tank-like depression which has retained parts of a massive and ancient enclosing wall. According to the evidence of the villagers, many large carved blocks of stone have been removed from this site for temples and other buildings constructed during the reign of the late Maharaja.

The meaning 'foreign' is indicated for the term deśya by its use in the next line and by the analogous use of the word daśika in several passages of the Rājat., as shown in note vi. 303. The daśikas of the last named passage who are contrasted with the Kāśmīrians, correspond exactly to the deśya Bhikṣus of our line. The interpretation here assumed for daśika is supported by Jonarāja's commentary on Srikanṭha, xxv. 102. The meaning 'foreign' is likely to have developed in the case of both words from that of 'local' or 'provincial'; comp. N.P.W., s.v. deśya. The correct rendering of deśya has already been given in Prof. Bühler's translation of the next verse.

10. Mention has been made already in Prof. BÜHLER'S Report, p. 27, of P. GOVIND KAUT's shrewd guess as to the identity of Loḥ with Leh, the capital of Ladākh. He "had found by inquiries among his friends who were serving in Leh, that stunpā was actually a Tibetan word."

A reference to Jaschke's Tibetan-English Dictionary, p. 224, shows in fact that stōn-pā is a word of common use in the meaning of 'teacher.' From the expression used by K. (stunpā taābhūṣayā prokto), it is clear that K. knew the Tibetan term to be the equivalent of 'Guru' and not, as has been supposed, a proper name.

The exact reproduction of the Tibetan word we have in Lo-stonpā, where the first part Lo shows the local name Loḥ with the omission of the visarga which is optional before an initial st. The form Stunpā shows a less accurate transcription, which is accounted for by the fact that the sounds o and u are almost identical in Kś. pronunciation and hence often confused in Kāśmīr Sanskrit MSS.; see Report, pp. 25 sq.

I am unable to find equally convincing evidence for the identity of the names Loḥ and Leh. The name of the Ladākh capital is written Sle in Tibetan (JASCHKE, p. 580), but now actually pronounced Le. In view of the difference between these forms and K.'s Loḥ, it must remain an open question whether we have not in the latter the name of some other Tibetan territory.

It is curious that K. should have placed the home of Queen Amṛtaprabhā in Prāgyotisa, while at the same time reproducing the tradition as to the Tibetan origin of her father's Guru.

For deśaikadeśa° of A, read deśyaikadeśa° as corrected in A and also found in L; comp. preceding note.

11. By Naḍavana may, perhaps, be meant

MEGHAVĀHANA.

12. In one half of it she placed those Bhikṣus whose conduct conformed to the precepts, and in the [other] half those who being in possession of wives, children, cattle and property, deserved blame for their life as householders.

13. Then another wife of the king, called Indradevī, built a Vihāra [named] Indradevībhavana, together with a quadrangle [and also built] a Stūpa.

14. Many Vihāras of renown were built by other queens of his, such as Khādanā and Sammā, under their own names.

15. The reign of this ruler, though he lived in more recent times, was rendered wonderful by events which surpassed the stories of the first kings.

Story of Nāgas.

16. Once when the king was taking recreation in the open, he heard from afar loud cries raised by people in fright: "A thief, a thief here."

17. "Who [is that], who is there? Let the thief be bound!" When the king in anger spoke thus, the loud cries for help ceased, but no thief could be discovered.

18. Again, two or three days later when he was going out, two or three women of divine appearance presented themselves before him praying for safety.

19. When the compassionate [king] had stopped his horse and had promised [to listen to] their request, they with their folded hands raised to the parting of their hair spoke thus:

20. "While you of divine power rule the earth, who could, indeed, O you embodiment of mercy, be in fear of any one else?"

21-24. "When our husbands, the Nāgas, were once covering the sky in the the present quarter of Naror situated in the north-western part of S'rinagar, between Sangin-darwāza and the Idgah. The modern name goes clearly back to a form Naḍavāṭa*. In this form -vāṭa (or vāṭaka) 'garden' might correspond to -vana of K.'s name. -vār or its feminine form -*vāṛ (<Sk. vāṭikā) is frequently found at the end of Kāśmīr local names; comp. notes on Bhūkṣiravāṭikā, i. 342; Rājānavāṭikā, viii. 756; Raṅgavāṭikā, vii. 1668.

Naror shows like most parts of S'rinagar in its cemeteries and Ziārats ample remains of ancient buildings. It is, however, impossible to identify any of these from the remains found overground.

12. The text, as found in A and L, is in at least one place corrupt. For sastrīputrapaśu-strīyaḥ, which gives no sense, we have to emend, with Durgāpr. °paśuśrīyaḥ. The translation of the curious expressions used for the designation of the two classes of Bhikṣus, śikṣācārāḥ and yārhaṣṭhyagarhiyāḥ, is not certain.

With K.'s notice of married Bhikṣus may be compared what HONGSON, Essays of the Languages, etc., of Nepal and Tibet, p. 52, says of modern Buddhist practices in Nepal: "All the Nepalese Buddhists are married men who pursue the business of the world, and seldom think of the injunctions of their religion." I owe the reference to this interesting passage to my friend, M. A. Foucher.

13. The Indradevībhavana Vihāra is mentioned again in the account of the troubles following Bhikṣācara's usurpation, viii. 1172. From this passage it is clear that it must have been situated within the precincts of the present S'rinagar, probably close to the quarter of Kāṭhūl, the Kāṭhūla of viii. 1169.

14. The position of the Vihāra called after the two queens here named cannot be traced with certainty. The name of Khādanāvihāra* may possibly be preserved in that of the village of Khāḍṇiyār, about four miles below Varāhamula on the right bank of the Vitastā. In the Vitastāmāhātmya, xix. 60 sqq., the name of this locality is given as Khādanāhāra.

21-24. Regarding the belief in Nāgas form of clouds, the peasants, who were afraid of a sudden hail-shower and who were agitated in their minds by watching the rich ripe crop of rice, made them, O Lord, cunningly the object of your violent anger. When Your Majesty, hearing the cry of the distressed: 'A thief, a thief,' had angrily ordered their detention, then on your mere command they fell down bound in fetters. May you now have pity on us and show mercy to them!"

25. Having heard this, the king smiled and said, with his face brightened by kindness: "Let all the Nāgas be freed from their fetters."

26. Upon this order of the king the Nāgas shook off their fetters, and after bowing down before his feet quickly departed with their families.

27. Then he who was sincere in the observance of the sacred law, went forth for the conquest of the world so that he might impose upon the [other] kings his prohibition against the killing [of living beings]. The king's Digvijaya.

28. His ambition for conquest, in which valour was laudably [coupled] with care for keeping the people free from fear, deserved to be envied even by a Jina.

29. After he had made the kings whom his prowess had vanquished, take the vow of abstention from slaughter, the blameless [king] arrived near the lord of the waters (Varuṇa).

30. While his army was resting there comfortably in the shade of the palm groves, for a short time he thought in his mind over a device to reach the other terrestrial isles (dvīpa).

31. Then he heard from near a wood on the shore a distressed person's cry for help: "Even under Meghavāhana's rule I have been slain." Story of Varuṇa.

32. As if he had been struck in his heart by an arrow of heated iron, he quickly moved to that spot accompanied by his royal parasol.

33. Then he saw before a temple of Caṇḍikā (Durgā) a man with his face turned downwards who was being killed by some barbarian troop-leader.

34. "Shame upon you for this misdeed, you senseless person!" When thus threatened by the king, the barbarian in terror communicated to him the following:

35. "My little son here, O king, hurt by disease is on the point of dying. This deed, the deities have declared, would bring him some small relief."

36. "If this [propitiatory] sacrifice is prevented, he dies on the spot, and know you that the whole band of his relatives lives only while he lives."

37. "You protect, O Lord, a friendless man brought from the depth of the taking the form of clouds and producing hail, compare note i. 239.

The combination of these four verses into a syntactical unit is marked in the MSS. by the word cakḥalaka. The latter is apparently formed in analogy of the terms yugalaka and tilaka, and is explained in the Samanvayaśiṣ of Rājānaka Chūḍāṇaka (see MS. deposited by me in the Imperial Library, Vienna).

28. I supplies here the correct reading jinasyāpi for the meaningless janasyāpi of A and the Edd.

MRGHAYĀHANA.

forest. Why do you take no heed of this child with whom many persons are connected ? ”

38. Then the high-minded [king], distressed by these words of the barbarian and the terrified look of the victim, spoke thus :

39. “ O Kirāta, do not be despondent. I myself save your son who has many relations, as well as this victim, who is without relatives.”

40. “ I make my own body an offering to Caṇḍikā. Strike boldly at me. May these two persons live ! ”

41. Thereupon the barbarian who was astonished by the nobility of soul [shown] by that [king] of wonderful mental courage, and who felt thrilled, thus addressed him :

42. “ O Lord of the earth, while you strive after too great compassion, some kind of mental error arises in your heart.”

43. “ Why do you show disregard for that body [of yours], which ought to be protected without hesitation even at the cost of [all] lives in the three worlds, and which is destined to enjoy the earth in happiness ? ”

44. “ In their thirst for life, kings regard neither honour nor fame nor riches nor wives nor relations nor the law nor children.”

45. “ Therefore, O protector of your subjects, show favour, do not take pity on this victim. While you live, may this child and those [your] subjects also live ! ”

46. Then the ruler of the earth, eager to sacrifice himself and paying worship to Cāmuṇḍā, as it were, with his brilliant teeth which glistened as [if they were] an oblation (argha), spoke thus :

47. “ What concern have you, forest-dwellers, with the enjoyment of the nectar of righteous conduct ? Those who live in the deserts, know not the delight of bathing in the Gaṅgā.”

48. “ You go too far, O fool, in your obstinate endeavour to frustrate my desire of buying imperishable fame with this body which is sure to decay.”

49. “ Speak not another word. But if you should feel [too much] pity to strike [yourself], why, cannot my own sword effect the purpose ? ”

50. Eager to offer up his body, he drew himself his sword after these words to cut off his head.

51. As he was about to strike, his head was covered with divine flowers and his arm held back by one of divine form.

52. Then in this state he saw before himself a person of heavenly appearance, but neither Caṇḍikā nor the victim nor the Kirāta nor the boy.

53. Thereupon the divine person spoke to him : “ O you who are like the moon of the middle (terrestrial) world, and the embodiment of compassion, know that I am Varuṇa who has been subdued by [your] courage.”

54. "The parasol which to-day is by your side, was in old times ^{out} the away from my town by the father of your father-in-law, the very power ^{hole} Bhauma."

MEGHAYĀHANA.

55. "Without this, the single ornament on the surface of the earth, and which [acts] like a great power, fatal calamities [arise] everywhere for our citizens."

56. "Wishing to possess myself of it, I have employed such deception in order to test your nobility of mind, O you compassionate one."

the Brahman's

57. "By abstention from killing you seem to perform an expiatory rite (prāyascitta) for the sin of your predecessor Vasukula's son (Mihirakula) who deprived the creatures of their lives."

58-61. "O wonder that in one great race was seen the birth of two [such kings], of that 'slayer of three crores' (trikoṭihanti) and of you, a ruler who has renounced killing. In that race, accustomed to rule the earth, these two produce terror and delight, just as in the body of S'eṣa which is accustomed to bear the earth, the poison he spits out, and the mass of jewels [he bears] in his hood, [produce terror and delight]. In that race which has penetrated all regions by its glory, these two bring darkness and light, just as in the fire which penetrates into all directions with its blaze, the mass of smoke and the shooting flame [bring darkness and light]. In that race which has held under its sway an array of brilliant [princes], these two bring about exhaustion and refreshment, just as on a day obscured by the clouds of the rainy season, when the disc of the sun is hidden, the fierce heat and the downpour [bring about exhaustion and refreshment]."

62. When the ruler of the sea-animals (Varuṇa) had spoken thus, the sovereign reverently and with folded hands paid worship to him with a hymn of praise and the parasol [as an offering].

63. And when Varuṇa had graciously accepted the parasol, the most virtuous lord of the earth thus addressed him :

64. "Wishing trees and virtuous men do not deserve to be classed together. Because the first give their fruit to the needy [only] if requested, the latter of their own accord."

65. "How could that parasol become the means of purchasing for us religious merit, if you were not asked to help the distressed?"

54. Bhauma is another name of the Daitya Naraka mentioned in ii. 150; comp. the passages quoted in P.W., s.v.

55. Rasātala must be taken here in the sense of a compound of rasā, 'earth,' and tala, as in the passage of the Suhāsitaratnākara, quoted in N.P.W., s.v. Rasātala in its ordinary meaning of 'hell' does not appear appropriate, as neither Varuṇa's world nor Prāgyoṭiṣa could be said to belong to it.

58-61. As the compounds describing the royal race have a double meaning, it has been necessary to give above a paraphrase of these verses.

MEGHAVĀHANA.

66. "A liberal giver should show full kindness to the recipients of his foresight. Also the tree gives his fruit while refreshing by his shade."

67. "Thus stimulated by the munificent bounty [already] accorded, I ask you, O worshipful one, [to grant me yet] some other wish."

68. "Through your favour the whole earth has been subjected [by me]. But let me [now] be informed of some device for crossing the water so that I may conquer the islands."

69. Upon this prayer the lord of the waters spoke to the protector of the earth: "When you desire to cross I will make the water of the ocean rigid."

70. Upon the king's reply: "Great is this [your] favour," the worshipful Varuṇa disappeared together with the parasol.

71. On the following day he crossed over the sea whose agitation had been turned into rigidity by supernatural power, traversing the water in a straight line with his troops smiling in astonishment.

Conquest of Lankā.

72. He, a mine of precious virtues (guṇaratnākura), then ascended with his forces that diadem of the ocean (ratnākara) Mount Rohaṇa, which contains mines of manifold precious gems (nānāratnākara).

73. While his army rested there in the shade of the palm groves, Vibhīṣaṇa, the king of Lankā, approached him in friendship.

74. Brilliant was the meeting of the kings of men and demons; the first hasty exchange of words between the two could not be heard on account of the loud praises of the bards.

75. Then the ruler of the demons (Vibhīṣaṇa) took that ornament of the earth (Meghavāhana) to Lankā and waited upon him with those riches which are easily obtained by the immortals.

76. The name 'piśitāśa' ('flesh-devourer') which [so far] had been an appropriate one for the demons, then became on their accepting his commandment a term of conventional application (rūḍhiśabda).

77. The lord of the demons presented to him banners which on their tops were decorated with representations of demons' heads indicating their permanent obedience.

78. These [banners] which are known as the 'banners from across [the sea]' (pārādhvajāḥ), because they came from the other side of the ocean, —are even at the present time borne before the kings of Kāśmīr on their expeditions.

67. Meghavāhana considers politely the acceptance of the parasol by Varuṇa as a favour accorded to himself.

72. Rohaṇa is the name of the 'Adam's Peak' on Ceylon.

78. I have not been able to trace any

79. After having thus prohibited the killing of living beings throughout the race of the demons, the virtuous monarch returned to his own kingdom.

80. From that time onwards the commandment of this sovereign of the whole earth regarding the abstention from killing, was not broken by any one.

81. While he ruled, animals were not killed by wicked [creatures], neither in the waters by otters and other [aquatic animals], nor in the thickets by lions and other [wild beasts], nor in the air by eagles and other [birds of prey].

82. Then as time passed by, some aggrieved Brahman bringing his pain-stricken son lamented at the king's gate : Story of the Brahman's son.

83. "Without giving to Durgā the animal oblation which she desires, I who have no other issue, shall lose my son to-day from fever."

84. "If you persist in the [law of] not-killing and do not preserve this [my son], O protector of the earth, then who else could appear to me the cause of his death?"

85. "May you yourself, O guardian of [all] castes, give here judgment as to how great a difference there is between the life of a Brahman and of an animal!"

86. "O mother earth, those kings who killed even ascetics in order to gain the life of Brahmans, have now disappeared."

87. While the Brahman spoke contemptuously these harsh words in his grief, the king, the destroyer (hara) of the pain of the afflicted, long reflected in this manner:

88. "Aforetime I made the rule that living beings should not be killed. Why should I even for the sake of a Brahman do what I have recognized as ruinous?"

89. "If the Brahman [youth] should die to-day leaving me as the immediate cause [of his death], there too would be a case of extreme sinfulness, that of [causing] distress intentionally."

90. "My soul tossed about by doubts finds no rest on [either] side, like a flower which has fallen into a whirlpool at the junction [of two streams]."

91. "If I then satisfy Durgā by offering up my own body, I righteously preserve the lives of [these] two as well as my vow."

92. Having thus meditated for a very long time, the king who was ready to sacrifice his own body, dismissed the Brahman with the words: "To-morrow I shall do what pleases you."

other reference to these royal banners with demons' heads, which popular belief in K.'s time seems to have connected with Meghavāhana's legendary expedition to the island of the demons.

80-81. These two verses which have been subsequently added in A by A₃, are missing in L.—The word translated above by "otters," is written udhrā^o by A₃, but is probably meant for udrā^o. The lexicographers are uncertain as to which kind of aquatic animal is meant by udra.

MEGHAVĀHANA.

93. During the night Durgā restored the Brahman's son to health and [thereby] prevented the king who was anxious to offer up his body [from carrying out his intention].

94. We feel embarrassed in thus recording also of this king of recent times these and other acts, which cannot be believed by common people.

95. However, those who proceed by the [righteous] way of the Rāis, are also in their compositions not dominated by subservience to the hearer's notions.

96. When this king died after ruling the earth for thirty-four years, the whole world was as if deprived of the sun and light.

S'ṚEṢṬHASANA.

97. Then the earth was protected by his son King S'Ṛeṣṭhasana whom the people forthwith called [also] Pravarasena (I.) and Trinijina (II.).

98. One might have thought that the glory of the world had, as it were, betaken itself with upturned face to the jewelled mirror of his sword, which was firmly attached to his pillar-like arm.

99. After having constructed the first [shrine of] Pravarasvara together with a 'circle of the Mothers' (mātṛakṛa), he consecrated various holy shrines at Purāpādhishṭhāna.

100. As he looked upon the earth which was subject to his sway, as if it were

99. This verse is supplied by A, and is not found in L. The identity of Purāpādhishṭhāna, 'the ancient capital,' with the present village of Pāndrēthan, about three miles above the present S'rīnagar on the right bank of the Vitasta, has been first shown by Gen. CUNNINGHAM (see J.A.S.B., 1848, pp. 283 sqq., also Anc. Geogr., p. 98); it is also well-known to the Pandits. If we are right in deriving the name of the locality from the fact of its having been the site of the old capital S'rīnagari founded by Aśoka (comp. note i. 104), the use of the name in our passage is a kind of anachronism, as the foundation of the new capital of Pravarapura on the site of the modern S'rīnagar is attributed by K. to S'Ṛeṣṭhasana's grandson Pravarasena II.; comp. iii. 348 sqq.

The name Purāpādhishṭhāna must have already been in use in the first half of the seventh century, as Hiuen-tsiang evidently refers to it when speaking of the 'old city' situated about 10 li or circ. two miles to the S.E. of the 'new city' (Sī-yu-ki, i. p. 158).

K. mentions Purāpādhishṭhāna once more in the reign of Pārtha, v. 267, where the gloss of A. explains the name by pāndyārthan itī prasiddhe grāme. The temple of Meruvardhanavāman whose erection is related in that passage, has been recognized by Gen. Cunningham in the well-preserved little temple still standing in the centre of the modern village. Still later, in K.'s own time, the Chronicle records, viii. 2408 sq., the creation of various buildings by the minister Rilhapa "in the towns of the two Pravarasenas," and in particular that of a Rilhapaśvara 'in the first city of King Pravara.' The latter expression is evidently intended to designate Purāpādhishṭhāna.

The slopes rising immediately to the N. of Pāndrēthan show considerable remains of ancient buildings in the form of carved stones and architectural fragments which can be traced along the foot of the hillside for about a mile and a half. Among them several broken Lingas of colossal dimensions attract attention (CUNNINGHAM, loc. cit., and VIGNY, Travels, ii. p. 36). Individual structures, however, cannot be distinguished now among the debris overground. An indication of the sites of S'Ṛeṣṭhasana's various pratiṣṭhās is, therefore, impossible. The Linga or shrine of Pravarēśa, which seems to have been the most prominent among them, is distinguished by the designation 'pūrvam' from the great temple of the same name which Pravarasena II. built in his new capital of Pravarapura, comp. iii. 350, 372, 378. It is not clear to which of the two Pravarasēnas K. refers in vii. 109.

J 100. The territory of Trigarta is identical the court of his palace, he bestowed upon the Pravareṣa [temple] along with villages [also] the land of Trigarta.

S'RESTHASENA.

101. This king of a mild disposition was during thirty years the chief of the rulers who owned the fields of the whole earth as their family property.

102. Then his two sons Hiranya and Toramāṇa, holding the position of sovereign and Yuvarāja [respectively], delighted the earth.

HIRANYA [TORAMĀṆA].

103. Suppressing the undue abundance of [coins] struck by . . . , Toramāṇa put in circulation coins (dīnnārāḥ) struck in his own [name].

with the modern hill district of Kāngra situated between the mountains of Camba and the upper course of the Bias; comp. Vijayapur., ii. p. 179; CUNNINGHAM, Ans. Geogr., p. 138; Arch. Survey Rep., v. pp. 148 sqq.; Ind. Ant., xvii. p. 8; xxii. p. 191. With reference to the ancient stronghold and capital of the district, Kōṭ Kāngra or Nagarkōṭ, the gloss of A₂ to v. 144 renders Trigarta by 'Nagarakotta.'

As Trigarta formed in ancient times part of the kingdom of Jālandhara (Jalandhar), Inducandra, who is identical with the Indracandra of the genealogical list of the Ketōch Rājas of Kāngra, is called, vii. 150, king of Jālandhara.—For a characteristic of the inhabitants of Trigarta, see viii. 1531.

103. It is to be regretted the text of this interesting passage has suffered a corruption in the word left untranslated above. bālākatānāḥ, as the previous Edd. and the modern S'rada MSS. read, is due to a misreading of bālākatānāḥ, as written by Rājānaka Ratnakṛṣṇa in A. In L the leaf containing iii. 100-131 has unfortunately been lost. Neither the reading of A nor the one substituted for it in the Edd. gives an appropriate sense. The conjectural emendation proposed by Durgāpr., bhātrākatānāḥ, is for the present unsupported by palaeographical or other evidence.

The passage has been repeatedly discussed by Gen. CUNNINGHAM in connection with the ancient coinage of Kāśmīr; comp. Numismatic Chronicle, 1848, p. 24; Transactions of IX. Internat. Congress of Orient., 1892, p. 232. In his opinion, as expressed in the last named paper, "what Toramāṇa did, was to collect the old coins called Bālāhats, and to recoin them as Dināre in his own name." The pieces thus recoined he takes to have been copper coins of the later Indo-Scythian prince.

In his Coins of Med. India (1894), p. 34, Gen. CUNNINGHAM seems to connect the term bālāhata with the Ks. hat (recte kath) 'hundred' which, as will be seen from the note on the Kāśmīr currency terms, iv. 495, has been in use until quite recently as the designation of a small copper coin representing originally, perhaps, a hundred of Kauris. It is, however, clear that this explanation is impossible, since K. mentions always the 'kath' under its proper Skr. name śata; see Note H, iv. 495, also v. 71, 116; vi. 38, etc.

Copper coins bearing the name of Toramāṇa in characters of the Gupta period are found in Kāśmīr in remarkable quantities. A description of them will be found in Cunningham's above quoted papers as well as in Mr. A. V. Smith's lucid resumé, J.A.S.B., 1894, pp. 195 sqq. But numismatic considerations based on the type and execution of these coins and the characters of the legend favour their attribution to an earlier ruler, viz. Toramāṇa, the father of Mihreṅkula. Of the latter we know, since Mr. FIEBER's researches (Corp. Insor. Ind. III., pp. xi. sqq.; Ind. Ant., xviii. pp. 225 sqq.), that he ruled as King of the White Huns over the Panjab and probably also over Kāśmīr about the end of the fifth century A.D. The very abundance of these coins appears to speak rather for their having been struck by a powerful ruler than by an ill-fated pretender.

It is difficult to believe that K. could have meant in our passage any other coins but the above, which even to this day are common in all Bāzars of Kāśmīr. If these coins belonged in reality to Toramāṇa, the father of Mihreṅkula, we could account for their mention in our passage only by two alternatives. Either the Toramāṇa of the Chronicle is identical with the King of the White Huns, in which case K. or his authorities would be guilty of having placed the father some 700 years after the son, as suggested by Dr. Hultzsch, Ind. Ant., xix. p. 282. Or the Toramāṇa of the Chronicle is another and later ruler, in which case the error of K. or his authorities would lie only in the attribution of the coins. With reference to the latter possibility it may be noted that the name Toramāṇa, though in all probability of Turkish origin, can be shown

HIRANYA
[TORAMĀNA].

104. "How did this [Toramāna dare to] make display as if he were king, disregarding me?" Thus thought in anger the king his elder brother, and placed him in prison.

105. While he abandoned his grief during a long residence there, his queen called Añjanā, a daughter of Vajrendra from Iksvāku's race, became enceinte.

Birth of Pravarasena
II.

106. When she was near her confinement, she betook herself at the direction of her husband, who felt ashamed, to a potter's hut somewhere and [there] gave birth to a son.

107. The potter's wife accepted the prince as her child, as the she-crow the young cuckoo, and brought him up properly.

108. He was known [only] to his mother and the potter's wife who nursed him, just as a treasure [in the ground] which is known [only] to the earth and the female snake.

109. At the bidding of his mother the potter's wife called him, who was a grandson of Pravarasena [I.], by the very name of his grandfather.

110. While growing up the boy did not tolerate the touch of those with whom he lived, just as the lotus, fond of associating with [the rays of] the sun, [does not tolerate the touch] of the waters.

111. With wonder saw the people that when playing, he was followed about only by boys of good birth, of courage and of learning.

112. The boys at play made him, who was distinguished by exceptional strength, the king of their band, just as the young animals in the forest [choose as king] the lion-cub.

113. He made presents to the boys, treated them kindly and kept them obedient; on no occasion did he conduct himself in a manner unfit for a king.

114. When the potters gave him a ball of clay to prepare pots and the like, he took it and made [with it] rows of S'iva-liṅgas.

115. His maternal uncle Jayendra once saw him playing in this remarkable fashion and greeted him with kindness.

116. When the children announced him with the words: "This is Jayendra," he received him condescendingly, as it were, looking at him with the easy assurance of a king's son.

117. He (Jayendra) concluded from that [boy's] resolute character that he was born from no common race, and guessed on account of the resemblance to his brother-in-law that he might be his [own] nephew.

from Rajāt. v. 283 to have survived in the Hinduized S'ahi dynasty down to the tenth century A.D.

For passages indicating K.'s acquaintance with the old coinage of his country, see vi. 177; vii. 926; viii. 168, 883.

Regarding the term ātmāra Note H, iv. 495, should be consulted.

HIRANYA [TOBAMĀNA].

118. He followed him in haste with the anxious desire of ascertaining the truth, and when he had reached his home in impatience, he saw [there] his sister.

119. Brother and sister looked long at each other with emotion and suddenly let flow their tears, made doubly hot by their sighs.

120. When the boy asked the potter's wife: "Mother, who are these two?" he was told by her thus: "O my child, this is your mother and that your maternal uncles."

121. Jayendra advised the [boy] who felt wrath over his father's imprisonment, but was [yet] helpless, to await his time, and then left for his other business.

122. When he (Pravarassna) was prepared to raise a rebellion, chance willed that Toramāna, that sun among men, died after having been set free from prison by his brother.

123. Pravarasena who felt despondent and weary, kept his mother from seeking death and then went abroad eager [to visit] Tīrthas.

124. At that time Hiranya, too, died without issue, after having protected the earth for thirty-one years less ten months.

125. At that period there lived at Ujjayinī as the sole sovereign of the world the glorious Vikramāditya who [also] bore the second name of Harṣa. Story of Vikramāditya and Mārgupta.

126. Leaving the four arms of S'iva and the four seas, Fortune in ardent desire gave herself up to this king, whose good fortune was wonderful.

127. It is owing to his having used his fortune [only] as a tool for increasing virtue, that even to this day men of noble character stand with their necks erect before the rich.

128. By destroying the S'akas he made the task light for S'iva who is to descend to the earth for the extermination of the Mlecchas.

129. To this king, whose fame penetrated all quarters of the world, who was easy of approach for the virtuous, and whose audience-hall was [frequented] by all, betook himself a poet called Mārgupta.

119. Compare note i. 167.

126. It is certain that K. himself saw in this Vikramāditya-Harṣa of Ujjayini the king whose supposed victory over the S'akas he believed, according to the theory referred to in note ii. 7, to be commemorated by the commencement of the S'aka era, 78 A.D. This is proved by iii. 128, and by the close approach of the above date to A.D. 106, the date which K.'s chronology assigns to the death of Hiranya.

K. himself helps us to correct the great chronological error implied by this view, when stating, iii. 380, that Vikramāditya-Harṣa was the father of S'ilāditya-Pratāpāśila. As the latter cannot be anyone else but the King S'ilāditya mentioned by Hinen-tsiang (Si-yu-ki, ii. p. 261) as having ruled about 580 A.D. in Malava, we must conclude in accordance with the arguments first set forth by Dr. Bhau Daji (J. Bo. Br. R. A. S., 1861, p. 208 sqq.), that K.'s Vikramāditya-Harṣa was in reality the same as the Vikramāditya who is mentioned by Hinen-tsiang as the predecessor of S'ilāditya. The reign of this Vikramāditya may be placed with Prof. M. Müller (India, pp. 286 sqq.) in the first half of the sixth century.

129. Dr. Bhau Daji has endeavoured to MĀTṚGUPTA.

130. This [poet], who had grown up in various courts, reflected over the wonderful might of this profound king and thought thus :

131. "This king here is endowed with merits and is a friend of the virtuous; to comprehend his perfection [one must turn] to the kings of old times."

132. "Before this king wise and learned Brahmins need not fold their hands [in prayer] in order to receive honour and distinction."

133. "Before him the mind does not lose its acuteness by having to express its thoughts under disguise just as a lady of good breeding [has to do]."

134. "As the talk of the wicked is wasted [upon him], and as he discriminates between the right and wrong, one's own merit does not lose its value in his service."

135. "Men of merit do not feel before him as if dead in life, since they are not placed [by him] on the same footing with the wicked and the ignorant."

136. "Men of noble character need not feel pained and heave sighs at his presents, because this discerning [prince] makes those with due regard to the esteem [they deserve]."

137. "This judicious [prince] treats each character according to its qualities, and gives fresh strength to the efforts of all by suitable marks of esteem."

138. "The pains which attendants take in his service in order to secure his kindness, are not [without profit] like the sale of snow on a snowy mountain, since he perceives the hardships [incurred by them]."

139. "In the council of this king there is no confidant of false merits, no minister who loves quarrels, breaks his promises or robs."

140. "His servants do not use rough words, nor do they wound each other to the quick with jesting words, nor do they combine in jealousy against the admission of others."

141. "This ruler does not watch the faces of those who show [servile] com-prove by an ingenious theory the identity of the poet Mātṛgupta whose regency in Kāśmīr is described in the following vv., with the great poet Kālidāsa, see J. Do. Br. R. A. S., 1861, pp. 208 sqq. This theory was closely connected with another, subsequently taken up by Fergusson and Prof. M. Müller, that the famous Vikramāditya at whose court the Nine Gems, and among them Kālidāsa, flourished according to the Indian tradition, was identical with the Vikramāditya-Harṣa of the sixth century A.D.

Dr. Bhanu Daji's arguments were chiefly based on the synonymy of the two names Kālidāsa and Mātṛgupta (Kāli: mātṛ, āśa: gūpta), on the absence of any mention of Kālidāsa in the Rājat., and on the attribution to Kālidāsa of the Prakrit poem Setubandh composed at the request of a king Pravarasena. The latter he assumed to have been Pravarasena II., Mātṛgupta's successor. Prof. M. Müller has reproduced those arguments with great lucidity, India, pp. 312-347, but has in the same place indicated the grave objections which preclude the acceptance of this identification.

Verses ascribed to Mātṛgupta are given in the Aucityavivāraṇa of Kṣemendra and in the Subhāṣitāvalī of Vallabhadeva; compare Cat. Catalog., s.v., where references are also given to passages which name a Mātṛgupta an author on Alaṅkāra and the Nāṭyaśāstra.

plaisance, who praise up their own wisdom and in their blindness hold themselves tout omniscient."

MĀTĀGUPTA.

142. "Wicked wretches never find a chance for interrupting a conversation of great import which may have been begun with him."

143. "If I thus attach myself to this faultless prince who is worthy of being served, the attainment of advantages for myself along with spiritual merits cannot be far off."

144. "It is clear to me that I may serve this king who is deep-minded, who recognizes merits and has a firm intellect, without apprehension of trouble."

145. "Nor does it appear to me right that after having gratified him and having obtained his gifts, I should [subsequently] serve any one else and wander about on the earth, as [one might do] in the case of other kings."

146. After he had thought this over thoroughly, he did not seek to please the royal assembly as one new [to him], nor did he push himself into the company of distinguished persons.

147. While he thus displayed his accomplishments with modesty, the king recognized that he was anxious to gain [an opportunity] for proving his superior capacity.

148. And he thought: "This noble person is not merely a man of distinction. His ways of deep insight show that he has a claim to the highest consideration."

149. Though of this opinion, the king yet in order to ascertain his innermost thoughts and to test him, did not honour him with such presents as would have befitted him.

150. The wise [Mātāgupta] knew from this [apparent] want of attention that the king, whose disposition was munificent, was taking him into his intimacy, and served him with devotion.

151. By the assiduous services of this wise [person] which increased by degrees, the king was as little wearied as by [the presence of] his own body.

152. By making his presence neither too short nor again too long, he pleased the king, just as the moon [is pleased] by the duration of the autumn nights.

153. He was not confused by the jests of the servants of the household, the repeated changes in the behaviour of the door-keepers and the false praises of the court-parasites.

154. When he obtained from the king kindly words, he was like a rock which receives shade; when passed over by him, he did not feel angry like a rival.

155. That judicious man did not cast his eyes on the king's female servants, did not sit together with the king's enemies nor talk with low persons in the king's presence.

MĀTRAGUPTA.

156. The officials, who naturally are the king's defamators and with their people live on slander, did not hear from him censure of the king.

157. Firmly resolved, he was not induced to relax his efforts by those who, being [themselves] incapable of the exertions of service, talked [to him] daily with kind intent about the uselessness, etc., of [serving] the king.

158. By praising the excellent qualities of others also, as occasion offered, by never showing obstinacy and by manifesting his learning, he gained the heart of the courtiers.

159. Mātrgupta passed thus six months, serving him unweariedly with the greatest diligence.

160. Then once the king, when going outside, noticed him grown thin in body, dust-covered and in torn clothes, and thought :

161. "I, in my desire to ascertain his strength of character, have subjected this excellent man, who is a stranger, without protection and without relatives, to a severe trial."

162. "Deluded by power, alas, I have not thought of what would be his shelter or his food or his clothing."

163. "Even now I have not comforted with splendour this man who is withered by cold winds and fierce heat, as the spring [would comfort] the tree."

164. "Who could cure the exhaustion of this worn-out unfortunate man, remove his weariness or alleviate his fatigue?"

165. "Should I not have to offer him the philosopher's stone or nectar (amṛta) for his service, considering how I have tested him in my delusion?"

166. "By what honour then could I repay to him my debt for his great merits and excessive exertion in [my] service?"

167. While the king thus reflected, there occurred to him no honour of any kind sufficient to [mark] his goodwill towards this servant.

168. Then came the winter scorching the body, as it were, with its winds which brought hoar frost and dense mists.

169. The continued darkness which covered the regions subdued by the fierce cold, appeared as if it were a black cloak.

170. The days became short, for the sun, which seemed pained by the cold and eager to seek the warmth of the submarine fire, was rapidly descending into the ocean.

171. Then once by chance the king woke up in the middle of the night, while the house was lit up by lamps and the glowing fire-pans shone forth.

172. He saw before him the lamps shaken by the wintry winds which partly entered the house with their harsh and loud sounds.

173. Then looking for servants to light these [lamps] again, he called out with a loud voice : " Who of the guards is present outside ? "

174. Thereupon while all [the guards] were sleeping placidly, he heard a voice from within the outer enclosure : " O king, I, Mātrgupta, am here. "

175. When the king himself had called him in, he entered the palace which the presence of fortune made delightful, without being noticed by the others.

176. He was told to light the lamps. Then when he had done this and was about to retire outside with quick steps, the king asked him to stop for a moment.

177. Shaking doubly with cold and fear he went up to the king, but not too far, wondering what he might say.

178. Then the king asked : " How far has the night progressed ? " He answered : " Sire, one watch and a half of the night remains. "

179. Then the king spoke to him : " How have you ascertained precisely the time of the night ? And why did not sleep come upon you at night ? "

180. Then resolved to rid himself by an announcement of his condition either of hope or of misery, he composed the following verse at the spur of the moment and recited it to him.

181. " While I, assailed by cold and with my throat parched by hunger, was sinking in the ocean of thoughts like a bean-corn, and with my underlip split [by cold] was blowing at the dying fire, sleep somehow deserted me like a neglected mistress and went afar. The night [however], like the land which has been bestowed on a worthy person, does not get exhausted. "

182. The king after hearing this [verse] acknowledged his exertion with thanks, and dismissed this prince of poets to his former place.

183. And he reflected : " Shame over me that I stand yet thus now, when I have heard from this excellent man whose mind has become despondent, these words hot with pain. "

184. " Surely he sits in distress outside, since he has not been recognized in his heart, and thinks my words of thanks empty as if they were those of some one else. "

185. " Though for a long time I try to think of some honour worthy of him, yet even now no gift of great value occurs to me. "

186. " And yet—just his felicitous word makes me remember that the lovely land of Kāśmīr is now without a king. "

187. " Therefore I grant that land to this worthy man, though I know well that even great kings are eagerly seeking it. "

175. I adopt the reading of A₃, tadadr̥ṣṭo, now confirmed by L, for tadapṛṣṭo of A₁ and Ed.

MĀTRAGUPTA.

188. After thus taking a quick resolve, the king despatched secretly that very night messengers to the ministers of Kāśmīr.

189. And he instructed them: "He who will show you my royal decree, Mātragupta by name, should be inaugurated as king without hesitation."

190. Then when the messengers had set out, the king got his own decree written and passed the rest of the night in satisfaction.

191. But Mātragupta, who thought that even an interview with the king was fruitless, abandoned all hopes and felt as if freed from a burden.

192. And in his heart he thought: "What had to be done, I have done. My doubt has been appeased to-day. Now that the goblin 'Hope' has left me, I shall find happiness."

193. "What an error of mine this was, due to following others, that [relying] upon the people's tales I thought this [king] worthy to be served by me!"

194. "The tribes of crawling animals which live on air (serpents), have been called 'bhogin'; those [elephants] which with their big ear-laps drive off the humming-bees, have been named 'gaja'; and the tree which is affected by the fire residing in its interior, bears the name of S'amī. Thus the people uncontrolled in their babbling have turned everything topsy-turvy."

195. "And yet—that [king] who has made the houses of his favourites favoured with fortune, is by no means inaccessible."

196. "What fault is it of this liberal blameless king? On the contrary, it is my want of merit which has to be accused. That stands in the way of my luck."

197. "If the sea which rolls its waves glittering with jewels, is stopped in its movement towards the shore by the winds, the fault lies in the applicant's bad fortune, but not in the least in the liberal disposition of the giver."

198. "For those who are eager for readily attainable fruit, the king's servants are better than their masters, as the latter yield fruit [only] after severe exertion."

199. "Those who stand at the foot of the lord of the animals (S'iva), they surely do not obtain on the spot anything but ashes. But those who stand at that of his bull and obtain the shining gold, what happy times are not ever [in store] for them?"

200. "However [much] I may ponder, I do not discover any fault of my own the perception of which might have made this prince turn away from me notwithstanding my services."

194. The allusions are to the lucus a non lucendo etymologies assumed for the words bhogin (from \sqrt{bhuj} , 'to enjoy'), gaja (from the \sqrt{gai} , 'to sing'), and samī (from the \sqrt{sam} , 'to be calm').—The S'amī tree supplies the wood used for producing fire by friction.

201. "However, who could get to reaping his reward from a king who follows the footsteps of others, if one comes before him without having been [previously] honoured by someone else?"

202. "Those very drops of water which, while floating about in the sea, are ever unheeded, are when drawn up by the clouds and falling down [as rain-drops], received by the sea in the embrace of wave-circles and, indeed, turned into pearls. Thus a person even of small consequence, if he has been well treated by somebody else, is on his arrival, as a rule, honoured by the great."

203. With such thoughts he wronged that [king] who was worthy of being served; for in misfortune even a wise man's mind fails.

204. When the morning had broken, the king directed the doorkeeper to call in Mātragupta.

205. Ushered in thereupon by several chamberlains who had hastily gone forth [to call him], he stepped before the lord of the earth like one who has abandoned hope.

206. He made his bow, and at that very instant the king had the document handed to him by the secretary (lekhādhikārīn) to whom he gave a signal with his brows.

207. And he himself spoke thus: "Well, do you know Kaśmīr? Go there and deliver this decree to the state officers." Mātragupta sent to Kaśmīr.

208. "He who should read the document on the way, is responsible by my body. Be careful not to forget this order on any account!"

209. As he did not know the king's mind and dreaded the hardships, he saw in this order a burning flame, but not the light [issuing] from the point of a jewel.

210. After Mātragupta had left with the words: "As you order, so [it shall be]," the king stood talking with his trusted counsellors as before, and showed no pride [over his munificence].

211. The people then blamed the king when they saw Mātragupta setting out [for the journey], unused as he was to the fatigue, weakened in body and without provisions or friends.

212. "O, [look at] this inconsiderate conduct of the sovereign, who employs a man of worth in a task fit for a common person."

213. "The foolish king, forsooth, has thought just him fit for hardships, because serving day and night he underwent hardships in vain hope."

214. "If a servant adopts some [particular] line for serving his master, the latter without judgment takes him, indeed, to be fit for that very [line]."

214. The conjectural reading upāyān yān, proposed in the text, is confirmed by L.

MĀTRAGUPTA.

215. "Whon S'eṣa offered to the foe of the Asuras (Viṣṇu) his body as a couch, he sought for ease by thus averting the danger dreaded from the foe of the snakes (Garuḍa); but in reality he abandoned ease. Because that [god], when made aware of his capacity for [enduring] pain, laid upon him the wearisome and never-ending task of bearing the weight of the earth."

216. "This eminent man perceiving in himself more merits than in those worthy persons whom this [king] had taken [into his favour], attached himself to him with full confidence."

217. "Can any one display more want of judgment than this king, who, indeed, because an eminent man has shown superior merits, has paid him such an honour?"

218. "Who else shows [such] want of feeling, except the cloud which sends a mere drop of water for the peacock who dances displaying his tail-fan [and hopes]: 'He who appreciates the various shining objects and rejoices even in the frail rainbow, what kindness will he not do for me when he sees this tail?'"

219. There was no thought of his future greatness in the mind of Mātraguṇḍa while he quite cheerfully marched along on the roads.

220. Finding, as it were, a support for his arm in the [various] auspicious omens which presented themselves in rivalry, he did not feel fatigued.

221. He saw on the path a wagtail [seated] on the top of a snake's hood, and dreamt of himself as having ascended a lofty building and crossed an ocean.

222. And being versed in the S'āstras he thought: "Surely, in view of these auspicious omens the king's order might bring me luck."

223. "Even if I should obtain but a very small reward in Kaśmīr, yet how much more valuable will it not be on account of the [spiritual] excellence of that priceless country?"

224. As he marched on, he found paths which he could get over without fatigue, houses where guests were dear, and hospitable reception at every step.

Arrival on Kaśmīr frontier.

225. Thus passing along he saw before him the snowy range (Himālaya) verdant with waving trees and glittering auspiciously like a dish of curds.

226. Breezes, familiar to the land which he was to rule, went forth to meet him, giving delight with their [scent of] resin and laden with the spray of the Gaṅgā.

227. Then at the place called Kramavarta he reached the watch-static (ḍhakkha) which bears the name of Kāmburva and is nowadays located at S'ūrapura.

220. For vitiṇṇakarāmbha of A and L emend °karāmbha, २ and ३ are easily confused in S'arada characters.

226. Numerous streams and springs of Kaśmīr are considered as manifestations of the Gaṅgā; the most important among these is the river Sind, comp. note i. 57.

227. For a detailed account of the position of Kramavarta and S'ūrapura, and for the explanation of the term ḍhakkha, see Note D

228. Then he heard that the ministers of Kaśmīr were for some reason present at that place, which was thronged by people of various kinds.

229. After removing his former dress and putting on clean clothes he went before them to deliver the king's order.

230. As his success had been indicated by the occurrence of auspicious omens, some wayfarers followed him as he walked forth, to see these auguries bear fruit.

231. When the door-keepers heard that a messenger from Vikramāditya had arrived, they quickly announced his presence to the ministers of Kaśmīr.

232. Invited on all sides to come and enter, he freely approached them, attended as they were by all the vassals.

233. After he had received proper welcome from the ministers in order of precedence, he placed himself on the highest seat which they indicated to him.

234. When asked thereupon with due respect by the ministers for the order of the king, he slowly, as if he felt ashamed, handed to them the latter's decree.

235. They respectfully greeted the king's letter, assembled in private, and after opening and reading it spoke thus with deference:

236. "Is Mātrgupta your Honour's name?" He replied to them with a smile: "Yes, that it is."

237. Then was heard the cry: "Who, who is present among the officials on duty?" and there was seen the apparatus for the inauguration of a king (abhiṣeka) ready prepared.

238. Then that place became in a moment thronged by crowds of people indulging in confused cries, and resembled the agitated sea.

239. Placed with his face turned eastwards on a golden throne, Mātrgupta received then the bath of inauguration from the assembled high officers of the state.

Mātrgupta inaugurated.

240. The water of the abhiṣeka-[ceremony] which flowed down with a loud sound from his chest, broad like the slope of the Vindhya-[range], resembled the stream of the Revā.

241. Then after his body had been bathed and anointed and all his limbs dressed with ornaments, he stepped on to the royal throne, and the subjects thus addressed him as their king:

242. "May you rule over this our land, since King Vikramāditya whom we had ourselves asked to protect it, has designated you as one equal to himself."

243. "Do not believe, O king, that this country by which at all times [other] countries have been granted, was granted [in your case] by others."

244. "As parents are only the [immediate] cause for the production of a birth

243. Of the vv. ll. vidyante and vidatam which of the text, I has actually vilattam. The A₁ has indicated for vilabhyante and vilabdhām meaning remains the same with either reading.

MĀTRGUPTA.

which one obtains by one's own [previous] deeds, thus too are other [kings] for that of a throne in the case of kings."

245. "Since [matters] stand thus, you ought, O king, not to lower our and your own dignity by acknowledging some one else as your master."

246. King Mātrgupta, though justly told thus by them, remembered the kind treatment on the part of his master, and smiled for a short while.

247. He made the day festive by bountiful gifts suited to his new royal power, and spent that day of highest luck at that same place.

248. When he was then asked by the ministers on the following day to proceed to the city, he despatched to the giver of his kingdom a messenger with wonderful presents.

249. Remembering that this might appear to the mind of his master as if he wished to vie with him owing to the excellence of his [now] country, he felt ashamed and guilty.

250. He thereupon called other messengers and despatched, in order to indicate that he remembered the service [done] to his master, also presents of small value [consisting of] wholesome [fruits] and the like.

251. And remembering with tears in his eyes the extraordinary virtues of that [ruler], he sent one verse of his own written by himself.

252. "You show no sign of emotion and do, indeed, not boast; you do not indicate your liberal disposition, but yield your good fruits [like a tree]. Your favour is perceived only when you grant your rewards, just as [that] of the cloud which pours down silently its rain."

253. Then he entered the city with his troops which extended to the horizon, and governed the land in the right way as if he had obtained it by succession.

254. He whose soul was by nature elevated, did not limit his impulses like a beggar, where liberality or manliness [were concerned].

255. When he in his liberality was preparing to have sacrifices celebrated [accompanied] by extensive Dakṣiṇās, he thought of the slaughter of animals and felt [his heart] compressed by pity.

256. Hence he proclaimed for the length of his reign a prohibition against slaughter in his land and offered [at sacrifices] porridge made of pulverized gold and other [precious stuffs].

257. When King Mātrgupta threw about his porridge, who did not feel his thirst quenched and his joy roused?

258. This king who was eminent, who had seen misfortune and was liberal,

250. L reads anarghānyapi, "valueless," and confirms the reading of A sūtrayāni.

258. Comp. notes v. 16; viii. 811.

deserved to be approached, even more than Vikramāditya, by those who desired happiness.

MĀTRGUPTA.

259. The king's cheerful amusements, to which his praiseworthy judgment added flavour, gave delight among men of wisdom.

260. When Menṭha showed before him his new [poem called] Hayagrīvavadha ('the Death of Hayagrīva'), he did not get from him a word of approval or dissent, until he had completed it.

261. Then when he set about to bind the volume, he (Mātrgupta) placed below it a golden dish, lest its flavour might escape.

262. Honoured by such appreciation on the part of that [king], the poet Bhartṛmenṭha thought the rich reward superfluous.

263. He built a [shrine of] Madhusūdana (Viṣṇu) called Mātrguptasvāmin, whose villages were in the course of time appropriated by Mamma for his own temple.

264. While this king ruled the earth after attaining the royal power in the manner described, five years passed less three months and one day.

265. The son of Añjanā (Pravarasena) who was pleasing the Pitṛs by [offering to them] the waters of Tīrthas, heard of this usurpation which had taken place in his own country. Return of Pravarasena.

266. Anger absorbed in him the tender feeling arising from the sorrow for his father, just as the heat of the sun [absorbs] on a tree the moisture arising from the drops of night dew.

267. When he got to S'rīparvata a saint called Āśvapāda, who appeared in the guise of a Pāśupata ascetic, offered him food prepared from roots and thus addressed him:

268. "When I on gaining supernatural power asked you who had attended upon me in a former birth, after your desire, your wish was after a kingdom."

260. Menṭha, or Bhartṛmenṭha, is mentioned by Kṣemendra in the Suṃtāttilaka and by Mañkha (S'rikanṭha, ii. 63). The latter places him by the side of Subandhu, Bhāravi and Bāṇa. Verses are quoted under his name in S'rivara's Subhāṣitāvalī and later anthologies, comp. Cat. Catalog., p. 397. Prof. BÜHLER has shown, Report, p. 42, by a reference to Hemacandra's Alaṃkāraśūdhī-maṇi, that the Hayagrīvavadha was a Kāvya. According to Cat. Catalog., p. 754, the work is mentioned in the Kavyaprakāśa and Sāhitya-darpana. Dr. Bhau Daji found verses from it quoted in Raghavabhaṭṭa's commentary on the Sākuntala (M. MÜLLER, India, p. 314).

263. The temple of Mātrguptasvāmin is not mentioned elsewhere, and its position is unknown. Regarding the temple which Mamma built under the name of Mamma-svāmin, comp. iv. 698 sq. The names of Viṣṇu-temples are regularly formed by adding the term svāmin to the name of the person who built the shrine. This use of svāmin corresponds exactly to that of īśa, īśvara in the names of Ś'iva-temples; comp. note i. 106.

265. Reference is made to the rite of the pitṛtarpaṇa which forms a portion of the Samdhyā and S'raddha ceremonies.

✓267. Regarding the sacred mountain called S'rīparvata or S'rīśaila, see Viṣṇupur. ii. 141; v. 118, and P.W., s.v.

268. Sādhaka designates in Tantra texts and Māhātmyas the pupil who aspires to magic power. Here clearly a kind of famulus is meant. Comp. the Paddhatiratnamālā (Jammu MS., No. 5293), passim; the Sarvāntāra, etc.

MĀTRĒGUPTA.

269. "Then when I was preparing to fulfil this desire, he who bears the moon as his diadem (S'iva), directed me thus :"

270. "'He who is [now] your famulus (sādhaka), is a semi-divine attendant (ganu) of mine. I will truly carry out his wish in another birth.'"

271. "Therefore, Sir, the Lord will appear to you and fulfil your thought." With these words he (Aśvapāda) disappeared.

272. When he (Pravarasena) had passed a year there over ascetic exercises with the wish of securing the royal power, S'iva, who had been reminded by the saint's words [of his promise], appeared to him.

273. After S'iva, who wore the disguise of an ascetic, had declared that he would fulfil his desire, he (Pravarasena) asked from him that he might become a king [ever] awake for the conquest of the world.

274. S'ambhu (S'iva) wishing to ascertain his object, spoke to him: "Why, O prince, do you desire transitory enjoyments, neglectful of your salvation?"

275. He replied to him: "I have said this, thinking you were S'ambhu under the disguise of an ascetic. But indeed you are not that god, the lord of the world."

276. "Because the great when asked for little, give much of their own accord. That liberal [god, scil. S'iva] gave to him who asked in his thirst for milk, the ocean of milk."

277. "Do you not know of the exasperating overthrow of that noble family which [until its re-installation] must ever see misery [even] in celestial bliss?"

278. Then the lord of the world full of kindness granted his prayer, and manifesting himself in his [true] form spoke once more :

279. "In time when you are immersed in the pleasures of royal power, Aśvapāda will, by my order, carry to you the indication which will announce that you are to reach communion [with me]."

280. With these words the god disappeared, and he (Pravarasena) after bringing his ascetic observances to a close and taking leave of Aśvapāda, went forth towards his desired land.

281. When the ministers came into his presence after his story had become known, he restrained them from hostility against Mātrēgupta, addressing them thus :

282. "My mind is bent on destroying the arrogant Vikramāditya ; my mind is not irritated by anger against Mātrēgupta."

283. "What would be [gained] by crushing enemies who are unable to bear

276. The story of Upamanyu is alluded to ; comp. Mahābh. XIII. xiv. 352 sqq.

up with distress? It befits to aspire to victory over those who are able to uproot the former."

MĀTRGUPTA.

284. "Who else is slighted by the lotus-flowers but the moon whose rise they hate? What sense is then in his breaking the teeth of those elephant-princes which uproot those [lotus-flowers]? But, forsooth, the great, [eager] to manifest their strength, abandon the contest with those who are not their equals, and let loose their accumulated anger against those who have power over the former."

285. When on the march after the conquest of Trigarta, the prince received news that Vikramāditya had succumbed to the law of time (death).

286. That day the prince heaved continual sighs; standing with his face cast down he did not bathe nor eat nor sleep.

287. On the next day he heard that Mātrgupta, who had proceeded from Kāśmīr, abandoning the country, was encamped in the neighbourhood.

288. Apprehending that he might have been driven into exile by some of his own [partizans], Pravarasena approached him with a small escort.

289. After he had saluted him and [seen] him comfortably seated, the king bowed politely and gently inquired the reason why he had left the kingdom.

Abdication of Mātrgupta.

290. After keeping silent for a moment he (Mātrgupta) answered with a sigh, and smiling: "That benefactor, O king, is gone through whom I enjoyed the [rule of the] land."

291. "The sun-crystal shines in all directions as long as the rays of the sun rest on its surface; otherwise it does not shine at all, being only a stone."

292. The king replied: "Who has, O king, wronged you that you should regretfully mourn over that ruler with a desire for revenge?"

293. Mātrgupta then spoke with his underlip lit up by an angry smile: "Nobody, though he may be superior in strength, can injure me."

294. "Truly, when that discerning [ruler] raised me to a position of honour, he did not sacrifice butter in ashes nor sow corn in barren soil."

295. "But those who remember benefits and are the slaves of gratitude, follow even unconsciously, the footsteps of their benefactors."

296. "Does not the sun-crystal lose its light after the sun has gone down, and does not the moon-stone wither along with the waning moon?"

297. "Going, therefore, to holy Vārāṇasī with the hope of [finding] happiness in quietism, I desire to effect a complete renunciation as befits a Brahman."

298. "I am afraid even to look at the earth, which is cast in darkness without that sovereign who was like a lamp of jewels. What need I then say of contact with pleasures?"

299. After hearing in astonishment the words of that embodiment of proper feeling, the wise Pravarasena too spoke thus suitably :

300. " Truly, O king, this goddess earth brings forth jewels, since it produces for its own lustre pious and grateful persons like yourself."

301. " Who else is to be praised for his judgment but that sovereign who, alone in this world which is so dull, has fully comprehended you ? "

302. " Long, forsooth, would the roads of gratitude have been deserted, if you, O wise one, had not made your appearance on them."

303. " A worthless person when receiving a favour, generally thinks inwardly in this fashion : ' If it is not my luck which has ripened to-day, then why did he not give this to me before ? If he had no object with me, why does he not favour his own poor relatives ? If he were not afraid of my looking through his weaknesses, then would that greedy man give this away ? ' "

304. " Even a small honour [bestowed] on persons of exalted character, grows into a [tree of a] hundred branches, since it is nourished by their [previously] acquired merits."

305. " Therefore, you being the foremost of the virtuous and praised by the wise, are truly, like a tested jewel, highly valued by the righteous."

306. " Hence do me [this] favour, do not abandon the throne. May it be also to my credit that I have sided with the virtuous."

307. " May you again bestow your affection on the land which was granted [to you], first by him and afterwards also by me."

308. On hearing the king whose conduct was one of unfeigned generosity, speak thus, Mātṛgupta spoke smiling slowly the following words :

309. " Those words without which what has to be said, cannot be said, how should I proceed to utter them without overstepping the limits [of propriety] ? "

310. " Hence it may be that I say to-day also something impolite, though I have convinced myself that this your noble behaviour is unfeignedly true."

311. " Every one knows every one else's insignificance in previous conditions of life ; but one's greatness at the present time is known only to one's own mind."

312. " My former condition which is in your mind, and yours which is in mine, confuses us both. [Hence] we do not know our mutual feelings."

313. " How should a person of my sort, after having been king, receive back riches ? How should he brush aside with one step all propriety ? "

307. The pun lies in punar bhavam, which may be taken either as two separate words or as the Acc. s. f. to punarbhū, 'a remarried widow.'

310. Read °navadhīrya te, for °navadhīryate misprinted in text.

313. A king cannot accept gifts of grace.

314. "How could one like myself for the sake of mere enjoyments reduce the uncommon greatness of that king's generosity to the common level?"

315. "And supposing even that I should care for enjoyments, O king, who would prevent me from [having] them while I preserve my self-respect intact?"

316. "The benefit which he bestowed on me, would at once be wasted in my body, if not requited [by me]; this is certain."

317. "By following the way which was that of this ruler, I have to bring to light the fame which is [his due] for discerning between the worthy and the unworthy."

318. "Now that he is gone, to survive [only] in fame while so much yet remains to be done, I wish to show myself true to the bond by at least renouncing enjoyments."

319. When he had ended this speech, the lord of the earth said: "While you live, your riches are not to be touched by me."

320. Then the pious Mātṛgupta went to Vārāṇasī, assumed the reddish-brown garment [of an ascetic], and renouncing everything became a Yati.

321. King Pravarasena too kept firm to his resolve and sent the whole revenue of Kāśmīr straight off to Mātṛgupta.

322. The wise [Mātṛgupta], living on alms, handed over the wealth which he received against his will, to all who applied [to him], and thus continued to live for ten years.

323. The story of these three [thus] displaying self-conscious pride towards each other and mutual consideration, is [purifying like] the water of the Gangā.

324. King Pravarasena thereafter caused the great of the earth (i.e. kings or mountains) to bend low, and thus easily made his great fame pervade [all] regions.

Expeditions of
Pravarasena II.

325. His mighty glory, which like Agastya sucked up the ocean and overstepped the mountains, brought brightness to creation.

326. His army made the leaves of the Tamāla trees wither on the shores of the ocean and the leaves of the palms (tāḍī) fall off, and it removed the forehead-marks (tamālapattra) on the faces of the enemies' wives and tore off the earrings (tāḍīdala.)

315. Mātṛgupta is made here to say that if he cared for pleasures, he might indulge in them without sacrificing his pride, as he should have to in accepting the kingdom from Pravarasena.

✓ 325. Agastya, according to the epic legend, drunk up the ocean and made Mount Vindhya lower its height. Agastya as the star Canopus marks by his appearance the end of the rainy season, when the waters (included in the expression bhuvanāni, see gloss of A.) run clear again; comp. note ii. 140.

326. The double-meanings of tamālapattra and tāḍīdala make it necessary to give a paraphrase of this verse. Tāḍī, which the P.W. knows only from a Kośa, is still the name for a kind of earring in the Panjāb.

PRAVARASENA II.

327. By the flow of the [black] temple-juice of his war-elephants he gave the splendour of a junction with the Kālindī (Yamunā) to the eastern ocean embraced by the Gaṅgā.

328. By his armies which spread to the brink of the horizon, he uprooted the inhabitants of Surāṣṭra on the shore of the western ocean, and destroyed their kingdoms.

329. This earthly Indra, eager [only] for glory, extended among the kings his righteous conquest, free from love and hatred.

330. He replaced Pratāpaśīla, also called S'īlāditya, the son of Vikramāditya, who had been dethroned by enemies, in the kingdom of his father.

331. He then brought back from Vikramāditya's residence to his own capital the throne of his family which had been carried away by enemies.

332. Seven times he vanquished King Mummuni and let him off again, as under various pretences he did not acknowledge his defeat.

327. The water of the Yamunā is supposed to be dark and that of the Gaṅgā white; comp. vii. 1477.

328. Regarding Surāṣṭra, the ancient name of a portion of the Gujarāt peninsula, comp. CUNNINGHAM, Anc. Geogr., pp. 325 sq.

330. S'īlāditya-Pratāpaśīla can be identified with S'īlāditya of Mālava, whom Hien-tsiang (S'iyu-ki, ii. p. 261) mentions as having flourished sixty years before his own time and apparently indicates as the successor of Vikramāditya (i.e., i. p. 108). Prof. M. MÜLLER, India, p. 289, assigns to S'īlāditya hypothetically a reign from 560 to 600 A.D.

331. TROYER and LASSEN, Ind. Alt., ii. p. 812, have assumed that this verse referred to the famous throne of Vikramāditya which is frequently mentioned in the legends regarding the latter, and that Pravarasena was believed to have carried it back to Ujjayini. As sa in the preceding as well as in the following verse designates Pravarasena, it is clear that the latter must be understood also by tena in our verse. In this case, however, the expressions svapurāṇa and ānītaḥ . . . puṇar could not be appropriately used with reference to Ujjayini and Vikramāditya's throne. The general context renders it impossible to take Pratāpaśīla as the logical subject of the sentence (tena).

332. I am unable to say who was this obstinate opponent designated as 'King Mummuni.' The name must have been an old puzzle, as the reading of *A*₂ shows. There an attempt is made to get rid of it by dividing jitvā'muḥ munibhūhujam (for jitvā mummuni?) and referring the word to Pratāpaśīla.

The fact that the name recurs in iv. 167 and 518, disposes of this conjecture. In the first passage Mummuni is mentioned as having been three times defeated by Lalitāditya; in the second he is said to have formed with other kings the night-guard of Jayāpīṭha. The three different kings under whom Mummuni is named, are according to K.'s chronology separated by centuries. Hence it is clear that K. could not have meant the same person in all three passages.

Was Mummuni possibly the title or family name of the rulers of some country or tribe analogous to S'āhi, Khākān, or similar terms? The word is evidently of non-Indian origin, and in the passage iv. 167, describing Lalitāditya's march of conquest in the north, Mummuni is named between the Tukkhāras and the Bhauṭtas. The former must be located in Badakhshān, and the latter are undoubtedly the Tibetan inhabitants of Ladākh and the adjacent regions; comp. notes iv. 166; i. 312. As the Darads receive subsequently separate mention, we may possibly here have tribes of Turkish origin such as the conquests of the Great and Little Yue-tchi as well as of the White Huns brought into the regions of the Upper Indus, and thus within the sphere of Kāśmīr politics.

From the above passages must be kept separate viii. 1090, 2179 where a Mummuni, brother of Sanigata, is mentioned. He is named in the first place in a list of foreign Rājaputras and hill princelings who serve King Sussala as condottieri or gentlemen-adventurers. Without placing too much reliance on the identity of the names, it may be

333. Then when after the eighth time he boldly was going to put forth a [fresh] pretence, the king (Pravarasena) spoke in anger: "Fie over [such] beasts; let him be bound."

PRAVARASENA II.

334. Anxious about his safety, he (Mummuni) spoke: "As I am a beast, I ought not to be killed, O you manly one!" and thereupon he danced in the midst of his court, imitating a peacock.

335. Seeing him dance and utter cries like a peacock, the king granted him along with his safety a present such as is fit for an actor.

336. After the conquest of the world, while he resided in the city of his grandfather (Pravarasena I.), there arose in him the desire of founding a town after his own name.

Foundation of Pravarapura.

337. Once that hero, the sun among kings, went forth at night for adventures in order to ascertain in a supernatural way the place and the auspicious time [for the foundation of the new town].

338. The host of the stars, reflected on the jewelled points of the king's diadem as he moved about, appeared like protecting mustard-seeds.

339. Wandering about, he reached a stream which skirted the burning-ground and was bordered by trees looking terrible in the light of numerous funeral pyres.

suggested that in this instance we possibly have before us a late descendant of the princely family referred to in the earlier books. The continued use of the name Sāhi for descendants of the royal family of the 'Sāhis of Kābul' (see note v. 152) long after the destruction of its rule, is vouched for by passages, like vii. 178, 274, 1470, 1550; viii. 3290, and seems to offer an exact parallel. In the case of a foreign adventurer we could easily understand the substitution of his family name for his own personal one.—For another suggestion regarding the origin of the name, see note iv. 167.

The vv. of the name in I deserve little attention, as their variations are evidently due to mere blunders of transcription; iii. 331 sumati^o; iv. 167 muṣṣunih; iv. 616 suṣṣuni^o; viii. 1090 saṣṣuni^o; viii. 2178 niṣṣuni.

334-335. The curious story of Mummuni's peacock-dance might possibly have originated from some peculiar custom observed among Mummuni's people. For a similar popular legend got up in explanation of the habits of foreign nations, see iv. 179 sq.

336. According to iii. 99 we must assume that Purāṇādhishṭhāna is meant here as the residence of Pravarasena I. With this agrees fully the subsequent narrative regarding the foundation of the new Srinagara.

338. Grains of mustard-seed (sarapa) are still used in Kāśmīr as means of protection against evil spirits; they are, e.g., generally sewn into the caps of small children.

339-349. PRAVARAPURA-S'rinagara.—The legendary account which these verses give of the foundation of Pravarasena's town, can be correctly understood only in connection with the topography of modern Srinagar. At the latter CUNNINGHAM, Anc. Geogr., p. 91, has already correctly fixed the site of Pravarasena's capital. In support of this identification he referred to the general agreement of the description given in iii. 338 sqq. with the situation of the present capital and to the testimony furnished by Hiuen-tsiang. The latter names (Life, p. 69) as his quarters in the capital of Kāśmīr that very Vilāra of Jayendra which we know from iii. 356 to have been built by Pravarasena II.'s maternal uncle in the new city. Prof. BÜHLER has subsequently called attention to designations surviving for parts of the modern city, such as Diddamar (Diddāmaṭha) and Braḍmar (Bhaṭṭrakamaṭha), which prove its identity with the town of Pravarasena II.; see Report, p. 16.

The opinion expressed by these two scholars is further confirmed by the fact that the name Pravarapura (for Pravarasenapura)

PRAVARASENA II.

340. Then there appeared on the [other] bank of the stream before that powerful [prince] a big roaring demon with upraised arms.

341. Covered with red light by the flaming looks of that [demon] the king glowed, like a large mountain which is enveloped by the glare of meteors.

342. Then the Rākṣasa laughed, and raising with a loud voice a terrible echo in all directions, thus addressed that fearless [king] :

shortened bhīmanat) can be traced throughout the works of Kāsemendra, Bilhana, Kalhana and the later Chroniclers as the appellation of the city occupying the site of the present S'rinagar. To the present day it has also continued to be used in this sense in colophons of MSS., Janmapatras and other documents; comp. Rājat. iv. 311; viii. 2408; Samayam. i. 4; Pikram. xviii. 1, 70; S'rikanthac. iii. 21, with Jonaraja's Comm. on iii. 31, 68; S'riv. iii. 277; iv. 205, 336; Fourth Chron. 938. The most convincing proof is, however, furnished by the long list of buildings and localities which are mentioned by the Chronicle in the new capital, and which, beginning with Pravarasena's own great temple Pravarasēa, can actually be identified within the modern S'rinagar or its immediate vicinity.

Looking then within the precincts of the present S'rinagar for the local names mentioned in our legend, we can in the first place identify that of the river Mahāsarit. It had previously not been recognized as a name at all, but a series of passages proves that it was the ancient appellation of the stream which issues from the Dal lake and joins the Vitastā at the S.E. extremity of S'rinagar.

In viii. 339 K. relates that the body of King Uccala who had been murdered in his palace at S'rinagar, was hurriedly cremated by a few faithful servants at the burning-place which lay 'on the island situated at the confluence of the Mahāsarit and Vitastā.' A reference to the map of S'rinagar will show that the only island in or near the capital which can be said to be situated at the meeting of the Vitastā with another stream, is the great island of Māy'sum formed on the S. by the Vitastā and on the other sides by the two branches of the above named stream (comp. note iv. 88 on Māṅṣikavāsin : Māy'sum).

The conclusion to be drawn from this regarding the identity of K.'s Mahāsarit is further confirmed by the fact that close to the place where the western branch of the Dal stream joins the Vitastā (a little below the present First Bridge), there existed till the times of Mahārāja Ranbir Singh a Hindu burning Ghat. As the latter is mentioned already by S'riv., i. 442 eqq., in the fifteenth century in the identical locality, it can be safely assumed that it marked the site of the burning-ground referred to in viii. 339 and alluded to in our own passage. S'rivara gives to the place the more modern name Marisahyama, which from a passage of the Vitastāmāhātmya, xvii. 5, can be proved with certainty to apply to the junction above indicated.

Among the other passages of the Rājat. which refer to the Mahāsarit, viii. 733, 753, 1090, 1158, 3181 are also instructive. In them the stream is spoken of as on the line of attack upon the city, in particular for forces coming from the East (viii. 733, 753, 3181). A reference to the map will again show that the shallow stream coming from the Dal forms actually the south-eastern boundary for that part of S'rinagar which lies on the right bank of the Vitastā and contains the greater portion of the city. Protected as it is on the E. and W. by the lakes of the Dal and Anchar, and on the S. by the Vitastā, this part of S'rinagar can be attacked with advantage only over the narrow neck of land in the N. or across the stream issuing from the Dal in the S.E.

This stream, now known by the name of Tāṁṭh Kul, 'the apple-tree canal,' is bounded along its right or N. bank by an old embankment about one and a half miles long, which stretches from the rocky foot of the Takht hill in the E. close to the high-lying bank of the Vitastā in the W. There can be no doubt as to the antiquity of this embankment. Without it large portions of the city which are built along the low-lying shores of the Dal and the numerous channels stretching from the latter to the W., would along with all the 'floating gardens' of the lake be exposed to annual inundations from the river. A further proof of its antiquity is furnished by the fact that this embankment bears along with the quarter built on it merely the general name of Suth, from Skr. setu, 'dyke,' whereas all the other numerous embankments and causeways about S'rinagar have distinctive appellations.

Several topographical considerations combine to prove that it was this old dyke or setu which the popular legend related by K. represented as the leg and knee of the demon

343. "Excepting Vikramāditya and S'ādraka who excels in courage, and yourself, O protector of the earth, it is difficult to find perfect fortitude elsewhere."

344. "Your desire, O ruler of the earth, will be fulfilled. Come to my side after crossing this embankment."

345. With these words the Rākṣasa stretched out his own knee from the other bank and thus caused the water of the Mahāsarit [stream] to be parted by an embankment (setu).

346. The courageous Pravarasena thereupon drew his dagger from its sheath, knowing that the embankment was formed by a limb of the Rākṣasa's body.

347. The place to which he crossed over, after having cut with this [dagger] the flesh of that [Rākṣasa] and thus made a flight of steps, is called Kṣurikābala.

343. King S'ādraka is like Vikramāditya a favourite hero of the fable literature; comp. e.g., Kaikās, lxxviii. 5 sqq.

347. I prefer the reading kṣurikābala of A, to kṣurikābhāla of A, and °bāla of L, in view of the modern name Khuṛḍbal to which it corresponds. The Ks. word bal, meaning 'place,' is frequently found as the final part of local names in Kāśmīr; comp. yāṛbal (see note i. 40), Mūṛbal, Pokṛbal, etc.

who helped Pravarasena to cross the Mahāsarit. In the first place we can see from the map that the dyke described actually turns sharply at an angle of 90 degrees opposite to the camping-ground known as the Cinār Bāgh. It thus curiously resembles a bent knee. Still more convincing is the fact that we find the name of Kṣurikābala, which according to verse iii. 347 marked the spot where Pravarasena reached firm ground, still attaching in its Ks. derivative Khuṛḍbal, to the city quarter situated at the W. end of the embankment. [For the phonetic connection of Khuṛḍbal, and Kṣurikābala, comp. Ks. khūr < Skr. kpura. A new popular etymology which saw in khūr the word khud, 'hollow,' might have helped in the change of Kṣurikābala > Khuṛḍbal.] Finally it should be noted that K's description of the 'Setu' dividing the water of the Mahāsarit (mahāsarito vāri setusimantitam, iii. 345) is exactly applicable to the Suth, if we assume that the various channels and marshes which lie immediately to the N. of the dyke, and are like the Tsunph Kul fed by the waters of the Pal, were also comprised under the name of Mahāsarit.

That this was indeed the case, is rendered highly probable by the fact that the whole network of these waterways to the N. of the Suth has retained to the present day the name of Mār, which we have encountered above in the form Māri as an earlier appellation of the Tsunph Kul. The question whether we have to see in this form Mār a phonetic derivative of Skr. Mahāsarit or vice versa in the latter form a Skr. adaptation of some earlier Ks. name, cannot be settled from our present materials, and its decision would not affect the topographical conclusions above indicated.

[Long after I had arrived at this conclusion I noticed the curious remark incidentally made by Vigne, ii. 69, which ascribes the construction of the embankment from the foot of the Takht hill to the city to Pravarasena. As Vigne had no other materials regarding the Rājat, than Wilson's abstract, which does not mention the legend here discussed, this notice must have been derived from oral information. At present no such tradition survives regarding the Suth.]

The name of the village S'arīṭaka, where the demon showed to Pravarasena the site for his new town, can no longer be traced, but its position is sufficiently indicated by the mention of the goddess S'arīkā. The latter, a form of Durgā, has been worshipped since ancient times on the N.W. side of the hill which lies immediately to the N. of the central part of S'rīnagar and is called after her S'arīkāparvatā or Ks. Hārparvat; comp. Jonar. 403; Fourth Chron., 944, 589, also Report, p. 17. The distance of the hill from Khuṛḍbal is about one and three-quarter miles.

The legend told at length in the S'arīkā-māhātmya relates that Durgā, taking the shape of a S'arīkā bird (Maina), carried in her beak the hill from Mount Maru to its present place in order to close a gate of the Daityas dwelling in hell. Subsequently she took up

PRAVARASENA II.

348. When he stood near the demon indicated to him the auspicious time (lagna) and disappeared after saying: "Build [your] town where to-morrow you see the measuring line laid down by me."

349. He discovered that [measuring line] which the Vetāla had laid down, at the village S'āritāka at which the goddess S'ārikā and the demon (yakṣa) Aṭṭa resided.

350. When he was first about to consecrate the [Linga of] Pravareśvara in pious devotion, the [image of Viṣṇu] Jayasvāmin seated itself of its own accord on the base (pīṭha) after breaking the sacred diagram (yantra).

351. This [image of Viṣṇu] was called by the king after the name of the architect Jaya who knew the auspicious time (lagna) which the Vetāla had indicated.

348. For the meaning of the term sūtra-pātana, comp. iv. 58.

350-351. The story here alluded to can be better understood by reference to the exactly corresponding legend related more fully in iii. 451 sqq. of the images Raṇeśvara and Raṇasvāmin. Pravarasena, who from the previous account may be supposed to be a worshipper of Śiva (comp. iii. 270 sqq., also iii. 365), wishes to consecrate first the Linga of Śiva-Pravareśvara. By a miracle, however, there appears in the place prepared for the Linga the image of Viṣṇu Jayasvāmin. As according to the rules given for the pratiṣṭhā of sacred images, special diagrams or yantras have to be traced on the ground for each god, Viṣṇu cannot occupy the base prepared for Śiva's emblem without removing the yantra of the latter. The story derives the name given to the Viṣṇu shrine of Pravarasena from that of his architect. Compare regarding yantras

Viṣṇudharmottara, iii., and for the use of the term svāmin in names of Viṣṇu-images, note iii. 263.

The shrine of Jayasvāmin is referred to only once more, in v. 443, as Jayasvāminivocana, and its position is not known. That of the Pravareśa temple can be fixed with great probability at a site in the centre of Srinagar, between the S. foot of the Hār-parvat and the Jāma' Masjid, now occupied by the Zīrat of Bahā'ud-dīn Sāhib. The old cemetery which surrounds the Zīrat, contains in its walls and tombs many ancient remains.

At the S.W. corner of the cemetery stands an ancient gateway of great height and width, built of blocks of remarkable size; its roof must have fallen in long ago. This gateway is designated by Brahman tradition as a part of 'Pravarasena's temple' and as the place where this king ascended to heaven. It is evidently the gate to which the tradition, her abode on the hill to make sure of their not escaping. This story is also briefly referred to in the Kathāsar. lxiii. 109 sqq. For another name of the hill, Pradyumnapiṭha, comp. note iii. 459. [A modern popular etymology, generally accepted by Panjābīs and Europeans, has turned the Hill of Śārikā into the 'Hill of Hari' or 'the Verdant Mountain'; comp. VIÑE, ii. p. 59; BERNIER, Travels, p. 395.]

I have not been able to find any other mention of the demon Aṭṭa who, according to the translation given above of iii. 349, is referred to as residing with Śārikā at the village S'āritāka. It is possible that he figured merely in the popular etymology of the name S'āritāka which that verse evidently alludes to. But it may be noted that another translation is also possible. Aṭṭa might be taken as an instrumental from the word aṭṭa,

'tower,' which would be a poetic designation of the hill, called śṛṅga in the Mahātmya. We should then translate: "... at the village S'āritāka, at which the goddess Śārikā with her towering [hill] and the Yakṣa resided." The demon of the legend whom K. calls alternately bhūta, raṇas, vetāla, might well be designated also as yakṣa.

A. renders S'āritāka by Haratāṭh. If this gloss is intended for the name of the village Hār-tratāṭh, in the Pārāpor Pargana, 74° 41' long. 34° 9' lat., no value can be attached to it, as the distance of the latter place from Srinagar precludes all thought of its being meant in the legend here related.

From vi. 191 it appears that the locality where the Vetāla was supposed to have laid his measuring line, was known by the name of Vetālasūtravṛtā; but its position cannot be clearly gathered from that passage.

352. Owing to his (Pravarasena's) devoted worship the [image of] Vināyaka, [called] Bhīmasvāmin, of its own accord turned its face from west to east in order [to show that he was] not averse to [his] city.

353. In this city he, [who ruled] like Indra over the five races [of men], established [shrines of] five goddesses, who were designated by the word śrī as Sailbhāvaśrī and so on.

354. This king had the 'Great Bridge' (Brhatsetu) built on the Vitastā. Only since then is such construction of boat-bridges (nausetu) known.

355. Jayendra, the maternal uncle of the king, caused the illustrious Jayendravāhara and a [statue of the] 'Great Buddha' (Brhadbuddha) to be erected.

356. The minister Morūka who had possession of Sinhala and the other isles, built the Morūkabhavana, a wonder of the world.

357. That city at the limits of which stood the [temples of] Vardhanasvāmin and Viśvakarman, was once famous [as containing] thirty-six lakhs of houses.

related in iii. 378 and by BILHANA in Vikram. xviii. 98, was attached in K.'s time. It is not certain, whether in the passage vii. 109, where a rehyapīṭha of Pravarasa is mentioned, this temple or the earlier shrine of Pravarasena I. (see iii. 99) is referred to.

352. Gaṇeśa (Vināyaka) is worshipped to this day under the name of Bhīmasvāminagaṇeśa in a rock lying at the foot of the southern extremity of the Har'parvat (S'arikapārvata) close to the Bāh'adarwāza of Akbar's fortresses. Under the thick layer of red daub with which the stone is covered by the worshippers, its supposed resemblance to the head of the elephant-faced god cannot now be traced, nor whether the face is turned west or east. S'riv. iii. 207, mentions the erection under Zain-ul-'abidin of a new shrine in honour of Bhīmasvāminagaṇeśa. The rock image of the latter is referred to also by Śhībrām in the Tirthas. In its immediate vicinity lies the Zīarat of Muquddam Saliḥ, one of the most popular Muhammadan pilgrimage-places of the Valley.

353. Nothing is known otherwise about the temples of these goddesses.

354. Brhatsetu, 'the Great Bridge,' must be taken in all probability as a proper name; it is certainly used as such in viii. 1171. Unfortunately the latter passage does not furnish a clear indication of the bridge's position, though it shows that the latter was at some distance from Māksikasvāmin (Māy'sum). Boat-bridges are mentioned by K. in the time of Harṣa, vii. 1649, and by S'riv. iv. 196.

It is curious that of the numerous permanent wooden bridges over the Vitastā, whose peculiar construction has attracted the notice of all modern travellers in Kāśmīr (comp., e.g. VIGNÉ, ii. p. 23), none can be traced back to an earlier date than the Zaina Kadal, one of the seven bridges of S'rinagar, built by Zain-ul-'abidin (S'riv. i. 232, 296) in the 15th century. Were the engineers of the Hindu period who showed such skill in stone architecture, less versed in bridge construction than their Muhammadan successors, who built chiefly in wood? Compare note vii. 1077.

355. The 'Life' of Hsüen-tsiang, p. 69, relates that the pilgrim on his arrival at the Kāśmīr capital stopped at the convent (Vihāra) of Che-ye-in-to-lo or Jayendra. There he received instruction in the various S'āstras from the chief of the priests of the establishment and probably spent most of his two years' stay in the country (ibid. 631-633 A.D.). That this establishment was identical with the Jayendravāhara of our text, as first pointed out by Dr. BHÄU DAJĪ, J. B. Br. R. A. S., 1861, p. 223, cannot be doubted.

Jayendra's 'Great Buddha' was probably a colossal statue like the Brhadbuddha, which King Lalitāditya erected in copper at Purīḥasapura, according to iv. 203. From vi. 171 sqq. we learn that the Jayendravāhara was burned and its Buddha-statue melted down by King Kṣemagupta, who used its brass for the construction of the Kṣemagaurīśvara temple. Another colossal Buddha statue in the city is mentioned under Harṣa and Sussala, vii. 1097 sq.; viii. 1184. For a Brhadbuddha which survived to the 14th century, see Jonar. 430.

356. No further mention is found of the Vihāra (or temple) of this fortunate minister whom K. credits with the possession of Ceylon.

357. The site of neither of these two

PRAVARASENA II.

358. He built [that] city, which was provided with regularly arranged markets, at first indeed only on the right bank of the Vitastā.

359. There are mansions which reach to the clouds, and ascending which one sees the earth, glistening in the rain at the close of the summer and covered with flowers in [the month of] Caitra.

360. Apart from that city, where else on earth can one find easily streams meeting, pure and lovely, at pleasure-residences and near market streets?

361. Nowhere else is seen in the centre of a city a pleasure-hill from which the splendour of all the houses is visible as if from the sky.

362. Where else do the inhabitants on a hot summer day find before their houses water like that of the Vitastā, [cooled] by large lumps of snow?

363. In that [city] the kings have provided for each temple [such] riches that with them the earth up to the encircling oceans could be bought a thousand times over.

364. While he who was like the creator among kings resided in this city, there passed slowly sixty years of his tenure of sovereign power.

365. On his forehead, which bore the mark of [S'iva's] spear, the locks whitened by age created the illusion that the waves of the Gaṅgā had attached themselves [to his forehead] by mistaking [it for that] of S'iva.

366. At that time Aśvapāda despatched by S'iva's command Jayanta, a Kāśmīrian Brahman, who had just joined him as an attendant, [with these words]:

367. "You are tired, O wanderer. What you desire you will not get from any other land. Deliver this letter to King Pravarasena."

368. When after saying these words he had handed the letter to that [Brahman], the latter spoke: "Exhausted by travelling, I am unable to start at once on a great journey."

369. "Then bathe to-day, since I who am of the Kāpālīn sect, have touched you who are a Brahman." With these words he (Aśvapāda) threw him into the water of the oblong pond close by.

370. When he opened his eyes, he saw himself standing in his own land, shrines can be ascertained now. The Var-dhamasāmīn is mentioned again, vi. 181, as marking (together with Bhikṣukipāraka) the extreme limit of a great fire which devastated the houses standing in 'Vetālasūtrapāta.' Vivakarmam is not referred to again, unless, perhaps, in the corrupt passage viii. 2488.

360. K. evidently alludes here to the numerous canals from the Dal and Anchar lakes which intersect the suburbs of Srinagar and pass also into the centre of the city. The principal Bazaars are still built along the banks of the river and canals, which themselves serve as main thoroughfares. The epithet 'parivra' scarcely agrees with the actual condition of these waterways, but may pass as poetical license.

361. The Uār-parvat or 'Hill of Sārikā' is meant, which affords a great panoramic view of Srinagar; comp. note iii. 389-349.

365. The Gaṅgā, with white waves, is supposed to flow from S'iva's head.

and the servants of the king, who was engaged in worship, busy with carrying water.

PRAVARASENA II.

371. Then in order to announce himself he threw without hesitation the letter into a washing-pot which was being carried from the river to the king.

372. When the king who was washing the [Lāṅga of] Pravaraseṇa, had read the letter which had been thrown out again from that pot, he ordered Jayanta to be brought before him.

373. "You have done what was to be done; you have given large [presents], enjoyed pleasures and passed through life. What else is there to do for you? Go and betake yourself to S'iva's abode."

374. When through this [letter] the message had come, he (Pravarasena) satisfied that [Brahman] by granting his desire, and breaking through that palace of stone entered the spotless sky.

375. The people saw him as he moved in the direction which is marked by [Mount] Kailāsa, while producing a second sunrise on the bright sky.

376. Jayanta, after obtaining riches through this wonderful event, turned them to pious use by establishing Agrahāras which bore his own name, and by other [holy] works.

377. The best of kings after enjoying the sovereignty of the world, thus joined in his very body the assembly of the lord of beings (S'iva).

378. At the temple of Pravaraseṇa, the place where the king obtained supernatural perfection (siddhi), there is seen even to this day a gate which rivals the gate of heaven.

379. Yudhiṣṭhira [II.], who was born from that [king's] queen Ratnaprabhā, ruled the earth for forty years less nine months.

YUDHIṢṬHIRA II.

380. His ministers, who bore the names Sarvaratna, Jaya and Skandagupta, obtained distinction by [erecting] Vihāras, Caityas and by other [pious] works.

378. The legend of Pravarasena's bodily ascension to heaven at the temple of Pravaraseṇa was known already to Bilhana in the same form as narrated in our passage. In Pikram. xviii. 28 he described the temple of Pravaraseṇa as 'showing to this day a gap above resembling the gate of heaven (svargadvāra-pratīmam upari cchidram), through which King Pravara bodily ascended to heaven.'

In note iii. 350 sq. it has already been shown that the identical tradition attaches still at the present day to an ancient ruined gateway which in all probability belonged to the Pravaraseṇa temple. On the site of the latter stands now the Zīkrat of Bahā'-ud-dīn Ṣahīb built with its remains.

The words used by K. in our verse bear a curious resemblance to those of Bilhana, especially if we adopt the reading of A₂ cchidram instead of dvāram of A₁. Is this resemblance due to reminiscence from the earlier Kāvya on the part of K.?

379. I have preferred caturvīṃśatim of A₂ L to caturvīṃśatim of A₁, as only with the former figure we can obtain the total of 1328 years for the reigns of the Tarāṅgas ii-viii. which is required by the theoretical basis of K.'s chronology; comp. notes on i. 50, 53 and Dr. HULTZSCH's remarks, Ind. Ant., xviii. p. 99.

380. The Vihāra built by Skandagupta is clearly the Skandabhavanavihāra mentioned vi. 137; regarding the position of the latter, indicated by the modern Khandābavan in

YUDHIṢṬHIRA II.

381. A minister of his was also Vajrendra, the son of Jayendra, who made the village of Bhavaccheda famous by the construction of Caityas and other [sacred buildings].

382. Among his chief ministers were also Kumārasena and others, who fixed the sandal-powder marks of their fame on the faces of the maidens [representing] the quarters of the horizon.

‡ LAHKHANA-NARENDRĀDITYA.

383. His son from [queen] Padmāvati was Narendrāditya, who bore a second name, Lahkhana, and who built the temple of Narendrasvāmin.

384. Vajra and Kanaka, the sons of Vajrendra, distinguished by pious deeds, were his ministers and Vimalaprabhā his queen.

385. After establishing his own [special] office for the keeping of records, this strong-armed [ruler] ascended to heaven after [a reign of] thirteen years.

RANĀDITYA.

386. Then his younger brother Ranāditya became king, whom the people forthwith called by another name, Tuñjina.

387. His head which was formed like a shell and different from [that of all] beings, showed as unprecedented splendour as if the sun had been absorbed in the moon.

Srinagar, see the note on that passage. As to the abbreviated form Skanda for Skandagupta, used bhīmaavat, compare my remarks on the names of other Kāśmīr Vihāras, Notes on Ou-k'ong, pp. 5, 9.

By the 'monastère de Je-je' which Ou-k'ong mentions in Kāśmīr (Journal asiat., 1895, vi. p. 364), may possibly be meant a Vihāra erected by Jaya.

381. Bhavaccheda may be identified on the strength of the gloss Bhaucho written by A, with the modern Būts, a village situated in the Vular Pargana, circ. 75° 9' long. 33° 54' lat. (marked as 'Bosoo' on larger Survey map one mile to S. of 'Mir-Sangrama').

383. The name Lahkhana which A, writes with the Jihvāmūliya before kh, can be read clearly in the latter spelling on the obverse of a silver coin described by Gen. CUNNINGHAM, Later Indo-Scythians, pp. 97, 111 and Pl. vii. 12. It shows the legend [Rā]ja Lahkhana Udayāditya, read by C. 'Rāja Lakhana [?] Udayāditya.' Cunningham, though not recognizing the name as occurring also in our passage, had rightly ascribed this coin to Kāśmīr, on the ground of the striking resemblance it bears 'in type and size and general fabric' to the unique coin of Deva Śahi Khingila (represented l.c., Pl. vii. 11). The latter ruler has been identified with the Khinkhila or Narendrāditya I. of Rājat. i. 347 (comp. note).

There is a close connection between the type ('Sassanian Bust') of these two coins and that of others bearing the names of Jabūla, Mihirakula, Hivanyakula (?). Cunningham was thus fully justified in assuming that they all belong to rulers of the Ephthalites or White Huns. As the dominions of the latter included also Kāśmīr, it appears very probable that by Lahkhana-Narendrāditya of the Rājat is meant the same king who calls himself Lahkhana-Udayāditya on the coins.

As in the case of Khinkhila, so we have here an Indian appellation used by the side of the foreign name Lahkhana. Why this Indian name should have been differently recorded by K., is a question which our present materials do not permit us to answer. But it is certainly curious that copper coins closely resembling in type the coins of the above mentioned Ephthalite rulers actually show the name Narendra (see Cunningham, l.c., p. 118 and Pl. ix. 12).

386. Compare the similar expression used iii. 97 with reference to S'reṣṭhasena-Tuñjina.

387. The shell-shaped form of head is a point of beauty. The simile alludes to the resemblance between the shell and the moon as regards whiteness.

388. His sword (dhārādhara) descended on the forests of his enemies' necks, while the eye-cavities of their women were overflowing with water (tears).

389. The fire of his glory, which was such as had never been witnessed before, when it entered the enemies' land, put streams of water in the eyes of [their] women, and made the grass sprout in their mansions.

390. When his sword had attached itself to his hand, then there danced none but headless corpsees in the force of his opponents.

391. This [prince] of divine appearance had as wife a goddess of an inexhaustible power, the S'akti of Viṣṇu, who had come to the earth under the name of Raṇārambhā.

392. He namely had been a gambler in a former birth, and once on losing all his property to gamblers had fallen into desperation.

Legend of Bhramaravāsini.

393. Though prepared to throw away his life he yet considered how he might gain something. Gamblers do not neglect [a chance of] profit, even to their very end.

394. He desired to see on the Vindhya [mountain] the goddess Bhramaravāsini, to see whom would not be fruitless, hoping [to obtain from her] the choice of a boon and feeling indifferent as to his own life.

395. For the mortal who proceeds to her abode, [the way for] five Yojanas is indeed difficult to pass, since he is pierced by bees which have sharp stings, and by other [insects].

396. He wisely thought that it would not be difficult to provide a protection against these [bees], whose stings are [hard as] diamonds, for a body which was bound to be lost.

397. He first covered his body with a metal armour, then with a buffalo's hide, and then put on a plaster of clay mixed with cow-dung.

398. After he had dried the repeated layers of clay on his body in the rays of the sun, he [looking] like a moving clod of earth set out with a strong resolution.

399. Leaving [behind him] the easy path along with the hope of life, he then entered a cave which was terrifying by its dense darkness.

400. Thereupon there issued from the recesses multitudes of bees menacing the ear by the sound of their wings, which resembled the noise of funeral music.

388. The pun turns on the word dhārādhara which means both sword and cloud.

391. The S'akti or active energy of Viṣṇu is embodied in Lakṣmī.

394. Bhramaravāsini is a form of Durgā, better known by the name Vindhya.

comp. references in P.W. under the latter word and also Bhramari.

395. Geheimrath BÖHLINGK suggests, Mélanges asiat., vii. p. 474, the emendation pucchādhyaiḥ for pucchādyaik of the MSS., "which have plenty of sharp stings."

RANĀDITYA.

401. Those [bees] whose eyes were affected by the dust [arising] from the dry coat of clay, could not attack with [full] force though they struck out to wound [him].

402. Those bees which had their eyes blinded by the dust, drew off; but the ever fresh [swarms] which flew forth, pierced the coat of clay.

403. While he was proceeding for three Yojanas on the path, the armour of clay being pierced by these fierce [bees] was gradually destroyed.

404. Thereupon arose a fearful and terrifying crackling noise from their striking incessantly at the buffalo's hide.

405. After passing one half of the fourth Yojana he knew by the rattle that the bees were falling upon the metal armour.

406. Then running with full might he lost his war-armour, which was pierced through by the bees, but his mind did not lose its firm resolve.

407. When he was only a Gavyūti from the residence of the goddess, he, full of courage and resolution, ran on shaking off the bees with his arms.

408. Then, with his body reduced to sinews and bones and stripped of his flesh by the bees, he reached the shrine of the goddess, protecting his eyes with his arms.

409. When the onslaught of the bees had ceased, and he saw the light, he fell down before the feet of the goddess as his life was about to escape.

410. Then the goddess, in order to restore the little life there remained in him, gave him a fine body and touched his limbs with her hand.

411. As soon as the touch of the goddess's hand dripping with nectar had restored his strength, he cast his looks about in [all] directions.

412. The goddess of terrible appearance whom he had seen just on reaching the edge of the throne, that [goddess] he then saw no more.

413. But, standing in a bower of creepers by the side of a lotus-pond, he saw a playful lotus-eyed young maiden.

414. As an offering (argha) she carried the pearls of a necklace; her body had been worshipped by Youth with precious blossoms of beauty, while his folded hands [appeared in the shape of] her swelling breasts.

415. She had feet which were most charmingly [coloured] with red lac (yāvakaḥārīṇau), which seemed to move with difficulty and which appeared

412. L confirms the reading of A, punaḥ against paraḥ A.

414. The pearls are likened to the rice-corns offered at worship before the statue of Durgā; the charms which Youth bestows, to the flowers which are thrown before it from the folded hands of the worshipper. In the pair of breasts which Youth makes swell, the poet sees the folded hands of the worshippers.

415. The pun lies in the word yāvakaḥārīṇau, which can be taken either as yāvakena, ā-samantāt, hārīṇau or as 'feeding on barley' (yāvaka āhāro yayoj). A diet of daily to perform austerities in their desire to see her face hidden by her breasts.

416. With her underlip which was [red] like a shining (bhāsvat) Bimba fruit; with her black (kṛṣṇa) locks, with her moon-face, with her waist like that of a lion (hari), and with her graceful (siva) figure, she seemed to unite all gods [in her person].

417. Seeing himself alone with this [maid] of faultless body in the bloom of youth, he was overcome by love-desire, which knows not restraint on account of disparity [of birth].

418. Hiding her inaccessibility under the abundance of her beauty's charms, she appeared to him in his thought an Apsaras, but not a goddess.

419. Moved by compassion she spoke to him: "Long have you suffered on the way. Having recovered you shall choose at once, O dear one, a suitable boon."

420. He said to her: "At the sight of you my pain has ceased. But how can you if you are not a goddess grant the choice of a boon?"

421. The goddess answered him: "What troubles your mind, my good friend? Whether I be a goddess or not, yet I can let you choose a boon."

422. Upon these words he made her promise to accede to his prayer, and then asked her, far exceeding the bounds [of propriety], for sexual union.

423. She spoke to him: "O wrong-minded one, what improper procedure is this of yours? Ask for something else, because I am Bhramara-vāsini."

424. Even when knowing her to be the goddess, his mind did not take heed. Who has [ever] suppressed desires which originate from other births?

425. He said to her: "If, O goddess, you care for your word to be true, fulfil my prayer. My desire is for nothing else."

426. "For the perfume (adhivāsa) which becomes once attached to persons in a former [birth], remains irremovable in them even to the end, like that of sesamum-grains (tila)."

427. "Be you a goddess or a charming woman, terrible also or beautiful,—as I have seen you before, just so you appear to me."

barley is prescribed at certain vratas; comp. yāvakakṛcakra in P.W. The slow movement of a lady's feet, often likened to the stepping of an elephant, is considered graceful; comp. the expressions gajāgāmini, alagāmanū in N.P.W.

416. The several compounds describing the goddess also contain the names of the gods Sūrya (bhāsvat), Kṛṣṇa, Soma, Hari (Indra) and S'iva.

426. The expression adhivāsa alludes to the vāsanaḥ, mentioned in verse 424.

RĀṆĀDITYA.

428. When he spoke thus, she knew that his resolve was immovable, and acceded with the words : " So it shall be in another birth."

429. " For those who are of the order of mortals, cannot touch divine women. Therefore go, O you whose determination is strong." Having spoken these words, she disappeared.

430. In the hope that he might obtain a [fresh] birth in union with the goddess, he then sacrificed his body from the end of a branch of the [sacred] fig-tree at Prayāga.

431. He was born on earth as Raṇāditya, and she, who retained the recollection of her former birth even in her mortal existence, as Raṇārambhā.

432. The king of the Colas, Ratiseṇa by name, when about to pay worship to the ocean, received her from the depth of the sea like a glittering string of pearls.

433. From childhood her divine speech was noticed, and to youth she was an adornment. As worthy of a divine wooer, the king did not give her [in marriage] to rulers of the earth though they asked [for her].

434. When he thus desired to give a refusal to the minister of King Raṇāditya, who had arrived on a mission, she herself declared this suit to be the best.

435. For this very reason she related her origin, and thereupon her father sent her in haste to the residence of his friend, the king of Kulūta.

436. Raṇāditya went with joy to that not distant land, and after celebrating the marriage made her the presiding deity of his seraglio.

437. As she was afraid of the touch of a mortal, she never touched him though his queen-in-chief, but deceived him through magic.

438. She placed on the king's bed a phantom woman resembling her, and she herself went forth at night in the form of a bee.

Story of the Raṇaśvara and Kulūta systems.

439. He being a votary of S'iva built two temples, in his own name and in that of his wife, and had two S'iva-lingas prepared by masons.

440. When the event of the consecration was arranged for the next day, a certain astrologer who had arrived from abroad, reviled both these Lingas.

441. He declared with firm conviction again and again that the interior of the two sculptured Lingas was full of broken bits of stone and frogs.

442. Then when the king felt bewildered as to what was to be done, and disconcerted over the obstacle against the consecration, the queen who was possessed of divine sight, said to him of her own accord :

/ 432. Regarding the land of the Colas, see note i. 300.

/ 435. Kulūta is the modern hill-district of Kullu in the upper valley of the Bias; comp.

CUNNINGHAM, Anc. Geogr., p. 142, and references from Bṛhatsaṃhitā, Ind. Ant., xxii. p. 182.

436. Read in Ed. prahṛṣṭam°.

443. "O king, once at the marriage of Pārvatī, Prajāpati, who filled the office of Purohita, brought his own divine image for purpose of worship from his store of sacrificial implements."

444. "Then S'iva when he saw that it was Viṣṇu's image which was being worshipped by him, thought it of no value, as it were, as it represented only the S'akti without S'iva [himself]."

445. "Thereupon he (S'iva) put together into a lump the jewels which the invited gods and Asuras had brought as marriage presents, and thus formed himself a Liṅga famous in the universe."

446. "That image of Viṣṇu and that Liṅga which S'iva had worshipped and which deserved to be worshipped by the Creator (Prajāpati) himself, came in the course of time into Rāvaṇa's possession."

447. "The two images which Rāvaṇa also worshipped, were long; at Lankā, and were at his death carried away by the monkeys."

448. "The monkeys which lived on the Himālaya mountain, stupid as beasts are, after satisfying their curiosity, dropped the [images of the] two gods in the Uttaramūnasa [lake]."

449. "I already have had those two [Liṅgas] raised from that lake by skilful workmen. To-morrow you will certainly see them brought here."

450. "These two should [then] be consecrated." Thus spoke the queen to the king, and retiring into the seraglio she addressed her thoughts to the demigods which move in the air.

451. These appeared at her mere thought, and, at the bidding of the goddess, raised the [images of the] two gods Hari (Viṣṇu) and Hara (S'iva) from the water, and deposited them at the king's palace.

452. In the morning the people seeing the [images of] Haru and Nārīyaṇa covered with divine blossoms at the royal residence were utterly astonished.

453-454. When the auspicious time (lagna) for the consecration was at hand, and when the king, being of the S'aiva persuasion (māheśvara), was just preparing to consecrate first the [Liṅga of] Raṇeśvara, the [image of] Raṇa-svāmin through the power of Raṇārambhā seated itself miraculously on the base (pīṭha), after breaking the sacred diagram (yantra).

444. Viṣṇu is considered as an embodiment of S'iva's S'akti or 'energy'; comp. e.g. Vāyupur. xv. 23 sqq.; Kīrmapur. II. iv. p. 466.
448. By Uttaramūnasa is meant the sacred Gaṅga-lake situated below the E. glaciers of Mount Haramukh and popularly known as Gaṅgabal; see note i. 57. The same designation is given to this lake in the Haramukha-mahātmya and Haracar. iv. 87 sqq.

The name is found also in the Nilamata, 910, 970, 1263.

453-454. Compare for the story here related the explanations given in note iii. 350-351.

From the legend related by K. it can be concluded that the shrines of Raṇeśa and Raṇasvāmin were within or near the city of S'rinagar and at no great distance from each

RANĀDITYA.

455. When thereupon the queen with a wish of testing its power placed property at its disposal, that self-created [image of Viṣṇu] directed itself the grant of various villages by its worshippers.

456-458. In the mind of some people there survives even to this day [another] version, namely, that there lived a magician (śiddha) called Brahman, under the disguise of a waterman; that the queen recognizing [his true character] made him consecrate those two [images]; that finding himself recognized he moved through the air after consecrating the Raṇeśvara [Linga] and effected the consecration of Raṇasvāmin in a secret manner; but that he was noticed by the people to have placed himself on the base (piṭha) in an Avatāra.

459. In honour of this magician who was the very image of Brahman and the foremost of the philosophers (brahmarid), the queen caused the exceedingly splendid [hall called] Brahmamaṇḍapa to be erected.

other. That of Raṇeśa is not mentioned again. The temple of Raṇasvāmin, however, appears to have enjoyed greater celebrity, and some of the references permit us to trace its approximate position. K.'s mention in v. 394 of a visit paid to Raṇasvāmin by Cakravartan's queen in the month of Magha, which is the time for the greatest snowfall in the Valley and, therefore, least suitable for travelling, shows that the shrine must have been within easy reach from the palace. In S'rikarṇāṭha, iii. 68, Maṅkha, Kalhana's contemporary, refers to his father's worship of Raṇasvāmin, and Jonarāja in his commentary distinctly describes the latter as 'S'ripravarapura-pradhānadevatā.'

Jonarāja in his own chronicle, 872, has further left us the notice, that Zain-ul-'ābidin carried the canal called Jainagahā on which his new 'town' Jainanagari was built, 'as far as Raṇasvāmin.' As Jonarāja indicates in verse 870 with laudable accuracy the Pradyumnagari and Amareśapura, i.e. the Hār'parvat and Āmburhār (see note i. 287), as the extreme limits of Jainanagari, it is clear that this canal is identical with the one now called Lach'm Kul (Skr. Lakṣmikulya*) which brings the water of the Sind river via Āmburhār into the quarters of Naushahr and Sangin Darwāza. The latter lies immediately to the W. of the Hār'parvat. The canal continues hence its easterly direction to the Jama' Masjid and ultimately empties itself into the Mār canal near the bridge called Kād' Kadal.

If it could be proved that the present termination of the Lach'm Kul is the same which Jonarāja († 1459 A.D.) knew in the time of Zain-ul-'ābidin, I should be inclined to identify with the Raṇasvāmin the ruin of an ancient temple which lies in the corner formed by the Mār and Lach'm Kul. It owes its partial preservation to the fact that it has been utilized by the Muhammadans as the Zīrat of Pir Ḥāji Muḥammad Šāhib. Besides the walls of a raised octagonal cella and the stairs leading to its two doors, the enclosing walls and the gateways of the ancient courtyard are yet standing. The building has not been noticed in any of the papers dealing with the remains of the ancient architecture of Kāśmir.

If the Lach'm Kul ended in old days further N. in the branch which flows into the Dal lake near the But'kadal, we might look for the Raṇasvāmin among the numerous ruins of ancient temples found about the Mosque of Mādin Šāhib in the N. part of Sangin Darwāza.

P. Šāhibrām in his Tirthas, briefly refers to the 'Raṇasvāmin,' as situated to the W. of the Hār'parvat without giving any further hint as to its position.

455. The image is called svayambhūh, because it is traced back directly to Prajāpati and was not made by man.

456-458. I have translated kumbhādāsa, a word not otherwise known to the dictionaries, by 'waterman' on the ground of its evident etymology. The meaning 'procuress, go-between' given by the Kōśas (see P.W.) for the fem. kumbhādāsi does not stand in the way of this explanation. The water-carrying for Brahman families is done to this day in Kāśmir by low-caste Kṣātriyas and their women. The latter having access to the households, might have as well earned the reputation indicated by the meaning of the Kōśas, as e.g. the barber's wives; comp. nāpiti in P.W. The feminine kumbhādāsi, viii. 1726, seems to designate a low-class servant.

460. This [royal] couple built the [temples of] Raṇārambhāsvāmīn and Raṇārambhadeva and a Maṭha for Pāśupata [mendicants] on the hill of Pradyumna.

461. This [king] also established a faultless hospital (ārogyaśilā) for the healing of sick people and in order to ward off a danger [threatening] his queen Senānukhā.

462. He built at the village of Simharotsikā a [temple of] Mārtaṇḍa which became famous everywhere under the name of Raṇapurāsvāmīn.

463. Another wife of that King Amṛtaprabhū built [a shrine of] Amṛteśvara on the right side of Raṇeśa.

464. She also placed a fine statue of Buddha in the Vihāra which had been built by a wife of King Meghavāhana called Bhinnā.

465. That goddess (Raṇārambhā) once granted to the king who was devoted to her and full of sympathy, the magic spell [called] Hāṭakeśvara, which gave command over the under-world.

466. After obtaining this spell, which she had granted in order that the possession of her should not be fruitless for him, he realized for many years the aims of his desire.

467. After undergoing severe austerities at Iṣṭikāpatha, he went to Nandiśilā and had the benefit of the magic power of the spell during many years.

460. By Pradyumnāmūrdhan is meant the Sārikāparvata or Hārparvat in Srinager (see note iii. 339-349). It is also frequently referred to by the name Pradyumnapiṭha, Pradyumnagiri, Pradyumnasikḥara and similar designations; comp. vii. 1616; Vikram. xviii. 16; Jonar. 587, 870; Sriv. i. 631; ii. 88; Mahādevamāhātmya, ii. 7, and Sārikāmāh., passim. The latter text does not furnish an explanation of the name. But Somadeva in the Kaṭhās. lxxiii. 109 alludes to a story which would connect the hill with the love of Uṣā and Aniruddha, the son of Pradyumna.

The E. slope and foot of the hill is now covered by extensive buildings, including Sarīā, connected with the famous Muhammadian shrines of Muqaddam Shāhib and Ākhūn Mullā Shāh. These probably occupy the sites of earlier Hindu structures such as the Maṭha referred to in our verse. The text leaves it doubtful as to whether the two temples mentioned here were also situated on this hill or elsewhere.

462. The position of Simharotsikā is unknown, and no mention is found elsewhere of the temple dedicated there to Viṣṇu in his form of Mārtaṇḍa or the sun. Cunningham, misled by an erroneous interpretation of our text and the verse iv. 192, had endeavoured to make out that the temple here mentioned is identical with the central shrine of the famous temple at Mārtaṇḍ, and that Lalitāditya only built the enclosing courtyard of the latter (see J.A.S.B., 1848, pp. 269 sqq.). Fergusson, Ind. Arch., p. 289, has already on general and architectural grounds rejected this view, which has no support whatever in the plain words of the Chronicle.

463. I am unable to trace any further notice of the Amṛteśvara here mentioned or of the Vihāra of Bhinnā referred to in the next verse.

✓467. It is not quite certain which localities are meant here. Nandiśilā is probably a site connected with the legend of Nandin, located on Mount Haramukuta; comp. note on Nandikētra, i. 38. According to the Nilamata, vv. 1081 sqq., Nandin was produced by Silāda from pulverized rocks (śilā) and performed his austerities in the lake named after him while holding a large rock (śilā) on his head. On the other hand it may be noted that Nandiśilā is the name given to the modern village of Nādīhāl in the Hamal Pargana, 74° 20' long. 34° 15' lat., by the Vīratāmāhātmya, xxiv. 32; but no sanctity attaches to this place.

In the direction of the sacred Mount Haramukuta points also the other name Iṣṭikāpatha, by which is probably meant the locality

RANĀDITYA.

468. Gathering unbroken confidence from dreams and supernatural marks, he proceeded to the cave of [the demon] Namuci after passing through the water of the Candrabhāgā.

469. While the cave was open during twenty-one days, he led the citizens into it and thus first made them partake in the love of the Daitya-women.

470. Thus having ruled the earth for three hundred years, this king obtained the sovereignty over the under-world together with an end which deserved to be praised as [implying] final liberation (nirvāṇa).

471. When the king with his retinue had gone to the company of the Daitya-women, that queen who was Viṣṇu's S'akti, went to the 'White Island' (S'vetadvīpa).

472-473. Among the numerous royal families there have been two families, and in them only two kings, who showed to perfection utmost care for [their] subjects: [these were] Ranāditya of the Gonanda family and Rāma of the Raghu [race], who even had their happiness in another world shared by their subjects.

VIKRAMĀDITYA.

474. The son of this [king] who had conquered the universe by his valour (vikrama), was Vikramāditya who built the [shrine of S'iva] Vikramēśvara and whose power was like that of Trivikrama (Viṣṇu).

475. This king, who was Indra's equal, protected the earth for forty-two years along with his ministers Brahman and Galāna.

476. Brahman built the Brahmamaṭha, and Galāna, who destroyed the evil-doers (līnarluṣkṛtaḥ), had a Vihāra constructed under the name of his wife Ratnāvalī.

BĀLĀDITYA.

477. After this king there ruled his next eldest brother, the powerful Bālāditya who tormented opposing rulers.

478. His glory (pratāpu) brought tears into the face (or mouth) of his enemies' wives and thus caused excessive thirst, as if [it had made them] drink the salt sea.

479. Even to this day there stand in the eastern ocean his triumphal columns which seemed to have been brought [by him] as poles for [measuring] the unfathomable sensations of his enemies' minds.

referred to in the Nilamata, 1081, as Patheśvara īṣṭaḥ. The latter place is identified by a gloss to another passage, 1208, with the modern hamlet of Jūmarādan, 74° 58' long. 34° 19' lat., in the Lār Pargana, from which the ascent on the Haramukuta pilgrimage begins.

468. The cave of the demon Namuci regarding whose part in early mythology Prof.

Bloomfield's paper in J.A.O.S., 1891, pp. 148 sqq., may be consulted, is supposed to form a part of pātāla or the infernal regions. By the Candrabhāgā probably the Cinab is meant.

469. The correct reading pravēṣya, required by the context, is supplied by L; A pravīṣya.

475. I read °galānābhyaṃ as conjecturally restored in Ed. for °galūnābhyaṃ of A.

480. Subduing the Vanikālas by the hook of his power, he founded a hospice (janāśraya) called Kalambi for the accommodation of Kāśmīrians.

481. In Maḍavarājya in Kāśmīr he founded for Brahmans the Agrahāra of Bheḍara, which was distinguished by its wealth.

482. His wife Bimbā whose lips were [red] like the Bimba fruit, built at Ariṣṭotsādana the [shrine of] S'iva Bimbeśvara which removed the people's misfortune (ariṣṭa).

483. The three brothers Khaṇkha, S'atrughna and Mūlava, who were his ministers, built a Maṭha, a temple and an embankment (setu).

484. This king had a daughter called Anaṅgalekhā whose beauty was a wonder of the world, and who was like the glitter of the moon on the ocean of love.

485. An astrologer of unerring knowledge, after seeing in the presence of her father this gazelle-eyed maiden and the marks she bore, declared clearly :

486. "Your son-in-law will obtain the rule of the earth. Verily with you ends the sovereignty of those from the race of Gonanda."

487. Thereupon the king, who did not wish the sovereign power [to go] to the descendants of his daughter, endeavoured to defeat fate by human effort.

488. Thinking that if she were given to some one not of royal blood, she would not carry away the sovereignty, he did not give the maid [in marriage] to any prince.

489. He then made Durlabhavardhana, an official [in charge] of the fodder for horses (śvaghāśakāyastha), his son-in-law, being solely guided by his good looks.

490. The king did not know that he was really born to the throne, [being

490. I do not know which people is meant by the Vanikālas.

481. Bheḍara can be safely identified with the present Biḍṛ, a large village in the Bring Pargana, 75° 20' long. 33° 55' lat. In the centre of the village there is a mound which was pointed out to me in September, 1891, as the site of an ancient temple. Carved slabs are said to have been extracted from it. In the neighbouring village of Hāngalgūnd, which contains a large Brahman colony, an ancient Durgā image is worshipped under the name of Biḍā Devi.

Regarding Maḍavarājya, see note ii. 15.

482. The gloss of A. renders Ariṣṭotsādana by Raṭṭosāna, which is in all probability intended for the name of the modern village of Raṭṭaun, situated in the Mānch'hōm Pargana, 74° 38' long. 34° 4' lat. (not marked in 'Atlas of India'). P. Kāśī Rām, who visited the place on my behalf in 1891, could not discover ancient remains there.

483. By setu also a bridge might be meant.

489. The fodder for horses in Srinagar is brought chiefly by boats from the neighbouring lakes and marshes, in which suitable grasses and waterplants grow in abundance. This produce is State property, and a tax is levied to this day by a special employé on the people who live by collecting and selling it. Possibly the term śvaghāśakāyastha is to be understood in this special meaning.—Geheimrath BÖTLING proposes in Mélanges asiat., vii. p. 474, for sa rūpatām the very acceptable emendation surūpatām; the meaning remains the same.

490. The Kārkoṭa Naga is mentioned by the Nīlanāta, 901, in the beginning of the list of Kāśmīr Nagas along with Nīla, Vāsuki, the son] of the Nāga Kārkoṭa who had cohabited with his mother when she took her purifying bath.

BALĀDITYA

491. Fate, in fact, as if it wished to triumph, bestows fortune just on that person whom those, who think themselves wise, persist in considering as unfit.

492. The Sun which on setting out of jealousy ignores the planets and deposits his light in the fire, because he sees fitness in the unequal,—he does not understand destiny and deserves to be laughed at. Let alone the fire indeed! Even the lamps which it kindles, can at its will make the world forget the sun.

493. Durlabhavardhana with a mind bent on success, pursued a politic conduct and attracted the eyes of everybody.

494. In the course of time his father-in-law distinguished him, as he was spreading light by his intellect (prajñā), by the name Prajñāditya, and made him the master of a fortune resembling that of Kubera.

495. But the princess, made overbearing by the excessive love of her parents and the intoxication of youth, did not show proper regard towards him.

496. The company of unrestrained women, pleasures, youths, above all the parental house, the mild disposition of her husband,—what was there not to interfere with her proper conduct?

497. Anaṅgalekhā was gradually enticed [into an intrigue] by the minister Khankha, who through the familiarity [produced] by continual sight, entered into her heart.

498. Then in the enjoyment of the pleasures of a secret love, she lost shame, fear and regard and increased her boldness from day to day until she became quite absorbed in him.

499. The minister through his gifts and influence got her attendants under his power and conducted himself with her in the seraglio as it pleased him.

500. And the wise Durlabhavardhana discovered by degrees the ruin of her moral character by the appearance of indications of her aversion.

501-505. For a wife who has sold her mind to [illicit] love, generally betrays the change [brought about] by the intrusion of the demon of immorality.

Taksaka. He seems to have been worshipped in different localities. The Kārkoṭa Nāga which gave the name to the Kārkotadraṅga (see notes iii. 227; viii. 1596) was probably supposed to reside in one of the small mountain lakes on the Tośmaidān Pass, leading to Lohrīn. He is referred to in Fourth Chron. 114 and the Tirthas. (Bāngil Pargana), and has left his name to this day on the mountain ridge Kārkodar over which that route leads.

Another Kārkoṭa Nāga is mentioned in the Tirthas. at the village of Uṭrus (Skr. Uṭrāsā) in the Kuṭhār Pargana, 75° 22' long. 33° 43' lat.; this spring may be alluded to in Haracar. x.

492. The sun when setting is supposed to deposit its light into the keeping of the fire.

494. kaubīr A L is evidently only a wrong spelling for kauber, explained by Kś. pronunciation.

497. L has samprāyujyata as emended in Ed.

Among her companions she smiles secretly; her colour changes when she sees her husband; getting up quite unexpectedly she looks with a smile on the roads; when her husband is angry she indicates contempt by movement of her brows, eyes and chin; when he uses harsh words, she looks down with a smile; she cares nothing for those whose character is like his, but enjoys the praise of his opponents; when noticing that he wishes to enjoy himself with her, she engages in a conversation with her companions; when he kisses her she bends down her neck; she does not yield her body to his arms; in his love-embrace she shows no pleasure, and on his bed she feigns to be asleep.

506. Durlabhavardhana, whose body became thin with fears as to his wife's hidden wickedness, on one occasion entered the seraglio at night.

507. He found his wife overpowered by sleep which is easily brought on by the exertions of love-play, and fixed as it were on the body of her paramour.

508. Her deep breathing from which flurry had not [yet] died away and which made her swelling breasts heave, indicated that they had just at that time indulged in sexual enjoyment.

509. When he saw her who in this condition might have caused the anger even of a stranger and who would even [then] not have had a claim to forbearance, he flamed up in wrath.

510. While he was wishing to strike her in fury but was yet held back by reflection, he felt as if he had relieved himself by striking her repeatedly.

511. Then this excess of rage, tumultuous like the ocean, was with difficulty calmed by the tide of his reflection.

512. Honour be to him who overcomes the strong cholernic disease (viṣṇīkā) brought on by the poison of jealousy. Who but he is to be considered the foremost of the self-controlled?

513. He thought: "Fie on these miserable [women] who are the slaves of their active passions and devoid of reflection, and who quickly drag men down [to hell]."

514. "That [thing] which is called 'woman,' is the object of a sense, like the other objects of senses (indriyārtha). As such they are common to all. Why should self-controlled persons feel angry about them?"

515. "Who can restrain women who are fickle by nature? Or by restraining them what is [to be got], worth remembering for wise men?"

516. "If the sense of honour (māna) of two [men] in love-passion displays

514. Indriyārtha is used in the meaning of (rūpa, śabda, gandha, rasa, sparśa); 'stri' viśaya of which the Nyāyasastra knows five is supposed in our passage to be the sixth.

BĀLĀDITYA.

itself like the wrangling of two dogs which are bent on the same thing, then what dishonour (śamāna) could be greater than this?"

517. "Why should men of sense feel, as it were, self-interested attachment for gazelle-eyed [woman]? How can one think this [attachment] to others right when it is improper even to one's own body?"

518. "If this [woman] appears to me desorving of death because she has caused [me] agitation, then why forget the love-passion which is the root of this tree of agitation?"

519. "How is the tree of passion which sends its roots down to the seven hells, to be uprooted, if the hatred which is the soil [for its growth], is not destroyed?"

520. "He who by judgment once triumphs over hatred difficult of attack, destroys in half a minute indeed even the name of passion."

521. "Recognizing by divine intuition this remedy, which must be declared [for the benefit] of those who are subject to passions, one should overcome jealousy. Passion then vanishes of its own account in [all] directions."

522. After he had thus reflected, he wrote these words on the border of Khaṅkha's dress: "Remember that you have not been slain, though deserving of death."

523. Then when Durlabhavaradhana had left without having been noticed by any one, the minister awaking saw and read those written words.

524. In view of the kindness shown by him who had spared his life, Khaṅkha then banished Ananyalekha from his mind and instead thought how to requite this kindness.

525. While he searched for suitable means to return this kind act, anxiety entered his mind, but not the five arrows of love; the attention of his eyes was absorbed by sleeplessness, but never by the princess.

526. At that time Bālāditya, that [prince] of splendid deeds, reached the world of him whose forehead is adorned by the young moon (S'iva), after having been a jewel at the head of royalty for thirty-seven years less four months.

527. When this last descendant of his family died after having previously lost his [male] issue, the Gonanda race became an object of pity like a lotus-pond in which first the lotus-flowers have been pressed down by elephants and afterwards their stalks torn out by the violent irruption of a flood of water.

528. Then that [minister] to show his gratitude in some way, removed the obstacles created by the dissent of the chief ministers, and according to usage performed high above the head of the king's son-in-law the holy and desired coronation rite (abhiṣeka) with sacred water poured out from golden jars.

523. The correct reading tān dṛṣṭvā is furnished by L.

529. When this king, begotten by the [Nāga] Kārkoṭa, supported the earth with his large arms which were marked by lines of light [proceeding] from the small pearls set in his diadem, and [resembling] the tops of serpents' hoods,—the multitude of golden lotuses in the wreath which adorned him, attracted glances from the corners of the beaming eyes of the S'eṣa serpent, who felt joy in the love of his kinsman.

530. Then the earth, gliding away from the pure race of King Gonandū, rested on the still purer family of the Kārkoṭa Nāga, like the river of the immortals (Gaṅgā) when, descending from its bending course in heaven with which it has long been familiar, [it proceeds] to the diadem of S'ambhu (S'iva), the lord of the three worlds.

BĀLĀDITYA.

Thus ends the Third Taraṅga of the Rājatarāṅgī, composed by Kaḥaṇa, the son of the illustrious minister of Kaśmir, Lord Caṇṇaka.

Colophon. A note found before the Colophon in A and L gives the total number of verses in the iii. Taraṅga as 536. This is probably only an error of reckoning, just as the figure 1069 given here as the total of verses for the first three Taraṅgas. According to the numbers shown before the Colophons of these Taraṅgas the total ought to be 1079.

A and L have no entry showing the total period of the reigns described in Taraṅga iii. The Poona MS., however, gives this, as already stated by Dr. Hultzsch, Ind. Ant., xviii. p. 98, in the verse : saikṣaṇanavatiścātra varṣāṇāṁ śatapañcakaḥ | dātā mūdāśca saikāhā gatā dātāsu rājāsu ||. As the text of this MS. is certainly derived from A, I can see in this verse only a recent addition probably made by the owner of one of the intermediate copies.

FOURTH BOOK.

1. May that body of the Immovable (S'iva)—from which there is no separate existence (vīṭavyatīreka), which is united with the body of Pārvatī and which knows no obstacles, remove misfortunes from you [who are] in this [world], —[the body of him] on whose hair-knot the serpent also seems to embrace the form of its own female as it entwines its body with the plaited hair [of Pārvatī], which resembles in its falls and its dark splendour the body of a female snake.

DURLABHAVAR-
DHANA.

2. This king who had received from one family both the earth and a princess, entered in the course of time into the possession of treasures and sons.

3. The king's wife whose fault had been kept secret by her husband and whose dignity proved equal to her good fortune, built the Anaigabhavana Vihāra.

4. A son of the king called Malhaṇa considering the shortness of his life predicted by an astrologer built, while yet a boy, the [shrine of Viṣṇu] Malhaṇasvāmin.

5. The king bestowed on Brahmans after paying them honours, the [village of] Candragrāma in [the neighbourhood of] the castle of Pārevisōka and other [places].

6. Having consecrated at S'rinagarī the [shrine of] Viṣṇu Durlabhasvāmin, this lord of the earth died after [a rule of] thirty-six years.

DURLABHAKA-
PRATĀPĀDITYA II.

7. Then his son the wise Durlabhaka, born from Queen Ananga [lekḥā], ruled the earth like [another] Indra.

8. As he had been declared by his mother the son of his maternal grand-

15. The name Pārevisōka, which designates here and in vi. 130; viii. 2194 perhaps a small territorial division, means literally "beyond the Viśoka." Viśokā is the name of the modern Veśau, a considerable stream which rises near the Kōnear Nāg (Kramasaras) Lake on the Pir Pantāl range, and after an easterly and then northerly course joins the Vitastā at Gambhirasaṅgama below Viśbrūr; comp. VIENZI, i. p. 297. The Nilamata, 271 sqq., identifies the river with Lakṣmī and gives a story accounting for its name ("free from pain"); see also vv. 230, 491, 1031, etc., and S'riv. i. 226, 228; Haracar. iv. 52; xii. 35; Vitastāmūhātmya, ii. 17 sqq., etc.

The position of Candragrāma and of Pārevisōkakōṭa, 'the castle of Pārevisōka,' cannot be traced now. Pārevisōka may possibly have been the name of that part of the Div'sar district which lies to the E. of the Veśau.

6. The position of the Durlabhasvāmin temple, as well as of the other buildings mentioned in the account of this reign, is unknown.

Regarding the use of the form S'rinagarī for S'rinagara, see note i. 104.

8. As Bāladitya died without male issue, the functions prescribed for a son by religious law devolved naturally on his daughter's son father, being the daughter's son, he took the name Pratāpāditya [II.] in accordance with the usage of that [grandfather's] family.

9. His minister Hanumat, the son of Ūḍa (or Oḍa?), whose good fortune was approved by the pious, founded Agrahāras on obtaining wealth from Aiḍabiḍa (Kubera).

10. This strong-armed king, whose glory (pratāpa) tormented his enemies, built the town of Pratāpapura, which rivalled the city of Indra.

11. In his land, which was full of merchants of different wares come from all regions, there lived a merchant called Nona from the Itauhītaka country.

12. That virtuous man built the Nonamaḥa, most eminent for its religious merit, for the accommodation of Brahmins born in the Rauhita land.

13. Once the king invited him in a friendly way to the royal palace, and honoured him for one day with polite attentions such as befit a king.

14. When the king with kindness inquired in the morning as to his being comfortable, he said that the soot from the lamps had caused him headache.

15. When then the king was once in turn invited by him, and stopped at that [merchant's] house, he saw [there] at night lamps formed of jewels (maṇiḍipikā).

DURLABHAKA-
PRATĀPĀDITYA II.

Marriage of Naren-draprabhā.

as well as the inheritance; comp. e.g. Manu, ix. 131 sqq.

The mixed metal coins bearing the legend S'ridurlabhadeva, described by CUNNINGHAM in Coins of Med. India, p. 43 (Pl. iii. 7), belong in all probability not to Durlabhaka-Pratāpāditya II., but to his father Durlabhavardhana. The name of the former is found in the form S'ipratāpa on copper coins of two varieties which have been described l.c., p. 44, and figured Pl. iii. 10, 11. [C. attributes erroneously the second variety to Lalitāditya, whom owing to some misapprehension he believes to have borne also the name of Pratāpāditya.]

CUNNINGHAM, l.c., p. 38, has expressed the belief that the king of India named Tu-lo-pa, who according to the Chinese Annals (A. RISMUSAT, Nouv. Mélanges asiat., i. p. 212) was between the years A.D. 627-649 charged with having the envoys of Ki-pin (Kabul) conveyed to their own country, was the same as Durlabhavardhana. Assuming the identification Tu-lo-pa = Durlabha to be correct, it still remains doubtful whether this ruler or his son Durlabhaka (or Durlabha, see iv. 44) is meant here. According to K.'s Chronology the above period is divided between the reigns of these two kings.

9. The word Auḍa, rendered above by "son of Ūḍa," is of doubtful meaning.

10. Pratāpapura is identified in the gloss of A. with the modern Tāpar, a considerable village of the Kruhin Pargana situated on the high road from Varahamula to S'rīnagar, 74° 31' long. 84° 12' lat. This identification is confirmed by viii. 820, where Pratāpapura is mentioned as lying on the route of Sussala's retreat from S'rīnagar to Lohara (viā Varahamula), and by Fourth Chron. 820, where the name occurs in connection with that of the neighbouring Pargana of Bangil.

When visiting Tāpar in Sept., 1892, I found close to the road between the Zīrat of Sayid Nizām-ud-dīn and Vatār Bāba Shāhib two large ruined mounds, covered with fragments of ornamented columns, pediments, etc. In the walls of the second Zīrat there was a large number of ancient carved slabs. Most of these remains have since been utilized in the construction of the new carriage road. The local tradition knows of the existence of an old town at this site which it ascribes to a King Tūp'dat (Pratāpāditya?).

11. The name Rauhītaka or Rauhita, perhaps, the same as Rohitaka mentioned by Alberūnī, India, i. pp. 308, 316, as the name of 'a fortress in the district of Multān, which is now deserted'; comp. also P. W., s.v. The name occurs also in the Lakkhā Mandāli inscription, edited Epigr. Ind., i. pp. 10 sqq. Prof. Bühler, upon a suggestion of Dr. Burgess, there proposes the identification of Rauhītaka with the modern Rohtak town and district to the N.W. of Delhi.

15. A lamp is meant in which a shining jewel takes the place of the burning wick.

DURĀBHAKA-
PRATĀPĀDITYA II.

16. Astonished by his extravagance and such wealth, he then remained as an honoured [guest] in that same [house].

17. Once he espied in the house that [merchant's] wife, the illustrious Narendraprabhā, whose body was charming, and whose face was like the moon.

18. In her appeared to be embodied the feast of love and the feast of the household, her breasts representing full cups, and her well-shaped thighs (sadūrvā^o) giving charms.

19. When he saw this [lady] of faultless body, who in the privacy of her residence moved about freely, desire befell him.

20. She too, when her companions pointed him out [to her], turned her face a little and looked at the beloved of the earth with her eyes the [corners] of which extended to the ears.

21. Whether [it was] on account of the love-bond of a previous birth or through the command of Kāma, by that same look she filled his soul with devote attachment.

22. Though he had not touched her, he felt as if she who was like the nectar of bliss, were fixed [in him] even to the very marrow.

23. After hiding her body for a moment behind a pillar of the house, she moved on, looking again and again at the king with her face turned backwards.

24. Having lost his heart to that graceful [lady] to such an [extent], the king slowly returned to his palace, his eyes glancing sidewise full of care.

25. While his eyes were there absorbed in the imagination of her form, his body became reduced, as well as his affection for his seraglio.

26. He reflected : " Alas, the misfortune, that in the garden of my mind there has grown that evil-producing poison-tree called passion ! "

27. " O that lucky course of love, which defeating reason has driven off as enemies judgment and other [mental qualities] which befriended [me] ! "

28. " Whence [arises] that irresistible change of righteous conduct in me, who, as king, must be virtuous and afraid of slander ? "

29. " If the king himself take away the wives of the subjects, who else should punish trespass of the law ? "

30. While the king reflected in this manner he could not forget either the line [of conduct] which the virtuous should follow, or that long-eyed [lady].

31. When the merchant heard the story from the people, he kind-

18. sadūrvāhitaviḥramā may be dissolved either as indicated by A, santau tāu ūrit, tūbhyām āhito viḥramo yayā, or dūrvayā āhito yo viḥramas, tatsakittā. The compound, if taken in the latter sense, contains, as well as the expression pūrṇakumbhā^o of the other compound, an allusion to a sacrificial feast, at which cups (kalāśa or kumbha) and dūrvā grass (Panicum Dactylon) are used. The latter is also worn in the hair of women; comp. Kumārāsambhava, vii. 14.

heartedly spoke thus in private to the [king], whose illness had become known, and who was near to death :

32. "You have [now] reached such a state, why do you [let yourself] be restrained by the law? There is nothing that a man may not do when life is at stake."

33. "Even of those whose opinions are desired by the wise on doubtful questions of law, it is known that they abandoned restraint in such circumstances."

34. "Besides, it is not right to neglect one's body for the sake of glory. Far-spread fame is no elixir for the ears of those who are dead."

35. "Do not consider me. For in your cause, O king, no account need be taken even of my life. What need be said about mere objects of the senses?"

36. "If even after this declaration you do not accept her, then you should take her from a temple as a dancing girl put [there] by me on account of her skill in dancing."

37. Thus prompted by that [merchant] and by his own powerful love-passion, he first felt shame, but then reluctantly accepted the beautiful-eyed one.

38. Removing the levity of such conduct by noble works, Queen Narendra-[prabhā] built the illustrious [shrine of] Narendreśvara.

39. And in course of time the wife of the king bore, through the subjects' merits, a son called Caṇḍrāpīḍa, just as the earth [produces] a treasure.

40. His bright virtues removed the blot of his descent, just as rubbing with the touchstone [removes] the impurity attaching to a jewel when it comes from the mine.

41. The gathering of the clouds produces clear water from the intensely impure smoke; from the rock consisting of a mass of blunt stones is produced the very sharp iron. Moreover, the shining fire takes its origin from the thoroughly dull water. In truth, the character of the great does by no means conform to the place of their birth.

42. Subsequently she bore the king also a [second] son, Tārāpīḍa, and then Muktāpīḍa, whose name [ought to have been] Avimuktāpīḍa.

43. These sons of Pratāpāditya, [namely] Caṇḍrāpīḍa and the other [two], were also well known by the names of Fajrāditya, Udayāditya and Lalitāditya.

39. Verses 39-43 have been translated by Prof. BÜHLER, Ind. Ant., ii. p. 105.

42. Muktāpīḍa might be interpreted to mean 'he whose diadem is taken off.' Hence K., bearing in mind the greatness of this ruler, says 'his name ought to have been Avimuktāpīḍa.' The proper translation of Muktāpīḍa is, however, 'he whose diadem contains pearls.' See Prof. BÜHLER, l.c.

43. By a misinterpretation of this verse, WILSON, History, p. 43, made out that Pratāpāditya had seven sons—an error into which Troyer and Lassen have followed him. The correct meaning was first pointed out by Prof. BÜHLER, l.c.

DURLABHAKA-
PRATĀPĀUTIYA II.

CANDRĀPIṬA.

44. After ruling the earth for fifty years, King Durlabha ascended slowly to the holy celestial world by the stairs of his meritorious deeds.

45. Then the illustrious Candrāpiṭa became the crest-jewel among the kings. He caused distress to Kali by his fame, which vanquished the light of the moon.

46. He, [like] a clever versifier, completed the law which [other] kings had left like a samasyā with [only] one pāda, by the [remaining] three pādas.

47. Virtues mutually opposed, such as forbearance and valour, equally served him, just as the [different] seasons [equally serve] the celestial garden.

48. His fortune brought equal benefit to all his dependents in their respective place, just as the irrigation-channel to the trees of a garden.

49. Fortune reached him pure after leaving its impurities with other kings, just as a stream [reaches] the ocean after depositing the turbid substances, [brought down] in its flood, on the rocks it passes.

50. Acquainted with affairs, he did not do what by its result might have caused him anxiety, but was engaged in praiseworthy [acts], and [yet] felt ashamed when being praised.

51. He was not instructed by his ministers, but gave them instructions. The diamond is not cut by any other precious stones, but [on the contrary] it cuts them.

52. From fear of [doing] what was not lawful, he thought it necessary to abandon his own case (pakṣa) where the law was doubtful, as Garuḍa [abandoned his own wing (pakṣa)] from fear of [Indra's] thunderbolt.

53. This king showed the way of justice and removed foolish practices (mandehāḥ) from the legal course, as the sun [removes] from its daily course the Mandehas.

54. If this [my] discourse refrains from the description of that [prince's] virtues, it is in order that the connection [of the narrative] may not be broken, but not because only this much was available [for mention].

45. KLAPROTH, Mémoires relatifs à l'Asie, ii. pp. 275 sqq., appears to have been the first to recognize the Candrapīṭa of the Chronicle in the King Tchen-t'o-lo-pi-li of Kāśmīr, who according to the Annals of the T'ang dynasty applied in A.D. 713 to the Chinese Emperor for aid against the Arabs (see A. RÉMUSAT, Nouv. Mélanges asiat., i. pp. 196 sq.). These Annals also record that about the year A.D. 720 the Emperor granted Tchen-t'o-lo-pi-li the title of king. The latter must, therefore, have still been living about A.D. 719, whereas according to K.'s chronology Candrapīṭa's reign would fall in the years A.D. 686-695. The questions raised by these data as to the accuracy of K.'s chronology of the Kārkōṭa dynasty have been discussed by CUNNINGHAM, Anc. Geogr., p. 91; Prof. BÜHLER, Ind. Ant., ii. p. 106; Prof. M. MÜLLER, India, p. 333; ŚR. PANDURANG PANDIT, Gāṇḍavaho, pp. lxxx. sqq. Comp. also the remarks of REINAUD, Mémoire, pp. 188 sqq., bearing on the political condition of the north-west of India after the first Arab invasion.

46. Samasyā is a favourite poetic exercise, in which a pāda or a half-verse, composed for the occasion or taken from some well-known author, has to be worked into a stanza by the composition of the remaining pādas.

53. The Mandehas, a class of Rākṣasas, are supposed to bar the way of the rising sun on Mount Udaya.

55. When the work on his temple of Tribhuvnāsvāmīn was to be begun, a leather-tanner refused to give up his hut which was on the suitable site.

56. Though he had often promised it to those in charge of the new building, he, obstinate by nature, would not allow the measuring lines to be laid down.

57. When thereupon they went to the lord of the earth and reported the matter, he considered them to be at fault, not the tanner.

58. He told them: "Shame upon the inconsiderate conduct of those who began the construction of the now [temple] without previously asking that [tanner]."

59. "Stop the building, or have it erected elsewhere! Who would stain a pious work by taking away another's land?"

60. "If we, who are to look after right and wrong, do unlawful acts, who should proceed by the right path?"

61. When the king had thus spoken, a messenger, who had come from that leatherworker and whom the council of ministers had sent on, brought this message:

62. "That [tanner] wishes to see the ruler and says: 'If it be not proper for me to come into the audience hall, then let it be at the time when [the king is] in the outer court.'"

63. Then on the following day, the king granted him an audience outside and asked him: "Why are just you obstructing our pious work?"

64. "If that habitation appears to you beautiful, then you may ask for one even better or else for a big sum of money." Thus he told him.

65. When the king then had ceased speaking, he was addressed by the tanner, who appeared eager, as it were, to take the measure of that [king's] noble character with the measuring lines of the rays [proceeding] from his [white] teeth.

66. "O king, if I tell you something just as it is in my mind, then as a true judge you should not stand by proudly."

67. "I am not less than a dog, nor is the king greater than the descendant of Kākutstha. Why should [then] your courtiers shake, as it were, at [the sight of] this conversation between us?"

68. "The body of man born in the cycle of existences resembles a weak mail-coat, being held together only by the two nails called 'self-sufficiency' and 'selfishness.'"

62. Bāhyālī appears to be the general designation of the outer portion of the palace, where an audience may be given by the monarch to people of lower position, outside the proper āsthāna or Darbār Hall. Comp. vii. 385, 392, 926, 936; viii. 46, and the distinction of Diwān-i 'Am and Diwān-i Khās at the Moghul court.

67. I am unable to trace the particular story alluded to. 'The descendant of Kākutstha' may be Dāśaratha or Rāma; comp. P.W., s.v. Kākutstha.

CANDRĀRĪPA.

69. "Self-consciousness such as you have in your splendour of bracelets, pearl-strings, and other [ornaments], lives also in my person though I am a poor man."

70. "As this palace resplendent with stucco is to your Majesty, so to me is the hut in which the window is formed by the mouth of a pot."

71. "Since my birth this hut has been [to me] like a mother, witness of good and evil days. I cannot bear to see it pulled down to-day."

72. "The misery which men [feel] when their homes are forcibly taken away, could be described only by a god who has fallen from his celestial car, or else a king who has lost his kingdom."

73. "Notwithstanding this, however, I should have to give it up if your Majesty would come to my dwelling and ask for it in accordance with propriety."

74. When he had given this answer, the king went to his home and bought up the hut with money. For those who desire happiness, there is no [false] pride.

75. The tanner then spoke to him with hands folded: "O king, your readiness to oblige is proper [and] in accordance with the law."

76. "As in old days Dharmu in the form of a dog tested the righteousness of the son of Pāṇḍu, so have I to-day as a Paria (aspr̥śya) [tested] yours."

77. "Hail to you! May you long live to show such righteous and pure lines of conduct, worthy to be relied upon by the virtuous."

78. Showing thus a blameless conduct, the king purified the earth by the consecration of [the shrine of] Viṣṇu Tribhuvanasvāmin.

79. His wife, whose name was Prakāśadevī, [and who deserved this name] from her works, bright like the brilliant ether (prakāśūkāśa), founded the Prakāśikāvihāra.

80. His Guru, [a man] of noble virtues, called Mihiradatta, built the [temple of] Viṣṇu Gambhīrasvāmin.

81. His city-prefect, called Chalitaka, who removed the permanency of all offices (?), built the [temple of Viṣṇu] Chalitāsvāmin.

70. The tanners of Kāśmīr (rātāḥ) form a despised class and lead a gipsy sort of life. Their habitations are built of mud-covered rush-walls in which the necks of big pots are inserted to serve as windows.

76. The story of the Yudhiṣṭhira, as told in a well-known episode of the Mahābh. xvii. Adhy. iii., is alluded to.

78. The Tribhuvanasvāmin temple stood still in the time of King Uccala; comp. viii. 80. Its position is unknown, and so is that of the Prakāśikāvihāra.

80. The gloss of A₂ places the Gambhīrasvāmin temple at Gambhīrasaṅgama, by which name the Vitastāmāh. viii. 6, Pīṇayekavaramāh. 151 and Sāhibrām's Tīrthas. designate the Tīrtha at the junction of the Vitastā and Viśoka (Vesau) rivers, 75° 8' long. 33° 50' lat. It speaks for the antiquity of the name Gambhīrasaṅgama that the lower course of the Viśoka, which receives a short distance before this junction the waters of the Rembyār^a (Ramanyaṭavi), is called Gambhīrā (Sindhu) already by K. viii. 1063, 1497 and Jayadratha, Haracar. x. 192. I have not been able to trace at Gambhīrasaṅgama any ancient remains above ground.

81. I am unable to explain satisfactorily

82. Once a Brahmana woman who was undergoing voluntary starvation (prāyopaveśa), and had been questioned [on this account] by the law officers, spoke thus to the king as he was seated in court :

CANDRĀPIṬA.
Story of the Sorcerer.

83. "Alas ! while you, who remove all reproach, rule the earth, some one has taken the life of my husband as he was peacefully sleeping."

84. "It is verily a great humiliation for a king of righteous conduct, if untimely death overtakes his subjects."

85. "But even if [rulers] like yourself look [quietly] upon that in submission to the power of the Kali age, how can you remain indifferent at this far worse misdeed ?"

86. "Ponder as I may [over it], I cannot find any enemy of my husband, because for him, being free from fault, there was peace in all directions."

87. "As he bore no grudges, was free from arrogance, friendly in his speech, fond of virtues, affable and without greediness, he was indeed no object of hatred for anyone."

88. "Suspicion falls on a Brahman residing at Mākṣikasvāmin, who knows witchcraft, and who, of the same age as himself, has from early youth been his inferior in learning."

89. "Those mean persons, whose want of distinction does not allow them to sleep, and who are incapable of competing for fame, in their grudge harass the life of those who are distinguished by cleverness."

90-92. "No one is of bad character if not the son of a harlot ; no one is in continual fear if not guilty ; no one is talkative if not a liar ; no one is ungrateful if not a clerk (kāyastha) ; no one is miserly if not the son of a liberal person ; no one is ever-wretched if not the jealous ; no one is laughed at by all if not the slave of women ; no one is of gentle speech if not an old man ; no one hates his father if sarvādhikaraṇasthairyocheṭṭā. The Paris Ed. has sarvādhikaraṇasthairyo^o, a reading which is not supported by the MSS. The text is, perhaps, corrupt.

82. Regarding the custom of prāyopaveśa used as a means for securing redress of injustice, etc., see JOLLY, Grundriss, Recht u. Sitte, p. 147. For other references in Rājat. see Index, s.v. prāya and prāyopaveśa.

88. From viii. 1171, it is certain that Mākṣikasvāmin was the name of a part of S'rinagar or a suburb immediately adjoining the capital. I believe, therefore, that Mākṣikasvāmin can be safely identified with the island of *Māy*sum*, which lies at the S.E. corner of S'rinagar between the Vitasta and the two branches of the Tsanṭh Kul or Mahasarit as explained in note iii. 339-349. The name *Māy*sum* can be traced back without difficulty to Mākṣikasvāmin through intermediate Apabhraṃśa forms in which the first part of the name, Mākṣika-, was turned, perhaps, into Māhiya* > Māhyu* > Māya*.

For the identity of Mākṣikasvāmin with *Māy*sum* speaks the mention of the former, viii. 1171, in connection with a great fire which arose in Kūṣkila, the modern Kāthūl, a quarter of S'rinagar situated nearly opposite to *Māy*sum*. Long before the island of *Māy*sum* was taken up for the modern European quarters, there existed a thickly populated suburb at its western extremity near the first city bridge.

A Mākṣikasvāmin Naga is mentioned by the Nilamata, 951.

90. For puṇḥscaleyo we have probably to amend puṇḥcaliyo, or with Durgapr. puṇḥscaleyo.

CANDRĀPIḌA.

he has not been begotten by another [man]; no one is devoid of shame if not possessed by love-passion; no one is thoroughly wicked but the man of mean learning. This is the summary of things as they really are."

93. After the Brahman's wife had thus spoken, the king had the Brahman, on whom her suspicion had fallen, brought into his presence and ordered him to exculpate himself.

94. Again the Brahman's wife addressed him: "O king, as he is famous for his knowledge of charms (khārkhodavidyā), he can get over an ordeal with ease."

95. Then the lord of the earth spoke to that [woman] while his face seemed to grow wan: "What shall we judges do to a man whose guilt has not been shown?"

96. "Not even another person can receive punishment if his guilt is not established: still less a Brahman, who is exempt from capital punishment although guilty."

97. When he stopped after these words, the Brahman's wife spoke again: "Four days have passed, O king, without my having taken food."

98. "I have not followed [my] husband [into death], because I was anxious for retaliation on the murderer. As this [man] has not received punishment, I seek death by starvation."

99. While the Brahman woman persisted in this [course], he (Candrāpiḍa) himself performed a prāyopaveśa at the feet of the Tribhuvanasvāmin [image].

100. When the king had spent there three nights, the [god], who rides on Satya (Garuḍa), and who is the highest of the never-sleeping [gods], spoke to him in his dream these true words, as the night was waning:

94. The practice of witchcraft and the belief in its efficacy have prevailed in Kāśmīr from early times, and have survived to some extent even to the present day; comp. BÜLLER, Report, p. 24. Marco Polo records of the people of Kāśmīr: "They have an astonishing acquaintance with the devilries of enchantment; inasmuch that they make their idols speak. They can also by their sorceries bring on changes of weather and produce darkness, and do a number of things so extraordinary that no one without seeing them would believe them." See YULE, Marco Polo, i. p. 175, with an interesting note giving later references to Kāśmīr magic.

The term khārkhoda, in the sense of a kind of deadly charm or witchcraft, recurs in v. 239, and is found also in the Vijayavaramāh. (Adipur.) xi. 25. In the form khārkhoda it is quoted by the N.P.W. from Caraka, vi. 23. Khārkhoda appears as the designation of a sorcerer or another kind of uncanny person in Haracar. ii. 125, along with Kṛtya and Vetālas.

The word occurs in the form khakhkhoda in one of the spells preserved on the ancient birch-bark leaves of the 'Bower MS.' There 'destruction by kh.' is mentioned between kṛtyakarma 'witchcraft' and evils caused by Vetālas; see Dr. HOERNLE's paper, Ind. Ant., xxi. pp. 356, 368 sq. Two similar spells found in the ancient Central Asian 'Weber MSS.' give the forms khakhkhoda and khākhkhoda. Compare Dr. HOERNLE's paper, J.A.S.B., 1898, p. 26, where the question of the different spellings is also discussed.

Whether the word khurkhoda (see note vii. 298) has any connection with khārkhoda seems now to me doubtful.

100. Garuḍa, who carries Viṣṇu, bears the name Satya, according to the Kośa passage quoted in the gloss of A₃.

101. "O king, such search after truth is not proper in the Kāli [age]. Who could place the sun on the sky at night?"

102. "On account of your [spiritual] power this shall once take place. Let rice-flour be thrown about in this courtyard of my temple."

103-104. "If on that [person] circumambulating this [shrine] three times there are seen behind his footprints the footprints of Brahmahatyā, then he is the murderer and deserves the appropriate punishment. This rito should be carried out at night; in day-time the sun keeps off what is of evil."

105. When he had this done, the guilt of the Brahman became evident, and thereupon the [royal] judge inflicted [upon him] the punishment which, as he was a Brahman, could not be that of death.

106. Then when that earthly Indra had passed judgment on the murderer of the husband, the Brahman woman spoke thus after uttering blessings :

107. "Among so many rulers of the earth as have ever existed, [only] the son of Kṛtavīrya (Arjuna) and you, O king, were seen to punish secret crimes."

108. "While you, O king, preside over this earth as judge, no one perishes without having reached the utmost object of [his] enmity or love."

109. Though the reign of this [king] was very short, yet it was thus filled with plentiful stories of his justice which might be thought of as [belonging] to the Kṛta Yuga.

110. Benumbing cold, methinks, [arising] from the contact with the lotus-seat, must have freely penetrated deep into the soul of Brahman.

111. How otherwise could he have ordained that he, who produced the happiness of the different castes (varṇa), should disappear as soon as seen, like the rainbow?

112. Tārāpiṇḍa, his younger brother, brought death on this king by making that Brahman, who felt deep wrath over his punishment, use his witchcraft (abhicāra).

113. In order to enjoy pleasures, which on account of the [preceding] evil deeds yield no enjoyment, the wicked destroy the virtuous, as the young cannols [destroy] the Ketaka-tree in order to get at its thorns.

103-104. The lengthy gloss added here in A by an unknown hand explains the supposition underlying the test recommended by the god. It is that the crime of killing a Brahman (brahmahatyā) follows the murderer in the shape of a female spectre. According to the story found in the Purāṇas (e.g. in the Kāśikhaṇḍa of the Skandapur., I. Adhy. 31), and alluded to in the gloss (āruhināśivacchedena mahādevatā), Brahmahatyā appeared first in the pursuit of Śiva, when this god had struck off the fifth head of Brahman.

110. Brahman is born from a lotus and is seated on a lotus; jaḍiman means both coldness and dullness.

111. The epithet vibhaktavarṇasobhasya refers also to the rainbow, 'shining in different colours (varṇa).'

CANDRĀPĪḌA.

114. From that [time] onwards, princes lusting for the throne in this kingdom began to use witchcraft and other evil practices against their elder relatives.

115-116. Who does not feel a thrill when he remembers that extreme (or last) act of forbearance on the part of the illustrious king Candrāpīḍa?—namely, that, when on the point of death, he did not destroy that Brahman sorcerer (kṛtyādhāyin), though he had got him [in his power], saying: “What sin is there in this poor fellow whom another has instigated?”

117. Surely, the Creator after forgetting him in the line of the kings of the Kṛta [Yuga], must have inserted him now with a mark of omission (kākapada) in the list of kings of the Kali [Yuga].

118. After being for eight years and eight months the benefactor of the earth, that self-controlled [prince] entered heaven and for ever the mind of the righteous.

TĪRĀPĪḌA.

119. Then the earth-disc was held by the cruel Tīrāpīḍa, who created terror by his glory, mingled with blood on account of the fratricide.

120. When his young glory was born, he carried off the fame of his adversaries, which resembled the full cups [used at the birth-sacrifice], and made the headless corpses dance.

121. Even the brilliant fortune of this evil-working [king] created uneasiness everywhere, like the light of the burning-ground.

122. Thinking that the Brahmans through their spells caused the power of the gods to be present, he in his hatred of the gods meted out punishment to the Brahmans.

123. He ruled on the earth [only] for four years and one month less six days, his merits [from previous births] having been out-balanced by his treachery against his elder [brother].

124. Then the Brahmans made his life sink through secret witchcraft, and he found a death similar to that of his brother, but not his way [to heaven].

125. Whoever makes a plot to injure others, surely perishes [himself] by that very [plot]. The smoke which the fire produces to blind the eyes, after turning into a cloud, extinguishes that very [fire] by its water.

LALITĀDĪTYA-
MUKTĀPĪḌA

126. Then the illustrious King Lalitāditya became the universal monarch, he

117. Kākapada, ‘crowfoot,’ is the technical term for a mark of omission in MSS. The glossator A₂ represents it as +, and in this form it can be seen, e.g., on fol. 162 of A₂, reproduced in facsimile in my Ed. The corresponding Kā. term, given in the gloss as kāvachhedo, is still used in the form kāvachgyund.

120. The jātakarṇa ceremony is alluded to, which is celebrated with a sacrifice and festivities.

122. For the rendering of danḍam atyajat, comp. gloss of A₂ and viii. 513.

126. The name of Lalitāditya or Muktāpīḍa is found in the Chinese Annals of the T'ang dynasty. These record the arrival of an embassy from Mu-to-pi, King of Kāśmīr, who was [far] beyond the conception of Fate which creates [only] rulers of limited territories.

LALITĀDITYA-MURTĀPIṬA.

127. With the shining mass of his glory's rays he adorned, as it were, the elephant [representing the isle] of Jambudvīpa with scented powders.

128. This king, who carried far his prowess, abandoned his [warlike] fury [only] when the [opposing] kings discreetly folded their palms at his victorious onset.

129. At the sound of his drums [beaten] in attack, the dwellings of his enemies were deserted by the [frightened] inhabitants, and thus resembled women dropping in fright the burden of their wombs.

130. He made the enemies' wives, on whose faces the ends of the [painted] forehead-marks became detached, and whose tears were flowing, perform, as it were, oblations to the Pitṛs (nivāpa) with folded hands.

131. The king, eager for conquests, passed his life chiefly on expeditions, moving round the earth like the sun.

132. The Mahārāja, taking the tribute of the eastern region in the presence of his flaming glory, shone forth in the land between the Gaṅgā and Yamunā (Anturvedi), wearing his own fame as head-dress.

during the reign of the Emperor Hiuen-taung, A.D. 718-755, and after the first Chinese expedition against Po-lin (Baltistan), which took place between the years 730-747. The king requested an alliance against the Tibetans, and the despatch of a Chinese auxiliary force, which was to encamp in the midst of his country on the shores of the Mahāpadma lake (i.e. the Vular). He offered to find provisions for an army of 200,000 men, and reported that in alliance with the king of Central India he had blocked the five routes of Tibet. Comp. the extract of Ma-tu-an-lin in A. REMUSAT'S translation, Nouv. Mélanges asiat., i. pp. 190 sq.; also KLAPROTH'S Mémoires relatifs à l'Asie, ii. pp. 275 sq.; Ind. Ant., ii. p. 102 sqq., and Messrs. LÉVI and CHAVANNES, Journal asiat., 1895, p. 351. Notwithstanding the very different picture which the notices of the Annales gives of the power of Kāśmīr at this period, the identity of Mu-to-pi with Muktāpiṭa cannot be doubted.

As the year of the Kāśmīrian embassy is not indicated, the above notice does not allow us to check with accuracy the dates assigned by K.'s chronology to Lalitāditya's reign, A.D. 700-736. That the same Annales necessitate a correction of at least twenty-five years in the date of Candrāpiṭa, has already been shown in note iv. 45. REINAUD, Mémoire, pp. 189 sqq., has rightly indicated the serious doubts which must arise as to the possibility of the extensive conquests ascribed by the Chronicle to Lalitāditya, in view of the general political situation created in the North-West of India by the irruption of the Arabs.

It is very probable that ALBERŪNĪ refers (India, ii. p. 178) to Muktāpiṭa when speaking of the King of Kāśmīr called Muttai, whose alleged victory over the Turks the people of Kāśmīr celebrated by a festival on the 2nd of the month Caitra. "According to their account he ruled over the whole world. But this is exactly what they say of most of their kings. However, they are incautious enough to assign to him a time not much anterior to our own time, which leads to their lie being found out." According to Prof. Bühler's ingenious suggestion, مٽٽاپير hides here Muttapir*, an Apabhraṃśa form of the king's name; see Ind. Ant., xix. p. 333.

In my Notes on Ou-k'ang, pp. 5 sq., I have shown that we have probably a reference to Muktāpiṭa also in the Itinerary of that Chinese pilgrim; see below, iv. 185, the note on the Moung-ti Vihāra.

130. At the nivāpa ceremony water is offered to the Pitṛs from folded hands, after throwing into the water a small quantity of the powder with which the forehead-marks are painted.

132. The pun introduced into this verse cannot be rendered in a translation. Mahā-

LALITĀDITYA-
MUKTĀPIḌA.

War with Yaśovarman.

133. At that very Gādhīpura, where [once] the wind-god had made the maidens humpbacked (kanyānān kubjatvām), that praiseworthy [king] made the warriors [bend their backs] in terror.

134. King Lalitāditya, withering in a moment the mountain-like Yaśovarman's troops (vāhinā), resembled the fierce sun [when it dries up a hill-stream] (adrivāhinī).

135. The thoughtful ruler of Kanyakubja showed himself as one of the wise when he [first] showed his back to the fiercely shining Lalitāditya, and [then] made his submission.

136. His (Lalitāditya's) companions surpassed even him in abundant pride, as the breeze from a sandal-wood [forest] carries even stronger scent than the spring.

137-138. Thus his minister of foreign affairs (sāṃdhyivigrahika), Mitraśarman, at the conclusion of peace did not tolerate the diplomatic politeness [observed] in the treaty document [drawn up on the part] of the illustrious Yaśovarman, as he rāja is in Kāśmīr the conventional title given to the bridegroom during the marriage festivities. Similar double meanings attach to the other words. The verse must be understood at the same time to mean: "He as bridegroom wearing the [festive] head-dress [white like] his own fame, appeared resplendent in the midst of the sacrificial place (vedi), taking before the shining fire the hand of his betrothed (pūrvadig itī pūrvadigā)."

133. Gādhīpura is a name of the town Kanyakubja, the present Kanauj, derived from its legendary king Gādhi. The well-known legend alluded to in our verse, gives an etymology of the name Kanyakubja; comp. Lassen, Ind. Alt., i. p. 158; CUNNINGHAM, Anc. Geogr., p. 370 sq.; Si-yu-ki, i. pp. 207 sqq., etc.

134. The expression pratāpādityatāh yayan contains an allusion to the name of Lalitāditya's father, but does not indicate that Lalitāditya, besides his other name (v. 42), bore also the name of Pratāpāditya, as erroneously supposed by CUNNINGHAM, Coins of Med. India, p. 40.

Scarcely any historical data are as yet available regarding King Yaśovarman of Kanyakubja apart from the notice in our passage, though we have a 'historical poem' dealing with Yaśovarman's victory over an (unnamed) Guṇḍa king in Vākpati's Gauḍa-vāha. Regarding the very scanty information contained in this work, see Sh. Pandurang Pandit's introduction to his edition, pp. xli-cvi., passim.

It has been assumed that the king of Central India with whom King Mu-to-pi Muktāpiḍa boasted of having concluded an alliance (see note iv. 126), was Yaśovarman. In this case Muktāpiḍa's war with Yaśovarman, and the latter's defeat, must fall after the date of Muktāpiḍa's embassy to the Chinese court. This date must be later than 736 A.D.; comp. Messrs. LÉVI and CHAVANNES, Journ. asiat., 1895, p. 353. Pauthier, in a paper quoted by the last-named scholars (Examen méthodique des faits qui concernent le Thian-ohu, 1839, p. 60), had already suggested the identity of Yaśovarman with I-cha-fen-mo, king of Central India, who sent in 731 his minister Sen-yo-to to the Chinese court.

According to Prof. M. MÜLLER, India, p. 334, Yaśovarman and his court-poet Vākpatirāja (see below iv. 144), are mentioned in the Jaina Tanpāyacha Patāvali as living about Samvat 800, i.e. 744 A.D.

Regarding a coin of Yaśovarman, which was found with Sassano-Arab coins in the Mānikyala Stūpa, and is supposed to have been struck by Y. of Kanauj, see Arch. Surrey Rep., ii. p. 159.

135. The simile of the preceding verse is continued. Yaśovarman flies before Lalitāditya, as one turns one's face from the shining sun, and seeks afterwards his protection, as one basks in the sun.

136. The wind from the south, where the sandal-wood grows, accompanies the spring.

137-138. The translation of these verses is not quite certain. They seem to refer to an objection raised by Lalitāditya's minister at the time of the peace negotiations to the thought it a slight on his master if it were written 'The treaty of Yaśovarman and Lalitāditya,' and thus the name [of his king] not shown first.

139. The king esteemed highly that [minister's] insistence on the proper form, though his generals, who were dissatisfied with the long duration of the war, blamed it.

140. Being pleased, he bestowed upon him (Mitrasārman) the five [offices distinguished] by the term 'Great' (pañcamahāśabda). Yaśovarman, on the other hand, he uprooted entirely.

141. From that time onwards there have existed over the eighteen offices, which had been created before, the five [new ones], which he instituted.

142-143. These bore the designations 'office of high chamberlain' (mahāpratihārapiṇḍā); that of 'chief minister of foreign affairs' (mahāsamudhivigraha); that of 'chief master of the horse' (mahāśvaśālā); that of 'high keeper of the treasury' (mahābhāṇḍāyāra); and the fifth was called that of the 'chief executive officer' (mahāsādhanaśhāga). The S'āhi (or S'āhis) and other princes were the officers in these [high posts].

form of the treaty document to be furnished by Yaśovarman. It appears that diplomatic usage would have authorized each of the 'contracting parties' to put his name first in his own copy of the treaty, the copies being subsequently exchanged between the two parties after ratification. Mitrasārman refuses to accept the document drawn up in this form by Yaśovarman's chancery, and Lalitāditya thereupon breaks off the negotiations.

140. THOMAS, i. p. 486, and after him LASSON, Ind. Ant., iii. p. 998, have assumed that our text shows a lacuna before this verse, because the copy of A, procured by Moorcroft and used for the Calcutta Ed., contained some indication to this effect. This mistake has arisen from the accidental fact of A, having left here a blank space in the MS., which the writer, however, was careful enough to deprive of all significance by the note: na kinēit patitam. Similar blanks are found elsewhere in A and other Kāśmir paper MSS. They are easily explained from the Kāśmir custom of writing MSS. not on single leaves as elsewhere in India, but on connected 'forms' (see Preface to Ed., p. vii.). Fast writers like Rājānaka Ratnakanṭha save the time otherwise required for the drying of the obverse of each folio by copying alternately in two or more different 'forms.' This has the occasional result that small spaces at the end of the forms must be left blank, or vice versa the writing unduly crammed, owing to some slight error in calculating the extent of the text allotted to each 'form.'

140-143. pañcamahāśabda.—The eighteen earlier offices (karmasthāna) are those referred to in i. 120. Among the five new ones, which were scarcely more than mere court-titles, only the first is mentioned again in the Chronicle, iv. 185. Collectively the five offices are mentioned in iv. 980; comp. regarding them, JELLY, Weber-Festgabe, p. 85.

Our passage is of interest, as it clearly establishes, at least for Kāśmir, the significance of the term pañcamahāśabda often met with in ancient inscriptions and grants from other parts of India. The term has been correctly explained, in the sense indicated by our passage, as 'the five titles commencing with Great' by Profs. Bühler, Kielhorn, Mr. Fleet and others; comp. Ind. Ant., iv. pp. 106, 180, 201; xiii. 131. Another explanation first suggested by Sir W. Elliot, Ind. Ant., v. 251, would refer the term to the privilege of using certain musical instruments conferred on vassals as a mark of honour. The number five is supposed to be connected with the beating of these instruments five times a day, or to relate to five different instruments used for this purpose. The evidence adduced loc. cit. and Ind. Ant., xii. p. 95; xiv. p. 202, does, however, not appear sufficiently old to establish this interpretation as the original sense of the term.

The meaning of the last title, mahāsādhanaśhāga, is quite uncertain. The above render-

LALITĀDITYA-MUKTĀPIḢA.

144. Yaśovarman, who had been served by Vākpatirāja, the illustrious Bhavabhūti, and other poets, [himself] became by his defeat a panegyrist of his (Lalitāditya's) virtues.

145. What more [shall I relate]? The land of Kanyakubja from the bank of the Yamunā to that of the Kālikā, was as much in his power as the courtyard of his palace.

Lalitāditya's Diyvijaya.

146. Passing over Yaśovarman, just as the Gaṅgā [breaks through] the Himālaya, his army (vāhini) proceeded with ease to the eastern ocean.

147. His elephants, which there saw the land of their birth, were only with difficulty induced by the abuse of their impatient drivers to march on from the Kalinga country.

ing was suggested by WILSON, p. 45. LASSEN, Ind. Alt., iii. 998, would refer the title to a director of public works, JOLLY, l.c., to a minister of police.

Sāhi.—In my paper Zur Geschichte der Sāhis von Kābul (Festgruss an R. v. Roth, Stuttgart, 1893, pp. 198 sqq.), I have shown that the title Sāhi is used elsewhere in the Chronicle for the designation of the dynasty, which preceded the Ghazna Sultans in the rule of Kābul and Gandhāra, and which Alberūni (India, ii. p. 18) knows as the 'Hindu Shāhiyas of Kābul.' From Note J, v. 152-155, it will be seen that Lalliya, whom K. mentions in the reign of Śaṅkaravarman as the mighty Sāhi ruler residing at Udabhāṇḍa, is in all probability identical with the king, who appears in Alberūni's account under the name of Kallar as the first of the Hindu Shāhiyas. The Sāhi or Sāhis mentioned in our own passage could, therefore, not have belonged to this dynasty.

We know, however, from the evidence indicated in the above-quoted paper, that the royal title Sāhi had continued in use from Indo-Scythian times through the various dynasties, belonging to the Yue-tchis, Little Yue-tchis, White Huns and Turke, which ruled successively in the Kābul Valley and Gandhāra. It can, therefore, be safely assumed that the Sāhi mentioned in our passage belonged to the dynasty which preceded immediately the Hindu Shāhiyas.

Alberūni, India, ii. pp. 10 sqq., designates these rulers as 'Turks who were said to be of Tibetan origin,' and his statement has now received full confirmation by the testimony of Ou-k'ong, who, visiting Gandhāra in the years 753-761, found that country under the rule of a family of undoubtedly Turkish origin. Compare LÉVI and CHAVANNE's paper, L'Itinéraire d'Ou-k'ong, Journal asiat., 1896, pp. 377 sqq. The notices in the Annals of the T'ang, quoted in the last-named paper, give the names and dates for these Turkish kings, who ruled Kipin-Gandhāra during the first half of the eighth century. Within this period must have fallen Mukṭāpiḣa-Lalitāditya's reign (see note iv. 128). In one of these rulers we have accordingly to recognize the Sāhi, whom K. claims as a vassal of the Kāśmirian king.

144. I prefer the reading of L, *kavivākpati*², to the text found in A, *kavir vākpati*², which makes Yaśovarman himself a Kāvī; see, however, Subhāṣitāvalī, Introd., p. 95.

Vākpatirāja is known to us as the author of the Prākṛit Kāvya Gauḍavaho, which celebrates Yaśovarman's victory over a Gauḍa king; see note iv. 134. Bhavabhūti is the famous author of the dramas Mālatīmādhava, Uttararāmacarita and Mahāvīracarita; comp. regarding him Prof. Bhandarkar's Preface to the Mālatīmādhava (Bombay Skr. Series), pp. v. sqq.

✓145. The Kālikā is, perhaps, the present Kālī Nadi, which flows parallel to the right of the Ganges until it joins the latter stream a short distance below Kanauj. It might be urged against this identification that the extent indicated by Hsien-tsiang for the kingdom of Kanyakubja makes it probable that it included territories beyond the Ganges. But the Chinese pilgrim visited it when it was the seat of the great Harṣavardhana. Moreover, K. can scarcely be expected to be accurate in his topography when relating legendary expeditions to distant countries; comp. CUNNINGHAM, Anc. Geogr., p. 378.

The subsequent stages of Lalitāditya's wonderful march of victory round India have been discussed already by WILSON, History, pp. 47 sq., with much care and learning.

✓146. vāhini means also a stream; comp. for the same pun, e.g. iv. 184; vii. 2; viii. 3403. ✓147. The name Kalinga applies to the country on the coast S.W. of Orissa, compris-

148. Numberless elephants joined him from the Gauḍa land, as if attracted by friendship for the elephant [carrying] the couch of Lakṣmī, who was attached [to the king].

149. When his advanced troops reached the eastern ocean, it seemed as if the trunks of the hosts of his war-elephants grasped in the waves the hair of the ocean.

150. By the sea-shore, dark with extensive forests, he proceeded to Yama's region (south), while his enemies went by his sword to Yama's region (the under-world).

151. The Karṇāṭas, who wear their hair-braids high, bent down before him, and dropping their [head-ornaments of] golden Ketaka-leaves, used [instead] his glory as a diadem.

152. At that period there ruled as sovereign over the Dekhan (Dakṣiṇāpatha), a far-famed, quick-eyed Karṇāṭa [princess] called Ratṭā.

153. This queen, who was, like Durgā, of unlimited power, made the roads over the Vindhya mountains adequate and free of obstacles.

154. She too felt satisfied when she bowed down and saw her own person transferred to (reflected in) the round mirror of the nails of Lalitāditya's lotus-feet.

155. Sipping the wine of the cocoanut-trees at the foot of the palms, and [fanned] by the breeze on the banks of the Kāverī, his warriors forgot their fatigue.

156. The snakes, which dropped from the multitude of the sandal-wood-trees on the Malaya mountain (Candunādrī), appeared like so many curved swords falling from the arms [of that mountain] from fear of his attack.

157. Putting his foot on the islands as if they were crossing-stones, he moved quickly and without difficulty over the ocean just as over a rivulet.

ing the present Madras districts of Ganjam and Vizagapatam; comp. CUNNINGHAM, Enc. Geogr., pp. 515 sqq.

148. Gauḍa is the name of the present Bengal.

150. The epithet vanarājīṣyāmalena must also be taken as referring to kṛpāreṇa, 'his sword which was dark like an extensive forest.' The dark colour of the sword is often alluded to, e.g. in Khaḍgasāṭaka (Kāvyamālā Ed.) vv. 16, 17, 23; comp. also below iv. 156.

152. The name Ratṭā evidently represents that of the Raṭṭa or Rāṣṭrakūṭa dynasty of Mahārāṣṭra, which from the middle of the eighth century had subjected Karṇāṭa or the Canarese country. For the dynastic name Raṭṭa as the equivalent of Rāṣṭrakūṭa, see

Ind. Ant., xii. pp. 216, 218, etc., and for the history of this dynasty BHANDARKAR, History of the Dekkan, pp. 62 sqq.

153. Durgā Vindhyaśāsini is alluded to.

As K. makes Lalitāditya proceed from the Karnatic to the Kāverī (Cauvery) River and hence to the hills of Malabar (Candunādrī, 'sandal-wood mountains'), the term Vindhya can scarcely be meant here for the mountain range of that name in Central India. Probably the Eastern Ghāṭs are intended, as suggested by WILSON, p. 47. The real Vindhya mountains are mentioned in their proper place below, iv. 161.

156. The dark colour of the snake and of the sword forms the point of comparison.

157. The expression uttarāśmānak is rightly explained in the gloss of A₂ by utta-

LALITADITYA-MUKTĀRĪPA.

158. Then having his triumphal cheers sounded by the music of the ocean waves, he, the first (aprasūcīma) of conquerors, proceeded to the western region.

159. His shining majesty, on reaching the seven Kaunkaṇas, dark with betel-nut trees, appeared like that of the sun with his [seven] horses.

160. Dvārakā, appearing from the wind-tossed waves of the western ocean, inspired his soldiers with a desire of entering [that holy city].

161. As the atmosphere was filled with the dust [arising] from the minerals trodden down by his forces, it appeared as if Mount Vindhya had risen up red with excessive anger.

162. The tusks of his elephants were split only by the light of the moon on the diadem of [S'iva] Mahākālā, as they marched in rows into Avantī.

163. Then when he saw on all sides most of the kings defeated, he entered by pathless tracks the far-spreading northern region (uttarāpatha).

164. There he had, step by step, fights with mighty kings, just as Indra with the chief mountains when bent on the task of cutting their wings.

165. The stables of the Kāmbojas were emptied of horses, and their [consequent] darkness made them appear as if filled with [black] buffaloes instead.

166. The Tukkhāras, who [at his approach] fled to the mountain ranges, leaving behind their horses, ceased to long for the latter when they saw the horse-faced [Kinnaras in the mountains].

raṇārtham atmānaḥ. The Kāś. term ut'vat'gal, added by A, (ut'vat'gal), is still used for crossing stones placed in the bed of small streams.

✓ 159. I have translated according to the reading of A, kramukakāyānān, which seems preferable to that of A, L kramukān sapta adopted in the text. Kramuka, which according to the latter reading would have to be taken as the designation of a country, is not known as a local name. According to Wilson 'the seven Konkaṇas' are known in the Dekhan as comprehending the following territories on the Malabar coast: Kerala, Tuluṅga, Govarāṣṭra (Goa), Konkaṇa proper, Kerātaka, Varalatta and Berbera.—From Mr. Fleet's allusions, Ind. Ant., ix. p. 130; xxii. p. 182, it appears that the expression 'Seven Konkaṇas' is still known to modern tradition.

✓ 160. Dvārakā is the name of Kṛṣṇa's city located at the north-western extremity of the Gujarāt peninsula.

✓ 162. S'iva in the form of Mahākālā was worshipped at a famous shrine in Ujjayini, the capital of Avantī in Mālava; comp. WILSON, Sel. Works, ii. p. 142; REINAUD, Mémoire, pp. 291 sqq.; ALBERŪNI, India, ii. p. 202.

The verse alludes to the belief that the tusks of elephants are split by the moon-rays.

✓ 165. The country of the Kāmbojas, i.e. the eastern part of Afghanistan, is famous already in the Epics for its breed of horses. It still sends its annual supplies of the 'Kabuli' horse into all parts of Northern India. K. boldly compares the black omptiness of the stables with dark-coloured buffaloes.

✓ 166. The order, in which the Tukkhāras are here mentioned, makes it highly probable that the people meant are the same who are called Tukhāras in other Sanskrit texts, the Toṣapoi or Tochari of classical authors. The statement of Hiuen-tsiang (Si-yu-ki, i. p. 37) about the country of the Tu-ho-lo or Tukhāra, makes it certain that this people, possibly a branch of the 'Great Yue-tchi' nation, had given its name to the upper Oxus Valley, including Balkh and Badakhshan. This is the territory known as Tokhāristān to the early Muhammadan writers. The difficulties besetting the question as to the original application of the name Tukhāra have been fully set forth by YULE, J.R.A.S., n.s., vi. pp. 94 sqq. Comp. ST.-MARTIN, Mémoire analytique, p. 36; LASSEN, Ind. Alt., i. p. 1023; FIÉQUET, ii.

167. He thought Mummuni defeated [only] after having vanquished him three times in battle. The valorous, indeed, think a single victory over an enemy [as accidental] as a letter [which is traced by the boring] of a wood-worm.

168. The anxiety [felt] by the Bhauṭṭas could not be seen on their faces, which are white in their original state, as the anger of the monkeys [cannot be seen] on their faces, reddish-brown by nature.

169. His dignity did not tolerate the continual wine-[drinking] of the Darads, [as little] as the rising morning sun [tolerates] the light of the herbs in the [mountain-]gorges.

170. The wind of the northern region, which touched the musk-deer and shook the stamina of the saffron flowers, attended his armies as if they were women.

171. As the town of Prāgyjotiṣa was deserted, he saw the smoke of incense rise only from the quantities of black aloes burning in the forests.

p. 186, and for other references Beal's note on Si-yu-ki, i. p. 37.

The form Tukkhāra, with Jihvāmāliya, in place of the usual Tukhāra, is found again in iv. 211, and must also have been written originally in the closely connected passage iv. 246, where A has *bhukkhāra*² and L *tukkhāra*². The same form may be supposed to have been intended in Bilhana's Vikram. ix. 116; xviii. 93, where the Ed. reads tukkhāra. The ancient sign of the Jihvāmāliya closely resembles a superscribed ॐ, both in S'aradā and Devanāgarī, and is sometimes mistaken for it; comp. the form khākkhorda for khāḥkhorda referred to in note iv. 94.

No importance need be attached to the v.l. of A, bhukkhārāḥ, in our own passage and the form bhukkhāra written by A, in iv. 246, as the akṣaras ṭu and bhu can scarcely be distinguished in old S'aradā. For iv. 246, which mentions the birthplace of the minister Cakkaṃpa, the form tukkhāra is proved as the correct one by a reference to iv. 211, where the same person is designated as a Tukkhāra, and further by the reading of L, tukkhāra. L reads also in our own passage tukkhārāḥ, and thus confirms the reading of A, accepted in the text.

The apparent connection with the name of Bukhāra has induced former editors and interpreters to prefer the reading bhukkhārāḥ, though that designation of the ancient Sogdiana has not yet been found in Skr. literature. To Tokharistan or the upper Oxus regions points distinctly the mention of the mountains in our verse and the reference to the Tukkhāras' horses. The latter are mentioned too in the above quoted passages of Bilhana.

167. The name Mummuni has been fully discussed in note iii. 332, where also the v.l. of L is indicated. The gloss, Mumen Khān, given by A, on our passage, has apparently suggested to the editors of On-k'ong's Itinerary (Journal asiat., 1895, p. 351), the identification of Mummuni with the title of the Khalifs, Amir-ul-Mūnenin. But this glossator is quite modern, and I have shown in Ed., p. xii, how little reliability can be claimed for his information on geographical or historical points.

168-169. Regarding the Bhauṭṭas and Darads, see note i. 312.

The healing herbs of the mountains are supposed to shine at night; comp. TAYLOR'S note on this passage.

About the wine-drinking habits of certain Dard tribes, see DEBE, Jumroo, p. 430.

170. The musk-deer is found on the high mountain-plateaus to the N. and E. of Kāśmīr. The saffron flower is cultivated in the Valley of Kāśmīr itself; see above note i. 122.

171-175. After bringing Lalitāditya to the countries of the Bhauṭṭas and Darads immediately bordering on Kāśmīr in the N. and E., K. makes the king conclude his march of conquest by expeditions into purely mythical regions, which Hindu tradition locates in the far North and East. The land of the Uttarakurus figures in the mythological geography of the Indian Epics as a kind of Hyperborean paradise; comp. LASSEN, Zeitschr. f. d. Kunde d. Morg., ii. p. 62 sq.; also Ind. Alt., i. p. 346 sq., and in particular V. DE ST.-MARTIN,

LALITĀDITYA-
MUKTĀPIPA.

172. In the 'sea of sand' (vālūkāmbudhi), where the mirage produced the illusion of a stream, his lordly elephants appeared like a host of large crocodiles.

173. The women-folk in Strirājya made the resolute hearts of his warriors melt, not by displaying the fronts of their elephants, but by [showing] their high breasts.

174. On seeing the emotion [shown] by the queen of Strirājya in his presence by trembling and otherwise, no one could decide whether it were terror or love-desire.

175. In fright of him the Uttarakurus betook themselves to the trees, which had given them birth, just as the snakes terrified by the snake-destroying [Garuḍa] [hide themselves] in holes.

176. Then with the treasures obtained by his conquests he proceeded to his own land, as the lion goes to the mountain with his claws full of the pearls [taken from the frontal protuberances] of the destroyed elephants.

177. He made his attendants kings by granting them Jālandhara, Lohara, and other territories.

178. This mighty [king] made the [conquered] rulers, in order to indicate their defeat, adopt various characteristic marks, which they [and their people] wear humbly even at the present day.

179. Clearly it is by his command, to display the mark of their bondage, that the Turushkas carry their arms at their back and shave half their head.

Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscr., Sav. Étrang., vi. pp. 259 sqq., 272 sq., on the 'Ortopokoppa' of Ptolemy.

The 'land of the Amazons' (Strirājya), where no man may dwell longer than half a year, is mentioned also in the Mahābhārata and in Varāhamihira's Brhatsaṃhitā; comp. LASSEN, Ind. Alt., i. pp. 851 sq.

For Prāgjyotiṣa, see note ii. 147. The 'sea of sand' (vālūkāmbudhi) mentioned in verse iv. 172, and again in the story related iv. 279 sqq., is distinctly placed in the north (see iv. 306), and seems to imply a distant knowledge of the desert tracts of Eastern Turkestan and Tibet.

173. The word kavāṭin, 'elephant,' not found in our dictionaries, is derived from kavāṭa, which according to Mañkha's Kośa designates the temple of elephants (ibhagan-dhadvārapattayak kavāṭaḥ syāt).

177. The name of Jālandhara is preserved in that of the present town and district of Jalandhar in the Panjab. But the ancient kingdom of Jalandhara included in the centuries preceding the Muhammadan conquests, as Hiuen-tsiang's account (Si-yu-ki,

i. 175 sq.) and other evidence recorded by CUNNINGHAM, Ans. Geogr., pp. 136 sqq., shows, also the hill territories on the upper course of the Bias and in particular Kāngra or Trigarta. Compare note iii. 100 and Prof. BÜHLER's remarks, Epigr. Ind., i. pp. 11, 102.

The position of Lohara, the present Lohrin, has been fully discussed in Note E.

178-180. WILSON quotes, p. 49, a similar legend from the Harivaṃśa which relates how the various tribes of Mlecchas were forced by King Sāgara to dress their hair in different distinguishing fashions. The observations underlying K.'s story still hold good. Yarkandis and Tibetans are fond of walking with their hands folded at their back, and can often be seen in this attitude about the Bazaars of Srinagar. Among Kāśmiris, whether Brahmans or Muhammadans, this habit is very unusual.

The dhātis or waistcloths worn by Dakhanis (and Bengālis), the ends of which are allowed to hang down behind to the ground, still excite the amusement and wonder of Kāśmiris.

180. On the waistcloth of the Dākṣiṇātyas that king put the tail which sweeps the ground, to mark that they were like beasts.

181. There is no town, no village, no river, no sea, and no island where he did not consecrate a shrine.

182. That proud [ruler] gave generally to his foundations names which in some cases had an appropriate relation to his doings and in others were in keeping with the [special] occasion.

183. When he had resolved (kṛtanīscaya) upon the conquest of the world, he built the [town called] Sunīścitapura; feeling proud, he built Darpiṭapura with a [shrine of] Keśava (Viṣṇu).

184. When receiving fruit (phala), the king constructed Phalapura; when taking a leaf (parṇa), Parṇotsa, and while at play (brīḍan), the Vihāra of Kṛiḍārāma.

185. And in the land of the Amazons (S'rīrājya) he placed an image of Nṛhari (Viṣṇu), which was suspended in the air, by fixing a magnet which drew it upwards and one which dragged it downwards.

186. While this protector of the earth was [absent] in another region, his architect built a town, called after him [Lalitapura], and [thereby] incurred his anger.

187. Swelled with pride, the king granted the land of Kanyakubju with its villages to the [shrine of] Āditya, [which he erected] at that [town of] Lalitapuru.

183. The position of neither of the two places here mentioned is known; the name of Darpiṭapura occurs again vii. 906; viii. 1940.

184. Regarding Phalapura, which must be located near Parihāsapura and the confluence of the Vitastā and Sindhu, see Note I, v. 97, also the gloss of A₂, iv. 673.

Parṇotsa is undoubtedly the modern town of Pīnch, 74° 9' long. 33° 45' lat., called Prānta by Kāśmīra. The place has given its name to a small hill-state situated to the S.W. of the Pir Pāntsal range, and at present under a branch of the Jammu family. The territory is mentioned under the name of Pun-nu-tso by Hsien-tsiang, who visited it on his way from Kāśmīr to Rājapuri (Rajauri), and probably reached it by the Tośmaidan route; comp. Si-yu-ki, i. p. 163. In his time it was directly subject to Kāśmīr. Subsequently the town appears to have been included in the hill-district of Lohara; comp. vii. 1800; viii. 914, 917, 1680, and Note B on Lohara (iv. 177).

Hsien-tsiang's reference in the first half of the 7th century proves that the name Par- notsa is older than the time of Lalitāditya. CUNNINGHAM, Ans. Geogr., p. 128, has correctly identified Pun-nu-tso with Pīnch, but has not recognized in it the Parṇotsa of the Chronicle. The identity of the latter name with Prānta is well known to the Panjābī of S'rīnagar. Kāśmīra represents a large percentage in the population of the town and territory of Prānta. This is evidently the result of the close political connection which has since old times existed between the latter and Kāśmīr. Parṇotsa is frequently mentioned by S'rīvara, see i. 67, 322, 607, 736; ii. 68, 105; iv. 145, 612.

The Kṛiḍārāma viḥāra is not referred to again, and its position is unknown.

186. The gloss of A₂ identifies Lalitapura, referred to under the name of Lalitādityapura, vi. 219, 224, with Lātṣpūr, a village of the Vihī Pargana, situated 75° 1' long. 33° 58' lat. on the right bank of the Vitastā. The local tradition of the place tells of a large town, which King 'Lalitādīt' had built here and on the adjoining Uḍar. No ancient remains can be traced at present above ground.

LALITĀDITYA-
MUKTĀPIḌA.

188. At Huṣkapura this noble-minded king built the splendid [shrine of Viṣṇu] Muktasvāmin and a large Vihāra with a Stūpa.

189. Having taken one crore when he proceeded for the conquest of the world, he presented on his return eleven crores to the [shrine of Ś'iva] Bhūteśa as an expiatory offering.

190. The lord of the earth erected there a lofty temple of stone for [Ś'iva] Jyēṣṭharudra, and made a grant of land and villages.

191. At Calradhara he made an arrangement for conducting the water of the 188. Regarding Huṣkapura: Uṣkīr, see note i. 168.

The Stūpa mentioned in our text is in all probability identical with the one referred to by CUNNINGHAM, Anc. Geogr., p. 100, as having been found still intact by the Rev. Cowie near Uṣkīr. A photograph of it (1888) is given by COLE, Anc. Build. On a visit paid in August, 1892, I found about 400 yards to the W. of the village the scanty remains of a Stūpa which according to the villagers' statements was dug into and partly levelled down 'years ago' by some Śākhib. From a notice quoted by Mr. LAWRENCE, Valley, p. 163, it appears that these excavations, of which I have not been able to trace any report, were conducted by Mr. Garrick in 1882.

Another ancient monument in the shape of a colossal Liṅga, about 10' high and still upright, is found between Uṣkīr and the present Tonga terminus of Barāmūla, at a distance of about half a mile from either place. Walls of old buildings can be traced on the ground in various places of the neighbouring fields.

In my Notes on Ou-k'ong, pp. 3 sqq., I have fully stated the reasons which suggest the identity of the Vihāra referred to in our passage with the Moung-ti Vihāra mentioned by the Chinese pilgrim at the commencement of his list of Kāśmīr monasteries. Ou-k'ong distinctly informs us that 'this monastery was built by the king of Northern India after he had obtained the dignity,' and there can be no doubt as to Moung-ti being intended to represent the name of this king.

There is a curious resemblance between Ou-k'ong's notice and the manner in which Albāṛīnī in a passage quoted above in note iv. 128 (India, ii. p. 178) refers to Muktāpiḍa. This, as well as the consideration of points connected with the Chinese transcription of Indian names, makes it probable that we have in Moung-ti an attempt to represent a Prakritized, i.e. Kāśmīrī, form of the shortened name, Mutta* or Muttā* for Mukta or Muktā. Both the latter forms are found as abbreviations (bhīmanav) of Muktāpiḍa in the names of temples mentioned by K.; see Muktāśvara, iv. 196, 201, and Muktasvāmin in our passage.

The great Vihāra which our verse mentions, is the only one in the long list of Muktāpiḍa's foundations of which the name is not specifically indicated by K. From this particular circumstance, and the analogy of the name Muktasvāmin given by the king to his Viṣṇu shrine at the same place, it may be concluded with great probability that the name of this Vihāra was Muktavihāra, the original of Ou-k'ong's Moung-ti Vihāra.

The other great Vihāra which the king is subsequently said to have built at Parihāsa-pura, iv. 200, seems to have received the name of Rājavihāra, 'the king's Vihāra,' in evident contradistinction from our Muktavihāra*. The proposed identification is further confirmed by Ou-k'ong's mention of the Moung-ti Vihāra at the commencement of his list, and the reference he makes to the studies he carried on there. Ou-k'ong entered Kāśmīr through the 'Western Gate' of the kingdom at Varīhamūla. Muktāpiḍa's Vihāra at Huṣkapura was, therefore, likely to have been his first place of rest and study in the Valley.

189. The figures given in the text must be taken as referring to the dimāva currency; regarding the latter, see Note II, iv. 405.

The king is supposed to perform a mṛāyā-citta on his return from his expeditions into the lands of impure barbarians, as Kāśmīrian Brahmans did until recent years on all occasions when returning from journeys outside the Valley.

190. This passage shows that the ancient Liṅga of Jyēṣṭheśa or Jyēṣṭharudra, referred to in note i. 113, must have been in close proximity to the shrine of Bhūteśvara at Buth'sār. From the evidence discussed in note v. 55, it will be seen that of the two groups of ruined temples found in that locality, the western one was connected with the worship of Jyēṣṭharudra. The principal building of this group may therefore be identified with Lalitāditya's temple mentioned in our passage.

191. For Calradhara, the modern Tsak'dar

Vitastū and distributing it to various villages by the construction of a series of waterwheels.

192. That liberal [king] built the wonderful [shrine] of Mārtāṇḍa, with its massive walls of stone within a lofty enclosure (prāsādāntar), and its town swelling with grapes.

193. After constructing at Lokapunya a town, which was provided with the

LALITĀDITYA-
MUKHĀPIṬA.

below Vij'hr̥r, see note i. 88.—The system of irrigation here referred to is explained by the configuration of the ground near that locality. On account of the high alluvial plateaus or Uḍars, which stretch in a semicircle from Vij'hr̥r to below Tsak'dar, the land enclosed between them and the left bank of the river cannot be irrigated by the ordinary means of canals. The expression ambhaḥpratāraṇa is used in a similar sense, i. 157. At present the fields and gardens between the two places are irrigated by means of wells.

192. The ruins of the temple of Mārtāṇḍa, here mentioned, form the most striking remains which have survived of the ancient architecture of Kāśmīr. They are situated near the N. edge of the alluvial plateau (Uḍar) of Maṭan, 75° 17' long. 33° 45' lat. About one mile to the N.W. of the temple, and at the foot of the Uḍar, lie the sacred springs of the Mārtāṇḍa Tirtha. The name given to the temple and its site leaves no doubt as to its having been erected in honour of Viṣṇu-Sūrya, who has evidently been worshipped since early times at the above Tirtha under the form of Mārtāṇḍa.

The Tirtha has remained to the present day one of the most celebrated pilgrimage-places in the Valley, and annually attracts crowds of visitors from all parts of India. The legend related in the Mārtāṇḍamahātmya connects the springs with the story of the production of the sun from the lifeless egg (mūrtāṇḍa), which Aditi, the wife of Kāśyapa, had brought forth as her thirteenth child. The Tirtha of Mārtāṇḍa is already mentioned in the Nilamata, 1036, among the places sacred to Sūrya.

The ruins of Lalitāditya's temple have on account of their size and architectural beauty been more frequently described than any other ancient building of Kāśmīr; comp. HÜGEL, Kaschmir, ii. p. 458 sqq.; VIGNE, Travels, i. pp. 360, 391 sqq.; CUNNINGHAM, J.A.S.B., 1848, pp. 268 sqq.; COLE, Anc. Build., pp. 19 sqq., etc. They consist of a lofty central edifice, with a small detached shrine on either side of the entrance, and of a quadrangular courtyard of imposing dimensions surrounded by colonnades. To this magnificent enclosure K. clearly refers in the expression prāsādāntar. Cunningham assumed, owing to a misinterpretation of our passage and of iii. 462, that the temple had been built by Raṇāditya, and that Lalitāditya had only added the enclosure. Fergusson in his account of the building (Ind. Arch., p. 285 eqq.), has already rightly rejected this view on purely architectural grounds.

[There is nothing about the ruins to justify the suspicion to which Cunningham has given expression, loc. cit. p. 273, that the interior of the quadrangle was once filled with water, and the temple thus 'placed more immediately under the protection of the Nāgas.' There are no Nāgas or springs anywhere on the arid plateau, and the water brought to it once by an ancient irrigation canal from the Lid'r river could never have taken their place according to traditional notions.]

The temple of Mārtāṇḍa is mentioned again by K. in the time of King Kalāṣa, who died there; comp. vii. 709, 715, 722. The shrine escaped being plundered under Harsa, vii. 1096. Subsequently it appears to have been used as a fortified position by a rebel force in K.'s own time, on which occasion the temple-enclosure (prāhgaṇa) is specially mentioned; comp. viii. 3281, 3283, 3295. Jonarāja, 390, mentions the temple among those which Sultan Sikanḍar, 'The Idol-breaker,' destroyed, but refers also subsequently to the locality under the name Mārtāṇḍa; see vv. 875, 970. So does also Fourth Chron., 520, 532, 850. A doubtful allusion is contained, perhaps, in Srikāṇṭha, iii. 15.

The temple as well as the Tirtha bears now the Kā. name Maṭan (from Mārtāṇḍa), found already in Am-i Akb., ii. p. 358, whereas the village round the springs is popularly known as Bavan (Skr. bhavana). The ancient temple is no longer a place of pious interest for the pilgrims, who visit instead the modern temple dedicated to Mārtāṇḍa by the side of the Nāga.

A writes the name as mārtāṇḍa° in all passages, except our own, where it is given as mārtāṇḍa°. As L has mārtāṇḍa° here too, the latter form ought to be adopted. The Mahātmya and Nilamata also read throughout Mārtāṇḍa.

193. Lokapunya is repeatedly referred to

LALITĀDITYA-
MUKTĀPIPA.

Parihāsapura and its buildings.

requisite accessories, the victorious [king] made it, together with villages, an offering to Viṣṇu.

194. Then again that Indra of the earth, when given to merry jesting (parihāsa), built the town of Parihāsapura, which mocked the residence of Indra.

195. The glorious silver [image of Viṣṇu] Parihāsakeśava shone like the god [Viṣṇu], when flooded by the strong light of the pearls during his sleep on the ocean.

196. The famous [image of] Viṣṇu Muktākeśava, made of gold, shone as if it had taken its lustre from the many stamina of the lotus [rising from Viṣṇu's] navel.

197. Clad in a golden armour, tho [image of Viṣṇu] Mahāvarāha shone forth like the sun when he puts on his radiant light to overcome the darkness in the world below.

198. He had a silver [image of the] god Govardhanadhura made, which was white as if [coloured] by the streams of milk [flowing] from [his] herds of cows.

199. After raising a great stone [pillar] fifty-four hands high, he put on the top of the standard a [representation of] Garuḍa, [the bird] of the enemy of the Daityas (Viṣṇu).

200. That king, who was free from passions, built the ever-rich Rājavihāra, with a large quadrangle (catuḥśālā), a large Caitya, and a large [image of the] Jina (Buddha).

201. Into the image of Muktākeśava he put eighty-four thousand Tolakas of gold.

202. And collecting as many thousands of Palas of silver, that pure-minded [king] made the famous [statue of] Parihāsakeśava.

203. With just as many thousands of Prasahas of copper he made the glorious [statue of] the 'Great Buddha' (Brhadbuddha) which reached up to the sky.

in the later portion of the Chronicle; see vii. 1289, 1367; viii. 523, 1429. The gloss of A₂ on the first-named passage identifies Lokapunya with Lokabavan (Skr. Lokabhavana*), a fine spring or Nāga situated near the village of Larikpūr, 75° 12' long. 33° 38' lat., in the Bring Pargana. Near the basin formed by the spring, are the ruins of a small summer house erected by one of the Moghul Emperors, apparently with materials of some earlier building. Fragments of ancient stone images lie in the water near the spring, which is visited by the Brahmans of the neighbourhood.

194-204. Regarding the site of Parihāsa- pura and the identification of its shrines with the ruins on the Paraspōr Uḍar, see Note F.

195. Virge must be taken as viśeṣa reje; comp. e.g. Kathāsar. xxv. 173.

198. Kṛṣṇa bears the epithet of Govardhanadhara, because he held Mount Govardhana as a shelter over the cows, which Indra threatened by a storm.

200. This colossal image is referred to as Brhadbuddha below, iv. 208; comp. Note F. (iv. 194-204), and vii. 1097 sq.

201-203. The tolaka, tho modern Tola, is in Kāśmīr still as in Abu-l-Faḍl's time (Ain-i Akb., ii. pp. 354, 366)=16 māṣa=96 raktikā (ratā). The pala, which according to the

204. He built the quadrangle (catuṣśālā) and the sacred shrine (cāitya), in each case with such expenditure that his five structures were alike [as regards cost].

205. He, like another Kubera, placed as attendants by the side of the chief deities [other] images of gods, which in some [shrines] were of silver and in others of gold.

206. Who could determine accurately in number how many treasures, villages, and establishments he bestowed on these [shrines] ?

207. The ladies of the seraglio, his ministers and princely attendants, consecrated there in hundreds images [of gods], wonders of the world.

208. His queen Kamalavatī, she who founded Kamulāhaṭṭa, put up the large silver image of Kamalakeśava.

209. His minister Mitrasārman, too, put up the S'iva-[Linga called] Mitreśvara. The king of Lāṭa, called Kayya, made the famous [shrine of Viṣṇu] Kayyasvāmīn.

210. By this very [king] was built also the wonderful and famous Kayyavihāra, where subsequently the Bhikṣu Sarvajñamitra resided, who appeared as another Jina.

211. The Tuḥkhārā Caṅkuṇa, who founded the Caṅkuṇavihāra, made a Stūpa loftier even than the mind of the king, and golden [images of the] Jinas.

authorities quoted in P. W., corresponds to 4 karṣa, each of 16 māṣa, must be taken as = 1 tolaka. The prastha is usually estimated at 16 pala; see P. W., s.v. The term pal is still used in Kāśmīr for $\frac{1}{16}$ Ser.

204. Comp. for the significance of the terms catuṣśālā and cāitya the description of the Puraspōr ruins, Note F.

208. Kamulāhaṭṭa means 'the market of Kamālā.' Its position can be traced as little as that of the other minor shrines and Lingas mentioned in the following vv. in connection with Parihāsaपुरा.

209. Regarding Lāṭa, an ancient name of the territory of central and southern Gujarāt, Ptolemy's Λατίκη, comp. YULE, Marco Polo, ii. p. 353; Ind. Ant., xxii. p. 183.

211. K.'s subsequent references to Caṅkuṇa, iv. 216, 246-262, show clearly the important position, which this minister from the Tuḥkhārā land occupied at Lalitāditya's court. Messrs. Lévi and Chevalles, in their notes on Ou-k'ong's Itinerary (Journal asiat., 1895, vi. p. 352), have already pointed out the curious agreement between these statements of K. and the indications given by Ou-k'ong as to the connection of the Tou-kious or Turks with Kāśmīr in the middle of the 8th century.

It was specially in view of these relations that I felt induced to propose in my Notes on Ou-k'ong, pp. 19 sq., the identification of K.'s Caṅkuṇavihāra with the monastery, which in Ou-k'ong's list of Kāśmīr Viharas figures as 'le monastère du général (tsiang-kien, senā-pati). The syllables tsiang and kien could, according to the authorities indicated loc., be looked upon as the exact representatives in Chinese transcription of the syllables Cuṣ and kuṇ, respectively. As Caṅkuṇa is clearly described as a Tuḥkhārā, it appeared to me that "we have in the name given by the Chronicle only the Sanskritized transcription of a Turkish name, of which Tsiang-kien is an equally exact rendering in Chinese characters." In support of this identification it may be mentioned that the Vihāra of Tsiang-kien is named in Ou-k'ong's list immediately before the pious foundations ascribed to members of the royal family of the Turks.

Prof. Lévi was kind enough to inform me in a letter dated 2nd October, 1896, that he agrees with the equation Caṅkuṇa = Tsiang-kien, but looks upon the Sanskrit name as a transcription of the Chinese title. Prof. Lévi holds that as this title is very frequent and well known, no Chinese would have ever thought

LALITĀDITYA-
MUKTĀPTA.

212. His wife Īśānadevī constructed a well, the water of which was pure as nectar and gave health to the ailing.

213. Cakramardikā, the wife of King Lalitāditya, built there Cakrapura with seven thousand dwellings.

214. A learned teacher, Bhappapa by name, made the [Linga of] Bhappateśvara. Many other [Lingas], too, called Rakchaṭeśa, etc., were put up by a host of people.

215. Caṅkuṇa, his chief minister, built also in the other capital (S'rinagara) a Vihāra, distinguished among meritorious works, together with a Caitya.

216. The physician Īśānacandra, a son-in-law of the minister Caṅkuṇa, built a Vihāra after obtaining wealth through the favour of Takṣaka.

217. The lord of the earth, who thus made the earth golden, surpassed Indra by his generosity, valour, and other great qualities.

218. Never was an order of this monarch, though it had escaped from his mouth through mere carelessness, disobeyed even by the gods.

Story of Kapittha fruit.

219. Thus, once when he was encamped with his army on the shore of the eastern ocean, he chanced to order Kapittha fruits to be brought.

220. Then while those [in attendance] upon him stood blind with perplexity, a person of divine appearance brought up Kapittha fruits.

of combining these characters to express a foreign name. We should accordingly have to see in K.'s Caṅkuṇa the Sanskrit reproduction of a Chinese title, which, it may be assumed, had found its way into the Tuhkhāra country, and was taken in Kāśmīr to be a personal name of the Tuhkhāra minister (comp. regarding the similar use of the term Hamīra, note vii. 53). Possessing no knowledge of Chinese, I can only accept with due deference the opinion of my learned friend. We may hope that future research will throw light on the strange connection of races and civilizations, which might account for the appearance of a Chinese title in our narrative.

A second Vihāra built by Caṅkuṇa at S'rinagar is referred to below, iv. 215. This, too, bore the founder's name, as seen from viii. 2415 sqq. Which of these two Vihāras Ou-k'ong may have meant, cannot be determined.

215. By 'the other capital' (adhiṣṭhānāntare), only S'rinagara, the real capital, can be meant, in contradistinction from Parihāsapura, which during the reign of its founder temporarily ranked as a royal residence, and had also a Caṅkuṇavihāra (iv. 211).

Caṅkuṇa's Vihāra at S'rinagar survived to the time of K., and was repaired by Sussalā, the wife of the minister Rilhana, under King Jayasinha; see viii. 2415 sqq. Its position cannot be traced. It is certain that it was at this Caṅkuṇavihāra, and not at that founded at Parihāsapura, that K. saw the Buddha image referred to in iv. 259 sqq. Parihāsapura was deserted and its temples in ruins in K.'s time; see Note F (iv. 194-204).

216. Regarding the worship of the Naga Takṣaka in Kāśmīr, see note i. 220.

219. Kapittha, according to the dictionaries, is the name of the Ferronia elephantum Correa, and its fruit the 'Elephant-apple.' From iv. 237, it is clear that K. meant a fruit, which grows in Kāśmīr and is rare in India proper. Now the elephant-apple is common throughout the greater part of the plains of India, but does not grow in Kāśmīr; comp. WATT, Dict. of Econ. Prod., iii. p. 324.

The reference, which K. makes, iv. 237, to the Kapittha fruit being obtainable in Kāśmīr only for a short time at the commencement of the summer, suggests that the fruit he really meant was the cherry. Both varieties of the latter (Prunus Avium and P. Cerasus) are commonly cultivated in Kāśmīr, 'where it flowers in April-May, and the fruit ripens in June;' see WATT, l.c., vi. p. 346. Apart from the mountains of the North-West Himalaya, the cherry seems wholly unknown in India.

231. Directed by a sign of the king's brows, the doorkeeper stepped forward, and receiving the offering in the presence [of the king], asked that person whose [servant] he was.

222-223. He replied to him : "The great Indra has to-day sent me, the keeper of the Nandana garden, after giving the Kapittha fruits, which the king likes. I am to deliver in private a message of the great Indra." Hearing this, the doorkeeper removed everybody from the audience-hall.

224. Then the divine one spoke : "O king, Indra sends you this message : 'Kindly forgive these words, which are rude though appropriate.'

225. 'Hear, O king, the reason why we, though guardians of the quarters, receive even in the present fourth Yuga your command with reverence.'

226. 'Once in a previous birth you were, verily, the ploughman of a village householder who possessed great wealth.'

227. 'At one time in the hot season the close of the day found you in a waterless waste, weary after driving your oxen.'

228. 'Then while you suffered from hunger and thirst, there came to you from the master's house somebody carrying a jug of water and a loaf.'

229. 'Thereupon, when after washing hands and feet you were at the point of taking food, you saw before you a wandering Brahman, whose breath was about to escape.'

230. 'He spoke to you : "You should not eat. Starved by famine, I must let my life pass away unless [I get] food."'

231. 'Though kept back by your companion, you offered in charity half the loaf and the jug of water to that [Brahman], with comforting words.'

232. 'By this gift which you made with a cheerful heart to a worthy recipient, a succession of hundred uncurtailed wishes was [secured] for you in heaven.'

233. 'On account of that gift of water, sweet streams appear at your mere wish even on desert tracks.'

234. 'O king, even the wishing-trees are surpassed by that gift-tree which, if planted in the right soil (or worthy person), provided with a series of watering trenches [in the shape] of kindly words and moistened with the water of true heart-[felt] charity, rewards, though ever so young, the giver at the time with whatever he desires.'

235. 'Now, O king, but few commands are left over to you, as you waste heedlessly here and there your orders, which must not be infringed.'

236. 'Whence does also in your mind, who are truly great, arise that thoughtlessness which, indeed, is common in other kings?'

237. 'How could there be [found] in the cold season on the eastern ocean

LALITĀDITYA-MURTĀPIṬṬA.

those fruits, which in Kāśmīr are produced [only] for a few days on the approach of the clouds ?'

238. 'Whichever region you penetrate, the guardian of that [region] is anxious to take your orders on account of the efficacy of your previous gift.'

239. 'Since you are now in the eastern quarter, which is under the great Indra, this your order, however insignificant, has now somehow been fulfilled by Indra, whose power is never baffled.'

240. 'On this account you should in no case again thus give out orders without serious import, as they are few [now].'

241. When after these words [that] messenger disappeared, the large-minded king thought over the great power of a gift and fell into utmost surprise.

242. Henceforth filled with an ardent desire to secure such valuable results, he established permanently at Parihāsapura a great festival.

243. At this, which is well-known under the designation of Sahasrabhakta, a lakh and one dishes of food (bhakta) are given away besides Dakṣiṇās.

244. With this object he built towns in salty wastes, so that anyone suffering from thirst may ever find water to drink.

245. He collected from [different] countries various wise men, as the wind [collects] masses of full-blown flowers from the trees.

Story of Caṅkuṇa.

246. He brought from the Tuḥkḥāra land the brother of the magician Kaṅkuṇavarṇa ('he who rains gold'), who bore the name of Caṅkuṇa and excelled by his great qualities.

247. Producing plenty of gold in the [king's] treasury by magic power, he gave him comfort as the lotus tank [gives] to the lotus.

248. Once the king was stopped in the country of Pañcanada (Panjāb) by streams, which had united and could not be crossed, and finding his army arrested on the bank, was for a short time filled with apprehensions.

249. When he then asked his ministers for means of crossing the waters, Caṅkuṇa, who stood on the bank, threw a charm (manṭi) into the water, which was very deep.

250. The water of the streams parted asunder through the force of that [charm], whereupon the king crossed and quickly reached the other shore.

251. Caṅkuṇa drew that charm out again by means of another charm, and in a moment the water of the streams was as before.

252. After witnessing this miracle, the king, whose mouth poured forth praise, courteously asked Caṅkuṇa for those two charms.

246. The reasons which induce me to adopt the reading of L, tuḥkḥāra°, for ḍuḥkḥāra° of A, have already been stated in note iv. 166.

253. Smiling, he answered him : "These two useful charms do their work only when in my hands. What use would it be to you to take them?"

254. "A thing of excellence obtains renown only among ordinary people. What merit has it for the great ones who possess manifold excellent things?"

255. "The flow [of moisture] from the moonstone is valued only as long as that [stone] is in some place on the shore of the ocean. If the latter takes up that [stone], then its flow, even if exuberant, cannot be noticed in the [ocean's] water."

256. When he had concluded his words, the king spoke in wonderment : "Do you then think that I own a gem even stronger than these two?"

257. "Or,—if you see something in my possession that is superior to these, take it and give up these two charms in exchange."

258. Then Caṅkupa said : "This is a great favour. The two gems are in the power of the lord. But let a wish be granted to me."

259. "Favour your humble servant by giving him that image of Sugata (Buddha), which was brought on the shoulders of an elephant from Mṛgadha."

260. "Let your Majesty take this charm which gives a means for crossing the waters. May to me be given the [image of] Sugata, which opens a way for crossing the [ocean of] mundane existence (samsāra)."

261. At this appropriate request the king granted the image of the Jina. Who is able to resist the words of the eloquent?

262. He (Caṅkupa) then placed in his own Vihāra the image of the Blessed [Buddha], which [still] shines in its brownish (bronzen) beauty as if clothed in the brownish-red garment [of the mendicants].

263. Even to this day metal bands are seen fastened round the seat [of the image], showing that it was once fixed on an elephant's back.

264. O wonder, [even] the earth follows the desires of the kings of great might and shows them favour.

265. Once that [king], who was proficient in the knowledge of horses, took out himself and alone an untrained horse into a waste in order to break it in. Story of 71-qu images

266. There far away from men he saw one maid of lovely form singing, and another dancing.

267. And after a short time, while he was exercising the horse, he noticed

254. saṃprathāṃ, for which suprathāṃ is proposed as a conjectural emendation in P.W., s.v., can well be explained as samyak-prathāṃ.

255. The moonstone (candṛakānta) is supposed to exude cooling moisture when touched by the rays of the moon.

259. The kingdom of Magadha, comprising the modern districts of Gayā and Patna south of the Ganges, was the scene of Buddha's early career; comp. e.g. CUNNINGHAM, Ans. Geogr., pp. 452 sqq.

262. The Vihāra built by Caṅkupa at Srinagar, which still existed in K.'s time, must be meant here; comp. iv. 215 and viii. 2415 sqq.

LA LITĀDITYA-NUKTĀPĪPA.

that the two gazelle-eyed ones, after completing their song and dance, bowed slightly and went.

268. Mounting that horse, he came day by day to that place, and seeing the two beautiful girls exactly in the same fashion, came up and questioned [them] in his surprise.

269. They told him: "We are dancing-girls belonging to a temple. Here in the village of S'ṛaravardhamānu is our home."

270. "By the direction of our mothers, who got their living here, we perform at this spot the dancing, which our descent makes incumbent."

271. "This custom, handed down by tradition, has become fixed in our family. Its reason we cannot know, nor can anyone else."

272. When the king had heard from them this information, he was astonished, and the next day had the whole ground, in accordance with their indication, dug up by workmen.

273. Then when they had made a deep excavation, the king saw, as announced [by them], two decayed temples with closed doors.

274. On opening the folding doors, he saw there two [images of] Keśava, which, as the letters engraved on the bases (pṛiḥa) showed, had been made by Rāmu and Lakṣmaṇa.

275. The illustrious king, after erecting a separate stone building by the side of the [temple of] Viṣṇu Parihāsa [keśava], had the [image of] Rāmasvāmin consecrated [there].

276. Thus too the [imago of the] god Lakṣmaṇasvāmin was put up by [Queen] Cakramardikā by the side of [S'iva] Cakreśvara, after she had obtained it by request from the king.

277. During the [expedition for the] conquest of the world, a man, who [appeared] to have undergone a recent punishment, threw himself before the king, who was mounted on an elephant.

269. The locality here referred to is unknown.

276. The position of the Liṅga called Cakreśvara cannot be ascertained. From the references in the Nilamata, the Mahātmyas and the Tirthas, it appears that S'iva was worshipped under that name in not less than four distinct localities. These are:—the bank of the Madhumati (probably the stream of Band'pūr; comp. note vii. 1179), according to Nilamata, 1161; the neighbourhood of Vijayeśvara, see Vijayeśvaramāh. 156; Vīṭastāmāh. ii. 11; v. 23; the spring called Cakratirtha close to Isēvara (Is'bar), near S'rīnagar, see Isālayamāh. and Sureśa- rimāh., passim; and in a cave near the Harṣeśvara Tirtha above Khun'moh, according to Tirthas.

277. The Zopyrus story told in the following verses agrees most closely with the one related by Albērūni, India, ii. pp. 11 sq., about the expedition of Kanik (Kaniška) against the king of Kanauj. We have here clearly an ancient story transferred to the hero of popular tradition in Kāśmīr; comp. Lassen, Ind. Alt., iii. p. 395. The resemblance of the details is so close as to justify the supposition that the story in the form recorded by K. was taken originally from the same source as the one heard by Albērūni.

Expedition into the 'Sand-ocean.'

278. The king, moved to pity, questioned this man, who was streaming with blood from the wounds [caused] by the cutting of his hands, nose and other [limbs] and imploring protection, about his story.

279-280. He related to him that he was the minister of the king, who ruled near 'the Ocean of Sand' (sikarāsindhu), and well-known as his faithful servant, and that on giving the right advice of submitting to Lalitāditya, he had [thus] been punished by that king.

281. The king then promised him to punish his master, and made his wounds heal by hospitable treatment, which restored his health.

282. The minister, who had met with [such] kind reception, once thus addressed the lord of the earth, while he was on the march and no one near :

283. "O king, if I preserve such a body, it is only because I am deluded by the hope of revenge."

284. "Having accomplished my object, I should, verily, abandon the life, which disgrace has crushed, after offering my tears like a sacrificial oblation of water to Happiness as well as to Misfortune."

285. "A small injury [inflicted] by the enemy should be surpassed by a greater injury, just as the mountain [surpasses] the sound of a person's shout by its mighty echo."

286. "How can that land, which lies at a distance of three months from here, be reached quickly? Or if it were reached, would indeed the enemy remain there?"

287. "Therefore I indicate to you a route [thither], which can be traversed in half a month. But as no water is met on it, it is [only] passable for armies provided that water is taken along."

288. "My relatives, who live in that region, will not betray your approach. By this stratagem the king, together with his ministers and seraglio, can be captured."

289. By such words he induced him to march into the 'Ocean of Sand,' and when half a month had passed, the army found itself without water.

290. Even in this condition the king moved on for two or three days; and [then] seeing the army exhausted by thirst, spoke thus to the minister:

291. "Since days over the appointed time have been spent [on the march], the army is at the point of death. How much of the way remains?"

292. He thereupon replied with a laugh: "O you, who wish to be a conqueror! Do you inquire about the way remaining to the enemy's land or about that to the kingdom of Yama?"

293. "Because I, [acting] only for the advantage of my lord, and sacrificing

LALITĀDITYA-MUKTĀRĪḢA.

my own life, have brought you by cunning with your army before the face of death."

294. "This is no mere desert-land. This is the terrible 'Ocean of Sand.' Nowhere is water to be found here. Who will, O king, now protect you?"

295. Hearing this, the whole army was deprived of all vigour, resembling a rice-field, on which the corn has been destroyed by a hailstorm, and only the stalks remain.

296. Then the king, raising his arm, stopped the loud lamentations of the frightened [soldiers], who had lost all hope of life, and spoke:

297. "O minister, we are pleased with what you have done in your desire to help your master, and are thrilled [with delight, so much] that we feel cold, as it were, even here in the desert."

298. "But on my impregnable firmness certainly even such an effort of yours breaks down, as the iron on the diamond."

299. "This day yet you will surely regret the limbs, which you had cut off to no purpose, just as a person, who seizes a spark of fire, mistaking it for a gem, [laments] his burned fingers."

300. "Look, at my mere order the earth produces water to-day, just as the soil, which contains beryls, [yields up these] precious stones at the thunder of the cloud."

301. Saying this, he dug up the ground with his lance to draw out the water, as Ś'iva with his spear [broke open the earth] when he wished to bring up to the surface the water of the Vitastā.

302. Thereupon there came forth from the subterraneous region, along with the soldiers' hope of life, a stream, which appeared like the coquettish smile of hell's goddess of beauty.

303. This stream removed the distress of his soldiers, as well as the hope of that minister, who had sacrificed his limbs in vain.

304. The foiled minister, with his limbs cut off, and uttering curses, was the first to enter his master's city, and behind him [came] Death.

305. The king punished that deceitful ruler, and reduced him too to the same condition as his own minister.

306. To this day there flow in the northern region the streams [produced] by

300. L. nideśenairā, as emended in the text from A. dimeśenairā.

301. The river Vitastā, according to the legend told already in the Nilamata, 247 sqq., was brought to the surface from the subterraneous world (rasātala) by Ś'iva striking the ground near the Nilanāga (Vērnāg) with his trident; comp. note i. 27.

306. The term kuntavāhini seems to contain some local allusion, which is obscure to us. WILSON, History, p. 50, has assumed that Kuntavāhini was a river name.

his spear (kuntavāhinā), which had been brought forth by him from place to place as necessity required.

307. Other wonderful stories also are [current] about him in thousands, but have not been related, as they would unduly break up the connection [of the narrative].

308-309. Just as noble streams are observed to produce with their [naturally] silent waters a mighty roar only, where the ground is made rugged by great rocks, and as they, pure [originally], are seen turbid and spoilt only when the weather is obscured by clouds,—thus, indeed, even the great must also conform in their conduct to those two, place and time. Or was it owing to the power of the Kali [Yuga] or of the regal throne that he, too, committed acts of terrible wickedness?

310. On one occasion when the king was stopping at Parikhāṣapura in the company of the ladies of his seraglio, he gave, while intoxicated by drink, the following order to the ministers :

311. "That [town of] Pravarapura, which Pravarasena made, burn it down if you think that its beauty is like that of mine."

312. On hearing this terrible order of the lord of the earth, whose command could not be disobeyed, they went to Vātulānaka and set on fire ricks of grass [stored] for horses.

313. As he viewed this [fire] from the top of his palace, with his face lit up by the flames of the conflagration, he appeared like a meteor-faced spectre (ulkā mukha) mad with exultation and laughter.

314-315. When a person, though of good character, is affected by morbid hatred and the like [passions], another person, O wonder, appears to him by error excessively great. He sees before himself the moon and other [heavenly bodies] double. His eye, though naturally full of light, is indeed struck with the fault of darkness. If it were not thus, why should he, the founder of innumerable towns, have thought even that single town of King Pravara[sena] too much?

316. Then when his intoxication had passed away, and he thought of the guilt of having burned the town, he was touched by the fire of regret, which is accompanied by hot sighs.

317. Those, whose inner [self] is hollow, do [acts], by which they are secretly consumed and [in the end] completely annihilated, just as old trees are [burned] by the fire, which lives in their [hollow] interior.

318. In the morning, when the ministers saw him tormented by misfortune,

LALITĀDĪPṬYA-MUKTĀPĪṬA.

Attempt to burn
Parikhāṣapura.

311. Pravarapura is Srinagar; see note 339-349.

312. The position of Vātulānaka is unknown.

LALITĀDITYA-
MUKTĀPĪṬA.

they told him, in order to relieve his sorrow, that the burning of the town had only been a fiction.

319. When the king heard that the town was not destroyed, he felt freed from pain, as one, who after dreaming that he had lost his son, wakes up [to find] him standing before him.

320. Praising the ministers for their wise action, he told them not, on any account, to carry out an order which he might give while drunk.

321. Fie over those servants, who, eager to benefit their own position, make the king, who holds the earth only for a short time, as if it were a prostitute, indulge in unseemly pleasure! By those noble-minded [servants] the earth is purified, who, unmindful even of their own life, persist in protecting here their king when he moves on the wrong path.

322. This king, who reached a greatness surpassing even [that of] Indra, committed also another fault, which might have befallen another ruler.

323. This was, that he killed by assassins the king of Gauḍa (Bengāl) at Trigrāmī, though he had made the glorious [image of Viṣṇu] Parihāṣakeśava a surety [for his guest's safety].

324. Wonderful was at that time the heroism of the Gauḍa [prince's] servants, who courageously sacrificed their lives for the sake of their departed lord.

325. Having come to Kuśmīr under the pretext of visiting the [shrine of the goddess] S'ārādā, they invested in a body the temple of the god, who had been [made] a surety.

326. Seeing them eager to enter while the king was away in a foreign country, the attendant priests closed the gate of the [temple of] Viṣṇu Parihāsa[keśava].

327. They reached in a vigorous onslaught the silver [statue of Viṣṇu]

323. Trigrāmī is undoubtedly the modern village of Trigām situated in the Paraspūr Pargana, 74° 43' long. 34° 10' lat., about one and a half miles to the N.E. of the ruins of the Parihasapura temples (see Note F, iv. 194-204). This identification is rendered certain by the passage v. 97, which mentions Trigrāmī as the place, where the Vitastā and Sindhu rivers met previous to Surya's stream-regulation; comp. also viii. 3356.

The place is visited in connection with the pilgrimage to the Kapālamocanātīrtha (at Digām: Dvigrāma), and accordingly mentioned in the Mahātmya of that Tīrtha and in Sahibram's Tīrthas.

For the custom of making a particular divine image the surety for a promise of safe conduct, see vii. 1515, where the term sākṣin corresponds to the madhyastha of our passage.

The word tikṣṇa is very frequently used in the Chronicle in the meaning of 'desperado,' 'assassin,' 'bravo'; comp. vi. 171; vii. 627, 629, 655 sqq., 1016, 1045; viii. 1282, 1286 sq., etc. (see Index). A characteristic expression is the derivative tikṣṇatva, viii. 2085.

Mañkha's Kośa gives for tikṣṇa also the meaning abhisara, which the commentator explains in the sense jīvanirapekṣa, 'desperado.'

This use of the word tikṣṇa is evidently referred to also by the author of the Trikāṇḍaśeṣa, III. i. 14 (rājagha).

324. It appears from the subsequent account that the Gauḍas came to Kāśmīr after the murder of their king, with the object of revenging his death by the destruction of the favourite object of Lalitāditya's devotion, the image of Parihāṣakeśava.

325. Regarding the famous shrine of S'ārādā in the Kiṣangāṅgā Valley, comp. note i. 87.

Affray at Parihasapura.

Rāmasvāmin, and mistaking it for [that of] Parihāsa[keśava], they overturned it and broke it into dust.

328. After reducing it to particles, they scattered them in all directions, while they were all being cut up by the soldiers who had come from the city (S'rīnagara).

329. As these dark-coloured [men] were falling blood-covered to the ground under the strokes, they resembled fragments of stone, [falling] from an antimony-rock taking a bright colour from liquid red chalk.

330. The streams of their blood brilliantly illuminated their uncommon devotion to their lord, and enriched the earth.

331. The danger of the lightning (vajra) is averted by the diamond (vijri); the ruby produces prosperity; various kinds of poisons, too, are counteracted by the emerald. Thus each gem accomplishes its task in accordance with the power bestowed upon it. But what cannot be accomplished by those jewels of men who surpass [all] by their immeasurable power?

332. What of the long journey which had to be accomplished, and what of the devotion for the dead lord? Even the creator cannot achieve what the Gauḍa did on that occasion.

333. At that time kings everywhere possessed such jewels of servants, who had the power of superhuman devotion to their lords.

334. At the sacrifice of [the image of] Rāmasvāmin, the famous [statue of] Parihāsa[keśava] which was dear to the king, was preserved in that affray [caused] by the Gauḍa devils.

335. To this day even the temple of Rāmasvāmin is seen empty, whereas the whole world is filled with the fame of the Gauḍa heroes.

336. Thus over various affairs the king passed his days, a few in his own city but most in foreign regions.

337. Seized by curiosity to view lands which no one else had reached, he set out again towards the boundless regions of the north.

Lalitāditya's end.

338. He had then various adventures with demons, which Kubera and other [guardians of quarters] sent forth to test his power.

339. Even in those lands which, indeed, to this day have not been seen even by the rays of the sun, the command of this king met with no resistance.

340. A messenger, who had been dispatched by the ministers when they had been long without news, reported to them the following on return from his presence.

341. 'Thus the lord speaks to you: "What a delusion is this, that people like you should expect my return after I have reached this country!"

335. L correctly rāmasvāminurāpadam; A °purāpadam.

LALITĀDITYA-
MOKTĀPĪPA.

342. "What task do you see for me, that I should return to my kingdom and abandon the winning of new victories every day?"

343. "For the rivers which leave the country of their [origin], the ocean is the goal. But nowhere is seen [a goal] for those who wish to be true conquerors."

344. "Therefore, I shall communicate to you in abstract the principles of government adapted to my own country. Complying with them, you may carry on the rule without hindrance, without blame."

345. "Those who wish to be powerful in this land, must always guard against internal dissension. Because of [foreign] enemies (paraloka) they are as little in fear as the Cārvākas of the world beyond (paraloka)."

346. "Those who dwell there in the [mountains] difficult of access, should be punished, even if they give no offence; because, sheltered by their fastnesses, they are difficult to break up if they have [once] accumulated wealth."

347. "Every care should be taken that there should not be left with the villagers more food supply than required for one year's consumption, nor more oxen than wanted for [the tillage of] their fields."

348. "Because if they should keep more wealth, they would become in a single year very formidable Dāmaras and strong enough to neglect the commands of the king."

349-352. "When once the villagers obtain clothes, women, woollen blankets, food, ornaments, horses, houses, such as are fit for the town; when the kings in madness neglect the strong places which ought to be guarded; when their servants show want of discrimination; when the keep of the troops is raised from a single district; when the officials are closely drawn together by the bonds of intermarriage; when the kings look into the offices as if they were clerks (kāyastha),—then a change for the worse in the subjects' fortune may be known for certain."

353. "Keep in mind the distinction between [my] royal descendants which I [now] indicate, after having secretly ascertained from their conduct the disposition of their hearts."

344. It is of interest to compare the brief code of political wisdom given in vv. 344-353, with the description of the traditional system of Kāśmīr administration, given by modern writers; comp. e.g. MOOREHEAD, Travels, ii. pp. 289 sqq.; LAWRENCE, Galley, pp. 390 sqq.

Our verses, as well as many incidental references in the Rājat., show clearly that the principles which prevailed until recent changes in the fiscal and political management of Kāśmīr, and which are indirectly likely to influence it yet for some time longer, go back to a far earlier period than is assumed by some of those writers.

345. Comp. i. 39; regarding the materialistic sect of the Cārvākas, see COLERBROOK, Miscell. Essays, ii. pp. 402 sqq.

348. Regarding the significance and use of the term dāmara, see Note G.

The Dāmaras have played, as the narrative of the viii. Book amply shows, a chief part in all political troubles witnessed by K. From the reference made here, we can see clearly that K. in making Lalitāditya set forth these principles of Kāśmīr policy, is thinking in reality of his own times.

354. "The vicinity of a mad elephant is indicated by the wind carrying the scent of his temple-juice ; the rise of the thunder from the cloud by the lightning displaying its brilliancy. [Thus too] a person's unalterable turn of mind which is acquired from a previous birth, is clearly [indicated] by his conduct, the true nature of which must be traced by the skill of a thoughtful person."

355. "Kuvalayāditya and Vajrāditya are equally my sons, but the mind of these two brothers, who are born from different mothers, is of different character."

356. "The slder should be placed on the throne, and when he should prove of violent nature, then you must needs resist his commands."

357. "Whether that king renounces his life or his throne, nobody is to lament him. Remember this my word."

358. "Do not make the younger king. If [however], through a fault of judgment, this should happen, then his commands should be obeyed and he [himself] protected, though he may be of bad character."

359. "Jyāpīḍa, who is the youngest among my grandsons, and a small boy still, should ever be told to become like his grandfather."

360. Filled with despair, they bowed and accepted with praise this the king's last direction, which was full of meaning, while dropping tears which appeared like the grains [thrown] at a sacrificial oblation (avgha).

361. After assembling all the subjects, Caṅkṣa addressed [them], moistening with tears the earth, which was tormented by the hot [fever of] separation from its master :

362. "Let Prince Kuvalayāpīḍa be installed on the throne. That pious king of auspicious name has gone to heaven."

363. "Therefore the magic power which the gods had granted me in order to increase the riches of this wise [king], has suddenly vanished."

364. Through some power of fortune that king, indeed, though far away, accomplished with ease even difficult tasks.

365. The sun, though hidden by dense clouds, comforts the lotus-flowers. The cloud, though far away, gives a touch of coolness to the sunshine. There is, certainly, some unimpaired power of the great by the force of which even the remotest tasks are freely carried out without hindrance.

366. This moon of his subjects vanished, after comforting the earth in this fashion during thirty-six years, seven months and eleven days.

367. Some have reported that he perished in the country called Āryāṇaka, through excessive snow, which fall out of season.

367. TROYER and LASSEN, Ind. Alt., iii. p. 1004, have supposed that Āryāṇaka corresponds to the Ariana of Greek geographers, i.e. Eastern Iran generally. This identification is, however, very doubtful, as the name, if ever used in India in that meaning, could

LALITĀDITYA-MUKTĀPIṬA.

368. Some [have reported] that in a certain critical situation he burned himself in order to preserve the foremost position which he had long held among kings.

369. In the belief of some, that ruler of the earth entered, along with his army, those regions in the farthest north which are of easy access to the immortals [alone].

370. Indeed, just as most wonderful deeds are related of this king, so the reports about his end are also very astonishing.

371. When the sun sets, some say that he descended into the waters of the ocean; others that he entered the fire; and others again that he has proceeded to another world. O wonder, even when the great meet with their end, there arise, as they whimsically insist on an unparalleled departure, stories indicative of the uncommon grandeur possessed [by them].

KUVALAYĀPIṬA.

372. Then the illustrious Kuvalayāpiṭa, the son of Kamaladevī, enjoyed the rule over the earth-disc (kuvalaya), just as Indra, the son of Aditi.

373. By his liberality he gave spotless brightness to the royal fortune, which is an object of attachment (anurakta), as the snake [when abandoning] its skin, gives to it [spotless brightness] though it is dark-coloured by nature.

374. For some time he was deprived of lustre by his brother, who held equal power, as a lamp does not shine brilliantly when approached by the glow of a fire.

375. While the courtiers, lusting for presents (dāna), moved to and fro between the two [princes], their treasure fared badly, like the temple-juice from the two temple-holes of an elephant in rut, when the bees, lusting for the fragrant secretion (dāna), move to and fro between them.

376. Then after a short time King Kuvalayāpiṭa subdued his younger brother, as well as the intrigues of the ministers, who were appropriating the riches of both.

377. When the king had freed the kingdom from his enemies and had attained power, he, feeling his strength, collected forces for the conquest of the world.

378. One minister at that time acted against his orders, either from a recollection of his father's words or from an access of arrogance.

379. When the night had come, the king, full of anger, thought on his couch of that disobedient [minister] and could not, even for a moment, find sleep.

scarcely have survived till the time of Lalitā-ditya or K., without leaving a trace in other Sanskrit texts.

368. The version here alluded to is told at length vii. 1428-49.

373. The pun is in the word anurakta, which also means "coloured."

375. The several puns contained in the verse make it necessary to render it by a paraphrase.

380. While he was thus planning the destruction of that guilty [minister], it appeared to him in his rising anger that many [others] ought to be killed on account of their connection with that [minister].

381. As from the ocean, when it was churned [by the gods] with the mountain [Mandara], there appeared after the [poison] Kālakūṭa the nectar (sudhā), so there arose from his soul, when stirred up by reflection, resignation after rage.

382. Thereupon his wrath vanished and he thought: "What is it then, for whose sake it appeared to me that I ought to carry out so great a destruction of living beings?"

383. "That body, for the benefit of which ill-deeds are accomplished and sinfulness earned, for whom is it lasting?"

384. "Who, while in possession of his memory, would think of destroying the eternal paths [of righteous conduct] for the sake of this ungrateful body?"

385. "Alas, men do not know that at every moment the condition of their self is brought about by the cook 'Death' (Kāla), who prepares them for the end!"

386. "Surely long-lived beings laugh when they see this our face, yesterday bright with the causeless smile [of a child] and resembling [in rosy colour] the calyx of a lotus, to-day suddenly hard with a bristling beard and heated by a bronzen glow, next morning changed by withered white hair and resembling the head of an old goat."

387. Caring [only] for the bliss [gained] by the resignation with which such thoughts of eternity inspired him, he left his kingdom and went to the Plakṣa-praśravana forest.

388. "Go straight to the forest, O my good friend! Devote your soul to austerities. Such fortune like this is bound to decay, and vanishes in a moment."

389. By writing this verse on his throne before leaving his kingdom, he indicated his deep feeling of indifference for the world.

390. The king who had secured supernatural perfection (siddhi) by the unbroken intensity of his quietism, shows himself, even at the present day, to the eyes of the pious on S'rīparvata and at other holy places.

391. When the son of his king had thus departed, Mitraśarmun, overtaken by grief, abandoned life at the confluence of the Vitastū and Sindhu, and was followed by his wife.

387. The gloss of A₂ identifies Plakṣa-praśravana with the Naimiṣāranya, well known to the Epics and Purāṇas as a retreat of holy men.

390. For Mount S'rīparvata, see note iii. 267.

391. The place where the Vitastū and Sindhu rivers meet (now at the village of Sād'pūr, recte Shahābuddīnpūr), enjoys in Kāśmīr the same sanctity as the confluence of Gaṅgā and Yamunā at Prayāga. The latter name is directly applied to the Kāśmīr Tirtha in the Nilamata, 299 sq.; Vitastūmah. xxi. 74; Vijayeshvaramāh. ii. 170, etc., and in other texts. Regarding the old site of the river-junction, comp. Note I, v. 97.

KUYALAYĀPIḌA.

392. This pious lord of the earth, after ruling for one year and half a month, obtained that perfection which is the stair leading to final beatitude.

VAJRĀDITYA (BAPPĪYAKA).

393. Then Vajrāditya, who was also known [by the names of] Bappīyaka and Lalitāditya, and whose mother was Oakramardikā, became king.

394. This [king] of a cruel character differed certainly from his brother, who was the comforter of his subjects, as Durvāsas [differed] from the moon.

395. The wicked king, a slave to avarice, withdrew from Parihāsapura the various foundations [granted] by his father.

396. This sensuous ruler had a large number of women in his seraglio, with whom he diverted himself in turn, like a stallion with the mares.

397. He sold many men to the Mlecchas, and introduced into the country practices which befitted Mlecchas.

398. After ruling the earth for seven years, the sinful king ended his days through consumption, which was caused by excesses in sensual enjoyment.

PṚTHIVYĀPIḌA.

399. Then his son Pṛthivyāpiḍa, who was born from Queen Mañjarikā, a destroyer of his subjects, was king for four years and one month.

SANGRĀMĀPIḌA I.

400. After overthrowing him, there ruled for seven days the son of Bappīya from [Queen] Mammā, called Saṅgrāmāpiḍa [I].

401. When the royal power reached these two brothers it did not shine forth brilliantly, [as little] as the sun-disc when it has entered the seasons of Hemanta and S'isira (winter and early spring).

JAYĀPIḌA.

402. After Saṅgrāmāpiḍa's death the illustrious King Jayāpiḍa, the youngest son of Bappīya, ascended the throne in due succession.

403. Remembering the words of the ministers: "May you be like your grandfather," he, full of ambition, collected an army and set out for the conquest of the world.

404. When on the point of leaving his country, accompanied by the feudatory chiefs, this prudent [monarch] asked the old men dwelling near the 'Gate (dvāra) of Kāśmīr':

394. The story of the Purāṇas makes the vindictive and ill-tempered Muni Duroṭsas, a brother of Soma, the moon-god.

396. The endowments made for the temples of Parihāsapura in the form of sacerdotal apparatus, grants for establishments, etc., are probably meant.

400. The reading of A₁, vāsarān, accepted in the text, is confirmed by L. The reading vatsarān of A₂, which has been preferred by Troyer, Lassen and Durgāpr., would extend Saṅgrāmāpiḍa's rule to seven years. It must, however, be rejected, as it does not agree with the total of 1828 years which K.'s chronological scheme assumes for the aggregate of the reigns described in Tarangas ii-viii. This has already been correctly pointed out by Dr. HULTZSCH, Ind. Ant., xviii. p. 99. Compare also note i. 50, and Introduction.

402. According to iv. 517, Jayāpiḍa also bore the name of Vinayāditya.

Mixed metal coins of Jayāpiḍa showing this second name are very common; comp. CUNNINGHAM, Coins of Med. India, p. 45, and pl. iii. 14.

404. Regarding the significance of the term dvāra, see notes i. 122, 302. Comp. also v. 137.

405. "How great was the army of my grandfather when he marched forth? You who counted the troops at his expeditions, should now tell me this."

406. They answered him smiling: "O king, why this question? Nobody is able now to equal the things that are passed."

407. "At that ruler's expedition there were one lakh and a quarter of litters (karpīnatha), but now at that of your Majesty there are [only] eighty thousand."

408. Hearing this, Jayāpiḍa did not take his defeat to heart, as [he knew that] the earth is quickly being reduced [to smaller dimensions] through the overpowering force of Time.

409. When the old men noticed such character in the king as he set out for conquest, they realized the deep judgment [shown] by King Lalitāditya.

410. When that [king] had moved far away, his brother-in-law, Sujja by name, entered Kaśmīr by treachery and forcibly usurped the throne. Usurpation of Jajja

411. Then day by day, soldiers who were longing for their own country, and were neglectful of their duty towards their lord, turned back from the royal army.

412. Jayāpiḍa, however, eager to prove his own power without [the help of] dependents, devised some clever plan.

413. The self-reliance of this strong-minded [king] could not be broken, and by it he overcame even the disfavour of Fate.

414. He dismissed the princes who had followed him on his expedition, each to his own land, and proceeded with limited forces of his own to Prayāga.

415. Collecting there the swift horses which remained, he gave a lakh less one of them to the Brahmans, along with rich Dakṣiṇās.

416-417. And he gave a seal engraved with the words: "Of the illustrious King Jayāpiḍa," [which was to be used for sealing the vessels] of Ganges water carried to distant lands, and ordained: "If anyone else should grant here [at Prayāga] a complete lakh of horses, my seal may be replaced by his own."

418. Proud princes drink even to this day the holy Ganges water [from vessels] marked with that [king's] seal, and feel pained in their mind.

419. After leaving with a trusted [servant] an order permitting his soldiers to return to their country, he went forth at night, alone, from the midst of his army.

407. "The inhabitants of Kaśmīr are pedestrians, they have no riding animals nor elephants. The noble among them ride in palankins called Katt, carried on the shoulders of men."—Alberūni, India, i. p. 206. Is the word Katt here, perhaps, a corrupted rendering of a Pr. derivative from karpīratha?

416-417. The sacred water of the Ganges is still carried at the present day in sealed pots and bottles to distant parts of India. It would be interesting to find evidence for K.'s statement that a seal with Jayāpiḍa's name was still used in his own time for the sealing of such pots at Prayāga. Troyer and Lassen make Jayāpiḍa throw his seal into the river.

JAYĀPTA.

Jayāpda's tour of adventure.

420. Searching for a place suited for displaying his brilliancy, he moved about (?) in the countries (maṇḍala) of kings, as the sun in the masses (maṇḍala) of the clouds.

421. Then in due course he entered the city of Paṇḍravardhana, subject to the kings of Gauḍa, and [at that time] protected by a prince called Jayanta.

422. Pleased there by the wealth of the citizens, which was rendered enjoyable by a good government, he went to the temple of Kārtikeya to view the dancing.

423. Seeing dancing and singing [performed there] in accordance with [the precepts of] Bharata, and being [himself] acquainted with this S'āstra, he then quickly seated himself on a stone at the gate of the temple.

424. As the people, rendered uneasy by his [look of] exceptional dignity, withdrew from his side, a dancer, Kamalā by name, noticed the beautiful [prince].

425. With astonishment she noticed that the hand of that distinguished-looking man reached, from time to time, quickly to the back of his shoulder.

426. She then thought: "Surely this must be a disguised king or a Rājaputra born from a great family."

427. "He is accustomed to take thus the rolled betel-leaves from [attendants]

420. We owe the partial restoration of the text of this passage to L, which adds after verse 419 and before verse 420, as printed in the Ed., the two pādas: baddhāma sthānam anviṣṇan pratāpākhyājanocitam. These fill the lacuna in the text of A, which had already been indicated in Ed., but wrongly placed in verse 423. The arrangement of the half-verses in the text should be corrected accordingly.

The first three Akṣaras in the newly gained text, baddhāma, certainly contain some fault and give no sense, but the general meaning of the verse is not obscured by this corruption. As a verb expressing motion seems wanted by the context, babhrāma might be suggested as a conjectural reading.

421. The name of King Jayanta does not appear to be otherwise known. LASSEN, Ind. Alt., iii. p. 720, has proposed to identify him with a Jayadhara who appears in a list of Bengal kings given by Abu-l-Fazl, Ain-i Akb., ii. p. 146, as the last of the dynasty preceding the Palas.

The name Paṇḍravardhana, for which other texts (see P.W., s.v.), also show the form Puṇḍravardhana, is certainly identical with that of the kingdom of Pun-na-fa-tan-na which Hiuen-tsiang visited in Bengal to the north of the Ganges (see Si-yu-ki, ii.

p. 194). The name appears to be connected with that of the Puṇḍra people. From the indications furnished by Hiuen-tsiang, it appears that Paṇḍravardhana must be located somewhere in the present district of Rājashāhi. As to the exact position of the capital, different opinions have been expressed by those who have had occasion to examine this portion of the ancient topography of Bengal; comp. Beal's note, Si-yu-ki, l.c.; CUNNINGHAM, Anc. Geogr., p. 430, and Arch. Survey Rep., xv. pp. 102, 110 sqq.

422. In accordance with the corrected arrangement of the text, we must adopt the reading tasmin of A, and L in place of A, yasmin shown in Ed.

423. I prefer now to divide the words of the first half-verse (corrected text) with the other Edd., as bharatānugam ālakṣya nṛtagitādi śāstravit, and to translate as above. If the whole is taken as a compound we should have to translate: "As he was learned in the S'āstra of dancing and singing which was to be seen [there] by following the players (bharata)," etc.

The Muni Bharata is the traditional founder of the art of dancing and acting.

427. Regarding the chewing of betel as a habit of men of good birth, see vii. 1087.

standing at his back, and therefore his hand moves at every moment to the back of his shoulder."

428. "The elephant moves the lobe of his ear to and fro, even when the attack of the bees, eager for his temple-juice, has ceased. The lion turns his looks to the back even when the elephant-herd does not follow him. The peacock does not cease to send forth cries from his throat, even when his expectation of the cloud has passed. Habits fixed by long practice are not likely to cease, even when their reason is gone."

429. Thus she thought in her mind, and after having consulted with an intimate friend she sent the latter close up to him.

430. When his hand moved [again] as before, she put betel-nuts into it. These Jayāpīṭa put into his mouth, [and then] turning round he noticed that [girl].

431. When he had asked that fair-browed [maid] by a sign of his brow to whom she belonged, he was told by her about that [dancer] who sent the betel-rolls.

432. Rousing in him kind feelings by her various sweet words, she led him gradually to the dwelling of her friend, who had finished her dance.

433. That charming person, who was of surpassing beauty, and who talked with delicacy and tenderness, so attended upon him that even he felt surprised.

434. Then when the face of the night became white in the moon[light], she took the king by the hand, and proceeded to the bed-chamber.

435. While he lay there on the golden couch, he did not loosen his undergarment, though she, heated by intoxicating drink, requested it.

436. Thereupon the long-armed [prince] embraced her, who felt ashamed, as if he were going to enclose her in his broad chest, and spoke slowly the following :

437. "O you, whose eyes are like lotus-leaves, indeed, you have captured my heart. But regard for the [proper] time makes me offend [you]."

438. "O lovely one, I am your slave, bought by [your] unaffected charms. Before long you will learn [my] story, and experience [my] tenderness."

439. "O you proud one, know that I have resolved not to enjoy any pleasures until I have completed some task which remains [for me] and is close at hand."

440. After these words he sighed, and [then] playing a tune as it were with his beringed finger on the couch, he recited this verse :

441. "How should a strong-minded [man] bent on conquest, think of women ? The Sun does not approach its love, the Evening, until he has passed over the whole world."

442. From this verse which the king recited to himself, she, who was versed in [all] arts, knew him verily to be some great person.

443. And when the king in the morning desired to leave, that affectionate girl beseeched him earnestly and prayed him not to go away for a long time.

JAYĀNTA

444. Once when he had gone to the river-bank to perform the evening devotion (saṁdhyā), and was late in returning to the house, he found her in great concern.

445. When asked by him about this, she told him with a bright smile: "There is a very large lion here which attacks and kills living beings."

446. "Day by day he has destroyed men, elephants, horses. When you were late in returning, this danger frightened me."

447. "Kings and Rājaputras in this place are made uneasy by this danger, and do not leave their houses when the night has come."

448. When the lovely one spoke thus, Jayāpīḍa stopped her and laughed at her, and [subsequently] passed the night as if in embarrassment.

449. On the next day at nightfall he left the interior of the town and waited under a great Ficus Indica tree for the coming of the lion.

450. Then there appeared in the distance the king of the animals, who shone like a Bakula-tree in blossom, and seemed, as it were, a moving [embodiment] of the laughter of Death.

451. When the lion passed along another way at a slow pace, the royal lion called to him recklessly with a loud shout.

452. With straightened ears, open mouth, shaking mane, and glittering eyes, the roaring [lion] rushed at him, raising the fore-part of his body.

453. When that [lion] fell upon [him] in fury, Jayāpīḍa with a quick movement thrust his elbow into the hollow of his mouth and cut open his breast with a dagger.

454. Cut up with one stroke, that [lion] died, while his flowing blood appeared, as if it were the red colour [smeared on the foreheads] of the elephants he had devoured.

455. Then he hid his [wounded] elbow by putting on a bandage, and returning to the house of the dancing girl, passed the night in sleep as before.

456. When the morning dawned, King Jayanta heard with joy that the lion was killed, and in curiosity went forth in person to see it.

457. When he saw that the big [beast] had been killed by one stroke, he felt astonished, and was convinced that its slayer was superhuman.

458. His attendant handed him a bracelet found between the teeth of that [lion], and with astonishment he saw that it bore the illustrious name of Jayāpīḍa.

459. When the king inquired how that ruler of the earth could be present in this locality, the town, dreading the approach of Jayāpīḍa, was distracted by fright.

460. Then after reflection King Jayanta spoke thus to his citizens: "O fools, why are you frightened when there is occasion for joy?"

461-462. "It is reported that King Jayāpiḍa, relying on the strength of his arm, is for some reason wandering about quite alone in foreign lands, calling [himself] a Rājaputra Kallaṭa [by name]. Having no son, I have decided to give to him [my daughter] Kalyāṇadevī."

463. "If he who would have to be searched for, has arrived, then [it is as if] one finds a treasure hidden in [one's own] house when on the point of starting for the 'Isle of jewels' with the wish of gathering precious stones."

464. "The lord of the universe must be in this very town. If anyone would search him out and report him [to me], I would grant that person his wish."

465. The citizens, who gave credence to the word of their truth-speaking king, searched for that [disguised king] and reported that he lived at the house of Kamālā.

466. The king went to him, along with his ministers and the ladies of his seraglio, beseeched him earnestly, and then ordering a feast, conducted him to his own residence.

467. Then he made that [prince] who was bound [to enjoy] prosperity (kalyāṇa), accept the hand of Kalyāṇadevī, as if it were that of the royal fortune which he had [previously] abandoned.

468. He (Jayāpiḍa) showed there his valour by defeating, even without preparation, the five Gauḍa chiefs, and by making his father-in-law their sovereign.

469. He was joined by Devaśarman, the son of Mitraśarman, who had remained [behind] collecting the forces which were left after the departure [of the others], and which were without their leader.

470. Then at the request of this [minister] he set out thence towards his own country, leading in front the goddess of Victory, [and] behind those two beautiful-eyed ones.

471. After defeating the king of Kanyakubja in battle, that king of surpassing valour carried off his throne, the ensign of royal power.

472. When he (Jayāpiḍa), after [such] display of mighty prowess, entered his own country, Jajja, with troops ready for battle, marched forth to fight [him].

Jajja overthrown.

473. For many days Jayāpiḍa fought with him in fierce contest at the village called S'uskaletṛa.

474. The king, who had the attachment of his subjects, was followed in the fight by a large number of villagers and men from the forests who were unable to bear Jajja's rule.

462. I have translated above in accordance with the reading of L uktvā for A uktā.

464. The correct reading samanvīṣya for A samānvīṣya is supplied by L.

471. This throne is referred to again, viii. 81.

473. For S'uskaletṛa, the modern Hukh-lit'r, see note i. 102.

JAYĀPĪDA.

475-476. S'rideva, a village Caṇḍāla, had asked his mother for food, with the words: "I am off to help the king," and had joined after assuring her, as she laughed, that he would kill Jajja. Arriving at the battle with [his] villagers, he moved about in all places asking the soldiers where Jajja was.

477. They showed to him from afar that [prince] who, pained by thirst, was drinking water from a golden jug in the midst of the battle, while mounted on a horse.

478. Letting go his sling, he hit the face of the [prince] with a stone, and unflinching in his aim, shouted: "There, I have slain Jajja."

479. Jajja, with his face fearfully injured, fell from his horse, and when he rolled on the ground in a dying condition, his followers left him and fled.

480. He, who had always been troubled by the apprehension of an attack from [his] powerful enemy, after three years lost the kingdom which he had gained by treachery.

481. Fortunes which merchants obtain by abstracting deposits, or courtesans by cheating their lovers, or princes by treachery, are in truth inconstant.

482. When Jajja was slain, Jayāpīḍa, returning to his royal dignity, took upon his shoulder the burden of [ruling] the land, and [gained] the hearts of the virtuous by his righteous acts.

483. In that land where the king met with good fortune (kalyāṇa) after the destruction of his enemy, Kalyāṇadevi founded Kalyāṇapura.

484. The king built Malhānapura and established the [shrine of] Vipulakeśava. Also, Kamala founded a town, called after her own name Kamalā[pura].

475. The expression Caṇḍāla is here evidently used for a person belonging to the inferior castes from which to this day the watchmen (Kā. ḍūmb, Skr. ḍomba) and other village menials are taken in Kāśmīr. Notwithstanding their low social status, *Ḍūmb*s and men of related castes are generally superior to the ordinary villagers in natural intellect and energy; comp. LAWRENCE, Valley, p. 311.

L shows verse 475 (Ed. 478) in its proper position after 474. In the Ed. I had adhered to the order of the verses as given by A₁, though a marginal note of A₂ already indicated the transposition now effected. The agreement of L with A₁ proves that the arrangement of the text in Ratnakaṇṭha's original was that now adopted in the translation.

483. Kalyāṇapura, which is repeatedly mentioned in the viii. Tar., can be identified with certainty with the present village of Kalampūr, situated in the S'ukru Pargana, 74° 54' long. 33° 48' lat., close to the high road leading from S'upiyān to Srinagar. This identification is proved by viii. 2814, and specially by S'riv. iv. 466. The position of Kalyānapura is clearly indicated in the last-named passage by the reference to Drābhagrāma, the modern Drābhgām, about two miles to the N.W. of Kalampūr.

It is very probable that the gloss Kalamapuram, which A₂ has written above Kamalā-khyam puram in the following verse, referred in the original MS. to Kalyānapura, and was only by a mistake of A₂ copied in the wrong place.

484. Malhānapura is identified in a note of A₁ with the modern village of Mahur situated on the left bank of the Vitasta, 74° 47' long. 34° 7' lat. The position of the shrine called Vipulakeśava (thus also L) can be traced as little as that of Kamalāpura.

485. Out of polite attention he exalted Kalyāṇadevī even further by installing her in the dignity of Mahāpratīhārāpīḍā (office of Chief Chamberlain).

486. By him learning, which had hidden itself far away, was made to appear [again] in this land which was its original home, just as the Vitastū by Kaśyapa.

487. When he gave to a person who openly said: "I am a fool", he made all anxious for learning.

488. The king, by bringing from abroad [competent] expositors, restored in his own country the [study of the] Mahābhāṣya, which had been interrupted.

489. Receiving instruction from a master of grammatical science, called Kṣīra, the learned (paṇḍita) Jayāpīḍa gained distinction with the wise.

490. That pure-minded [king] did not allow any king to compete with himself, but was proud of being able himself to compete with the learned.

491. So much [greater] was his fame from the title of scholar than from that of king, that notwithstanding his various faults it has not faded like other [things] subject to time.

492. As the king was attached to the learned, the princes who came to serve him and desired to reach his presence, frequented the houses of the scholars.

493. The king searched for and collected all scholars to such an extent, that in the lands of other kings there was a dearth of learned men.

494. He attached to himself, and elevated on account of his learning, Thakkiya,

485. The translation of this verse is doubtful. In order to gain an acceptable sense, I have followed above the readings of A, °devī and °adāhikonnatām, though L supports those of A, as adopted in the text. The gerund pratipadya has been taken in a causative sense; comp. note on udetya, ii. 60.

L gives the name of the office in the form shown above, which agrees with the one found iv. 142.

✓486. A legend told in the Nilamata, 255 sqq., relates how the Vitastā, after having been brought originally to Kāśmīr by Śiva (see above iv. 301), disappeared again several times on meeting sinners of various descriptions. Kaśyapa's prayer induced the divine stream each time to return to Kāśmīr and to flow forth from a fresh source. The story is also mentioned in the Vitastānāḥ.

487. The meaning of the verse is obscure, and the text at the commencement of the third Pāda probably corrupt. For sarvaśūnān dāda°, which does not allow of a suitable construction, L reads the still less intelligible nāmahaḍbahaḍa°. I have left the doubtful words untranslated.

488. Comp. with the reference here made to the study of Patañjali's Mahābhāṣya, note i. 176.

489. Kṣīra, Jayāpīḍa's teacher in grammar, is identified by the tradition of the Kāśmīrian Paṇḍita with Kṣīrasvāmīn, son of Śīvarasvāmīn, the author of a well-known commentary on the Amarakośa and several smaller grammatical treatises still extant. Compare Prof. Bühler's Report, p. 73; Prof. M. Müller, India, p. 331, and Aufrecht, Cat. Catalog., p. 131. The gloss of A, on our passage shows that this tradition, which confirms a suggestion made already by Wilson, Essay, p. 65, is old. In the Fakṣastuti which Rājānaka Ananda appended to his commentary on the Naiṣadha-carita (composed A.D. 1654), the grammarian Kṣīrasvāmīn is claimed as one of the great scholars produced by the Rājānaka family of Kāśmīr, along with Kaśyapa, Uvāṭa and Mammata (see Poona MS., Coll. 1875-76, No. 143, fol. 673).

494. The term bhaktakūtā seems to designate a place where food (bhakta) is regularly distributed in charity. Compare the expression dharmabhakta used i. 347 by the glossator in explanation of the term abhyāyini, which has to be understood in the same sense; also iv. 243.

JAYĀPĪḌA.

Jayāpīḍa's literary patronage.

JAYĀPIṬA.

who had been superintendent in the charity foundation (bhaktasālā) of the minister S'ukradanta.

495. The learned Bhaṭṭa Udbhaṭa was this king's Sabhāpati (chief Paṇḍit), and received a daily allowance of one lakh dinnāras.

496. He took the Kavi Dāmodaragupta, the author of the [poem] Kuṭṭinīmata, as his chief councillor, as Bali [had taken] Kavi.

497. Manoratha, S'ukhadanta, Caṭaka, and Samdhimat were his posts, and Vāmana and others his ministers.

498. When he saw in his dream the sun rise in the west, he thought that [some] exalted teacher of the law had luckily entered his land.

499. This king, who was full of intelligence, and possessed a clever judgment [based] on experience, knew the different tastes of [all] things which can be enjoyed.

500. Those kings who have no eyes for things of great charm, and cannot judge what is sweet, what can they know but eating, just as blind oxen?

501. What the embrace of the wife who is eager to follow [her husband] unto death, is to the [dead man] raised on the funeral pyre; what the drink [prepared] from the juice of the sugar cane is to him who has lost all consciousness in a complete swoon; and what the fragrance of a multitude of garlands is to him whose life has passed away,—that is the natural beauty and greatness of things to the fool.

495. The glose of A₂ rightly designates Bhaṭṭa Udbhaṭa as an alanṅkārika or writer on poetics. His Alanṅkāraśāstra, a short treatise, has been discovered by Prof. Bühler; see Report, p. 66.

Regarding the term dinnāra (dināra), and the currency designated by it in Kāśmīr, see Note H.

496. Dāmodaragupta's Kāvya ('Reflections of the procuress'), referred to in the text, has been discovered by Prof. Peterson in the Cambay Temple library. It has been printed in the Kāvyamālā, iii. pp. 32 sqq.; comp. Prof. PETERSON'S Report on the Search for Sanskrit MSS., 1883-84, pp. 23 sqq.

Dāmodaragupta is quoted in several anthologies; see AUFRECHT, Cat. Catalog., p. 251.

Bali is the Duītya whom Viṣṇu established as ruler in the under-world. Kavi, i.e. the planet S'ukra, figures as Bali's minister.

497. Verses of Manoratha are quoted in Vallabhadeva's Subhāṣitāvalī; see p. 85 in the edition. The names of Sukhadanta, Caṭaka and Samdhimat do not appear to be known otherwise.

Vāmana, the minister of Jayāpiṭa, has been supposed to be the same as the Vāmana whom we know as one of the two authors of the Kāśī-kāvṛtti, the famous commentary on Pāṇini's grammar. Comp. BÖHLINGER'S Pāṇini (1st Edition, p. liv.) and Report, p. 72, where Prof. Bühler refers to a Kāśmīrian tradition to the same effect. On the other hand, it has also been suggested (first by Wilson, Essay, p. 55), that the Vāmana of our passage was the author of the Kāvyālanṅkāravṛtti, a work containing a set of poetical Sūtras and a gloss upon them; comp. Report, p. 65. The questions involved by these identifications have been fully discussed by Prof. M. MÜLLER, India, pp. 289 sqq. His discovery of a reference to the Kāśīkāvṛtti in the work of I-tsing, whose latest date is A.D. 690, makes it difficult to attribute any longer a share in the authorship of that commentary to a contemporary of Jayāpiṭa; comp., however, Prof. BHANDARKAR'S Report on the Search for Sanskrit MSS., 1883-84, p. 58.

498. L has actually the correct reading, dharmaṇṇācāryaṇ, which A₂ gives as 'taken from another MS.'

499. L correctly °vivekṛtvo for A °vivakṛtvo.

500. Read with L svādvavivekibhīḥ for A svādviv°.

502. His one form being reflected in council and valour, as [if it were] in two mirrors, was multiplied a thousandfold.

503. Once he directed an envoy who stood before him, to bring five Rākṣasas from the king of Lañkā, [and the former] accepted the impracticable order.

504. This envoy, then, on his way fell from the ship into the sea, was devoured by a great fish, freed himself by destroying that fish, and reached the shore.

505. Vibhīṣaṇu, the friend of mortals, through his attachment to Rīmu, sent that envoy who brought him the king's written order, back to his own land, together with the Rākṣasas, which he had granted.

506. The king richly rewarded his ambassador with money, filled a deep lake with the help of the Rākṣasas, and built the castle (koṭṭa) of Jayapura, which equalled heaven [in beauty].

507. That pious [king] set up three Buddha images and a large Vihāra, and built in the town a [shrine of] Jayādevī.

508. In his town [of Jayapura] Keśava, showing his quadruple form as well reclining on the [serpent] Ś'eṣa, has truly taken up his abode, abandoning his residence in Viṣṇu's world.

509. Some relate that after having had some other works executed by the Rākṣasas, he had the water [of the lake] covered up by [ordinary] workmen.

510. For having been told in a dream by the foe of Kaṁsa (Viṣṇu): "Make me in the water a Dvāravatī," he had such a work executed.

511. Thus it is that all the people speak to this day even of the 'Outer Castle' (bāhya koṭṭa), [which is] the famous residence of Dvāravatī, and of the 'Inner Castle' (abhyantara koṭṭa), which is Jayapura.

✓ 506-511. JAYAPURA-DVĀRAVATĪ. — The description given here of the twin towns Jayapura and Dvāravatī, which Jayāpiṇḍa founded, has been fully discussed by Prof. BÜHLER, who, in the course of his tour in 1875, succeeded in tracing their site and remains near the village of Andārkōṭh, situated on the Sambal lake, 74° 12' long, 34° 13' lat. Referring for all details as regards the topography and ruins of the place to the exhaustive and accurate account given by Prof. BÜHLER, Report, p. 18 eqq., it will be sufficient to notice here the following points directly bearing on the identification.

Andārkōṭh is the name given to a village which lies partly on an island rising from the Sambal lake, and partly on the low-lying strip of land separating that lake from the Vitastā. On the island referred to are the ruins of numerous temples, which the tradition of the villagers distinctly attribute to a king 'Jayāpiṇḍa.' This tradition, which I verified on the spot at several occasions, fully agrees with the one current among the Pundits of Srinagar, who all look upon Andārkōṭh as the site of Jayāpiṇḍa's capital. We can attach all the more importance to this tradition as it is borne out by the old gloss of A₃, iv. 511, which explains abhyantara koṭṭa by 'Andārkōṭ.' Its survival is sufficiently accounted for by e.g. Viṣṇu Pur. v. p. 16; Mūrkāṇḍeya Pur. iv. 43 eqq., and also below v. 25.

508. The Vaiṣṇavas worship Viṣṇu in four forms (caturātman)—as Saṅkhaṛṣaṇa, Aniruddha, Vāsudeva, Pradyumna; comp.

JAYĀPIṇḌA.

Foundation of Jayapura.

JAYAPIṬṬA

512. Jayulatta, a minister of the lord of the earth, who held the five [offices designated] by the word 'Great' (pañcamahāśabda), built a Maṭha at this castle of Jayapura.

513. Aca, the pious son-in-law of Pramoda, lord of Mathurā, who was the king's chamberlain, had a [shrine of] S'iva Acēśvara constructed.

514. After completing his preparations, he set out once more for the conquest of the world, while his forces, with their large elephants, seemed to prolong the hill-range of the sea coast.

515. The army which followed him, shone yet in unbroken [line] on the the fact that the place was still known in the time of S'rivara, i.e. towards the close of the 15th century, by the name of Jayāpiṭṭa-pura or Jayapura (see S'riv. i. 246, 250, 257; iv. 540, 545).

Verse 511 records that Dvāravati, which was built in the water and called after Kṛṣṇa's town, was popularly known in K.'s time as bāhya kōṭṭa, the 'Outer Castle,' and Jayapura as abhyantara kōṭṭa, the 'Inner Castle.' The latter name is undoubtedly preserved in the modern Andṛkōṭh, which in Kā. has the same meaning. The term Bāhyakōṭṭa Prof. Bühler thought to have recognized in the name 'Bahirkūt,' which according to the information obtained for him by his Kāśmirian assistant (see Report, p. 16) was applied to the village situated on the above-mentioned island.

Careful inquiries made by me on several occasions, both at the village and in its neighbourhood, have shown that this supposed name 'Bahirkūt' is wholly unknown, and that both portions of the village are called Andṛkōṭh, as indeed Prof. Bühler himself had been rightly told by his boatmen. The name 'Bahirkūt' is thus, in all probability, due only to some misunderstanding on the part of Prof. Bühler's informant. As a Kāśmiri village name it would have been all the more curious, as Kā. does not know the word bahir, but uses neb'r as the contrast to and'r.

With Bahirkūt we must abandon also Prof. Bühler's proposal of placing Dvāravati on the island and Jayapura on the opposite lake-shore. All the buildings which K. specially mentions, iv. 507, 508, 512 sq., such as the Vihāra, the temples dedicated to Jayādevī, Brahman and Keśava, the Maṭha of Jayulatta, are distinctly placed at Jayapura. Ruins corresponding to such structures can be traced in far greater number on the island plateau of Andṛkōṭh than on the opposite shore, and it is, therefore, more probable that the former was the site of Jayapura. The largest ruin situated at the N.W. corner of the plateau has already by Prof. Bühler been rightly recognized as a temple dedicated to Viṣṇu, on the evidence of a large sculptured block bearing representations of that deity. This ruin may now be assumed to correspond to the temple of Keśava referred to by K. in iv. 508.

The epithet kōṭṭa, which K. gives to Jayapura, iv. 508, 512, and again in vii. 1626, and which is reflected also in S'rivara's expression durga (S'riv. iv. 540, 545), receives its proper significance if we take into account the strong position occupied by the plateau of Andṛkōṭh, surrounded as it is on all sides by water. Jayapura served also in later times as a royal residence (Jonar. 300, 357), but its buildings were already in ruins in the time of Zain-ul-'ābidin (S'riv. i. 250).

Of Dvāravati no further mention is found either in the Rajāt. or in the later Chronicles. We may conclude from this circumstance that the place had lost its importance already at an early date. This again accounts for the comparative insignificance of the ruins extant at the probable site of Dvāravati. The latter is indicated by a few detached hamlets, all belonging to Andṛkōṭh, which stretch in a semicircle along the edge of the lake to the N. of the Andṛkōṭh island. During a short visit paid to the site in May, 1896, I could trace remains evidently taken from ancient structures in the ruined Ziārat of Saiyid Habibulla, and in the foundations of an old building known as the Qazī Hamām. From the central hamlet at which the latter is situated, a causeway (sutṛ), about 400 yards long, leads across the 'Sar' to the island of Andṛkōṭh. It is built entirely of old stone-material. The tradition of the villagers attributes the ruins here named, like those on the island itself, uniformly to King 'Jayapitṭ.'

512. For pañcamahāśabda, see note i. 140.

515. King Bhagīratha made the Gaṅgā descend from heaven to the Himālaya, and hence led her to the ocean.

Himālaya, even when it had reached the eastern ocean, just as the Gaṅgā [following] Bhagīratha.

JAYĀPIḌA.

516. Mummuni and other chiefs roamed with fierce Caṇḍīlas outside his army, and formed his guard at night.

517. Proclaiming Vinayāditya as his other name, the king beautified the eastern region by [a town called] Vinayādityapura.

518. The fortunes even of great kings are exposed to danger, when from the excessive self-confidence due to glory they resolve upon inconsiderate acts.

519. Thus, disguised as an ascetic, together with other ascetics, he entered noiselessly the fortress of the king of the eastern region called Bhīmasena.

Expedition against Bhīmasena.

520. A brother of Jajja, Siddha by name, who had long resided there, recognized him as he was looking for the weak points [of the fortress], and going to the king, denounced him.

521. Thereupon King Bhīmasena suddenly threw that prince (Jayāpiḍa) into fetters, just as the serpent Nahūṣa [caught] Bhīma, of formidable strength.

522. Fate, which hates heroic characters, raised its head, I know, when this valiant [prince], the foremost of heroes, was thus bound in fetters.

523. But Jayāpiḍa, undismayed even in this most severe adversity, and looking forward yet for a rise of his fortune, considered various stratagems.

524. In the meantime there arose in the country of King [Bhīmasena] a plague caused by the lūtā-disease, which much distressed his citizens.

525. This disease is, owing to a defect of [that] country, contagious and fatal. Hence, whoever is attacked by lūtā is abandoned.

526. On hearing this, Jayāpiḍa fixed his mind on the means [of escape thus] offered, and had secretly the required articles brought by his servant.

527. By eating those [articles] which produce excessive bile, he excited his bile and brought on a fever, and then putting on his body the juice of the Vajravṛkṣa (Cactus Opuntia), he produced boils.

528. When his opponent heard from the mouth of the jailors that he was attacked by lūtā, he thought that he would certainly die, and had him removed from the country.

529. When he had thus by the power of his own mind escaped from the ocean of calamities, he took the enemy's fortress, which reached up to the sky, and [with it the enemy's] glory.

530. That tree of learning which is ever laughed at by fools, does, indeed,

516. For Mummuni, see note iii. 332.

517. It has already been stated in note iv. 402, that all known coins of Jayāpiḍa bear the name Vinayāditya.

521. For the story how Bhīma, one of the Pāṇḍavas, fell into the power of Nahūṣa, see Mahābh. iii. clxxviii. 1 sqq.

JAYĀPIḌA.

Expedition against Nepāl.

not show roots, blossoms, and the like, but bears its fruit at the time of distress by removing a man's misfortune at one stroke.

531. King Aramuḍi, who ruled Nepāl, and who was possessed of wisdom and prowess, wished to prevail over him by cunning.

532. When that [king, i.o. Jayāpīḍa,] had entered his land, he did not pay homage, but retired with his army to a great distance.

533. While he (Jayāpīḍa), eager for conquest, thus pursued him, he defeated one ruler after the other without having to undertake special expeditions.

534. He followed the enemy, who sometimes kept in hiding and sometimes showed himself, in pursuit from land to land, as the eagle [pursues] the dove in the thicket.

535. When that [enemy] had no place left to fly to, the conqueror of the world marched his army to the bank of a stream where it neared the ocean.

536. After two or three days he started, and led his troops towards the eastern ocean, their flags fluttering touched by the breeze of the sea-coast.

537. Then on the [opposite] river bank, which was on the king's right, there was [seen] Aramuḍi in position, displaying his army together with his royal parasol.

538. When Jayāpīḍa saw that [king's] mighty force, he flamed up, just as the fire when fed with liquefied butter.

539. As he saw before him the water of the river only knee-deep, and [hence] offering no obstacle, he stepped into it to cross, angry as he was, and unacquainted with the country in which he had not been before.

540. When the king reached mid[-stream], the river, which was near the sea, was filled by the tide rising at an unexpected hour, and became unfordable.

541. Then the king's army, with its mass of men, elephants, and horses, was washed away by the swollen river, and destroyed in a moment.

542. The king, whose ornaments and clothes were torn off by the breaking waves, was carried far away by the flood, while cutting through the billows with his arms.

543. The pitiable cries of one army, the triumphant shouts of the other, and the din of the river's waves, spread uproar in all directions.

544. And the quick [foe] from the other bank dragged out and captured Jayāpīḍa by means of [men] who stood ready with [inflated] skins, and [thereupon] celebrated a feast.

545. The practice of fate and the cloud is not directed towards giving favours. The former displays something pleasant, and prepares for man at the same moment dire distress; and the latter, after promising relief from the painful heat of a long summer day, brings about the destruction of the tree by lightning.

531. The name Aramuḍi does not occur in the traditional lists of Nepāl Rājās as given by PRINSEP, Ind. Antiquities, ii. pp. 268 sqq.; WRIGHT, Hist. of Nepāl, p. 312 sqq.

JAYĀPIḌA.

546. He (Aramuḍi) placed Jayāpiḍa in the hands of trusted jailors, in a castle which was [built] of stone on the bank of the Kālaganḍikā, and very high. Jayāpiḍa imprisoned.

547. The Kāśmīrian king, thus once more submerged in misfortune, felt confused in his helpless state, and was inwardly consumed by grief.

548. The prudent king kept him so [close], that even the moon among the artful (kalāvut) and the sun among the glorious could not see him.

549. When he came forth a little [from his place of confinement] and attached his eyes to the window, he saw the river close by, and thought of means [of escape].

550. Scholars are even to this day moved to sadness when remembering the verses which the king composed there, and in which he described his condition.

551. While he was [kept] in this state, the self-respecting Devaśarman, alone among the ministers, remembered the honours [received] from the king, and felt grieved day and night.

552. Anxious to help his master at the sacrifice of his own person, he enticed Aramuḍi through messengers, who used soft words.

553. His messengers told that [king] that he (Devaśarman) would deliver to him the rule over the country of Kāśmīr, along with Jayāpiḍa's treasures.

554. When an agreement had been arrived at, on the arrival of the envoys sent in return [by Aramuḍi], the minister, accompanied by an army, proceeded to the land of Nepāl.

555. After placing the army on the near side of the Kālaganḍikā river, he went with a small following to the opposite bank.

556. After he had been conducted to the assembly-hall by the feudatory princes who went to receive him, and had made his obeisance, Aramuḍi greeted him, and made him take his seat.

557. He quickly took his leave from the king on [the ground of] being tired from the journey, and after [receiving] the complimentary presents despatched by him, spent that day at his residence.

546. By the Kālaganḍikā is evidently meant the river Gandakā which drains the western part of Nepāl, and is said to bear in its upper course also the name Kākā; see Lassen, Ind. Alt., i. p. 76.

548. In the word kalāvut there is an allusion to the moon's crescent (kalā). The sense intended is that neither craft nor force could penetrate the king's prison.

549. Āloka must be taken with the gloss as the designation of a small window, (called vātāyana in iv. 568)—a meaning not recorded in the dictionaries.

550. The Subhāṣitāvalī of the Kāśmīrian Vallabhadeva contains a verse (661) attributed to a Jayāpiḍa. It is probable that King J. is intended by this attribution; see Prof. Peterson and Durgaprasāda's edition, p. 40.

JAYĀPĪDA.

558. On the following day he and King Aramuḍi mutually took an oath by sacred libation (pītakōśa), and in privacy settled the affair.

559. The minister then said to the king: "The treasure acquired by Jayāpīḍa is with the army, and its [place] known [only] to his trusted servants or to himself."

560. "Under the pretence that his liberation will be effected by payment, I will, therefore, ask him where the treasure is deposited."

561. "For this reason I have not brought [here] the army in a body, because those who keep the deposited [treasure], could not be caught while in its midst."

562. "If we call them one by one away from it and imprison them, the [remaining] soldiers, not knowing our intent, will not be excited, and will be ready to tell."

563. When the clever [minister] had obtained the consent of the duped [Aramuḍi], he went to the imprisoned King Jayāpīḍa.

564. Full of resolution, he hid the pain which the king's sight caused him, and after removing all people from the place, asked him quickly:

565. "Have you not yet lost your natural energy? For it is required for the success of bold plans, just as a wall for paintings."

566. He answered him: "O minister, unarmed as I stand here, what wonderful exploit could I perform, even if I had preserved energy?"

567. The minister spoke to him: "If your strength has not departed, you shall see that the ocean of your misfortune is crossed at this very moment."

568. "Are you able to reach the [opposite] shore after dropping yourself into the water of the river from this window? For there is your own army."

569. The king replied to him: "If one dropped oneself from this [window], one could not rise from the water without an [inflated] skin, and a skin must burst here on account of the height of the fall."

570. "Therefore, there is no means [of escape from] here. Nor, indeed, do I care to abandon life while disgraced and before having destroyed the enemy."

571. Then, after reflection, the minister addressed him: "O king, may you under some pretence tarry outside for two Nālikās."

572. "Then return alone, and you will see that I have prepared a device for crossing the water. This you should then use without hesitation."

573. Hearing these words, he went outside, proceeded to the privy, and by tarrying there managed to pass outside the time indicated by that [minister].

558. For an explanation of the term pītakōśa, see note v. §26.

571. A nālikā corresponds to twenty-four minutes.

574. Returning thereupon alone, he saw him lying on the ground, and dead, [strangled] by a strip of his garment, which he had tied round his neck.

575-577. And on the strip of cloth tied round the neck, he saw and read the following direction written [by the minister] with blood from his own body, which he had torn with his nails: "I, having died just now, with my body still full of breath [serve you] as an indestructible skin. Mount me and cross the stream! As a hold for your thighs when mounted, I have bound the cloth of my head-dress round my loins. Put [your legs] into this and quickly drop into the water."

578. The king first fell into the emotions of astonishment and affection, then [threw himself] into the current of the stream, and reached the opposite bank.

579. As soon as he had reached his army, he at once invaded the kingdom of Nepāl, and destroyed it completely, together with its ruler.

580. While his jailors did not even know that he had escaped from prison, he had turned that kingdom into [a thing of the past], which survives only in stories.

581. When the king had freed himself from his prison, there took place a battle-feast, at which the dancers were headless corpses, the garlands those bestowed [on the dead heroes] by the celestial maids, and the music that of the kettle-drums.

582. O wonder! When in summer time other hills abound in forest-fires, and must be avoided, just then rises Mount Himalaya moistened by the melting masses of snow and [therefore] particularly fit to be resorted to.

583. At the very time when Jajju and others were born, who betrayed their master, then, O wonder, [was born] that wise minister Devaśarman.

584. For the son (Devaśarman) did not differ from his father Mitraśarman, as the dark S'anaīscara (Saturn) [differs] from [his father,] the shining sun.

585. When that minister, who was like a protecting amulet, had died, the king thought that he had lost the royal power, though he had [just] received it.

586. When that conquest of the world was ended, the blemish on his honour passed from the king's mind, but not the service [done] by his minister.

587. Wonderful it is that after he had conquered a large territory in the 'Land of the Amazons' (Strirājya), the [other] kings esteemed [still more] highly his victory over the group of his senses (indriyagrāma).

588. And he established the office called Dharmādīkaraṇa ('administration of justice'), fixing [there] the regal cloth of Karṇa (? karṇāśrīpaṭa) which he had carried away from the conquered Strirājya.

JAYĀPĪṬA.

Jayāpīṭa's escape.

584. Read with L nābhūd visadṛśaḥ, for A nābhūdāhi sadṛśaḥ.

588. The meaning of karṇāśrīpaṭa is quite uncertain; paṭa (for paṭṭa) may also

JAYĀPIPA.

589. He also created another office called Calagañja ('moving treasury'), to serve on expeditions when his own treasury (gañja) was far away.

590. What more [need I relate]? While the goddess of victory rested in the embrace of his arms, the four oceans served [her] as jewel-studded mirrors for play.

591. After having again returned to Kaśmīr, the king, surrounded by the [tributary] princes, enjoyed for a long time the glory earned by his conquests.

Story of the Nāga Mahāpadma.

592. Once the king, who had acquired might by the conquest of all regions, was addressed in his dream by a person who bore a divine appearance, and had his hands folded [in supplication]:

593. "I am, O king, the Nāga-prince called Mahāpadma, residing peacefully in your dominion, along with my relations. I apply to you for protection."

594. "A Dravidian sorcerer wishes to lead me away from here, in order to sell me for money in an arid tract requiring water."

595. "If you protect me from him I shall show you in your own land a mountain which contains gold ore, [in return] for your great favour."

596. Having learned this in his dream, the king sent out spies in all directions, and when that [sorcerer] had been found somewhere and brought up, he asked him about his intentions.

597. When after a promise of safety that [sorcerer] had in due form related all that the Nāga had told, he was questioned once more by the king himself, who felt astonished:

598. "How can you drag out that very powerful Nāga from the depth of the lake, which extends over many Yojanas?"

599. He replied to him: "Incomprehensible are the powers of magic. If you wish to see them, come, and you will quickly see a wonder."

designate a plate bearing a picture or edict. Karna, the king of Aṅga, one of the Kauravas, might be alluded to. But I am unable to trace any story regarding him which could be connected with our passage.

593. The Nāga Mahāpadma is the tutelary deity of the Pulur, the largest of the Kāśmīr lakes, which has received from it its ancient name Mahāpadmasaras. The Nilamata, 928 sqq., tells at great length the story how Nīla, the king of the Nāgas, granted to Mahāpadma and his relatives a residence at the site which was first occupied by King Viśvagaśva's town, Candrapura, and after the submersion of the latter converted into a lake. Compare the abstract given in Report, p. 10. Other legends about the lake are related by Jonarāja, 909-944, in connection with the artificial Laukā island constructed in it by Zain-ul-'ābidin.

From Rājat. v. 114, and the passages discussed in the note thereon, it appears that the Mahāpadma Nāga supposed to inhabit the lake was identified with the Kāliya Nāga subdued by Kṛṣṇa. The lake itself is referred to as Mahāpadmasaras in v. 68, 103 sqq., 118; viii. 3128; Srikanṭha. iii. 9; Jonar. 909-913, 949; Sriv. iii. 292, 528; iv. 200, etc., and its name is mentioned under the form of Mo-ho-po-to-no-lung (Mahāpadma) in the Annals of the T'ang dynasty, quoted in note iv. 123.

For a description of the lake, see M^{rs} CROFT, Travels, ii. pp. 223 sqq.; VIGNE, Travels, ii. pp. 153 sqq.; LAWRENCE, Valley, p. 20. Its modern name Pulur is derived from the Skr. designation Ullola, scil. saras, [the lake] 'with high-going waves.' This is found first Jonar. 938 sqq. (see also Jonarāja's commentary on Srikanṭha. iii. 9), and is frequently used in the Mahātmyas.

600. Then he went up close to the lake, followed by the king, and after closing all quarters [by magic formulas], dried up the water by means of arrows discharged under [proper] spells.

601. Thereupon the king saw wriggling in the mud a human-faced snake, a span long, together with many other small snakes.

602. That [sorcerer] said: "O king, I take him now reduced as he is by the spell." But the king kept him back with the words: "You must not take him."

603. Then, upon the king's order, he quickly withdrew the force of the magic spell, and the lake resuming its former state, extended again in all directions.

604. The king gave money to the Dravidian, and when he had sent him away, thought: "Should not that Nāga this very day give the mountain containing the gold mine?"

605. While he thought over this, the Nāga spoke to him in his dream: "For what favour should the gold-producing mountain be shown to you?"

606. "Continued residence produces in the mind of living beings, through [the logical processes of] connection and exclusion, [the conceptions]: 'This is my own country; this is a foreign country.'"

607. "I came to you for protection from fear of dishonour. But that has been put [upon me] just by you who were to be my protector."

608. "The subjects think that their master can as little be disturbed as the ocean. What disgrace else can be greater than for him to be humiliated before them by others?"

609. "How shall I in self-respect see the faces of those women who have seen me incapable of offering protection when another disgraced them?"

610. "We, who ought to be [looked upon] by you as alike to the prime causes (kāraṇa), are exposed by you senselessly to ridicule and jesting, as if we were beings of no consequence."

611. "However, what is there to wonder at in the haphazard conduct of kings, who are blinded by the intoxication [due] to royal power and who act without previous consideration?"

612. "Kings consider the humiliation of noble beings a sport, while the latter take it for a living death as long as their life lasts."

613. "Honour is for kings among the things which may be neglected for the

600. The āyabanā or 'closing of the quarters' against the influence of evil spirits, etc., figures frequently as a preparatory rite for magic performances in Tantra works, e.g. in the Nityārcanapaddhati of Rājānaka Taṭṭakavarta (Poona MS., Coll. 1875-76, No. 76, erroneously called Bhṛṅgosasamhitā, Report, p. v.). Comp.

also Rāghavananda's Paddhatiratnamālā (Jammu MS. No. 5293), foll. 38, 40, 54, etc.

Regarding the drying-up of the waters by means of fiery darts, comp. Mahābh. vii. cci. 25 sqq.

610. Read ye kāraṇa°. For the meaning of kāraṇa, see vii. 601 and gloss.

JAYĀPIḌA.

sake of their advantage. But for self-respecting persons it is one of those things which must be saved, even at the sacrifice of life."

614. "Who can imagine what those feel in their mind who are disrespectfully treated by some great person, and are brought into contact with [others] in dishonour?"

615. "But even under such conditions it is not profitless to see us as [it is profitless to see] you. Hence I indicate to you a mountain which abounds in copper ore."

616. After these words, he gave to him such directions in his dream that after waking up in the morning he found the mountain with a copper mine.

617. From this mountain, which was in Kramarājya, he obtained copper [sufficient] to coin hundred crores less one Dinnāras which bore his name.

618. In order to break the pride of kings, he offered the bet that whoever would produce a complete hundred of crores would triumph over him.

619. Thus [it seemed] as if the king by his actions, in which something remained for completion, set samasyas for [other] kings, in order to abate [their desire for] works of equal greatness.

Jayāpiḍa's oppressions.

620. Then suddenly, by a change in [his] subjects' fortune, the protector of the earth left his grandfather's course and followed the conduct of his father.

621. The officials (kāyasthas) beseeched him: "What is the use of [undergoing] the hardships of universal conquest and similar [enterprises]? Riches may be got from your own land." Thereupon he oppressed his own kingdom.

622. Greedy officers of finance, such as S'ivadāsa and others, excited his desire for treasures beyond measure, and he became a prey to avarice.

623. From that time onwards the kings of Kāśmīr became habituated to looking at the faces of their officials [for guidance], and to following the direction of their servants.

624. The king's plans, [before] directed towards the capture of various princes, were now fixed on the imprisonment of [his own] citizens.

625. Learning, which for the virtuous procures tranquillity of mind, led Jayāpiḍa, [when he turned] wicked, to passionate obstinacy in tormenting his subjects.

626. Though he destroyed the lives of many people, like [another] son of

617. It is curious that while Jayāpiḍa's coins of mixed metal (with silver as chief alloy) are still abundant, no genuine specimens of his copper coinage have yet been discovered. Comp. CUNNINGHAM, Coins of Med. India, p. 29. The attribution to Jayāpiḍa of the unique copper coin with the supposed legend S'ri Jaya shown there, pl. iv. 18, is quite uncertain.

For Kramarājya, the present Kamrāj, see note ii. 15.

619. For samasyā, see note iv. 46.

626. For the legend of Kalmāṣapāda, see Mahābh. i. cxxxvi. 35 sqq.

Sudāsa (Kalmāṣapāda), he did not, even in his sleep, feel satisfied with his deeds of evil.

627. Fie, if lascivious women only once, out of curiosity, indulge in loose conduct, and if princes only once commit cruelty,—although resolved in their mind to commit only this one transgression,—then wickedness enters so deep into their soul that, deprived of all shame, the former fool no remorse, even when they embrace the vilest person, nor the latter even when they slay their own parents.

628. In his persistent greed he went so far in cruelty, that for three years he took the [whole] harvest, including the cultivator's share.

629. With his mind merged in greed, the king took for friends the officials (kāyasthas), who carried off all property [of the subjects], while delivering only the smallest fraction of what they realized.

630. The fishes of the sea and kings are alike [in this]: the former think the cloud liberal when it sends down [some] drops from their own water which had been drawn up. The latter too, alas, believe inwardly in the faithful services of the wicked tribe of officials when it gives up a few trifles after openly looting everything.

631. O, that never relaxing courage of the Brahmans who braved even this merciless ruler.

632. Those who remained behind after [others] had emigrated, did not cease to die under loud complaints, nor the king to plunder.

633. Then the king spoke in fury: "Let it be reported [to me] if a hundred Brahmans less one die in a single day."

634. As the cruel king reversed his conduct, so the scholars, too, in their Kāvya's inserted laudatory verses, which might be reversed [into satirical reproof], in the following fashion:

635. "What difference is there between the glorious kings Jayāpīḍa and Paṇini? The former has completely accomplished all his tasks (kṛta/kṛtya), and has caused the increase of virtues (guṇavṛddhi; or has destroyed all works and removed virtues), and the latter has treated exhaustively of Kṛtya-suffixes, and has prescribed the rules for guṇa and vṛddhi."

636. Such a disguised attack was [also] made upon him by learned persons in

632. Suicide by voluntary starvation (prāyopaveśa) is referred to.

635-637. The epithets contained in the first halves of the two verses quoted, give each a threefold meaning. As applied to Paṇini they allude to grammatical topics discussed in his Aṣṭādhyāya. Taken as referring to Jayāpīḍa, they can be understood again either in a laudatory or in a satirical sense, according to the alaṅkāra called Vyājastuti (Kāvya-prakāśa, x. 112). The threefold interpretations intended in these specimens of poetic malice have been indicated by the above paraphrase.

In verse 635 the words kṛta and vṛddhi must be derived from the roots kṛ (kṛtsāyām) and vardha (chedana), respectively, in order to yield the sense unfavourable to the king.

Verse 636 seems to indicate that the second quotation is from the introduction of some connection with an exposition of the [Mahā]bhāṣya, by means of skilfully appropriated verses, and put into the following form :

JAYĀPIṬA.

637. "What difference is there between the glorious king Jayāpiṭa and I'āpini? The former has subordinated himself to the Brahmans (kṛtvāviprasarga), and has brought about the perfection of beings (bhūtanisṭhāvidhāyin; or has produced calamities for the Brahmans, and has accomplished the destruction of beings), and the latter has troated of the prepositions (upāsarga) vi and pra, and has prescribed the rules for the [terminations called] niṣṭhā of the past tense (bhūta)."

638. When he was appropriating [the land of] Tūlamūlya, he heard, while on the bank of the Candrabhāgā, that a hundred Brahmans less one had sought death in the water of that [stream].

639. Thereupon he desisted from confiscating Agrahāras, but did by no means give up the land which he had taken from [individual] inhabitants.

Jayāpiṭa's end.

640. Once the Brahmans residing at Tūlamūlya, struck by the hands of the doorkeepers, broke out in loud complaints before him at the time of the audience :

641. "Manu, Māndhātṛ, Rāma and others were great sovereigns. But even before them the Brahmans were not subjected to humiliation."

642. "For the Brahmans, if enraged, are able to destroy in a single moment heaven with Indra, the earth and its mountains, hell and its Nāga-princes."

643. On hearing these words, the vassals left [their places] behind the king. But he, frowning with one eyebrow, proudly spoke :

644. "What fever of arrogance is this that you, rogues who live upon a beggar's crumbs, should like Ṛṣis speak here words to proclaim your power?"

commentary on the Mahābhāṣya, and an adaptation of the one previously quoted from a Kavya.

In verso 637, upāsarga must be taken in the first case as equivalent to upasujana, 'subordination, accommodation.' Verso 637 is quoted by the Commentator of the Maṅkhakośa, s.v. niṣṭhā.

J 638. Tūlamūlya is undoubtedly the present village of Tulmūl, situated 74° 48' long. 31° 13' lat. among the marshes through which the Sind River passes before joining the Vitastā. The large spring of Tulmūl is sacred as the habitation of Mahārājñi, a form of Durgā extensively worshipped among the Brahman population of Kāśmīr, and is accordingly to this day the object of frequent and popular pilgrimages. The name is written as Tūlamūlaka in Fourth Chron. 527, 531, and in the Rājapūrāṇabhāṣmāh. The etymology (tūla and mūlya) indicated in the Māhātmya shows that K.'s form is the correct one.

The context makes it evident that the Candrabhāgā of our passage cannot be meant for the Cināb river to the S.E. of Kāśmīr, which is elsewhere mentioned by that name (e.g. iii. 467; viii. 554, 626), but must be some stream close to Tulmūl. The designation might have applied to that branch of the Sind River which flows past Tulmūl. It must, however, be mentioned that among the numerous passages of the Nilamata and other Kāśmīrian texts which contain the name Candrabhāgā, I have found only one in which a stream (different from the Cināb) is clearly intended. This is Nilamata, 1399, where a Candrabhāgā is named immediately after the Haramukuta-gaṅgā or Sind River (see note i. 57), as one of the Kāśmīr rivers flowing into the Vitastā.

641. Māndhātṛ is often referred to as one of the great kings of the heroic age: see v. 1122; viii. 231, 2362. For his story, comp. Mahābh. iii. Adhy. cxxvi, and for references in Buddhist texts, Prof. WINDISCH'S Māra and Buddha, pp. 277, 281.

645. Then when they, frightened by his terrible frown, kept silent, the twice-born Ilīla, a treasure of Brahmanical dignity, thus spoke to him :

646. "O king, we are by no means Ṛsis, since we conform, just as you [yourself do] as king, to the [change of the] Yugas, taking [from them] what we are, and what we are not."

647. Haughtily the king asked him : "Who art thou then ? Viśvāmītra, perhaps, or Vasiṣṭha, or Agastya, a treasure of asceticism ?"

648. Thereupon he seemed to flame up. His body became difficult to look at, on account of the fire which burst forth [from it], and resembling a snake when it raises its hood, and choking with fury, he spoke to the king :

649. "If you are Hariscandra, Triśaṅku, or Nahuṣa too, then I singly can be more than Viśvāmītra and the other [Ṛsis]."

650. The king replied to him with a laugh : "By the anger of Viśvāmītra and the other [Ṛsis], Hariscandra and the rest perished. What is to happen on account of your wrath ?"

651. Then the Brahman spoke in anger, striking the ground with his hand : "Why should not, through my wrath, the staff of Brahman fall [upon you] at this very moment ?"

652. On hearing this the king laughed, and spoke in anger to the Brahman : "May that staff of Brahman fall ! Why does it tarry even for this one day ?"

653. "Well, surely here it falls, you wretch !" Thus cried then the Brahman, and on the king's limb fell a golden pole which had broken off from the canopy.

654. In consequence of the wound which this produced on the limb, his body decomposed through inflammation, and masses of worms had to be removed from it by the use of saws.

655. After he had for a number of nights been made to feel pains which indicated his future torments in hell, life, eager to escape, passed from him.

656. The chief of princes (daṇḍadhara), who had brought [upon himself] sudden punishment (daṇḍa), then went into the presence of Yama (daṇḍadhara), after having suffered the punishment produced by Brahman's staff (brahmadāṇḍa).

657. Such was for thirty-one years the reign of this famous king, who could not restrain his will.

658. Princes and fishes, when their thirst is excited by riches and impure water [respectively], leave their condition (place) and follow evil ways, with such

649. The Epic legends relate the fall of the Kings Hariscandra, Triśaṅku and Nahuṣa through the curse of the holy seers Viśvāmītra, Vasiṣṭha and Agastya, respectively.

654. I translate according to the reading of A, visarpa^o, which is also found in L.

JAYĀPIṬA.

[result] that they are brought into the strong net of hell (death), the former by changes which fate dictates, and the latter by the troops of fishermen.

650. Seeing him depart from life in sinfulness, his mother, Amṛtaprabhā, built the [temple of] Amṛtakeśvara for the deliverance of her dead [son].

LALITĀPIṬA.

660. Then Lalitāpīṭa became the ruler of the earth, who was a son of Jayāpīṭa, born from the queen named Durgā.

661. During the reign of this [prince], who was the slave to his passions, and did not attend to his regal duties, the kingdom became the prey of courtesans, and was defiled by immorality.

662. He squandered the riches which his father, condemned to hell, had accumulated by wicked deeds, on buffoons and the like, and thus made the use [of these riches] conform to [their mode of acquisition].

663. Parasites, who got a foothold in the royal palace through their relationship with courtesans, initiated him in the arts of whoredom.

664. Dropping diadem and bracelets, he thought his body [sufficiently] decorated on having his hair torn by the teeth of women, and his breast marked by their nails.

665. Whoever was well-versed in stories about courtesans and clever in jesting, was taken into his friendship, but no valiant man nor a scholar.

666. This king, who was not satisfied with a few women, and who was full of violent desires, thought Jayāpīṭa an imbecile for having left the 'Land of the Amazons' (Strīnāṭya) after he had conquered it.

667. Ho, who was happy in the enjoyment of prostitutes, and kept in the company of like-minded [persons], laughed at the former kings and their efforts to subdue the world.

668. The parasites, who hurt modest old men by their jesting words, and thus kept them away, earned his affection and received from him presents.

669. Clever, like a market-slave, at open mockery, he, with his company of courtesans, made the old among the councillors feel ashamed in his audience-hall.

670. He in his wickedness made councillors worthy of respect dress themselves in pretty cloaks and other [garments] which bore the footprints of courtesans.

671. The self-respecting councillor Manoratha alone avoided him, as he was unable to restrain him, and avorse to [any] intercourse [with him].

672. Wicked acts, want of fitness, desperate condition, treacherous conduct There is no other remedy against a wicked lord but to shun him.

672. I am unable to trace a proper connection between the two halves of this verse, It is probable that our text shows here a lacuna.

673. This king, who granted to Brahmans the [Agrahāras of] Suvarṇapārśva, Phalupura and Locanotsa, ruled for twelve years.

LALITĀRĪṬA.

674. Then Samgrāmāpīḍa [II.], a son of King Jayāpīḍa, born from the Queen Kalyāṇadevī, became the lord of the world.

SAMGRĀMĀRĪṬA II.

675. This king, who also bore the second name of Prthivjāpīḍa, reached the end of his sovereign sway after seven years.

676. Then the illustrious Cippaṭajayāpīḍa, also called Bṛhaspati, the child-son of Lalitāpīḍa, became king.

CIPPAṬAJAYĀRĪṬA (BṚHASPATI).

677. His mother was Jayādevī, the daughter of a spirit-distiller (kalyapālā). She had been the concubine of King Lalitāpīḍa, who was in the clutches of the crocodile 'sensuous passion.'

678. For she was the daughter of a spirit-distiller, called Uppa, of the Ākhuva village, and had been taken by that king, who was lusting for her beautiful form, [into his seraglio] as a concubine.

679. He (Cippaṭajayāpīḍa) was guided, while he was a youth, by his maternal uncles Padma, Uṭpalaka, Kalyāṇa, Mamṃa, and Dharma, who shared the rule over the land.

Padma, Uṭpala, etc., in power.

680. His eldest [uncle], Uṭpalaka, took the five [offices distinguished by] the term 'Great,' and the others usurped the other offices.

681. The king's mother, Jayādevī, whose directions were respected by her brothers while in possession of the royal power, built the [shrine of Ś'iva] Jayēśvara.

673. Suvarṇapārśva is identified by the gloss of A₂ (suṇapāh) with the modern village of Sunpāh, situated 74° 40' long. 34° 1' lat. in the Biru Pargana. No ancient remains can now be traced at the place.

I have no suggestion to offer regarding the site of Locanotsa, which like Suvarṇapārśva is mentioned only in this passage. The identification of the latter name, as proposed by the glossator, is supported by phonetic rules of Kś. Skr. suvarṇa (gold) > Kś. sun^a; regarding the change ś > h in pārśva > pārśva* > pāh, see note i. 100.

The position of Phalupura, indicated by the gloss of A₂ Parihāṣapurāsamīpe, has been discussed in Note I, v. 97-100.

677. The term kalyapāla as the designation of a spirit-distiller has survived in the modern Kś. kal'pāl, as indicated already in the gloss of A₂. The occupation was practised by Muhammadan inhabitants of the Valley until the establishment of a state-monopoly, and was in recent times not attended by any special social stigma. The term kalyapāla occurs in a verse quoted by the Commentator of Manikha, with reference to kalya (surāyam).

678. The word avarudhā designates throughout the Chronicle (vii. 101, 724, 727, 858, 1461; viii. 210, 966, 1936) a concubine, i.e. a woman who, owing to her being a widow, of low origin, or from some other reason, cannot be legally married. In vii. 858; viii. 1936, reference is made to courtesans received as avarudhās into the royal seraglio. For a widow of high rank taken as an avarudhā by Prince Bhīkṣūcara, see viii. 966. Regarding the derivation of the term, which is also used by Kṣemendra, Samayam, ii. 21, 24; iii. 30; viii. 110, comp. avarodha, 'seraglio.' The modern Kś. urud, which is used in the same sense as avarudhā both among the Hindus and Muhammadans of Kāśmir, is the direct phonetic derivative of Skr. avarudhikā (for the latter form comp. vii. 725, 850). A man who receives a divorced woman or a widow, is called urud (avarudhā*); comp. vi. 286.

The position of Ākhuva is unknown.

679. The context requires the conjectural emendation bālakaḥ for A L bālakaḥ, as already indicated by Durgap.

680. For pañca mahāśabdān, see note iv. 140.

OLPPATAJAYĀPIḌA (BRHASPATI).

682. That royal treasure which has been defiled by the accession of money [extorted] in avarice, is quickly wasted by some new comers.

683. Those riches of Jayāpiḍa, which his son (Lalitāpiḍa) had partly squandered, were subsequently plundered entirely by his son's brothers-in-law.

684. Those lucky [men] obtained the enjoyment of lasting advantages, through the power which the charm of their sister's loveliness had secured [for them].

685. These low-born persons, who knew no restraint in their actions, feared their fall as the king, their nephew, gradually emerged from childhood.

686. Then these wicked men conspired together, and in their desire [to secure] the regal power, destroyed by sorcery the king, who was both their sister's son and their lord.

Olppatajayāpiḍa killed
(A.D. 813/4).

687. This [king] after a rule of twelve years thus being killed, those [brothers], nourishing mutual jealousy, did not wish [to give] the throne to anyone.

688. They having possession of the land struggled with each other to put up various persons of high birth as nominal rulers.

ARITĀPIḌA.

689-690. Tribhuvanāpiḍa, the son of King Bappiya and Queen Meghāvalī, had, though the eldest [son], been excluded from the throne, as he was not given to intrigues. He had a son from Jayādevī, [called] Ajitāpiḍa. This [son] was then made king by Utpala by means of force.

691. To the king they gave food and dress from the [income of] the fifth account-office, which received the surplus from the other [four] account-offices, [called] S'eḍa, etc.

692. The king, who, being dependent on them, had a difficult position, did not wish that they should be [all] on the same footing, as, day by day, if he spoke with one, the others felt annoyed.

693. They who carried off the revenue of the country founded towns, temples, and other [edifices] while Ajitāpiḍa was king.

694. They, with their descendants, feasted in mutual jealousy on the masterless kingdom, like wolves on a dead buffalo in the desert.

683. Comp. viii. 1952.

689-690. Bappiya was another name borne by King Vajraditya; comp. above iv. 393. The Jayādevī here mentioned is a different person from Jayādevī, the sister of Utpala, Padma, etc.

691. The exact meaning of this verso cannot be ascertained, as no information has come down to us as regards the details of the finance-administration alluded to here. An interpretation similar to the one given above appears to be intended in the curious gloss of A₂. This mentions names for the other four offices (śalasthūla, nāmelyāṇaka, mithūna, navagrāmādi), and is evidently taken from some earlier source. It is impossible that these Skt. terms should have been in use in Moghul times when A₂ wrote, or rather copied, his glosses. The passage viii. 576, where S'eḍa is mentioned once more as a 'rājasthāna,' does not throw any light on the character of this office.

695. By Utpala was built the [temple of Viṣṇu] Utpalasvāmin and the [town] Utpalapura. Foundations of Padma were the [temple of Viṣṇu] Padma-svāmin and the [town of] Padmapura.

आर्तिपत्रा.
Foundations of Utpala,
Padma, etc.

696. Padma's wife Guṇādevī, of brilliant virtue, built one Maṭha at the capital (ulhiṣṭhāna), and a second at Vijayeshvara.

697. Dharma, who exerted himself for the law (dharma), caused the [temple of] Dharmasvāmin to be built, and the pious Kalyāṇavarman the [temple of] Viṣṇu Kalyāṇasvāmin.

698-699. The clever, wise, and rich Mamma built the [temple of Viṣṇu] Mammasvāmin, and gave, when arranging [on that occasion] for the consecration of a multitude of sacrificial cups (kumbha), eighty-five thousand cows [to Brahmins], and provided for each cow five thousand Dinnāras as an outfit.

700. Who can count [the expense incurred] at the [temple] outfit by this single [brother]? What then [need be said] as regards all the brothers with their large fortunes?

701. Whether their wealth had been obtained by fraud or by righteous means, all were pleased with it through their liberality.

702. By the side of the temples which they built, the other shrines appeared [small], like young elephants by the side of the elephants of the quarters.

703. From the year [of the Laukika era three thousand eight hundred] eighty-nine (A.D. 818/4), when their nephew died, to the year [three thousand nine hundred] twenty-six (A.D. 850/1), they ruled unrestrained.

695. Utpalapura is mentioned again Jonar. 322, 859, but no distinct indication as to the position of the place is furnished by either passage. Utpalapura is mentioned as the seat of a Bhairava in a note found at the end of the MS. of the Kṣetrapūlapaddhati, written by Rājānaka Ratnakarṇa, and now in the possession of P. Jagannohana, Lahore. The place is there identified with Kākapura, i.e. the modern Kakpōr on the Vitasta.

If this identification is correct, the Utpalasvāmin temple may be looked for amongst the several ruined sites found at Kakpōr; comp. for the latter, CUNNINGHAM, J.A.S.B., 1848, p. 290. Of the temple of Utpalasvāmin nothing is known.

Padmapura is certainly the modern town Pāmpar on the Vitasta, 74° 59' long. 34° 1' lat. (called Pāmpūr by Panjābis), as already recognized by VIGNES, Travels, ii. p. 81. The scanty remains of an ancient temple, situated in the centre of the town, have been described by CUNNINGHAM, J.A.S.B., 1848, p. 274. They may possibly belong to the Padma-svāmin temple mentioned in our text and vi. 222. Padmapura figures frequently in the last two Books of the Chronicle (see Index); comp. also Jonar. 549; S'riv. iv. 192, 344; Fourth Chron. 928; Vitastāmāh. xi. 20, etc.

698-699. K. has previously recorded, iii. 263, that Mamma took for the endowment of his temple the villages granted to the temple of Mātrguptasvāmin. The site of Mamma's foundation cannot be traced.

A kumbhapratisthā is again referred to vii. 699; regarding kumbha, comp. note iv. 18.

701. "Die Kirch' allein . . . kann unge-rechtes Gut vordanen." Kunst.

703. From this passage K. commences to record exact dates for the various reigns and events in years of the Laukika or Saptarsi era, which is the traditional era of Kāśmīr and the neighbouring hill-tracts. Regarding its initial date, placed by Kāśmīrians on Caitra śuklī 1 of the twenty-fifth year of the Kali Yuga, i.e. 3076-75 B.C., see note i. 62. Following the general custom which prevails to this day in Kāśmīr, K. omits to indicate in his dates the centuries. The figures for the latter, however, can be ascertained in the case of the Chronicle by an easy calculation, and will accordingly be supplied within brackets in this translation.

AJITĀPIḌA.

704. Then there arose a terrible fight between Mamma and Utpalaka, in the course of which the current of the Vitastā was stemmed by the [bodies of] killed soldiers.

705. With reference to it the poet S'aṅkuka, who was like a moon over the ocean of learned minds, composed his poem called Bhuvanābhyaṇa ('the rise of the world').

706. There, at the commencement of the battle, the lustre of heroes was taken away by Yaśovarman, Mamma's son, as that of the stars by the sun.

ANANĠĀPIḌA.

707. Then Mamma and the rest overthrew Ajitāpiḍa, and made Ananġāpiḍa, the son of Samgrāmāpiḍa [II.], king.

708. Sukhavarman, the son of Utpala, was hostile to the rule of this [king], as, agitated by violent wrath, he was unable to bear with the power of Mamma.

UTPALĀPIḌA.

709. When Utpalaka died, three years thereafter, he (Sukhavarman) made Utpalāpiḍa, the son of Ajitāpiḍa, king.

710. Though these rulers were like the kings of the full-moon day of the Āśvayuja month, some clever ministers obtained power even under them.

711. Ratna, the king's minister of foreign affairs (śāhadvigrahika), possessed power, [and was able] to erect even at that time the temple of [Viṣṇu] Ratnasvāmīn.

712. Nara, and other merchants who were in possession of spotless horses and owned villages, ruled Dāruābhishāra and the neighbouring regions, setting up [their own] thrones.

705. The moon makes the waters of the ocean rise in joy; hence the simile. Verses of S'aṅkuka are quoted in the anthologies of Vallabhadeva and S'arvagadhara, and his opinion given as that of an authority on a point of poetics in Ullāsa iv. of the Kārya-prakāśa, as indicated by the gloss of A₂; comp. Kāvyapr., Bombay Ed. 1889, p. 89, and Subhāṣitāvalī, p. 127.

710. Allusion is made here to the story told in the Nilamata, 208 sqq., 326 sqq., according to which Kāśmir was occupied in consequence of a curse of Kāśyapa for six months of each year by the Piśācas, who forced the human settlers to retire from the country from the full-moon day of Āśvayuja to that of Caitra; see the abstract of the story given in Report, p. 40. The kings who followed each other in rapid succession are compared to the kings of that legendary age who had to abandon their country each year on the Āśvayuja day.

Connected with this legend is the old custom prescribed for the Āśvayuja day in the Nilamata, 391 sqq. People had to amuse themselves by throwing mud at each other, by indulging in abuse and playing jokes in order to frighten away the Piśācas, who attempt to enter the homes of men at that date. This custom, now entirely forgotten, is referred to by K. as āśvayujigāhī, vii. 1551 (see note), and appears also to have been in the mind of the author of the gloss on our passage. I am, however, unable to make out what the latter meant by cācaryartham and heyirayāh.

It is probable that Alberīnī, India, ii. p. 180, refers to a custom somehow related to that indicated by the Nilamata, when speaking of a festival celebrated on the 15th day of Āśvayuja ['when the moon stands in the last of her stations, Revatī,' i.e. on the Āśvayuja day]. At that festival 'they wrangle with each other and play with animals.' Can the strange name recorded for this festival, 'Puhai,' have anything to do with the Piśācas?

712. uttambya is probably only a clerical error for uttambya. For Dāruābhishāra, see note i. 180.

713. The dynasty of the kings from the Kārkoṭa race was almost destroyed, whereas the family of Uṭpala's descendants obtained great might.

UTPALĀPIṬA.

714. Then Sukhavarman, who by his power had almost raised himself to royal dignity, was killed by his own relative called S'uṣka, out of hatred.

715. Thereupon the minister S'ūra took the part of Avantivarman, the able son of Sukhavarman, and declared him fit for the throne.

716. Ousting Utpalāpiṭa, he made him king in the year [of the Laukika era three thousand nine hundred] thirty-one (A.D. 855/6), to put an end to the subjects' misfortunes.

Avantivarman made king (A.D. 855/6).

717. That success, for which his father and grandfather had struggled in vain, he, the grandson, obtained without effort through his merits [from previous births].

718. The pots which are used for carrying water from the ocean, are for ever engaged in useless toil. But, O wonder, he who was born from one of them (Agastya), has here in sportive play drunk up the whole ocean.

719. After this, King Avantivarman received on his head the fresh water of inauguration, which quickly flowed from the mouth of the golden jug, and the side-glance thrown by Royal Fortune formed his first head-dress.

720. Under the guise of the two ornamental earrings, the moon and the sun seemed to have placed themselves near the king's ears, in order to show [him] the system of government for the newly acquired kingdom, as taught by the kings who were their descendants. And under the guise of his bright regal parasol, the splendour of that lotus seemed to rise over him, which is the seat of the goddess of Fortune (Lakṣmī).

Thus ends the Fourth Taraṅga of the Rājatarāṅga, composed by Kaṭhāna, the son of the illustrious minister of Kaśmīr, Lord Caṇṇaka.

720. All great royal families trace their origin to the sun or moon (sūryavamśa, somavamśa). The latter are represented by the poet as handing over the traditions of these families to the king, who is the first ruler of a new dynasty.

Colophon. After the Colophon the following verse is found in A L:—"During two hundred and sixty years and six months there were seventeen kings of the Kārkoṭa race."

The figure here given for the total length of the reigns in the iv. Taraṅga supposes the attribution of a rule of seven years to Śaṅkagrā- māpīḍa, instead of seven days as indicated by the correct reading in iv. 400. As the assumption of seven years for that reign is against the basis of K's system of chronology (see note iv. 400), we have here clear evidence of these metrical summaries at the end of the several Taraṅgas being later additions, as indicated also by other considerations.

A note inserted by A₃ before the Colophon gives the number of verses as 716, against the 720 found in the text. This is, however, in all probability only an error of reckoning; comp. note on Colophon of the iii. Book.

FIFTH BOOK.

1 May the tongues of the two divine ones (S'iva and Pārvatī) protect you, which in their novel union move in unison, yet each uttering words different in sense if not in sound—(S'iva speaks to Pārvatī :) “In your tresses there is some [undefinable] charm like that of snakes. Look before you, the voice from your throat, as if it were that of the male Kokila [bird], delights the eye of [the snake], which hears through its eye.”—(Pārvatī speaks to S'iva :) “You have some fondness for [using] snakes for the knots [on your body]. Look before you, the eye of [the snake], which hears through its eye, is delighted by the rays of colour [which proceed] from your throat, as if it were that of a male Kokila.”

AVANTIVARMAN
(A.D. 855/8-883).

2. When Avantivarman had obtained the sovereign power, after uprooting his enemies (kaṇṭaka), he made, O wonder, the body of the virtuous feel thrilled (kaṇṭhikā) on account of his [great] deeds.

3. The king and his minister were towards each other both [equally] masters in respect of giving orders, and servants in respect of receiving them.

4. If the king is grateful and of mild disposition, and the minister devoted and free of arrogance, such a connection may at times be found to be lasting, owing to merits [from previous births].

5. The king, who was full of judgment and wisdom, did not lose his memory when he obtained the throne and saw the regal splendour, but inwardly reflected as follows :

6. “Lakṣmī, the mistress of kings, who dallies on the back of her elephant, creates violent desires and spoils the high-minded.”

7. “For whomsoever she has first shown fondness, he is [sure to be] brought into distress by her in the end, just as by a low attachment.”

1. The invocation is addressed, like the *Maṅgala*s of the preceding Books, to S'iva in his form of Ardhanārīkavarṇa. It consists in its first half of a series of puns which permit of the words being understood either as addressed by S'iva to his consort or vice versa. The long gloss of A₁ explains fully the puns and allusions intended by the author. Both meanings of the first line have been given in the above paraphrase. The snakes are supposed to hear through their syas and to be fond of music. Their eyes got contracted in the cold season, and are believed to open again on the first call of the Indian cuckoo or kokila. The throat of S'iva is represented as dark blue, and thus resembling that of the Kokila.

6. mātahgotsaṅgalālita can be rendered either as above or ‘who dallies in the lap of low-born men.’ The author intends the word to be taken both ways.

8. "How could she, who grew up in the ocean in company with the fickle courtesans of heaven (Apsaras), learn the conduct of a [woman faithfully] attached to a single man?"

9. "She, who is devoid of affection, has never followed kings when they had to proceed on the way to the other world, without provisions for the journey or attendants, though she may have been intimately connected [with them] for a long time."

10. "How is it that these kings, when they went to the other world, were not masters of the gold, the supplies, the valuables, and other [property] which they had stored up in their treasure-houses?"

11. "How is it that the kings [who came after them], did not feel ashamed or think of their purity, when they ate from the vessels which the other [kings] had left behind?"

12. "Who does not feel misgivings when he sees the marks of the names of bygone kings on the big silver bowls [resembling] skulls?"

13. "Who could delight in necklaces, cursed and unholy, which have been torn from the neck of the dying [king] when the sling of death had passed over it?"

14. "Who does not feel his heart shrink when he touches those ornaments which former [kings] have left behind, after defiling them in their death struggle with the hot tears of misfortune?"

15. "The goddess of fortune remains ever defiled, even if she proceed close into the midst of the ocean's waters. But when she yields herself to worthy persons, who, on account of their indigence, are [entitled to gifts], just as the fire is to offerings, she becomes purified, like the antelope which cleanses herself in the fire."

16. Reflecting thus, the king had the gold and other [valuables] ground into powder, and distributed this to Brahmans with his own hands as a porridge (karambhaka).

17. When one of the Brahmans, instead of saying, "Well done, O king," in his joy spoke unceremoniously, "Well done, O Avanti," he received [from the king] many handfuls.

15. According to the glosses of A₂, certain animals, called agnisauca, clean their fur-skin by entering the fire. The same story is alluded to in vi. 304, and viii. 3024. Compare Brahmavaivartapur. iv. iv. 153; vi. 70, 99; viii. 24, etc.; see also P. IV., s.v. valmihuddha.

The meaning 'indigence' given by a gloss of A₂ to the word rova cannot be traced in the dictionaries. Possibly the word rova, 'labourer' (P), quoted in N.P.W. from Hemacandra's Parisiṣṭaparvan, may be connected with it.

*16. The gloss of A₂ rightly explains karambhaka as the porridge prepared of mixed rice and beans and called khits in Kā. (khijāṭi in Panjabi), which is still distributed to Brahmans in connection with certain festivals. Comp. iii. 266; viii. 811.

AVANTIVARMAN
(A.D. 855/6-888).

18. The wise Avantivarman gave away the whole treasure in alms, and allowed only the [regal] Cauris and parasol to remain of [that] splendour.

19. The royal dignity was difficult to bear for this king when it was new, on account of the trouble [caused] by his numerous relatives who were possessed of excessive wealth.

20. He defeated his revolted brothers and cousins repeatedly in battle, and thus cleared his kingdom from opponents.

21. Then when he had firmly established his rule, he, full of tender affection, enjoyed the royal wealth by distributing it among his relations and servants.

22. Fond as he was of his family, he bestowed on the wise S'ūravarman, his brother from a different mother, the wide powers of Yuvarāja.

Pious foundations.

23. The latter granted the Agrahāras of Khādhūyā and Hastikarnā, and founded the [temple of Viṣṇu] S'ūravarmasvāmin and a Gokula.

24. He (S'ūravarman), who was accomplished, full of [spiritual] greatness and devoted to pious works, granted the [Agrahāra of] Pañcahastā and built a Maṭha, which was an abode of divine greatness.

25. Thus Samara, [too], another brother of the king, founded for Keśava in his quadruple form a [temple called] Samarasvāmin.

19. On account of the double meaning of the word durjarā, the verse may also be understood as meaning: "The royal dignity of this king could not fade in its freshness, notwithstanding the trouble," etc.

23. The gloss of A, renders Khādhūyā by Dhādākhohā. I am unable to trace either name.

Hastikarnā is placed by the gloss of A, at Tyāghrāsrama-Pāyākāma, i.e. the modern village Tyāghrās situated in the Dachūnpūr Pargana, 75° 10' long, 33° 50' lat., not far from the right bank of the Vitastā. A spring which issues in this village, is still at present known as Hastikarnānūya, and is mentioned by this name in the Pīyāśvaramāh. xi. 182, Amareśvaramāh. i. 9, and Pīrthas. This spring is probably meant also in Haracar. xiv. 43, and Nilamata, 985. The Hastikarnā mentioned by Śrīvara, i. 441, in connection with the Māri stream or Mahāsarī, must be a different locality and in the vicinity of Srinagar. To the latter place perhaps refers vii. 1640.

The position of the S'ūravarmasvāmin temple cannot be ascertained.—The gokula of S'ūravarman is alluded to in vii. 2436. Probably the identical shrine or building is meant in v. 461; viii. 900. The latter passage would place it in the capital. The name gokula, which judging from vii. 2436 must have been the general designation for a certain class of religious edifices, is clearly connected with the famous Gokula, the residence of the young Kṛṣṇa in the Vṛndāvana forest. From vii. 2437, it appears that Gokulas were provided with grazing grounds reserved for kine.

24. Pañcahastā is the modern village of Pānzath in the Divśar Pargana, 75° 13' long, 33° 30' lat. A large spring in its vicinity is held sacred as one of the places where the Vitastā originally came to light. It is mentioned by the name of Pañcahastakanāya in the Nilamata, 255, 908, 925, 1293. Comp. also Haracar. xii. 22. There are no remains now in the neighbourhood which could be identified with the Maṭha referred to in the text.

25. The gloss of A, indicates as the position of this shrine the small village of Somarbug situated near the left bank of the Vitastā in the Yeoh Pargana, 74° 57' long, 34° 2' lat. Close by is the village of Sālyun, the Sālyūnagrāma of the gloss. On a visit paid to Somarbug in Sept., 1891, I was unable to trace any ancient remains above ground except some fine slabs built into a house near the spot where once a bridge led across the river to the village of Pānduchuk. The temple of Samarasvāmin is mentioned again, vii. 1105, in the time of King Harṣa.

For Keśava-Viṣṇu caturātman, see note iv. 601.

26-27. Two sons of a younger brother of S'ūra, called Dhīra and Vinnapa, built under their own names temples, and two other [nephews], who held charge of account-offices (gaṇanāpatī), after having here on earth kept their [spiritual] powers hidden from view by a [guise of] madness, bodily took their places in the most exalted company of S'iva's world.

28-29. The illustrious Mahodaya, who was the chief door-keeper of S'ūra, consecrated the [shrine of Viṣṇu] Mahodayasvāmin, and gave at that temple the post of reciter (vyākhyātṛ) to a teacher called Rāmaṭa, who was famous for his labours on grammatical science.

30. The illustrious Prabhākaravarman, the king's minister, built a temple of Viṣṇu, called Prabhākarasvāmin.

31. Having received at the consecration [of that temple] pearls which were brought to him by his house-parrot and other parrots which came along with it, he constructed a famous parrot-house (? śukāvalī).

32. The minister S'ūra, by honouring learned men with a seat in the [king's] Sabhā, caused learning, whose flow had been interrupted, to descend [again] upon this land.

33. The scholars, who were granted great fortunes and high honours, proceeded to the Sabhā in vehicles (litters) worthy of kings.

34. Muktākhaṇa, S'ivasvāmin, the poet Ānandavardhana and Ratnākara obtained fame during the reign of Avantivarman.

35. In the assembly-hall of the minister S'ūra, the bard Kṛtāmāndūra recited always the following Āryā [verse], in order to remind [his master] of his resolve :

AVANTIVARMAN
(A.D. 855/6-888).

Literary patronage.

28-29. The temple of Mahodayasvāmin is placed by the gloss of A₂ at Maḍavāśrama, which on the evidence of a passage of the Vitastānāh. v. 36, can be identified with the large village of Marhām on the left bank of the Vitasta, 75° 9' long. 33° 50' lat. No remains are now to be found above ground; a sacred spring in the village is visited on the pilgrimage to the Amaranātha Tirtha.

31. It is doubtful what is exactly meant by śukāvalī. It seems to have been a valuable and transportable object, as this same śukāvalī is referred to in viii. 80 as having been carried off by Harṣa, and subsequently presented by Uccala for the adornment of the shrine of Tribhuvanāsvāmin.

34. Two of the names here mentioned are well-known in Kāśmīrian literature. Ānandavardhana is the author of two works yet extant, the Dhvanyāloka, a rhetorical treatise, and the poem Devīśataka. Both of these were commented upon towards the close of the 10th century; comp. Prof. BÜHLER'S Report, p. 65; Kāvya-mālā, i. 101.

Ratnākara is rightly identified by the gloss of A₂ with the author of the great Kāvya called Haraviṣaya, first obtained by Prof. Bühler in Kāśmīr, and since published in the Kāvya-mālā. From the colophon of this work it appears that Ratnākara, or with his full name Rājānaka Ratnākara Yāgiśvara, composed it under King Bṛhaspati (Cippaṭa-Jayāpīḍa), who, according to K.'s statement, iv. 703, died forty-two years before the accession of Avantivarman; comp. Report, pp. 42 sqq. For two smaller compositions of Ratnākara, see Report, p. 66, and Cat. Catalog, p. 491.

Muktākhaṇa appears to be known otherwise only from quotations in two treatises of Kṣemendra (11th century); comp. Cat. Catalog, p. 459. S'ivasvāmin is, perhaps, identical with the poet, verses of whom are given in Kṣemendra's Kaviśaṭṭhābharana and some later anthologies; see Cat. Catalog, p. 654, and Subhāṣit, Introd. p. 129.

AVANTIVABMAN
(A.D. 855/6-863).

36. "This is the time for granting benefits, while fortune, fickle by nature, is present. Why should there be again time for benefits, while misfortune is always imminent?"

37. This [minister], who built many edifices, erected at Sureśvarikṣetra, in honour of S'iva and his consort conjoined, a temple which was to last for ever.

38. The wise [minister], after consecrating the [temple of] S'ureśvara, which was as lofty as his own palace, built the S'ūramathā for the benefit of ascetics.

39. He transferred the watch-station (dhakka), which stood [before] in the locality of Kramavarta, to the fine town called S'ūrapura, which he had built himself.

¶ 37. Durgā is worshipped to this day under the name of Sureśvari ('queen of the gods') on a high crag rising above the village of Iś'bar from the range which encloses the Dal lake on the E. A natural rock on the top of the crag is looked upon as a representation of Durgā's husband. The Sureśvarimāhātmya accounts for the residence of the goddess and her consort at this spot by a legend connected with the killing of the demon Ruru. It also describes in detail the route of the pilgrimage, which begins at certain springs (S'atadhārā, etc.) situated in the immediate vicinity of the village of Iś'bar (comp. note ii. 134).

It is the site of the latter place which is meant by Sureśvarikṣetra in our own passage, vi. 147; Janar. 52, 874; S'riv. i. 426, and by Sureśvari, v. 41; viii. 500, 744, 2314, etc. The locality of Iś'bar is clearly indicated by those passages of Janar. (52) and S'riv. (i. 419, 426) which speak of Sureśvari as situated on the shore of the Dal lake; see also Samayam. ii. 29, where the S'atadhārā spring is mentioned with Sureśvari. The references to it as a place to be sought on the approach of death (see vi. 147; viii. 2344, 2418), show the sanctity attached to it. This is also set forth at great length in the fifth Adhyāya of the S'arvāvatāra.—The name of the Sureśvaritīrtha is found already in the Nīlamata, 1322.

The temple of S'iva and Pārvatī conjoined (śīrayor mīśrayos), i.e. of Ardhanaṛīśvara, is evidently identical with the one which K. mentions, viii. 3365, as standing at Sureśvari in his own time. Neither the position of this shrine, nor that of the temples mentioned in verses 40, 41, can now be traced with certainty, though the numerous carved slabs and sculptured fragments found near the sacred springs and in the walls of the houses of Iś'bar, prove unmistakably the former existence of ancient buildings besides the ruined temple (Īśōvara ?) referred to in the note ii. 134.

I have translated above according to the reading soṇyayasthiti actually found in A. But a comparison of vii. 952; viii. 249, 2401, 3316 sq., where the term vyayasthiti is regularly used in the sense of an 'endowment', in connection with temples, suggests that we ought to read here soṇyayasthiti, 'which was provided with an endowment.'

38. According to the gloss of A., the S'ureśvara temple stood at S'ūrapura: Īlūr'pūr. At the latter locality (see following note) materials belonging to ancient buildings can be traced in the walls of the Moghul Sarai and of a mosque.

The S'ūramathā appears to have been in the capital, comp. vi. 223; vii. 26, and in particular vi. 243. Its exact position is not known.

39. The position of Kramavarta and S'ūrapura, and the meaning of the term dhakka, equivalent to draṅga, has been fully discussed in Note D, iii. 227, where the same localities are mentioned. The site of the watch-station after its transfer to S'ūrapura was traced by me at Īlūr'pūr in Sept., 1891. There is a spot about one and a quarter miles above the present Īlūr'pūr, where the level ground of the valley is reduced to a gorge by rocky spurs projecting from the hill-sides. A local tradition relates that at this spot there once stood an ancient wall and gate, closing the route which leads along the right bank of the Rembyār* river to the Pir Pantāl Pass.

This spot, which is covered by dense fir-forest, is now known by the name of Īlāhi Darwāza, 'the gate of God.' But the father of the present Muqaddam, or village headman, a man of great age, distinctly remembers to have heard in his youth also the designation of Drang, i.e. draṅga. Ancient coins are frequently found in this locality, and some traces of old walls can still be followed through the thick undergrowth which covers the ground.

40. Ratnavardhana, a son of S'ūra, built near the precincts of Suresvarī, a [temple of] S'iva Bhūtesvara, and within the S'ūramāṭha [another] Maṭha.

41. The wife of S'ūra named Kāvyadevī, who was of noble birth, erected at Suresvarī a [shrine of] Saḍāśiva called Kāvyadevīśvara.

42. Avantivarman, who was free from jealousy, granted permanent royal prerogatives to his uterine brothers and to S'ūra and the latter's son.

43. The king, who conformed to the pleasures of his minister as [if it were that] of a deity, bore himself [outwardly] as a worshipper of S'iva, though he was [in reality] from childhood a worshipper of Viṣṇu.

44. At the site called Viśvaikasāra, which procures final beatitude for those who die [there], the king founded the [town of] Avantipura, an abode of abundant enjoyments.

AVANTIVARMAN
(A.D. 855/6-883).

A relic of ancient art is found some 330 yards higher up on the right bank of the stream, where a large rock shows in three richly ornamented niches elegantly carved reliefs representations of temples of the Kāśmīrian style. Comp. my Notes on the Pir Panāḥ Route, J.A.S.B., 1895, p. 385.

According to the surviving tradition, Vānt-pūr, still a busy little place and the seat of a customs-station, was once a large town, and occupied the level ground of the valley as far as Pāl-pāvan, a distance of nearly three miles, in the direction towards S'ūpiyan. Remains of deserted habitations can in fact be traced on both banks of the river over a considerable stretch of ground below the present village.

40. By Suresvariprāṅganataḥ probably the site of the village of Īśhar on the Dal is meant; comp. note v. 37. The lofty situation of the crag on which Suresvarī is actually worshipped (more than 3000 feet above the level of the Dal), and the steepness of the rugged slopes leading up to it, preclude the thought of any building having ever been erected on it or in its immediate vicinity.

Regarding the original shrine at which S'iva was worshipped under the name of Bhūtesvara, see note i. 107. The relation between Ratnavardhana's temple and the former corresponds to that between the Jyestharudra, founded by Aśoka near Srinagar and the more ancient Linga of that name at Buth'sēr; comp. notes i. 113 and i. 124 (C).

41. Saḍāśiva is a name of S'iva.

✓ 44-45. The name of Avantipura is preserved in that of the present village of Vānt-pūr, situated on the right bank of the Vitasta in the Vular Pargana, 75° 4' long. 33° 55' lat. Its ruined temples have already attracted the attention of early European travellers; see Fosterer, Journey from Bengal to England, ii.

p. 9, and Moorecroft, Travels, ii. p. 244. In his note on the latter account, Prof. Wilson has correctly indicated the identity of the place with the Avantipura of the Chronicle. This identification is well-known too to the tradition of the Srinagar Pandits. It is fully borne out by the topographical indications furnished by the numerous passages of the Chronicle in which Avantipura is subsequently mentioned (comp. e.g. vii. 1366; viii. 970, 1144, 1474, 1503; S'iv. i. 338).

The remains at Vānt-pūr consist chiefly of two ruined temples which have been fully described by CUNNINGHAM, J.A.S.B., 1848, pp. 275 sqq., and COLE, Anc. Build., pp. 25 sqq.

Cunningham has proposed to identify the ruined temple situated in the village itself with K.'s Avantisvāmin, and the larger one, which lies about half a mile to the N.W. and close to the hamlet of Jambūār, with the temple of Avantisvara, built by Avantivarman after his accession. The central shrines of both temples have been entirely overturned, and form now only confused piles of stones. It is thus impossible to test accurately C.'s assumption, which was based mainly on the different size of the two structures. Nor have the excavations which Bishop Cowie carried on in 1865 in the courtyard of the smaller temple, brought to light any evidence bearing on this point; comp. J.A.S.B., 1865, pp. 121 sqq.

In Kaśā's reign (A.D. 1081-1089), the temple of Avantisvāmin was deprived of the villages which formed its endowments (vii. 570). Its courtyard served as a fortification when shortly after the accession of King Jayasinha (A.D. 1128), Bhāsa, a commander of the royal troops, was besieged at Avantipura by the rebel Ḍamaras of the Holāḍa (Vular) district; see viii. 1420 eq.

That the town of Avantipura remained a

ĀYANTIVARMAN
(A.D. 855/6-888).

45. Having built there, before his accession to the throne, the [shrine of Viṣṇu] Avantisvāmin, that wise [king], after obtaining sovereign power, erected then the [temple of Ś'iva] Avantisvara.

46. This king had at the [shrines of] Tripureśvara, Bhūteśa and Vijayekā, three pedestals made with silver conduits for the bathing water (snānadroṇā).

place of importance long after the time of its founder, is shown by the numerous references made to it by K. and in the later Chronicles; comp. Index and Jonar. 321, 330 sq., 335, 863; S'riv. i. 338; iii. 42; also Samayam. ii. 76. The extent of the town is attested by the remains of ruined buildings which can be traced along the slopes of the hill-range rising to the E. of the present Vantpūr for a distance of over two miles.

It is not clear on what grounds the gloss of A. identifies 'the site (keetra) of Viśvaikaśāra' mentioned in the text with the village of Bhārasa, i.e. the modern Bāras (not marked on maps), which is situated about three miles below Vantpūr on the right bank of the Vitastā opposite to Gūrpūr. At Bāras the only ancient remains I could trace on a visit paid in Sept., 1891, was a fine Liṅga over five feet in height, standing near a small Nāga called Rudragāṇḍa, which is visited by the pilgrims to Amaranātha.

46. Liṅgas and images of gods were in Kāśmīrian temples always placed on ornamental stone pedestals (pīṭha or bhadrapiṭha), many of which can yet be seen in situ in the temple-ruins of Buth'sēr (Bhūteśa), Narastān, Paṭṭan, etc. For the purpose of carrying off the water with which the Liṅgas and images have daily to be bathed (comp. ii. 126), such pedestals are provided with a conduit sunk into their upper surface and ending generally in a sculptured waterspout.

§ The position of the sacred site of Tripureśvara (or Tripureśa) can be fixed with great probability near the modern village of Triphar. The latter lies circ. 74° 59' long. 34° 9' lat. in the valley opening to the E. from the N.E. corner of the Ḍal, and at a distance of about three miles from the latter. Apart from the name Triphar, which evidently stands in the same relation to Tripureśvara as Koṭhēr < Kapateśvara, Jyēṭhēr < Jyēṭheśvara, Amburhēr < Amarēśvara, Krambhār < Kambateśvara (vi. 261), this identification is supported by the following evidence.

The iv. Adhyāya of the S'arvātātāra contains a Mahātmya of Ś'iva Jyēṭhanātha or Jyēṭheśvara as worshipped 'sthāne Tripureśvara-sahjāke.' This locality, which, according to the legend related in that text, took its name from the demon Tripara destroyed there by Ś'iva, is described as situated close to Mount Mahādeva, and on the bank of the Mahāsarīt river. The former is certainly the peak still known by that name (Mahadeo of the maps) which rises immediately to the east of Triphar, and is to this present day the object of a pilgrimage. Of the name Mahāsarīt, we have already shown in note ii. 339-349 that it was the ancient designation of the stream which forms the outflow of the Ḍal, and is now called Mār.

We are the more justified in assuming that the same name was given also to the main feeder of the Ḍal, i.e. the 'Arrah' river of the map on which Triphar lies, as the S'arvātātāra distinctly mentions (iv. 120) as the source of the Mahāsarīt the lake Mahāsaras, i.e. the Mār Sar, from which that river actually takes its origin. [I have not been able to trace any generally known and distinctive name of this river. 'Arrah' is probably only the Kā. āṛ, 'mountain-stream.']

We are led to the same locality by the instructive passage, S'riv. i. 421, which in the course of a graphic description of the Ḍal lake mentions the Tilaprassthā river as flowing into it from Tripureśvara. The name Tilaprassthā can be shown by passages in the S'arv. (iv. 55, 61), Sureśvarīmāh. and Tirthas. to be the old appellation of that branch of the 'Arrah' river which separates a short distance below Triphar from the 'Shālimār' branch, and taking a more westerly course, empties itself into the Ḍal under the name of Tēlāl Nāla.

Triphar lies at the N.E. foot of the hill-range on which the Sureśvarībīrtha (see note v. 37) is situated. Accordingly we find Tripureśa referred to in the Nilamata, 1828, between the sacred sites of Sureśvari and Mount Mahādeva. The gloss written on this passage in one of my MSS. distinctly renders Tripureśa by 'Triphir'. This identification must have been known also to P. Sāhibrām, as he mentions in his Tirthas., in connection with the Tirthas around the Ḍal, a pilgrimage to 'the Gaṅgā at the village of Tripureśvara.' [According to the statement of one of the Purohitas at lā'gar, a small stream which joins the 'Arrah' near Triphar from the slopes of Mount Mahādeva, is locally known as 'Gaṅgā.']—Finally, it may be mentioned that the old Vijayēśvarāmāh. xi. 112, distinctly 47. S'ūra, too, saw in the king his chief deity, to please whom he ought to sacrifice even religion, life, or a son.

AVANTIVARMAN
(A.D. 855/6-883).

48-49. Thus, on one occasion when the king came to worship [S'iva] Bhūteśvara, after having presented on his own behalf sacrificial apparatus which was in keeping with his royal dignity, he noticed that the temple-priests had placed on the base of the god's [image], as an offering, a wild-growing vegetable of bitter taste called Utpalāsūka.

S'ūra's judgment at Bhūteśvara.

50. When, thereupon, the king asked the local [priests] the reason for such an offering, they threw themselves on the ground and spoke with hands folded:

51. "In the Lahura district, O king, there lives a powerful Dāmara, Dhanva by name, who is attached to the minister S'ūra, and [treated by him] like a son."

52. "This [Dāmara], whose power is unrestrained, has taken away the villages [belonging to the shrine], and thus we [can] offer to Bhūteśa only this oblation."

53. Thereon the king left the worship under the pretence of indisposition caused by sudden colic, and went outside, making it [appear] as if he had not heard what he had heard.

speaks of Tripureśa as worshipped 'Sureśvaram.'

Though no longer known to the Brahmans of Kāśmīr as a place of pilgrimage, Tripureśvara must have been considered in old days a site of great sanctity. K. mentions repeatedly the foundation of sacred buildings and the grant of endowments at Tripureśvara (see vii. 151, 526, 956). He also speaks of it, v. 123, as the holy site to which King Avantivarman retired on the approach of death. From vi. 135 we may conclude that it was a favourite resort for mendicants, and this it apparently continued to be in Muhammadan times, as S'rin. i. 402 refers to King Zaim-ul-'abidin having founded there a perpetual endowment for the feeding of beggars (annasattra, comp. note i. 347).

48-49. It has been shown above, in note i. 107, that the ancient shrine of S'iva Bhūteśa must be looked for among the ruined temples of Buth'sēr at the foot of Mount Haramukh. The Purohitas of the shrine wish to demonstrate to the king the poverty to which they are reduced, by placing before the image, instead of proper offerings, leaves of the Utpalāsūka plant, i.e. a present of no value. The plant, now known by the name of upalhākḥ (the phonetic derivative of Skr. Utpalāsūka), forms still one of the commonest vegetables of the Kāśmīrī cuisine. It grows abundantly on the mountain-slopes at an elevation of 7000-11,000', and its leaves are collected in large quantities by the villagers.

When examining the ruins of Buth'sēr in August, 1891, I found the Upalhākḥ growing plentifully in the midst of the luxuriant forest vegetation in which the temples were then embedded. The bitter taste of the leaves is removed by repeated boiling. According to traditional belief, the Upalhākḥ formed the diet of the ancient Rsis in the forest.

51. The name of Lahara survives in the designation of the modern district Lār, which comprises the whole of the territory drained by the Sind and its tributaries. This identification is correctly indicated by the gloss of A, on our passage, and is fully proved by the topographical evidence contained in the following passages:—vii. 911, 1300 sq.; viii. 437, 729, 793, 1128 sqq.; Jonar. 167 sq.; S'rin. v. 136; Fourth Chron. 226; Lokapr. ii. (Lahara-viṣaye Gāndhārvabale, i.e. Gāndhār on the Sind river).

In a few instances (see vii. 965; viii. 914), the extant text of the Chronicle hides the name Lokara (comp. Note E, iv. 177) under the form Lahara—a clerical error easily explained by the frequent occurrence of both names. For the opposite error, see viii. 86.

Regarding the term Dāmara, see Note G, iv. 343.

AYANTIVARMA
(A.D. 856/8-888).

54. S'ūra, who knew that there was a cause for his lord's departure from the worship, and for the [apparently] accidental oolio, followed up the matter.

55. Having ascertained the truth, he, full of anger, went quickly from there to the temple of Bhairava, who, together with a 'circle of the Mothers' (mātṛcalāra), is [worshipped] close to Bhūteśa.

56. He ordered off the crowd of people, and keeping [only] a few attendants, sent from there messenger after messenger to bring up Dhanva.

57. When that fierce [Dāmara] came at last before S'ūra, he made the earth shake with the tramp of his host of foot-soldiers, and did not bend his back.

58. As soon as he had entered, armed men, at the order of S'ūra, cut off his head while he was yet alive, in front of [the image of] Bhairava.

59. The wise S'ūra, who had [thus] removed the king's displeasure, went outside after having the body, from which the blood was pouring forth, thrown into the tank close by.

55-59. The indications furnished by this passage are of considerable antiquarian interest, as they enable us to identify with some accuracy the principal buildings among the ruined temples of Buthśēr. Of these we have already shown (see note i. 107) that they belong to the sacred site of S'iva Bhūteśvara so often mentioned in the Chronicle.

The temples, as will be seen from the plans attached to Bishop Cowie's careful notes, I.A.S.B., 1896, pp. 101-109, form two distinct groups. The latter have separate enclosing walls, and are situated at a distance of about 200 yards from each other. Just beyond the enclosure of the second or eastern group, and at its N.E. corner, is a large oblong tank (7 on Bishop Cowie's plan), lined with ancient slabs and filled with the limpid water of a spring. This spring is now known by the name of Nārān Nāg, but has been shown above (see note i. 123) to be identical with the Soḍaratīrtha of the Nīlamata and of K. As there is no other tank or pool anywhere near the site of Buthśēr, we must recognize in the basin of the Nārān Nāg the pond close by (āsanne sarasī) of v. 59, into which Dhanva's decapitated body was thrown.

About twenty yards to the W. of the tank, and facing the N. side of the stone wall which encloses the second group of temples, there are the ruins of a small solitary temple, marked X on the plan. They are now almost buried by the soil washed down from the hill-side, which rises immediately behind them. The close proximity of this temple to the tank, and its isolated position outside the temple-groups, makes it probable that we have in it the remains of the shrine of Bhairava at which Dhanva's execution took place. As the worship of Bhairava is connected with bloody sacrifices, his shrines are also nowadays generally kept at some distance from those of other deities.

If this identification is correct, we may safely recognize in the central and principal temple of the second group, which alone is a building of imposing dimensions (see COLA, Anc. Build., plan 6, and plates 6 and 7), the shrine dedicated to S'iva Bhūteśa. Our passage shows that this shrine was situated in the immediate vicinity of the Bhairava temple. We have further to conclude that the other group of temples, situated to the W. of the one just mentioned, was erected in honour of S'iva Jyēṣṭheśa. Of the ancient Līṅga known by this name, we have already shown (see note i. 118) that it was worshipped in the neighbourhood of Bhūteśa's shrine.

This group, too, consists of one large central temple, probably identical with the one erected by King Lalitāditya, according to iv. 190, and a number of smaller cellas around it. The base of a colossal Līṅga which Bishop Cowie found at the S.W. corner of the enclosure of this temple-group, belonged, perhaps, to the very emblem of Jyēṣṭheśa.

Kaḥaṇa has taken care to let us know of the frequent visits which his father Cappaka had paid to the shrines of Nandikētra, i.e. Buthśēr, and the rich endowments he had made there; comp. vii. 954; viii. 2965. We are, therefore, justified in assuming that K. himself was thoroughly acquainted with this sacred site, and that the information he gives

60. When the lord of the earth heard that the minister had decapitated that [Dāmara, whom he loved] as if he were his own son, his anger was appeased, and he felt as it were embarrassed.

AVANTIVARMAN
(A.D. 855/6-888).

61. Śūra then inquired after the health of the king, and when the latter replied that he felt no pains, made him rise from his couch and complete the worship.

62. In this way that [minister], who knew always the right thing to do, rendered again and again assistance to the king, without even speaking [to him about it], and at the risk of his own life.

63. Such a king and such a minister, whose [relations] were never disfigured by the blemish of mutual hatred, have not otherwise been seen or heard of.

64. For ten years in the reign of Avantivarman the killing of all living creatures was prohibited, just as [it was in that] of the illustrious Meghavāhana.

65. At that time the shadfish [pāṭhīnu] left the cold water without fear, and coming to the river-banks sunned their backs in the autumn sun.

66. In the time of Avantivarman, the illustrious Bhaṭṭa Kallaṭa and other holy men (śiddhas) descended to the earth for the benefit of the people.

67. As the lives of these would be [too] long to tell, some purifying story of one [of them at least] shall be related here as an episode.

68. This country [of Kāśmīr] always [before] gave small produce, as it was [inable to be] flooded by the waters of the Mahāpadma lake, and was intersected by [many] streams.

Story of Suzga.

69. When then the waters had been drained off somewhat, through the great exertions of King Lalitāditya, it became productive to a small extent.

70. Under the feeble kings who succeeded after the death of Jayāpīḍu, the country was again, just [as before], overtaken by disastrous floods.

71. In the famine-stricken land one Khāri of rice (dhānya) was bought for ten hundred and fifty Dinnūras.

us as to the relative position of the several shrines, is exact in its details.

Regarding mātṛcakra, see note i. 122.

65. The fish called pāṭhīna is, according to P.W., a kind of shadfish, Silurus Pelorius or Silurus boalis Ham. It is permitted as food by the Smṛtis (comp. Yājñavalkya, i. 178), and is particularly recommended for Śrāddha-offerings (Manu, v. 16). The Kāśmīri Paṇḍits give this name to the Rāmṛgāḥ, a kind of small fish generally eaten at Śrāddhas. Mr. Lawrence, Valley, p. 158, records of it that it retires to the lakes and morasses when the water becomes cold.

66. Bhaṭṭa Kallaṭa is known to us as the pupil of Vasugupta, the founder of the Spandaśāstra branch of Kāśmīrian Śaiva philosophy. His commentary, called Spandasarvasva, on his teacher's Spandakārikās, is still extant; comp. Prof. BÜHLER's Report, pp. 78 sq., clxv. He also appears to have written another exegetical work on the Ś'iva-sūtras of Vasugupta; comp. Report, p. clxviii.; HALL, Index to a Bibliography of Ind. Philos. Systems, p. 197, and STRIN, Catal. of Jammu MSS., p. 361.

68. Regarding the Mahāpadma lake or Vulur, see note iv. 598.

71. The ancient measure of the khāri, mentioned already in a hymn of the R̥gveda

AVANTIVARMAN
(A.D. 865/8-888).

72. Then through the merits of Avantivarman there descended to the earth the Lord of Food (annapati) himself, [in the person of] the illustrious Suyya, to give fresh life to the people.

73. The origin of this wise man was not known, and his deeds, which made the world wonder, proved clearly that though [he appeared] in the fourth period (Yuga), he was not born from a [woman's] womb.

74. Once a Candāla woman, Suyyā by name, found when sweeping up a dust-heap on the road, a fresh earthen vessel fitted with a cover.

75. Raising the cover, she saw lying in it a babe, which had eyes like lotus-leaves, and was sucking its fingers.

76. "Some unfortunate mother must have exposed this lovely [boy]." Thus she thought in her mind, and then from tenderness her breasts gave milk.

77. Without defiling the child by her touch, she arranged for his keep in the house of a S'ūdra-nurse, and brought him up.

78. Taking the name of Suyya, he grew into an intelligent [youth], and having learned his letters, became a teacher of small boys in the house of some householder.

(iv. 32. 17), and known to Pāṇini, has remained to the present day the standard of weight in Kāśmīr. It is called khār in Kā., but has been known in the official language for centuries past by the Persian designation of khawvār (for khār-bār*, 'ass's load.') The latter term, evidently substituted by a kind of popular etymology for the Kā. one, is found already in Abu-l-Faḡl's account (Ain-i Akh., ii. p. 388). In the Lokaprakāśa the measure is still named as khārī or khārīkā.

The division and weight of the Khār does not appear to have changed since the time of Akbar, as the table of weights in actual use, as given by Mr. LAWRENCE, Valley, p. 243, agrees with the statements recorded by Abu-l-Faḡl (l.c.) and MOORHOFF, Travels, ii. p. 135, in making the Khār (Kharwār) the equivalent of 1920 Pals (Skr. pala). Taking the latter measure as equal to 3½ Toles, the Khār corresponds to 177¼ lbs. avoirdupois (Lawrence). The Khār is divided into 16 Trakhs, the Trakh again into 4 Manuths (Abu-l-Faḡl's Man) of 80 Pals each, or into 8 Sērs of 20 Pals.

Owing to the ancient custom, until quite recently in force in Kāśmīr, of estimating and paying salaries, etc., in grain instead of cash, the term Khār came to be used also as the designation of a monetary value. The Lokaprakāśa accordingly speaks in several passages (ii. Pr.) of a dinnārakhārī or suvarṇakhārīkā, corresponding to Abu-l-Faḡl's distinction between the 'Kharwār in kind' and the 'Kharwār in money' (khawvār-i naḡdī). Similarly the term Khar has been applied, evidently since early times, to designate that area of land under rice-cultivation which is supposed to require a Khār's weight of rice-seed; comp. bhīmīkhārī in Lokapr. ii. with khārīkā, Pāṇini, v. i. 45, and LAWRENCE, Valley, p. 243.

In v. 118 sq. K. gives 200 Dinnāras as the price of a Khārī of rice for years of good harvest previous to Suyya's drainage operations, and 36 Dinnāras as the reduced price after the execution of the latter. Subsequently we read, vii. 1220, of 500 Dinnāras being paid for a Khārī in the reign of Harṣa during a famine. For prices at later famines see S'riv. i. 202 and Fourth Chron. 347, where 1500 and even 10,000 Dinnāras are mentioned, respectively.

Regarding the currency calculated in Dinnāras, and the probable value of the amounts named, see Note H, iv. 495.

72. Annapati seems to be the name of a god, personifying good harvests. Comp. the description of a famine, Fourth Chron. 355 sqq., where the 'Lord of food' (annāyapa, annādhipa) is represented as fighting against the demon Durbhikṣa (famine). According to P. Govind Kaul, old songs and proverbs of Kāśmīr peasants still personify the good harvest under the name of Suchirāsa, i.e. Skr. Subhikṣarāja*.

79. As he endeared himself to the virtuous by [keeping the] observances in regard to fasts, bathings and the like, and showed a brilliant intellect, men of senso kept around him in assemblies.

80. When these were complaining in their conversation of the flood calamity, he said: "I have got the knowledge [for preventing it]. But what can I do without means?"

81. When the king heard through his spies that he was saying these words persistently, as if he were deranged in mind, he was surprised.

82. The king had him then brought up and questioned him about his saying. He calmly replied also in the royal presence: "I have got the knowledge," etc.

83. Thereupon the lord of the earth, though his courtiers declared him (Suyya) crazy, was anxious to test [that] knowledge, and placed his own treasures at his disposal.

84. He took many pots [full] of money (dinnāra) from the treasury, and embarking on a boat, proceeded in haste to Maḍavarāja. Suyya's operations on the Vitastā.

85. After dropping there a pot [full] of money, at a village called Nandaka, which was submerged in the flood, he hurriedly turned back.

86. Though the councillors said: "That [Suyya] is surely only a madman," the king, when he heard this account, became interested in watching the end of these [proceedings].

87. On reaching in Kramarāja the locality called Yakṣadara, he threw with both hands money (dinnāra) into the water.

84. For Maḍavarāja, the modern Marāz, see note ii. 15.

85. The site of the Nandaka village, mentioned again in v. 108, cannot be fixed with certainty. With this name may possibly be connected that of the old Nandī canal which takes the water of the Vesāu river above the village of Kaimuk, and serves for the irrigation of the narrow strip of land separating the Vesāu and Vitastā near Anantnag and Vijābrūr. All the villages situated between the two rivers lie very low, and are protected against frequent inundation only by high embankments.

87. For Kramarāja, the present Kamrūz, see note ii. 15.

The position of Yakṣadara can be fixed, thanks to the gloss of A₁, which renders the name by Dyāragala. The latter name, in the form Dyār-gul, is applied to the present day to a rocky spur which runs down to the bed of the Vitastā, close to the village of Khād-nyār (71° 22' long. 34° 11' lat.) and about three miles below Varāhamūla. It is the last projection of a mountain-range which descends to the S.E. from the Kājī Nag Peaks.

Through a narrow cut or saddle in this spur, leads the road which forms the old line of communication on the right bank of the Vitastā between Varāhamūla and Muzaffarābad. A ledge of rocks stretches across the bed of the river just at the foot of the Dyār-gul ridge, and forms the first serious rapid of the Vitastā (marked on the Survey map). Beyond it boats cannot descend. It is evident that operations carried on with the object of deepening the bed of the river in this locality, and further up in the gorge, between Khād-nyār and Varāhamūla, would have a marked effect in lowering the water-level of the Vitastā throughout the Valley. It is, therefore, probable that the tradition reproduced by K. is right in indicating Yakṣadara: Dyār-gul as the extreme point of Suyya's operations in the lower course of the river.

For Yakṣadara° of A we find in L Yakṣadharā°. The form adopted in the text is the one supposed by the etymology of the name,

AVANTIVARMAN
(A.D. 855/6-888).

88-89. There, where the rocks which had rolled down from the mountains lining both river banks had compressed the Vitastā and made its waters turn backwards [in whirls], the famine-stricken villagers then searched for the money (dinnāra), dragged out the rocks from the river, and [thus] cleared the [bed of the] Vitastā.

90. After he had in this manner artfully drained off that water for two or three days, he had the Vitastā dammed up in one place by workmen.

91. The whole river, which Nīla produced, was blocked up by Suyya for seven days by the construction of a stone dam, a wonderful work.

92. After having the river bed cleared at the bottom, and stone walls constructed to protect [it] against rocks which might roll down, he removed the dam.

93. Then the [stream], flowing to the ocean, set out on its course in haste, as if eagerly longing for the sea after its detention.

94. When the water left it the land was covered with mud and with wriggling fishes, and thus resembled the [night] sky, which, when free from clouds, displays black darkness and the stars.

95. Wherever he knew inundation-breaches [to occur] during disastrous floods, there he constructed new beds for the Vitastā.

96. The river, with its numerous great channels branching off from the original channel, appeared like a black female serpent, which has numerous hoods resting on one body.

Change of junction of Sindhu and Vitastā.

97-98. The two great rivers, the Sindhu and Vitastā, which formerly met near the [temple of Viṣṇu] Vainyavāmin, flowing to the left and right of Trigrāmī [respectively], have to this day in the vicinity of the city (S'rinagara) their confluence which Suyya first planned, and which will last to the end of the world.

99-100. On the two banks of the original (?) confluence there stood the [temples of] Viṣṇuvāmin and Vainyavāmin, situated in Phalapura and Pari-

'the demon's cleft.' This designation evidently refers to the remarkable cutting in the spur above mentioned. To -dara corresponds also the second part of the modern name -gul, which in Kā. means 'opening, aperture, entrance.' With it may be compared the Pahāri word gāl, which is a frequent designation of mountain passes, i.e. Chotiāli, Cōrgali on the Pir Panthāl range. Both gul and gāl are probably derived from Skr. gala, 'throat, neck'; comp. also the local name Durgālikā, ii. 4.

It seems probable that the first part of the modern name has a connection with Kā.'s story.

Dyār- means 'money' in Kā. and is the equivalent of Skr. dinnāra (see Note II, iv. 495). On a visit paid in September, 1892, to Dyār-gul and the gorge below Varāhamūla, I was not able to trace any tradition relating to Suyya's works in this locality. For descriptions of this defile see MOORCORFF, Travels, p. 281; VIGNE, Travels, ii. pp. 175 sqq.

91. The Vitastā is supposed to have its source in the Nīlanāga; see note i. 28.

97-100. The interpretation of these verses, as well as the topographical details referred to in them, have been fully discussed in Note I in Appendix.

hāsapura [respectively]; whereas on the bank of the present [confluence], which has got to the vicinity of Sundarābhavana, [there stands the temple of] Ḥṛṣikeśa Yogaśāyīn ('Viṣṇu merged in mental abstraction'), the object of Sūrya's worship.

AVANTIVARMAN
(A.D. 855/6-893).

101. To this day even there are seen, growing on the banks of the former river beds, old trees which bear the marks of the boat ropes fastened [to them] by the Niṣādas.

102. He made the different streams, with their waves which are [like] the quivering tongues [of snakes], move about according to his will, just as a conjurer [does with] the snakes.

103. After constructing stone embankments for seven Yojanas along the Vitastā, he dammed in the waters of the Mahāpadma lake.

104. Trained by him, the Vitastā starts rapidly on her way from the basin of the Mahāpadma lake, like an arrow from the bow.

105. Having thus raised the land from the water, like [another] primeval boar (Viṣṇu), he founded various villages, which were filled with a multitude of people.

106. Keeping out the water by means of [circular] dykes, he gave to these villages the appearance of round bowls (kuṇḍa). [Hence] the people called these [villages], which are amply provided with all [kinds of] food stuffs, by the name of Kuṇḍala.

107. Even at the present day the rivers, when low in the autumn, display multitudes of pales, which stick out, appearing like posts [used] for the tying up of water-elephants (jalebha) in rut.

101. The term Niṣāda is generally applied to wild aboriginal tribes living by hunting and fishing. Here evidently the boatmen of the Valley are meant (Kā. hānṛ). These occupy to this day a very low position in the social scale, ranking considerably below the ordinary cultivator. Fishing plays a great part in the Hānṛ's livelihood; comp. LAWRENCE, Valley, p. 313.

103. Compare regarding the Yojana, note i. 261. K. does not state clearly from where the distance of seven Yojanas is to be measured, but the subsequent mention of the damming-in of the Vulur suggests that he refers to the length of the embankments constructed along the Vitastā in its course above the Vulur. This assumption is confirmed by the actual length of this portion of the river course. It is estimated by DEW, Jammu, p. 163, at fifty-four miles, between the Vulur and Kanabal, the highest navigable point on the river. K.'s seven Yojanas may be reckoned approximately as the equivalent of forty-two miles, which seems a sufficiently close approach to the above estimate.

106. Many of the villages situated in the marshy tract to the S. of the Vulur lake are enclosed by artificial embankments, and correspond in shape to the above description. Two of these villages, Uṭṭakundāl and Marakundāl, which are situated close together near the left bank of the Vitastā, at about 74° 40' long. 34° 15' lat., have preserved to this day in their names the designation kuṇḍala referred to by K. For Sūryakuṇḍala, see note v. 120. A Jainakuṇḍala on the bank of the Vulur is mentioned by JONAR. 964. The word kuṇḍāl, from Skr. kuṇḍala, 'ring,' is still used in Kā. as the designation of the round earthenware bowl placed in the kāṅṛ (kāṅ(hāṅārīkā); see regarding the latter Ind. Ant., xiv. pp. 285 sqq.; xv. p. 67.

AVANTIVARMAN
(A.D. 855/6-883).

Suyya's irrigation system.

108. The pot full of money, which he had dropped in an unfathomable depth of water, was found in the midst of the dry land when [the village of] Nandaka emerged from the waters.

109. After examining the different classes of land, he procured a supply of river water for the villages, which thus were no [longer] dependent only on the rainfall.

110-112. After watering all village [lands], he took from [each] village [some] soil, and ascertained, by [observing] the time it took to dry up, the period within which irrigation would be required [for each soil, respectively]. He [then] arranged [accordingly] on a permanent basis for the size and distribution of the watercourse for each village, and by [using for irrigation] the Anūlā and other streams, embellished all regions with an abundance of irrigated fields which were distinguished for excellent produce.

113. Neither Kaśyapa nor Samkarṣaṇa (Balabhadra) bestowed those benefits which the virtuous Suyya produced with ease in that land.

108. The correct reading ānnārabhāṇṣam aujñāt sa for A. °bhāṇḍān au° is found in L; comp. v. 86.

109-112. For the cultivation of rice, which has always been the staple produce of this Valley, irrigation is indispensable. We accordingly find the cultivated area, as it slopes down from the foot of the mountains towards the Vitastā or towards its tributaries in the side valleys, intersected by a network of irrigation channels, large and small. The system by which, at present, the water is taken off from the mountain streams at certain points of their course, and the arrangements for conducting and distributing it, have been carefully described by Mr. LAWRENCE, Valley, pp. 323 sq. Many of the main channels will be found marked on the Survey maps, e.g. along the lower course of the Lid'ar, Ar'pat, Sind, and other streams.

The system of irrigation must have been even more extensive in former times, when the population was greater. Much land which is now allowed to lie waste on the mountain slopes, on the Uḍar plateaus and in the low-lying ground near the marshes, was then under cultivation. This is shown by the number of old irrigation-cuts which once brought the water of the melting snows from high alpine Marys, but have long ago been abandoned. Such I could trace in some instances, e.g. on the Toṣmaidan and on Grāt'vath (between the Vnlur and Sind Valley), at an altitude of over 11,000 feet.—Old canals serving irrigation purposes have already been mentioned in the Sam'aman' Kōl (Suvarṇaman'ikulyā), i. 97, and Nṛmūlī, note v. 85.

I am unable to identify the stream specifically mentioned in our passage, or even to state with certainty its name. If the words anākāra cānūlādyaūbhīḥ contain the particle ca, the form of the name would be Anūlā, as shown in the translation, or Anūlā. But the copulative particle is not necessarily required for the construction of the Tilaka. Hence the name could be taken as Cānūlā. The latter form actually occurs in a list of Kāśmīr river names as given by that version of the Vitastāmāh. which purports to be taken from the Ādipurāṇa (see Poona MS., No. 88, Coll. 1875-76, and my own MS., No. 109). This evidence, however, is itself not certain, as the Nilamata, in which the identical list recurs with slight variations (1862 sqq.), shows in all MSS. accessible to me the form Samūlā. [A third text, which reproduces the passage, the Varāhaśeṣtramāh., No. 85 of the Poona MSS., Collection 1875-76, gives the name as Sasralā. This form is easily explained as a graphical error for Samūlā.]

113. Regarding the share of Kaśyapa in the desiccation of the Satīśaras, whereby Kāśmīr was produced, see note i. 27. The Nilamata, 165 sqq., attributes the draining to Ananta (i.e. Śeṣa). As he is related to have struck the mountains with the plough (hala), which is the characteristic weapon of Balabhadra, it is clear that the latter is meant. The Purāṇas consider Balabhadra or Samkarṣaṇa an epiphany of Śeṣa; compare Viṣṇu Pur., ii. p. 211; v. p. 12.

114-115. Suyya, who possessed accumulated religious merits, [achieved] in a single birth that holy work which Viṣṇu accomplished in four incarnations, viz. the raising of the earth from the water, the granting of it to worthy Brahmans, the construction of stone dykes in the water, and the subjugation of the [Nāga] Kāliya.

116-117. There, where previously from the beginning of things the purchase price of a Khārī of rice was two hundred Dinnāras in times of great abundance, in that very land of Kaśmīr henceforth—O wonder!—the Khārī of rice came to be bought for thirty-six Dinnāras.

118. On the bank of the Vitastā, where she leaves the waters of the Mahāpadma [lake], he built a town resembling heaven, which bore his own name.

119. On the lake reaching to the brink of the horizon, he established by his own authority a prohibition against the killing of fish and birds, which was to last till the end of the world.

114-115. The incarnations of Viṣṇu as Varāha, Parasurāma, Rāmacandra, and Kṛṣṇa, are alluded to. In the first, the god in the form of a boar raised the earth from the bottom of the sea. In the second, he exterminated the Kṣattriyas and gave the earth to the Brahmans. In the third, he crossed with his army to the island of Lankā on the famous stone bridge which Hanumat and the monkeys constructed. His victory over the Nāga Kāliya in the fourth incarnation is compared with the damming-in of the Nāga Mahāpadma, i.e. the Vulur. Comp. Viṣṇu Pur., i. p. 61; iv. 23; iii. p. 317; iv. 246 sqq.

With reference to the last comparison, it must be noted that a legend recorded by Jonar. 933, directly identifies the Mahāpadma Nāga inhabiting the Vulur with the Kāliya Nāga. The same story is known to the Dhyanēśvarāmāh., which speaks in verse 33 of Kāliya as worshipped in the Ullasaras or Vulur.

116-117. Jonar. 876 alludes to the subhikṣa created by Suyya.

118. The town built by Suyya, and called after him Suyyapura (see gloss of A.), is undoubtedly the modern Sōpūr. The latter is situated exactly in the position described by K., on both sides of the Vitastā, and about a mile below the point where the latter leaves the Vulur lake. The ancient name of the place is still well-known to the Pandits. Prof. BÜHLER, Report, p. 11, has already proved the necessity of this identification by a reference to our passage, whereas Cunningham (Anc.

Geogr., p. 99) had erroneously taken Sōpūr for K.'s S'ūrapura (recte Hūr'pūr). Suyyapura is mentioned again by K., viii. 3123, in connection with the Mahāpadma lake, and by Jonar. 840, 869, 873. S'rivara, iii. 183, refers to the building of a new royal residence at Suyyapura by Sultan Hasan Shāh.

Sōpūr is still a place of some importance, and showed at the census of 1891 a population of over 8000 people. For descriptions of the present town, which, as Prof. BÜHLER, l.c., rightly puts it, "does not resemble heaven, and possesses nothing ancient except its name," see MOORCROFT, Travels, ii. p. 230; HÜGEL, Kaśmīr, i. p. 353; INCE, Handbook, p. 220.

119. In the winter months vast flocks of wild geese and other water-fowl frequent the Vulur lake, where large numbers of them are shot by boatmen and others for sale in the city. The lake is also rich in fish, and the population dwelling in the villages near the lake lives largely by fishing. Compare MOORCROFT, Travels, ii. pp. 227 sq.; VIGNE, Travels, ii. p. 156; LAWRENCE, Valley, pp. 128, 157.

A similar prohibition against the killing of fish and birds on the lakes is recorded by Jonar. 938, in the reign of Sultan Zain-ul-'abidin; comp. also above iii. 5; v. 64. As a modern instance of such 'ahimsā,' it may be mentioned that fishing in the Vitastā was prohibited under great penalties for several years after the death of Mahārāja Gulāb Singh.

In the translation I have adopted the reading of A, sthīrā°, confirmed by L, against sthītā° of A.

AVANTIVARMAN
(A.D. 855/8-883).

120. After bestowing on Brahmins the village called Suyyākunḍala, in honour of [his mother] Suyyā, he constructed the [dyke called] after her name, Suyyāsetu.

121. On the lands which he raised from the water, thousands of villages such as Jayasthala, etc., were founded by Avantivarman and others.

122. King Avanti[varman] ruled the earth like Mūndhātṛ, and by such pious doings made the Kṛta [Yuga] appear again.

Avantivarman's end.

123. When he was attacked by the illness which was to cause his decease, he proceeded to the site which adjoins the [shrine of S'iva] Jyēṣṭhēśvara situated at the Tripureśa hill.

124. Having there become certain of his [near] death, he disclosed to S'ūra, at the end of his life and with folded hands, his attachment to the worship of Viṣṇu, which he had long hidden.

125. Listening to the end to the [recital of the] Bhagavadgītā, and thinking of the residence of Viṣṇu (Vaikuṇṭha), he cast off this [earthly] life with a cheerful mind.

126. That mighty ruler of the earth died in the year [of the Laukika era three thousand nine hundred and] fifty-nine (A.D. 883) on the third day of the bright half of Āṣāḍha.

127. After the death of this [ruler], the very numerous descendants of Utpala, whose minds were filled with pride on account of their power, aspired equally each and all to the throne.

S'ĀṆKARAVARMAN
(A.D. 883-902).

128. Then Ratnavardhana, the Chamberlain, secured by his exertions the kingdom for S'aṅkaravarman, the son of King Avantivarman.

129. Actuated by enmity towards him (Ratnavardhana), Karṇapa, a councillor of Vinnapa, placed also a son of S'ūravarmān, called Sukhavarman, in power as Yuvarāja.

120. The village of Suyyākunḍala (sic) is mentioned by Jonar. 948, in his description of the Vulur, as situated on the outskirts of the lake. I have not been able to trace its position. The Suyyāsetu is also unknown.

A, and L give the name of the village, evidently wrongly, as Suyyākunḍala.

121. The gloss of A, renders Jayasthala by Jithan; neither of these names is otherwise known.

123. The position of Tripureśa or Tripureśvara (Tiphar) has been fully discussed in note v. 46. The passage of the S'arvātārā there indicated proves the worship of a S'iva Jyēṣṭhēśvara at that site. It is evident that K. wishes here to distinguish this Līṅga from the other and better known Jyēṣṭhēśvaras whose places of worship have been identified in notes i. 118 and i. 124. He therefore specifies its position by the words Tripureśāḍ-minīṭha. The expression used leaves it doubtful as to whether the shrine was actually on 'the hill of Tripureśa' or at its foot, i.e. near the village of Triphar in the valley which leads down to the Paḥ lakṣa.

Kṣemendra, in the colophon of the Daśāvatāracarita, mentions the Tripureśaśailaśikhara as his favourite place of repose.

124. I have followed above the reading ciragopitām of Durgapr.'s edition, which, though not borne out by the MSS. (both A L have gopitām), recommends itself as an emendation. Compare v. 43. The reading śūrah, conjectured by D. for śūro (thus A), is actually found in L.

129. Regarding Vinnapa, see v. 26.

S'ĀṆKARAVARMAN
(A.D. 883-902).

130. Then there arose between these two, the king and the Yuvarāja, a war during which the kingdom was at every moment as if placed in a swing.

131. In this [war], S'ivaśakti and other valiant men, who lost their lives in the cause of their master, had an opportunity of getting their high character tested.

132. Though the enemies of their master promised them wealth and honours, they did not court [those] favours, [but thought] solely of their own high honour.

133. Servants were then still free from delusions, and, not having yet learned [to imitate] the conduct of dogs, proudly disdained to fight for morsels.

134. S'āṇkaravarman then defeated with difficulty the powerful Yuvarāja, and [hereby, as it were,] performed an effective benediction (omkāra) [at the commencement] of his own conquests.

135. Fighting numerous battles with Samaravarman and other [rivals], this sovereign superseded Fame, though she was to him [like] a fond wife, by the Glory which he gained [through these conquests, as his second wife].

136. Then the victorious and illustrious king, after having defeated his kinsmen and won over Fortune, put forth great efforts to conquer the world. Foreign expeditions.

137. Though the country [of Kāśmīr] had through the action of Time become reduced in population and wealth, he had nine lakhs of foot-soldiers when he marched forth from the 'Gate' (dvāra).

138. He whose commands had been disregarded in the purlieus of his own capital, verily made the princes [abroad] place his orders on their jewelled crests.

139. King S'āṇkaravarman revived by his own judgment the tradition regarding the conquest of the world, which was falling into oblivion [even] in learned works.

140. His army was swelled from place to place by the troops of [foundatory] chiefs, as a large river by the streams which join it.

141. The shouts of his army were heard not by the troops of the lord of Dārvābhisāra, but by the mountain-gorges in which that frightened [ruler] took refuge.

142. He surrounded in a moment Harigana with his [own] troops of horse

131. L gives the name as Sivabhakti.

137. Regarding the meaning of dvāra, see notes i. 122, 302; also iv. 401. The route followed by S'āṇkaravarman's army (see note v. 143-144) makes it probable that the frontier station on the Pir Panjal route is intended here.

141. Dārvābhisāra, as shown in note i. 180, designates the territory of the lower hills stretching between the Vitastā and Cinab to the north of Gūrjara or Gujrat. The term Dānagala, by which the gloss of A₁ renders Dārvābhisāra in our passage, refers, as the note of the same glossator, i. 180, shows, to a tract in the neighbourhood of Bhimbhar. The latter place lies about twenty-eight miles due N. of the town of Gujrat (see note v. 143-144).

142. The meaning of the verse is doubtful.

S'AMKARAVARMAN
(A.D. 888-902).

(harigaṇa), which were exceptionally numerous among men, and made him the guest of another fortress even before he (Harigaṇa) could reach his [own] stronghold.

Conquest of Gūrjara.

143-144. While he, who had as the advance-guard of his army nine lakhs of foot-soldiers, three hundred elephants and a lakh of horsemen, was wholly bent on the conquest of Gūrjara, he caused Prthivīcandra, [the lord] of Trigarta, who was afraid of his own overthrow, to be laughed at in his gloomy delusion (tamasi).

145-147. He (Prthivīcandra) namely had previously given his son called Bhuvanacandra as a hostage, and was come into his (S'amkaravarman's) neighbourhood to do homage. Then [however], on seeing the army of that [king]

Harigaṇa is not mentioned elsewhere. The ruler of Dārvāhisāra can scarcely be meant, as the latter is subsequently, v. 209, referred to by the name of Naravāhana. Harigaṇa may mean 'a troop of lions,' and the verse has been translated according to this interpretation by Troyer and Dutt.

143-144. The verse contains a pun on the name Prthivīcandra, 'the moon of the earth,' which is cast in darkness (tamasi).

The name Gūrjara is preserved in that of the modern town of Gujrāt, situated in the Panjāb plain about five miles from the W. bank of the Cināb, 74° 7' long. 32° 34' lat. This evident identification is clearly indicated by the gloss of A, and has already been noted by Wilson, History, p. 66 n.; comp. also Lassen, Ind. Alt., iii. pp. 502, 1027.

The name of the modern town is also used in an extended sense for the designation of the neighbouring territory, comprising the upper portion of the Deś between the Johlam and Cināb rivers to the foot of the Bhimbar hills. In this sense the term is well-known in Kāśmīr.

It appears that the older name Gūrjara had, at the time of the events here related, a much wider territorial application. K. represents subsequently, v. 150, as part of the kingdom of Gūrjara the Takkadeśa, or land of the Takkas, which, as Hsien-tsiang's account clearly indicates (Si-yu-ki, p. 164 sqq.; Life, p. 72), lay to the east of the Cināb. In explanation hereof, it will be sufficient to refer to the very numerous instances, both ancient and modern, in which Indian kingdoms were designated by the name of their capitals for the time being (comp., e.g., the use of the name Lahore for the whole Panjāb in the reign of Ranjit Singh).

For some traditions regarding the early history of Gujrāt, see CUNNINGHAM, Arch. Geogr., p. 179.

For Trigarta, the old name of the hill district of Kāngra, see note iii. 100. The gloss of A, on our passage explains Trigarta as 'Nagarakotṭa,' meaning thereby the modern Kot Kāngra, the chief place of the Kāngra district. The name Nagarkot, as a designation of Kot Kāngra and its famous old fortress, can be traced from the time of Mahmūd of Ghazna to the present day; comp. Alberūnī's India, ii. p. 11; CUNNINGHAM, Arch. Survey Rep., v. pp. 155 sqq. [The proper Sanskrit name of the capital is Suśarmapūra or Suśarmānagara, mentioned in the Baijnāth Prāsaṣti; see Epigr. Ind., i. 103 n.; ii. p. 483.]

Cunningham, who refers at length, i.e., v. pp. 149 sqq. (also in Coins of Med. India, pp. 100 sqq.), to genealogical lists preserved by the descendants of the Kāngra Rājās, does not mention that the names of Prthivīcandra and Bhuvanacandra actually occur in them. He, however, justly points out that the word candra, which forms the second part of these names, is similarly found in all the names furnished by the family rolls. These names, from the 14th century downwards, can be checked by coins and other documentary evidence. It can, therefore, be safely assumed that the use of such names goes back to a much earlier period. It is evidently due to the tradition connecting the Katōh Rājās of Kāngra with the Candravarṇsa. For a later ruler of this family, Inducandra, see below vii. 150.

K's words do not make it clear whether S'amkaravarman's expedition did actually extend to Trigarta as assumed, e.g. by Lassen, Ind. Alt., iii. p. 1027. Kāngra lies far away to the E. of the route which K. seems to indicate when making the king proceed viā Bhimbar (Dārvāhisāra) to Gujrāt (Gūrjara), and hence to the W. towards the upper Indus.

145. The word niv in its rare meaning of 'hostage,' is fully explained by the gloss which A, began to write on our passage, and which A, completed; compare for the same use of the word, vii. 1473; viii. 839, 1259, 2216; Fourth Chron. 246.

with which moved many feudatory princes, as it marched towards him large as the ocean, and fearing to be captured by it on approach, he turned and fled far away, failing in resolve.

148. He whose incomparable beauty those acquainted with the [stories of the] past mention to this very day, appeared to the frightened princes terrible, like the god of death.

149. The firmly rooted fortune of Alakhāna, king of Gūrjara, he uprooted in battle in a moment, and made long grief rise [in its place].

150. The ruler of Gūrjara gave up to him humbly the Takka-land, preserving [hereby] his own country, as [if he had saved] his own body [at the sacrifice] of a finger.

149. Wilson, History, p. 65, has already called attention to the strange name of Alakhāna, which has a curiously Muhammadan look. We might think of a temporary extension to the north of the Muhammadan kingdom of Multān, whose flourishing condition in the early decades of the 10th century is attested by interesting Arab accounts (see REINAUD, Mémoire, pp. 212 sqq.). But it is not easy to bring such an assumption into accord with K.'s subsequent statement as to Alakhāna's dependence on Lalliya S'āhi of Udabhaṇḍa. The Hindu dynasty of the 'S'āhis of Kābul,' of which Lalliya S'āhi was probably the founder (see note v. 152-155), and which held sovereign sway over the whole of the Northern Panjāb down to Mahmūd of Ghazna, appears throughout its existence as a powerful opponent of Muhammadan advance.

✓150. The Takka-land (Takkadośa) is mentioned only once more in the Rājat., vii. 1091, as Takkavisaya. As an ethnic designation, Takka is used in connection with the names of certain persons, vii. 520, 1001, 1064, 1207.

Cunningham has rightly connected the name Takka with that of 'the kingdom of Tsch-kia,' which Hiuen-tsiang reached after travelling to the S.E. of Rājapuri or Rajauri (see Ans. Geogr., pp. 148 sqq.; Si-yu-ki, i. pp. 165 sqq.). The kingdom of Tsch-kia is described as bordering in the E. on the Vipāśā (Bias), and in the W. on the Indus. Its capital was in close proximity to the old city of Šte-kie-la. The latter place is undoubtedly identical with the ancient S'ākala, famous in Brahmanical and Buddhist tradition (V. DE ST.-MARTIN, Mémoire analytique, p. 77). S'ākala is mentioned in the Mahābhārata as the capital of the Madras or Bahikas, tribes settled in the modern Panjāb (LASSEN, Pentapot. Ind., pp. 19 sqq.; Ind. Alt., i. p. 801), and with the Bahikas we find the Takkas actually identified in Hamaṇḍra's synonymic Lexicon (Abhidhānacintāmaṇi, ed. Bochtlingk-Rieu, verse 959).

The position of S'ākala has not yet been fixed with certainty, though it has been the subject of much speculation with special regard to the supposed identity of S'ākala with the Sāgyala of Arrian and the Sāyala (or Euthydemia) of Ptolemy (see e.g. CUNNINGHAM, Ans. Geogr., pp. 179 sqq.). It is, however, probable that the ancient city was situated somewhere between the Cināb and Rāvi. There we should then have to look for the seat of the Takka tribe, which in Hiuen-tsiang's time appears to have ruled the greatest part of the Northern Panjāb. Towards the end of the 9th century its power must have been considerably reduced, as in our passage the term Takkadośa is evidently used in a far more restricted sense than Hiuen-tsiang's 'kingdom of Tsch-kia.'

Cunningham (Ans. Geogr., p. 151) was evidently right in tracing back to our Takka the name Takṣaṣar which Alberūni gives to a region situated to the S. of the Pir Panteāl Range and neighbouring on the region of Lauhāwar (Lahore). Compare India, i. 208; ii. 8, with the translator's note on the first passage; also Note B (iv. 177), § 12. [Cunningham thought to have recognized the name Takka also in Tāqim (تاقیم), the designation used for an Indian territory by Ibn Khordādhboh and Ibn Rostah. Prof. De Goeje's critical editions of these geographers, however, show this name as Tāfin (تافین); see Bibl. Geograph. Arabiorum, vi. p. 18 (trans.); vii. p. 185. The position of this territory seems quite uncertain.]

The gloss of A. deserves mention only as a curiosity. This modern glossator sees in Takka the name of the 'Aṭak river,' i.e. the Indus, and identifies Takkadośa with Skardo!

For the custom here alluded to of cutting a finger as a mark of submission, see note viii. 1594.

S'ĀṬKARAYARMAN
(A.D. 883-902).

S'AMKARAVARMAN
(A.D. 883-902).

151. He caused the sovereign power, which the superior king Bhoja had seized, to be given up to the scion of the Thakkiya family, who had become his servant in the office of chamberlain.

152-155. Alakhāna's support, the illustrious Lalliya S'ūhi—who, [placed] between the rulers of the Darads and Turuṣkas as between a lion and a boar, resembled Āryāvarta [as it lies] between the Ilīmālaya and Vindhya [mountains]; in whose town of Udabhāṇḍa [other] kings found safety, just as the mountains in the ocean when threatened by the danger of having their wings cut [by Indra]; whose mighty glory [outshone] the kings in the North, just as the sun-disc [outshines] the stars in heaven,—he was not received into service by [S'amkaravarman], who desired to remove him from his sovereign position.

156. When, after thus effecting the conquest of [all] regions, he returned to his own land, he built in a locality called Pañcasatra a town [called S'amkarapura] after his own name.

Foundation of S'amkarapura

151. Cunningham, Arch. Survey Rep., ii. p. 225; x. p. 101, has proposed to identify the 'Adhirāja' Bhoja mentioned in our passage with the 'independent sovereign' (parama-śvara) Bhoja, who is named as reigning in the Deogarh inscription, dated A.D. 882, in a Gwalior inscription of A.D. 876, and in the Pehoa inscription of A.D. 882-883. This King Bhoja must, upon the evidence of the Siyadoni inscription, edited by Prof. Kielhorn, be assumed to have been a ruler of Kanyakubja or Kanauj; see Epigr. Ind., i. p. 170.

In connection with the above named inscriptions our passage has been repeatedly discussed, thus by Mr. FLEET, Ind. Ant., xv. p. 110; Dr. HULTZSCH, Epigr. Ind., i. p. 165, and more fully by Prof. BÜHLER, Epigr. Ind., i. p. 186.

The wording of our passage is unfortunately not clear enough to allow of the proposed identification being considered as certain. As already pointed out by Prof. Bühler, K.'s words do not necessarily imply that Bhoja was S'amkaravarman's contemporary, as Cunningham assumed. Hence the close approach of the inscriptional dates above mentioned to S'amkaravarman's period of reign (A.D. 883-902) cannot be considered conclusive evidence for this identification. The text allows, in fact, an interpretation, according to which Bhoja somewhat preceded S'amkaravarman.

K.'s expression Bhojādhirājena further admits of the rendering, 'king of the Bhojas,' as suggested by Dr. Hultsch, l.c. In this case we should have here the ethnic term Bhoja, which is well-known to the Epics and Purāṇas. It must, however, be mentioned that the exact location of this term is not known, and that the latter itself cannot be traced otherwise in historical documents.

The syntactical construction of our verse also offers difficulties. We miss the second object of the person with which adāpayat ought to be construed. The use of the locative (Thakkiyakāmye), where we should expect the dative, is also peculiar.

I am unable to make any suggestion as to the name Thakkiyaka, which is not found elsewhere. Can it have anything to do with that of the Paṇḍit Thakkiya mentioned iv. 49-1?

152-155. The historical data contained in this passage, as well as the position of Udabhāṇḍapura, have been fully discussed in Note J.

156. The identity of the town here referred to with the modern Paṭan is clearly established by verse v. 213. This informs us that the town founded by King S'amkaravarman, and called after his own name, was subsequently known only by the designation Paṭana, 'the town.' The glossator in the note on this passage renders Paṭana by Paṭṭan. This identification was known to the Paṇḍit informants of Cunningham (J.A.S.B., 1848, p. 281), and to P. Śaṅkaram, who speaks of the place as S'amkaravarmanapura in his Trikṣas. The name originally intended for the town was undoubtedly S'amkarapura, and this is used by Kṣemendra, Samayam, ii. 13. The glossator A. on our own passage reproduces it in the Kā. form of S'amkarapūr.

It is possible that a recollection of the original name survived locally to the time of the glossator by the side of the customary designa-

157. He was attached to [his queen] Sugandhā, the daughter of the illustrious Svāmirāja, the ruler of the northern region, just as the moon [is] to the full-moon day.

158. In company with her, the king, who resembled Indra, built in that fine town the [temples of Ś'iva] S'amkaragaurīśa and Sugandheśa.

159. In [charge of] these two temples of the lord of Gaurī, he placed the Brahman Nāyaka, who was versed in the four Vedas, and who was like a familiar dwelling-place to Sarasvatī.

160. Poets and kings of these modern times augment their own work by plundering the poems or the property of others.

161. Thus this ruler, who possessed but little character, had whatever was of value at Parīhāsapūra, carried off in order to raise the fame of his own city.

162. Because what gave fame to that city was [only] what is [still to be found] at Pattana,—the weaving of [woollen] cloths, purchase and sale of cattle, and the like.

163. The minister Ratnavardhana, who had secured the crown for the king, built the glorious [temple of] Sadaśiva, called Ratnavardhaneśa.

164. O wonder! Kings, after having purified themselves in the torrents

S'AMKARAVARMAN
(A.D. 893-902).

tion of Pattana: Paṭan, though the latter must have already prevailed in K.'s time. It may also be assumed that the annotator lost sight of v. 218, and erroneously thought he could recognize S'amkaravarman's town in the modern village of Sankarpūr in the Shāhābād Pargana (75° 14' long. 33° 37' lat.). Neither the name of S'amkarapura, nor that of Pañcasatra, can now be traced at Paṭan.

Paṭan is a large village situated on the high road from Srinagar to Varāhamūla, circ. 74° 37' long. 34° 10' lat. It was formerly the chief place of the Tilgam Pargana; see Moorcroft, Travels, ii. p. 113; Vigne, Travels, ii. p. 166. Since Mr. Lawrance's settlement, it has become the headquarters of a Tahsil. Regarding the ruins of Paṭan, see note v. 158; comp. also v. 162.

157. Svāmirāja may be supposed to have been a ruler in the Dard territory, or in some neighbouring tract.

158. The temples founded by S'amkaravarman and his consort have been correctly identified by Cunningham with the two ruined temples still standing at the village of Paṭan. A full description of these structures, which are not of great dimensions, and which, unlike most Kāśmīrian temples of old date, do not appear to have been surrounded by pillared quadrangles, has been given by Cunningham in J.A.S.B., 1848, pp. 282 sq. For reproductions, see COLLE, Anc. Build., pl. 28-35.

Judging from K.'s remarks, v. 161 sq., it appears that S'amkaravarman obtained the building materials for his new town, and perhaps for these very temples, from the great ruins of Parīhāsapūra (Parīspūr); comp. Note K, iv. 194-204. The distance between the site of these ruins and Paṭan is only about seven miles, and communication by boat easy across the marshes of the Pambāsar.

159. Abhinavagupta and subsequent Kāśmīrian writers quote a Bhaṭṭa Nāyaka as an author on Alaṅkāra; comp. Prof. BÜHLER's Report, pp. 64, 67; Cat. Catalog., p. 286. Could this possibly be the scholar mentioned in our passage? The Cat. Catalog. does not know of another writer of that name.

162. Pattana (lit. 'town') is here evidently used as the name of S'amkaravarman's town, and ought to have been shown accordingly in the Ed.; comp. v. 218 and note v. 156. K.'s description of the place as a lively market-town, without further distinction or objects of interest, is still applicable to the modern Paṭan, which has a fairly large Bazaar, and has become the headquarters of a Tahsil since the last settlement.

S'AMKARAVARMAN
(A.D. 889-902).

Fiscal oppressions.

of fame, become impure by indulgence in vices, like the elephants by [covering themselves with] dust after bathing.

165. In course of time, then, the king's mind became absorbed by excessive habits of avarice, and he became an expert in the [art of] oppressing his subjects.

166. Losing most of his treasure by the distractions to which he abandoned himself, he carried off again and again, by skilfully designed exactions, whatever the gods and others owned.

167. This robber of what the temples possessed in villages and other [property], established two new [revenue] offices, called Atṭapatiḥhāga ('the share of the lord of the market') and Gṛhākṛtya ('domestic affairs').

168. He took from the temples the profits arising from the sale of incense, sandal-wood, and other [articles of worship], under the pretext that they were the [king's legal] share of the selling price.

169. Then, again, he plundered straightway sixty-four temples, through special officers [placed over them] under the pretence of [exercising] supervision.

170. The king resumed the villages which belonged to the temples, against a compensatory assignment (pratikara), and [then] cultivated the land himself as [if he were] an agriculturist.

167. I translate according to L, which reads correctly suragrāgrāmā for A pura-gṛha.

The interesting passage v. 167-177, has been recently translated by Prof. JOLLY in his paper Rechtshistorisches aus der Rājataranṅinī, Festgabe an A. Weber, 1895, p. 88.

For the correct understanding of the administrative details here referred to by K., it is necessary to consult Chapter XVII, 'The old administration,' in Mr. LAWRENCE's Valley, pp. 399 sqq. A perusal of our passage, and of other references in the Chronicle (see vii. 1088, 1107; viii. 2224, 2513), proves that the elaborate system of taxation which oppressed Kāśmīr until quite recent times, with its manifold imposts on all products and industries, its State monopolies and demands for forced labour, dates back to very early times. A statement of the revenue assessments on the different parts of the Valley in Akbar's time, is supplied by Abu-l-Faẓl (Ain-i Akb., ii. p. 366 sqq.), but it gives no details as to the various imposts of which these demands were composed. For very curious details regarding the taxes due from the villages and the town-population in 1871-72, see the official estimate of receipts for that year, reproduced by Mr. LAWRENCE, Valley, pp. 236 sq.

In this estimate we find a variety of direct taxes on market shops, artificers, etc. The collection of revenue from similar sources might have been entrusted to S'ankaravarman's now office, the Atṭapatiḥhāga.

The receipts of the Gṛhākṛtya office are partly specified below, v. 176. They may possibly have included also fees levied at certain domestic events, such as marriages, Yājñopavītas, etc. Fees of this kind are referred to in viii. 1428. The gṛhākṛtyādhikāra is mentioned again, vii. 42.

169. These temples may be supposed to have been such as had been founded by former kings and their families. Shrines of this kind are still in Kāśmīr under the Mahārāja's direct control.

170. The text of this verse, as given by A, is scarcely correct. I have translated above according to the reading setpattih, which I restore from setpattih of L; A has setpattih.

It appears that the king resumed villages which had been held as Agrahāras by temples, on the understanding that a fixed amount should be returned in compensation from the revenue of these villages. The land of these villages was subsequently taken under direct fiscal management, which made it easy to reduce the compensatory allotment as explained in the next verse. Instances of certain plots of land being directly farmed by the State are not rare in

171. He reduced the weight in the scales by one-third, and [still made out] that he gave more to the temple-corporation (parṣad) than the [due] annual allowance, pretending [that deductions were due] on account of food supply, price of woollen cloaks, and the like.

172. When he was in another region, he fined those villagers who did not come and carry their loads, for one year, by the value of the load [calculated] according to the [higher] prices of that region.

173. In the next year he fined without any fault all villagers in the respective villages, by the value of the load according to the same calculation.

174. Thus he introduced that well-known [system of forced] carriage of loads which is the harbinger of misery for the villages, and which is of thirteen kinds.

Kāśmīr. Such areas are technically known as khud-kisht.

A somewhat similar procedure was followed by Mahārāja Gulāb Singh. Soon after taking possession of Kāśmīr, he resumed almost all the Jagirs granted during Moghul, Pāṭhan and Sikh times, and allotted in their stead fixed bounties, of considerably reduced value, from a consolidated fund since known as Dhar-mārtha.

171. The meaning of this verse is doubtful, and the text perhaps defective. For varṣa-deyāṅ of A, I read now with L varṣadeyāṅ. This word I take, like the pratikara of the preceding verse, to refer to the revenue assignment which had been made to the temples and their Purohita-corporations (parṣad) on resumption of the original land-grants.

In paying over the fixed assignment of rice or other produce, it was easy for the king's officials to defraud the grantees systematically by the use of wrong weights. Certain other contributions in kind made to the temples seem to have furnished an excuse for these unlawful deductions.

Land-revenue in Kāśmīr was until quite recent years generally realized in kind. This system was, as the Ain-i Akh. (ii. p. 386) shows, evidently very old. The great opportunities for peculation which this time-honoured system offers to officials of all classes, have been graphically described by Mr. LAWRENCE, Valley, pp. 400 sqq. Among the abuses connected with the system, the manipulation of the scales figures in the first place.

Regarding the proper meaning of the term parṣad, see note i. 88. A different explanation of the passage is given by Prof. JOLLY, Festschrift an A. Weber, p. 86; comp., however, the meaning of tribhāṅga in P. W.

172-174. We have in these verses probably the first reference to the system of forced labour, which under the name of Kār-bāgār has remained to this day one of the most characteristic features of Kāśmīr administration. The nature of the country, and the absence of proper roads, renders it necessary to use load-carriers in preference to all other means of transport. The system of corvée entailed heroby opens the way for much oppression. The manifold abuses connected with 'Bāgār' in Kāśmīr, are fully discussed by Mr. LAWRENCE, Valley, pp. 411 sqq. In the absence of a special labouring class, the whole demand for transport labour falls on the villagers. Expeditions outside the Valley have at all times been dreaded by the agriculturists, on account of the hardships implied by the increased requisitions for carriage. Until the recent road to Gilgit was constructed, the rumour that transport was required for troops going in, or coming from, that direction, would cause a general stampede among the villagers (Valley, p. 413). The sufferings of the load-carrying villagers on such an expedition are referred to by K. viii. 2513.

Saṅkaravarman was certainly not the first to levy Bāgār for transport purposes, but he seems to have given to this corvée a systematic organization (rūṣṭabhāroḍhi), and to have used it also for fiscal extortion. Villagers, it appears, who did not turn up to carry their allotted loads, were fined by the value of the latter at enhanced rates, and the same fine was levied the following year a second time from the village as a whole. The thirteen kinds of the corvée referred to in verse 174 cannot be specified. The term rūṣṭabhāroḍhi recurs in vii. 1088, where exemption from this impost is mentioned as a privilege granted to the Purohitas of a temple. Possibly the term included, like the modern Kār-bāgār, the various requisitions for village produce, until recently free of payment, which could be made by officials; comp. Valley, p. 414.

Saṅkaravarman
(A.D. 883-902).

S'ĀṆKARĀVARMAṆ
(A.D. 882-902).

175. By levying [contributions] for the monthly pay of the Skandakas, village clerks (grāmakāyastha), and the like, and by various other exactions, he drove the villagers into poverty.

176. Thus, by deducting or adding to the [due] weights, by fines on the villages and similar imposts, he amassed revenue for the Gṛhahṛtya [office].

177. He appointed in this special office five secretaries (divira), and as the sixth the treasurer (gaiñjavara) S'akaca (?), who was [also] called Lavaṇa.

178. Thus this foolish [ruler] accepted [residence in] hell for himself, in order to benefit by his sinful acts future kings or the functionaries.

179. None but S'āṅkaravarman was the cause that the learned in this land have lost respect and the kings their royal dignity.

180. By this king, who was foremost among fools, those sons of slaves, the Kāyasthas, were brought [to power], who by abstracting the wealth of honest people destroy [the kings'] renown.

181. Under his care the land fell into the power of the Kāyasthas to such an extent that its kings meet with reproach, as if they were plundering it.

Remonstrances of Gopāvarman.

182. When the people were thus cruelly suffering, the king's son, Gopāvarman by name, who was touched by compassion, on one occasion addressed [his father] with the following words:

183. "O father, the boon, which you once offered to me, has remained unclaimed. This I now ask from you who are true to your engagements."

175. The grāmakāyastha is in all probability the official ancestor of the present Paṭwari (Kā. paṭrār). The latter is the village accountant, who keeps the papers showing the area of the holdings of the villagers, with their revenue assessments, etc.; see Valley, pp. 400, 446. The meaning of the term skandaka is doubtful. It is found also Samayam, vi. 16. It designated, perhaps, the village headman, the modern Muqaddam or Lambardār, who as the person directly responsible for the payment of the revenues, has since old days been an important factor in rural administration; comp. Valley, p. 447. [The proper spelling of the word is possibly skandhaka; comp. remark on skandāvāra, i. 60.]

In the statement of the taxes levied from a Kāśmīri village in 1883, we still find specified, in addition to the regular assessment, a 'Paṭwari tax,' a 'Kānūngō tax,' and a 'tax on account of establishment'; comp. Valley, p. 415. These taxes evidently correspond in character to the imposts mentioned in our passage. The latter shows also clearly that the institution of village officials existed long before the times of the Moghuls, to which it is popularly attributed; see Mr. LAWRENCE'S Valley, p. 197, and my note thereon.

177. The proper explanation of the term divira, used by K. also in vii. 111, 119; viii. 181, has been given by Prof. BÜHLER, Ind. Ant., vi. p. 10. From the passages of the Lokaprakāśa quoted there, it becomes evident that the Diviras were officials who had to do with writing and accounts. Thus a passage in the iii. Prakāśa mentions the various classes of Diviras as gaiñjādiviras, nagara-diviras, grāmadiviras, khavāśādiviras. The word is derived from the Persian dīvir, 'writer, secretary'; see N.P.W., s.v.

The Lavaṇa of our passage is evidently the same person who is referred to in v. 205 and viii. 263 as a load-carrier (bhārika) by origin. Could śakaca be a term referring to the same occupation? The term gaiñjavara is undoubtedly identical, as already recognized by Benfey, with the Persian gaiñjvar, 'treasurer'; see P.W., s.v. In the list of officials given at the commencement of the Lokapr., the gaiñjavara is mentioned along with the koṣṭhādhipati and gaiñjādhipati,

184. "From these exactions which Your Majesty has introduced at the instigation of the Kāyasthas, breathing is the only vital function which nowadays remains [free] for men."

185. "And, indeed, my father, you do not derive the slightest benefit from this oppression of the people either for [this or the next] world."

186. "Who can account for what is told about the invisible and hidden sphere? [But] even in this visible existence one scots from such actions no other [result] but evil."

187. "On the one hand, there are the endless misfortunes of the subjects, such as plagues and famines, and on the other, again, nothing but the avarice of the king."

188. "The splendour of a ruler who practises avarice, causes no one pleasure, [as little as that] of a flower out of season, which does not promise a fruit."

189. "Liberality and kind speech bring everything under the power of the king. Avarice, [however], is bent with force upon destroying in the first place these two [qualities]."

190. "As the cloud destroys the lustre, duration, and splendour of a winter day, so does avarice that of the king."

191. "The kinsmen of [a king] who shuns enterprises from fear of their expense, become seditious. No servants would show devotion to him who is too faint-minded to reward their services. His own people will always attempt the life of [that king] who accumulates riches. What evil is there which avarice, [acting] like an enemy, does not quickly bring upon a king?"

192. "Therefore, O protector of the people, abolish this new impost, called 'the king's revenue' (rājasaṁvāhana), which has been introduced from avarice, and which takes away the people's life."

193. When the king had heard these words of the prince, which were inspired by benevolence, he slowly spoke as follows, while a smile lit up his under lip :

194. "This speech of yours, which charms by its human sentiments, and is in keeping with your [youthful] looks, brings now back to my mind the feelings of a bygone time."

195. "My dear son, once when I was a young boy and had a tender heart just like you, I cherished abundant affection for the people."

196. "As such I was taken about by my father, on foot and without shoes, dressed in heavy armour when it was hot, and in transparent [thin] cloth when it was cold."

197. "When those who went before [the king], saw me as I was running by the side of the horses during the chase and elsewhere, torn by the thorns and with tears in my eyes, they made representations to him."

S'ANKARAY ARMAN
(A.D. 883-1102).

198. "He replied to them: 'Since I have attained the throne from common rank, I know the hardships [experienced] by attendants at different times during their services.'"

199. "'After undergoing such misery, this [my son] will be sure to know the troubles of others when he comes to the throne. Otherwise he might remain ignorant [of them], having been born on the throne.'"

200. "Though my father gave me a good training by such devices, yet I have thus oppressed my subjects, since I attained the royal dignity."

201. "Just as living beings, when born, forget the pain [which they endured while] kept in the womb, so the king, as soon as he obtains the crown, needs [forget] his former thoughts."

202. "Therefore, you yourself should grant me to-day this one boon. May you not after ascending the throne oppress your subjects even more!"

203. Thus he spoke scornfully to the boy, who stood shame-faced, and the king's roguish confidants looked on, smiling at each other.

204. Under this [king], who from fear of having to be liberal was averse to the society of distinguished men, poets like Bhallaṭa and others had to lead the meanest existence.

205. Great poets went without pay, but Lavaṭa, [who had been] a load-carrier, drew by his favour a pay of two thousand Ḍinnāras.

206. Thus this [king], who did not speak the language of the gods [among men, i.e. Sanskrit], but used vulgar speech (aprabhāṃsa) fit for drunkards, showed that he was descended from a family of spirit-distillers.

207-208. The beard bound up under the head-dress, the forefinger at the point of the nose, the look fixed in abstraction,—these habits, which were befitting a person of merit, became the object of ridicule when [displayed] by the minister Sukharāja, who pleased the whims of the evil-conducted king, just as [when such habits are mimicked] on the stage.

209. Fearing treachery, he slew at night the brave Naravāhana, king of Dāravāhisāra, who cherished no evil intent, together with his followers.

204. Bhallaṭa is known as the author of the extant Bhallaṭaśūtaka, and a dictionary called Padamañjarī; he is quoted repeatedly by Ksemendra; comp. Cat. Catalog., p. 397.

205. Lavaṭa is evidently the 'treasurer' of that name mentioned above, v. 177.

K. does not say for what period the allowance of 2000 Ḍinnāras was drawn. From a comparison of iv. 495, where the same expression vetana is used, it becomes probable that a daily allowance is meant; comp. also vii. 145 sqq. After what has been explained regarding the 'Ḍinnāra' reckoning in Note H, two 'Thousands' of the Kāśmīr currency per diem cannot be considered extravagant pay according to modern ideas.

209. The king of Dāravāhisāra here mentioned is probably identical with the

210. Struck by the curse of the people, this king of wicked conduct lost twenty or thirty children without [previous] illness.

211. Those kings who do evil to their subjects, have their family, their glory, their life, their wives, nay, even their name, destroyed in a moment.

212. Thus it has been said [before], and will be said in future. And manifestly this should be held, since on account of his cruelty even the name of this [king] has vanished.

213. What other ruler founded, like S'ankaravarman, a city under his own name (S'ankarapura) which [subsequently] lost its [proper] appellation, and became known only by the name Pattana ('the town')?

214. A son of Sukharāja's sister, whom he had made 'lord of the Gate' (dvārādhipa), met his death through negligence at a place called Virāṇaka.

S'ANKARAVARMAN
(A.D. 888-902).

Naravāhana who figures as the son of the Darvābhisāra king Nara in the pedigree of the Lohara family; see vii. 1282. It is curious that the narrative does not explain how the king of Darvābhisāra, who on S'ankaravarman's expedition to the south had retreated into the mountains, came to place himself in the king's power.

210. The expression trīṇśadvimśa cannot be explained as 30 + 20, i.e. 'fifty,' as proposed in the gloss of A, in view of the passage viii. 126, where the latter figure is impossible.

213. Comp. note v. 156.

214. DVĀRĀDHĪPA.—The term dvārādhipa, literally 'lord of the Gate (or Gates),' along with its equivalents, dvārapati, dvāreśa, dvārādhipāra, dvāranāyaka, dvārādhipāra, is of most frequent occurrence throughout the Chronicle (see Index). It has hitherto been interpreted as denoting a chief chamberlain (P. W., Troyer, Lasson), or the administrator of a supposed province Dvāra (Dutt). A careful examination of all passages makes it, however, quite certain that it designated the high officer who held charge of the passes leading into Kāśmīr. Of the latter we have shown in note i. 122 that they were all uniformly known by the designation dvāra or 'gate.'

In the note quoted, reference has already been made to the high importance which was attached at all times to the guarding of these passes. The mountain-barriers which enclose Kāśmīr like great walls, leave but a small number of approaches practicable for a foreign invasion. The history of Kāśmīr down to the present century shows clearly that it was on the defence of these approaches that the safety of the Valley has always depended. We can hence easily understand why the protection of these passes, and the general command over the watch-stations (dravaga, ḍhalkha) established on them, should have been entrusted to a special high officer, a kind of 'lord of the Marches.'

That this was, indeed, the function of the officer variously named dvārādhipa, dvārapati, etc., is made evident by a series of characteristic passages in the last two Books. In viii. 422 we are plainly told that the charge of the dvāra required soldierly qualities and implied rough duties; vii. 217 shows us an officer holding the dvārādhipāra who, like the Dvārādhipa of our passage, falls bravely in battle with the Khaśas. That the latter held the territories immediately to the S. and W. of the Kāśmīr Valley, and were always troublesome neighbours, has been shown in note i. 317. Thus, too, we find the valiant Kandarpa as 'lord of the Gate' ever engaged in expeditions against Rājapuri and other frontier territories, vii. 576 sqq., 971 sqq. Of his successor it is specially noted that he was able to carry on his duties owing to his wealth, which permitted him to keep up a large armed force, vii. 599 sq. Subsequently, when Kandarpa had resumed once more the charge of the 'Gate,' he successfully wards off an inroad of the pretender Bhuvanarāja, vii. 906 (comp. also vii. 581). It is he, too, who endeavours to prevent the escape of the rebel prince, Vijayamalla, by closing the routes leading to the Darad territory, vii. 912. Malla, a member of the royal family, while holding temporarily the post of Dvārapati, under Kaśa, wages war on neighbouring chiefs, and invades Urāśa, vii. 584 sqq. Another 'lord of the Gate' is represented, vii. 1172, as exercising judicial power over the commandant of a frontier fort, etc.

Throughout the viii. Book, too, we see the successive 'lords of the Gate' exercising military functions, particularly in connection with troubles in the border territories; comp. o.g. viii. 374, 522, 746, 1005, 1832, 1827 sqq., 2281, 2503 sqq., etc.

S'ĀṆKARAVARMA
(A.D. 883-902).

215. Roused to anger by this [event], the king set out on an expedition himself, and after destroying Virāṇaka, proceeded full of lust [for conquest] towards the northern region (uttarāpatha).

From the expressions which K. uses when recording the frequent transfers of the Dvāra office (comp. e.g. vii. 578, 597; viii. 833, 2354), it is clear that the charge of the 'Gate' could be held ordinarily only by one person. Still more conclusive evidence is furnished by the fact that in all the numerous passages in which the detailed narrative of the last two Books has occasion to refer to the successive Dvārapatis, we never find mention of more than one person holding this post at the same time.

It is of interest to note this point, as it indicates the difference between the 'lord of the Gate' of the Hindu period and the Mārgēśas or 'guardians of the routes' who figure so prominently in the narrative of the later Chroniclers. These Mārgēśas (also called mārgapa, adhvapa, adhvēśa, māryapeśa) are generally referred to in the plural, and in connection with particular routes across the mountains (comp. S'iv. iii. 422; iv. 137, 154, 225, 353; Fourth Chron. 198, 206, 216, 264, 295, 301, 311, 384, etc.). They are clearly meant for the Malikis of Muhammadan times. These were feudal chiefs who held hereditary charge of specific passes, and were bound to furnish garrisons for the frontier posts on these passes in return for the revenue of certain lands assigned to them; comp. my Notes on the Pir Panjal Route, p. 383, and HÜBNER, Kaschmir, i. p. 347; ii. pp. 167 sqq.

Extensive as the power and privileges of the Malikis were down to the Sikh conquest, it is yet clear that we must see in them rather the successors of the old draṅgādhipas or commanders of frontier stations whom K. mentions on particular routes (see viii. 1577 sqq., 2803; also vii. 1172), than of the 'lords of the Gate' who held general charge of the approaches to the Valley.

The official position of the Dvārapati must have been a very high one, as his post is repeatedly mentioned by K. along with the chief State charges, such as the offices of the prime minister (sarvādhipā), the commander-in-chief (kampana), chief-justice (rājasthāna), the pādāgra post; comp. vii. 384, 887; viii. 573, 1944. It was superior to that of a mandaleśa or governor; comp. vii. 1178.

The post of the 'lord of the Gate' is most frequently referred to under the name of dvāra; comp. vii. 384, 578, 595, 887, 1178; viii. 21, 179, 451, 1680, 1684, 1964, etc. 'Dvāra' is here an abbreviation for dvārakārya (vii. 1177; viii. 293, 790) or dvārādhipā (vii. 216); comp. the use of kampana, as explained in note v. 447.

That the functions of the chief-chamberlain, which the interpretation hitherto generally adopted has attributed to the Dvārapati, were in reality discharged by another State official, will be seen from the account given of Kalāśa's coronation, vii. 292 sqq.

VIRĀṆAKA.—The details given in the following verses show that the route followed by S'āṇkaravarman's expedition after the destruction of Virāṇaka lay to the north-west. Hence we should be inclined to look for Virāṇaka somewhere in the Valley of the Vitastā below the 'Gate' of Varāhamūla. This assumption is supported by the other passage which mentions Virāṇaka, viii. 400. We read there how Sussala, after an unsuccessful attempt to seize the Kashmir throne, found temporary refuge in Virāṇaka, 'a seat of Khasas.'

The encounter in which Sussala was defeated by the troops of his rival Saḥapa, was fought not far from Huṣkapura-Varāhamūla (see viii. 390 sqq.). Sussala ultimately regains from Virāṇaka his stronghold Lohara by mountain tracks, which the snow had rendered difficult to pass. Sussala's defeat took place in mid-winter, when the direct routes leading over the Pir Panjal range to Lohara (Lohrin) must have been entirely closed. At this season communication with Lohara is possible only by the lower passes to the west (Hajji Pir, Pajjah), which connect the Vitastā Valley below Varāhamūla with the territory of Parnotā, or Prūṇis (see Note E on Lohara, iv. 177). It is, therefore, probable that Sussala's route of retreat lay first to the W., and that his subsequent escape from Virāṇaka to Lohara was effected by one of the last-named passes.

I had arrived at the conclusion above indicated before I was able to utilize for the identification of Virāṇaka the indication furnished by the gloss of A₂, which says Dvāravidyāśah Virāṇakanh. The name Dvāravidyā does not occur otherwise, but the use of a similar local appellation in the gloss, v. 225, which places Bolyāsaka in 'Dvārapati' near Varāhamūla, suggested to me that some part of the lower Vitastā Valley might be meant by it. The inquiries which I consequently

216. When he had conquered numerous territories on the banks of the Indus (Sindhu), and had received the homage of [their] terror-stricken kings, he turned back from that [region].

S'AMKARAVARMA
(A.D. 883-102).

217. As he passed through Uraśā, there arose suddenly a conflict with the inhabitants of Uraśā, on account of the quartering of his troops. March through Uraśā.

made in May, 1896, on my way to Kāśmīr, soon showed me that the name Dvāravidyā is still well-known to the Pahārī population in the form of Dvārbidī. It is commonly used as the name of that part of the Vitastā Valley which extends from Muzaffarābād up to a point a short distance above Buliāsa (Skr. Bolyāsaka; see note v. 225). In the form Dvāravidyā we have probably an attempt to render the modern name Dvārbidī, which itself is evidently derived from the old Skr. form Dvāravidī used in the gloss, v. 225.

[The map has actually Dvārbidī, but shows it erroneously as the designation of a small tract in the centre of that portion of the Valley to the N. of Hattian. The error is probably due to the fact that the old Pahārī name has been replaced in official use by the term Dopātṭa. The latter is taken from the locality which has since Sikh times been the administrative centre of this territory].

After ascertaining that Bolyāsaka or Buliāsa still comes within the territory of Dvārbidī, I was also able to trace the position of Virānaka. The easternmost limit of Dvārbidī is marked, according to the uniform statement of the inhabitants I had occasion to examine, by a hill-spur known as Kaudanda, which runs down from the N. and strikes the river a little to the E. of the village of Kīoa (map 'Poocha') at a point circ. 73° 52' long, 34° 10' 30" lat.

On the high ridge which on the left river-bank meets the Kaudanda spur, and almost due S. of the latter, lies the village of Viran. In this I have no hesitation to recognize our Virānaka. The name of Viran is not shown on the Survey map, but its position is correctly indicated by the sign marking a village, about one mile to the S.E. of 'Poocha.' Want of time prevented me from visiting the village itself, which lies about 1500' above the level of the Valley. According to the information supplied to me, it does not contain any ancient remains.

It deserves to be noted that the chief land-owning families on the left side of the Valley for some distance above and below Viran are still of the Khakha tribe, whose identity with the Khasas of the Chronicle has been shown in note i. 317. Another point which speaks strongly for the identity of Viran with Virānaka, is its position almost opposite to Buliāsa : Bolyāsaka. Of the latter place, we know for certain that it lay on the very border of Kāśmīr territory. And the circumstances under which Virānaka is mentioned both in our passage and vii. 409, make it clear that it too must have been in the immediate vicinity of the Kāśmīr frontier towards the Khasas.

216. The next verse shows that S'ankaravarman's expedition must have been directed towards those portions of the Indus Valley which lie to the N. and W. of Hazāra (Uraśā). The easiest route from Kāśmīr to these regions leads down the Vitastā to the great bend near Muzaffarābād, where the river turns from its north-westerly course to the south, and hence up the Kunhar Valley to the N. or through Mansahra to the W. The mention of Bolyāsaka in v. 225 makes it clear that this route was taken by the king's forces on their march back to Kāśmīr. From the position of Virānaka, as ascertained in the preceding note, we may safely conclude that the same route was followed also on the outset of the expedition. Among the territories on the Indus which can be reached by this route, some, like Cilās, and Sazin, lie almost due N., others to the N.W. of Kāśmīr. Hence K.'s expression uttarāpatha is sufficiently accurate.

✓217. Uraśā, given as a local name in the gūṇa to Pāṇini, iv. 2, 82, is undoubtedly the ancient designation of the hill region which lies between the upper course of the Vitastā and the Indus. Its greatest part is now comprised in the British district of Hazāra. LARSEN was the first to recognize in Uraśā the territory of "Apsa or Oṣapsa which Ptolemy, vii. i. 45, places between the Bidaspes and Indus; comp. Pentapot. Ind., p. 35. Hsien-tsiang describes it as the kingdom of W'u-la-shi, situated to the N.W. of Kāśmīr, and dependent on the latter; comp. Si-yu-ki, i. p. 147; Life, p. 68.

Uraśā is probably meant also by the Uragā of the Mahābhārata, a country mentioned between Abhisārī (see above note, i. 180) and Sinhapūra (Salt Range); comp. LARSEN, Zeitschr. f. d. Kunde d. Morgenl., ii. pp. 45, 52. The king of this region figures under the name of Arsakes in the account of Alexander's Panjāb campaign; see LARSEN, Ind. Alt., ii. pp. 155, 176. Regarding the

S'ANKARAVARMAN
(A.D. 883-902).

218. A S'vapāka, who had posted himself on a hill summit, discharged [at him] a swift-flying arrow, and this pierced the neck of the unwary [king].

219. In a dying condition, he ordered his ministers to lead and save the army, and [then] left that locality carried in a litter (harnīratha).

Death of S'ankaravarman,
A.D. 902.

220-222. Deprived of the power of sight, he slowly recognized by her speech the Queen Sugandhā, who stood [by him] crying and embracing his body. Speaking with difficulty, he entrusted to her protection his son Gopālavarman, who had no relatives and was [yet] a child. [Then] while the arrow was being pulled out, he died on the march in the year [of the Laukika era three thousand nine hundred] and seventy-seven (A.D. 902) on the seventh day of the dark half of Phālguna.

223. Sukharāja and the other [ministers] guarded the army safely through the enemy's territories, and kept on the march, concealing his [death] by [various] stories.

224. By means of cords, which made his head bend down and rise like that of a puppet, they caused him to return the greeting of the feudatories who had come [to do homage].

extent of Uraśā and its capital in Hiuen-tsiang's time, compare CUNNINGHAM'S Anc. Geogr., pp. 103 sqq.; also Ind. Ant., xx. p. 336.

The whole hill-tract was known in Muhammadan times generally as Pakhlī, and is described under this name, e.g. Ain-i Akb., ii. p. 390 sq. Regarding the name Hazāra and the modern history of the district, see Gazetteer of the Hazara District, 1883-81, pp. 19 sqq. It is worthy of notice that the northern portions of the tract were governed from Kāśmīr even during Sikh rule.

K.'s references to Uraśā fully confirm the above identification, and show that the close connection with Kāśmīr which existed in Hiuen-tsiang's days, continued into later times. Under Kulāśa, Uraśā is occupied by a Kāśmīrian force which crosses the Kṛṣṇā river, i.e. the Kṛṣṇagandā; see vii. 525 sq. The direct route from Kāśmīr into Hazāra at present crosses this river above its junction with the Vitastā at Muzaffarābād. Abhaya, king of Uraśā, the son of Muṅga, subsequently appears with other dependent princes at the court of Kulāśa, vii. 589. The daughter of Abhaya was married to Bhoja, the son of King Harsa, viii. 16. Payment of tribute by Uraśā is mentioned in the reign of Sussala, viii. 574, and a victory of Jayasinha over Dvitiya, king of Uraśā, alluded to in K.'s own time, viii. 3403 (compare the note on this passage regarding the position of Atyugrapura, i.e. Agror in Hazāra).

From v. 225 we learn that it took the Kāśmīrian troops six days to reach the frontier of Kāśmīr territory at Bolyāzaka, from the place where S'ankaravarman was wounded. This locality has been identified in note v. 225 with the present Bulāṣa on the right bank of the Vitastā about four miles below Kathul. From the latter place exactly six daily marches are still counted to Abbottabad, the modern administrative centre of the Hazāra District; comp. Drew, Jummoo, p. 528. The route here followed (via Muzaffarābād, Garhi Habibullah and Mansahra) has always been considered the easiest line of communication between Kāśmīr and the regions to the W. It may, therefore, safely be assumed to have been used also by the Kāśmīr army on its return from the Indus.

In view of this, and the close agreement of the distances, it seems probable that the encounter with the inhabitants of Uraśā in which S'ankaravarman was mortally wounded took place somewhere in the hills about Abbottabad. It is to be noted in this connection that Manjali, where popular tradition, according to Cunningham, Anc. Geogr., p. 104, locates the ancient capital of the country, lies on this route between Abbottabad and Mansahra.

218. S'vapāka (also svapaca), literally 'dog-cooker,' is the designation of a despised low caste; comp. P.W., s.v. K. uses the term as the equivalent of domba; comp. v. 383, 390 sqq., 407; also vii. 1052.

225. When after six days they had reached the place called Bolyāsaka in their own [territory], and were free from fear, they performed his funeral rites.

226. Three queens, Surendravatī and [two] others, followed the king [to death], and also a clever and grateful Velāvitta (?) Jayasinhā by name

227. Two servants [also], Lāḍa and Vajrasāra, followed him. Thus he was quickly consumed by the fire, together with these six who had ascended the funeral pyre.

228. Then Gopāluvarman, who excelled in virtue and kept faithful to his engagements, ruled the earth under the guardianship of [his mother] Sugandhā.

229. Though living among favourites of low character, and still in his boyhood, he did not acquire bad habits.

230. The king's mother, who in her widowhood [became] very dissolute through sensual enjoyments, fell in love with the minister named *Prabhākara*deva.

231. Pleased with his ardent love, she bestowed upon him fortune, rank and love, like three crescents on a diadem.

232. As superintendent of the treasury (kośādhyakṣa), he plundered the riches of the amorous [queen] and vanquished the S'āhi kingdom at Udabhāṇḍapura.

233. He bestowed the kingdom of the rebellious S'āhi upon Toramāṇa, Lallīya's son, and gave him the [new] name Kamaluka.

S'AMKABAVARMAN
(A.D. 888-902).

GOPĀLAVARMAN
(A.D. 902-904).

225. The gloss of A, places Bolyāsaka 'in Dvāravatī near Varāhanūla.' It has already been shown in note v. 211 that Dvāravatī corresponds to the present Dvārbiḍī, the designation of that portion of the Vitastā Valley which extends from above Muzaffarābād to a short distance beyond the village of Bulīāsa. In the latter place, which is situated on the right bank of the Vitastā, 78° 51' long. 84° 11' lat., and on the old route from Muzaffarābād to Kāsmīr, we can safely recognize K.'s Bolyāsaka.

The name Peliāsa, under which this locality is shown on the map, is that in common use with the Pahārī population. The Kāsmīrīs, however, settled in the valley below Varāhanūla at Kathai, Haṭṭiān, and other places, pronounce invariably the name as Bulīāsa. Of this I was able to convince myself by inquiries made at different occasions and in different localities. Bulīāsa is phonetically the direct derivative of Bolyāsaka. Bulīāsa has given its name also to a well-populated valley which opens to the N. of the village. Regarding the position of Bulīāsa: Bolyāsaka on the old frontier of Kāsmīr territory in the Vitastā Valley, see note v. 214.

226. The meaning of the term velāvitta is uncertain. It recurs vi. 73, 106, 127, where it is used for the designation of some official or courtier of King Yaśaskara. In vi. 106 the velāvitta is referred to along with the friends, relatives, and servants of the king. A velāvitta in favour with Queen Diddā is mentioned vi. 324.—The formation of the word seems similar to that of prasādavitta, 'a favourite'; comp. vii. 290, 725, and N.P.W., s.v.

The form velāvittah, as conjecturally emended in the text of our passage, is actually found in L.

230. For *Prabhākara*deva's descent, see below v. 409 sqq.

231. I translate according to the reading of L. °candratrayā°, instead of A. °cakratrayā°. The former is recommended by the comparison of vii. 195, where a royal diadem is described as adorned with five crescents (candrakā).

232-233. Regarding the S'āhis and their capital, Udabhāṇḍa: Faihind, comp. Noto J, v. 152-155.

The identity of Toramāṇa-Kamaluka with Kamālī, the third ruler in Alberūnī's list of the 'Hindu Shāhiya dynasty' (India, ii. p. 13), has been shown in my paper, Zur Geschichte der Qāhis von Kātul, p. 200. A story of the Jamī-ul-Hikāyat (see ELLIOTT, History, ii. pp. 172, 423) makes Kamālī, 'Rai of Hindustān,' the contemporary of 'Amrī bin Lais, Governor of Khorāsān (A.D. 878-901). This agrees closely enough with the date which the Chronicle indicates for the expedition against

GOPĀLAVARMAN
(A.D. 902-904).

234. Then he returned and entered the city, swelled by victory and proud of his person, which was the abode of prowess and love.

235. This paramour of the king's mother, full of arrogance on account of the victory he had gained, daily caused the humiliation of brave men by the slights [he inflicted on them].

236. While he invested the royal palace, it was unapproachable for anyone else, just like the house of a courtesan [while occupied] by a low-class lover.

237. When King Gopālavarman had by degrees realized the state of things, this robber of his wealth and honour became for him a terrible eyesore.

238. When the king insisted on an inspection of the treasury-chests, he told him that all that was missing in the treasury had been spent on the expedition against the S'āhi.

239. Thereupon the treasurer became afraid of the king, and caused his relative Rāmadeva, who was versed in witchcraft (khārkhoda), to use sorcery [against the king].

240. Through this bewitchment, King Gopālavarman fell into a hot fever and died after a rule of two years.

241. The wicked Rāmadeva, when his misdeed became known, was terrified by fear of the king's punishment, and committed suicide.

ŚAṆKAṬA (A.D. 904).

242. Then Gopālavarman's brother Śaṅkaṭa, who had been picked up from the highway, obtained the throne. He died after ten days.

SUGANDHĀ
(A.D. 904-906).

243. Thereupon when King S'ankaravarman's lineage had died out, Sugandhā herself assumed the royal power at the bidding of the subjects.

244. She built [the town of] Gopālapura, the Gopālamattha, the [temple of Viṣṇu] Gopālakesava, and also a town called after her own name, for the increase of religion.

the S'āhi capital and Kamaluka's installation (Gopālavarman's reign, A.D. 902-904). The nameless S'āhi whom Kamaluka replaced according to K., is perhaps identical with Sāmantā (Sāmantā), the second S'āhi ruler in Alberūnī's list.

The reading Toramāyā of A., against A, Tomarāyā, is confirmed by L. The name Toramāyā is probably of Turkish origin (see Epigr. Ind., i. p. 239, and above, note iii. 103), and it is interesting to meet with it here in a dynasty which Alberūnī distinctly designates as Brahman. But we know that this dynasty had succeeded to an ancient family of undoubtedly Turkish descent, and can thus easily account for the survival of the name.

239. For the term khārkhoda, see note iv. D1.

244. The gloss of A., renders Gopālapura by Guripura. By the latter name probably the modern Gūr'pūr is meant, a small village on the left bank of the Vitastā below Avantipura, 75° 3' long, 33° 57' lat. I have not been able to trace any ancient remains at this place. A similar name, Gur'pūr, is borne by a small quarter in the Rān'vōr Zillah of S'rinagar.

The Gopālapura mentioned viii. 1471 is evidently a different place situated outside Kāśmir, in the region of Rājapuri (Rajauri). A ruler of Gopālapura is named by S'rivara, i. 508, among the princes of distant lands, who sent presents to Sultan Zain-ul-'ābidin.

The Gopālamattha and Gopālakesava are not otherwise known, nor can I trace any other reference to Sugandhāpura.

245. Nandū, the wife of Gopālavarmān, who was descended from an unblemished family, founded, though yet a child, the Nandāmaṭha and the [temple of Nandā]keśava.

246. Jayalakṣmī, a wife of Gopālavarmān, was at that time enceinte, and her mother-in-law, who was anxious to have the family continued, placed her reliance on her.

247. The child of this [queen] died after its birth, and the deeply-grieved [Sugandhā then] endeavoured to bestow the kingdom on some of her relatives.

248. At that period the host of Tantrin foot-soldiers had formed a confederacy, and was strong enough to punish or to favour the rulers of this [land].

249. Thereupon Sugandhū herself ruled for two years, relying on the Ekāṅgas and through the good-will of the Tantrins.

SUGANDHĀ
(A.D. 904-906).

Rise of the Tantrins' power.

245. L correctly °kāriṇī for A °dhāriṇī. Nothing is known as to the buildings here mentioned. The name Nandāmaṭha is rendered in the gloss of A, by Nandāmaṭha, which is probably intended to produce a Kś. form Nandamar*. (For Kś. mar < Skr. maṭha, frequent in names of city quarters, comp. Didmar : Diddāmaṭha, vi. 300, Braḍmar : Bhattārakamaṭha, vi. 240, etc.). No local name of this form seems now to be known.

246. Read with L antarvatnyām and patnyā for A antarvatnyāḥ and patnyā, respectively. For Jayalakṣmī as a proper name, see vii. 124.

248. The Tantrins, so frequently mentioned in the account of the succeeding reigns, appear to have formed in Hindu times a military caste of strong organization. The period of internal troubles between the accession of Pārtha and the defeat of Śaṁkarevardhana by Cakravarmān (see v. 249-340, A.D. 906-936), seems to have seen the power of the Tantrins at its height. They are represented by our narrative as true Praetorians. They formed also subsequently an important and often troublesome element in the army, in which they seem to have served chiefly as foot-soldiers. They are distinguished from the mounted forces, vii. 1513; vii. 375, 932, 937, and figure as royal guards, viii. 303; for other passages see the Index.

The name Tantrin survives in the tribal name or 'Kram' Tāntri, which is borne by a considerable section of the Muhammadan agriculturist population of Kāśmīr. Families claiming the Tāntri Kram may be found in most of the towns and villages throughout the Valley.

The distinctions of race or caste which may be supposed to have once separated the numerous Krams of the agricultural population have long ago disappeared. There is nothing now to distinguish a Tāntri family in appearance or customs from any other Musulmān villagers. Nor have I been able to trace any genuine tradition as to the original character of the Tāntri tribes. Compare on the complicated subject of the Kāśmīr Krams, Mr. LAWRENCE'S Valley, p. 306 sq. ("There is no restriction on marriage, and a Musulmān of the Tāntri Kram can either marry a Tāntre girl or any other maiden of the villages, provided she be one of the agricultural families.")

249. The exact meaning of the term ekāṅga cannot be established with certainty. It is frequently used in Tarāṅgas v-vii. for the designation of an armed force (see Index). It has not yet been found outside the Chronicles. Troyer and the authors of the P.W. have assumed that the Ekāṅgas were royal bodyguards, and various passages show that this interpretation cannot be far from the truth. They are mentioned, along with the Sāmantas (feudal lords), ministers, Tantrins and Kāyasthas (officials), as influencing the affairs of the court and state, v. 342, 446; vi. 91, 132; vii. 135. They fight with the Tantrins, who support another claimant to the crown, v. 289, and save Queen Didda from a rebel force, whose onslaught they oppose in orderly array at the palace gate, vi. 244. They protect King Anantadeva with equal devotion against a pretender, and are freed in return by the grateful prince from the harassing service at the 'Akṣapātala'; comp. vii. 155-162. It is in the vicinity of the Akṣapātala (see note v. 301), that Haraṣa endeavours to collect a force of Ekāṅgas for a final struggle, vii. 1604.

The latter references seem to show that the Ekāṅgas were a body organized in military

SUGANDHĀ
(A.D. 904-908).

250. On one occasion she assembled the ministers, feudal chiefs, Tantrins and Ekāṅgas in council, in order to invest some fit person with the regal power.

251-252. Her wish was to place upon the throne, since Avantivarman's family had died out, Nirjitavarman, a grandson of S'ūravarmān and son of Sukhavarman. He was born from her own relative Gaggā, and she hoped that, out of family attachment, he would follow her will.

PĀRTHA
(A.D. 906-921).

253-255. Some ministers remonstrated: "How can he be fit for the throne who has got the nickname Pangu ('the lame one'), because, after spending the night in dissipation, he sleeps all day and is unable to get up?" While they were thus combating the queen's proposal, the Tantrin foot-soldiers, who had united in a separate faction, made Pārtha, the son of Nirjitavarman, king. [He was then] ten years old.

256. They thought by the ousting of Sugandhā that they obtained revenge for the sayings of the treasurer (Prabhākaradeva) injurious to their honour.

257. Deprived of her sovereign power, she left the royal palace, making her rolling tears take the place of a necklace of pearls.

258. As she went out, she saw that every one of the old servants, who had appeared to her a supporter, made common cause with the enemies.

Sugandhā's return
(A.D. 914).

259. In the year [of the Laukika era three thousand nine hundred] eighty-nine (A.D. 914) the Ekāṅga troops went forth united, and brought back Sugandhā from Huṣkapura, where she had been staying.

260. When at the end of Caitra they heard of her approach, all the Tantrins, who had taken Pārtha's side, marched forth in fury, eager for battle.

261. Having arranged their masses in battle array, they defeated the Ekāṅgas, whose union was broken, in the month Vaiśākha of the year [of the Laukika era three thousand nine hundred] ninety (A.D. 914), and captured the flying [queen].

Death of Sugandhā.

262. After imprisoning her, they put her to death in the Niṣpālaka (?) Vihāra. Strange are the ways of fate, ever falling and rising.

fashion, but employed chiefly for police duties. Their modern counterpart in Kāśmīr would thus be the 'Paltan Nizāmat,' a regiment specially maintained until a few years ago for the support of the civil authorities, the collection of revenue, etc.; comp. LAWRENCE, Valley, p. 402. The gendarmes of continental Europe are an institution of similar origin.

261. For Sukhavarman, see v. 129.

257. The expression kṛtādhikārā seems to contain an allusion to the 'garland of office'

(adhikārasaṃ) given as the insignia of high office; comp. note vii. 1863.

259. The next verses show that Sugandhā's return must have fallen towards the end of the Laukika year 3989, i.e. in the early part of A.D. 914.

261. Read with L'saṃghātā babandhus tūh.

262. It is doubtful whether we have got in niṣpālakavihārāntas a name, as niṣpālaka could also be taken with P.W. as 'having no guardian.' No mention is made elsewhere of this Vihāra.

263. Then there arose in this noble land a series of misfortunes which caused the destruction of wealth and lives everywhere.

264. Pāṅgu (Nirjitavarman), the father, acted as the guardian of the child-king, and, together with the ministers, being bent only on the amassing of bribes, oppressed the people.

265. The kings were in the service of the Tantrins, and ousted each other, like village officials, by offering greater and greater bribes.

266. In this land, the rulers of which had conquered Kanyakubja and other [countries], the kings [now] maintained themselves by giving bills of exchange (huṇḍikā) to the Tantrins.

267-268. The sons of the minister Meruwardhana, the same who built at Purūpādhiṣṭhāna the illustrious [shrine of] Viṣṇu called Meruwardhanasvāmīn, at that time accumulated riches by oppressing the subjects. They intrigued in deep-laid plots, but hid [as yet] their aspiration to the throne.

269. Saṃkaravardhana, the oldest of them, formed a secret alliance with Sugandhāditya, and [together with him] secretly plundered the royal palace.

270. At that time, while the people suffered, the whole autumn rice crop was destroyed by a flood,—[this appeared] like a caustic thrown in a wound.

271. In the terrible year [of the Laukika era three thousand nine hundred] ninety-three (A.D. 917/8) the people were destroyed by a famine, as it was difficult to obtain food while the Khārī sold for a thousand [Dinnāras].

272. One could scarcely see the water in the Vitastā, entirely covered [as the river] was with corpses soaked and swollen by the water in which they had long been lying.

273. The land became densely covered with bones in all directions, until it was like one [great] burial ground, causing terror to all beings.

274. The king's ministers and the Tantrins became wealthy, as they amassed riches by selling stores of rice at high prices.

266. The huṇḍikā, mentioned again v. 275, 302, is certainly, as already recognized by Troyer, the huṇḍi of modern India. Detailed information as to the various kinds of huṇḍikās, their negotiation, etc., is given in the Loka-prakāśa, ii.

267-268. Regarding the identity of Purūpādhiṣṭhāna with the modern Pāndrūṭhan, see note iii. 99. In the well-preserved little temple still standing in the village of Pāndrūṭhan, we may safely recognize with Cunningham the Meruwardhanasvāmīn of our passage. The building stands at present in the water of a shallow tank which has occupied the place of the original courtyard. The temple has been noticed already by the earlier European travellers; comp. Mooncroft, Travels, ii. p. 240; Hügel, Kaschmir, i. p. 260; Vigne, Travels, ii. p. 38, etc. For a full description, see J.A.S.B., 1848, pp. 283 sqq., and Cole, Anc. Build., p. 29 with plate.

The rare word cākrika, 'intriguer,' is a favourite expression with K.; comp. vi. 272; viii. 289, 375, 580, etc. It is derived from cākrikā, 'intrigue,' iv. 376; v. 280, 296, etc., and is used in Mañkha's Kośa as a rendering of cālaka. The word is, perhaps, connected also with the expression cakramilana, viii. 2730.

PĀRTHA
(A.D. 906-921).

Great famine
(A.D. 917/8).

PĀRTHA
(A.D. 906-921).

275. The king would take that person as minister who raised the sums due on the Tantrins' bills, by selling the subjects in such a condition.

276-277. As one might look from inside his hot [bath-]room upon all the people outside distressed by the wind and rain of a downpour in the forest, thus for a long time the wretched Paṅgu, keeping in his palace, praised his own comfort while he saw the people in misery.

278. Thus demons of kings led to destruction at that time those subjects who had been dear to Tuṣṭīna [I.], Oandrāpīḍa, and other protectors of the people.

279. The kings at that time could nohow secure a long reign, and resembled the bubbles produced [in the water] by a downpour of rain on a dull day.

280. Sometimes Pārtha would gain the power for himself by ousting his father, sometimes [again] his father ousted him through intrigues with the Tantrins.

281. The young Sugandhāditya pleased the wives of Paṅgu by sexual intercourse, just as a stallion a troop of mares.

282. In ardent love-embraces he appeased the amorous desire of the Queen Bappatadevī, and she, again, by rich gifts his lust for wealth.

283-284. The lovely Queen Mrgāvatī, whom Meruvarādhana's sons had themselves given in marriage to Paṅgu, in order to establish their rule by the love-charms of their sister—she, too, of beautiful limbs, approached of her own accord Sugandhāditya in ardent desire, and enjoyed herself with him just as a loving woman with her beloved.

285. Daily he served in turn for the enjoyment of these two queens, just as one eating vessel [used in turn] by two wives of a poor man.

286. In order to secure the throne for their respective sons, these two vied with each other in offering to their minister as fees the pleasures of love, along with rich presents.

NIRJITAVARMAN,
(A.D. 921-928).

287. Then in the month of Pauṣa in the year [of the Laukika era three thousand nine hundred] ninety-seven (A.D. 921) Pārtha was overthrown by his father, Paṅgu, whom the Tantrins supported and installed as king.

CAKRAVARMAN
(A.D. 923-933).

288. This [prince], without merits [from previous births], died in the month of Māgha in the year [of the Laukika era three thousand nine hundred] ninety-eight (A.D. 923), after having placed on the throne his child-son named Cakravarmān.

289. Thereupon the Tantrin foot-soldiers, taking the side of Pārtha, who was anxious to seize his father's throne, fought a battle with the Ekāṅgas.

275. K. seems to refer to the mortgaging of villages for loans to pay up the Tantrins.

276. By uṣṇamandira the Hamām is meant, the favourite dwelling-place of a Kāśmīrī in the cold season; see i. 40.

278. Comp. for Tuṣṭīna I. and Can-drāpīḍa, ii. 11 sqq. and iv. 45 sqq., resp.

280. L reads rightly pitā for A °pyabhūt.

282. L correctly °ārthaiṣaṇām for A °ārthe-ṣaṇām.

286. By the expressions nidhuvanaśradāḥ and sadākṣṇā, an allusion is intended to the S'rādāḥ sacrifice with its accompanying fees (dakṣiṇā).

289. The reading of L °ayānuarai makes

290. The child-king was for some time under the guardianship of his mother, Bappaṭadevī, and [then] for ten years under that of his grandmother, Kṣīlīkā.

OAKRAVARMAN
(A.D. 923-933).

291. Since youth hid his wicked character, no fault attached to the fostering care which these two [bestowed] upon him, just as if they had fondled a snake while yet in the egg-shell.

292. Then in the year [of the Laukika era four thousand and] nine (A.D. 933/4) the Tantrins overthrew Oakravarmān and made S'ūravarmān [I.], the son of Paṅgu from Mṛgāvatī, king.

S'ŪRAVARMAN I.
(A.D. 933-934).

293. His uncles and ministers, who cherished no affection and were solely looking to their own advantage, caused the overthrow of this king by not paying what was due to the Tantrins.

294. Though this prince was of good character, he could as little find favour with the Tantrins without rich gifts, as a man of good qualities [could find favour] with courtesans [without rich presents].

295. When a year had passed, the Tantrin foot-soldiers deposed him, and seeing the chance of profit, made the liberal Pārtha once more king.

PĀRTHA restored
(A.D. 934-935).

296. The courtesan Sāmbavatī, a mistress of Pārtha, who was known for the skilful plotting by which she conciliated the bands of Tantrins, founded the [shrine of S'iva] Sāmbesvara.

297. Then in the month Āṣāḍha of the year [of the Laukika era four thousand and] eleven (A.D. 935) Oakravarmān, who awaited his time and offered great riches, was once more made king.

OAKRAVARMAN restored (A.D. 935).

298-300. The sons of Meruvardhana had before profited by their intrigues in ousting Pārtha and the other [kings], though they had in various positions obtained their sustenance from those very [kings]. They had ousted from the throne his father and brother, and after giving a girl (Mṛgāvatī) in marriage, had again and again done injury to their relations. Yet upon them, whose faults had thus become evident, that [king] of perverted mind bestowed offices.

301. He made S'amkharavardhana superintendent of the Akṣapaṭala, and placed the false and deceitful S'ambhuvardhana in charge of the Gṛhakṛtya [office].

the Ekaṅgas the partisans of Pārtha; but see v. 295.

296. The gloss of A₂ places this shrine in 'the village of Sāmborāṇa.' Perhaps, the modern Sāmbur is meant, a small village on the right bank of the Vitasta, 74° 59' long. 33° 58' lat. (map 'Samra'). No ancient remains can now be traced at the place.

297. Read with L tato yucchan dhanam for A tato pyaichad dhanam.

301. The exact application of the term akṣapaṭala is not quite certain. It does not seem to occur in other published texts, and has been variously interpreted. The P.W., following Troyer and referring to akṣa, 'law-suit,' gives to akṣapaṭala the meaning 'court of justice.' The N.P.W. takes it as 'archive,' and this interpretation is accepted by Prof. Jolly, Festgabe an A. Weber, p. 86.

Our safest guide is, perhaps, the gloss of A₂ on v. 389, which explains akṣapaṭala as the gaganādhipatiṣṭhāna, i.e. 'office of the Accountant-General,' and gives aṭṭala as the modern equivalent of the term. This word

CAKRAVARTMAN REstored (A.D. 985).

302. As, from want of money, he could not pay to the Tantrins [the amounts] due on bills, he fled in fear in the month Pauṣa of the same year.

303. While he stopped in Maḍavarājya, S'amkaravardhana, who aspired to the throne, sent S'ambhuvardhana to negotiate with the Tantrins.

S'AMBHUVARDHANA
(A.D. 935-936).

304. The latter deceived his elder brother, and after winning over all of them by repeated promises of yet greater bribes, got them to instal himself on the throne.

305. The Timi fish, though living in sacred water, feeds upon his own kind. The heron, keeping silence [like a hermit], stalks the Timi and eats him. Then the hunter, living on the outskirts of the forest [like an ascetic], kills the heron. Thus one gets above the other by employing greater and greater skill in deceit.

306. On one occasion Cakravartman, after losing his throne, came to the house of the Ḍāmara Saṁgrāma, who lived at S'riḍhakkha.

307. The Ḍāmara recognized the king by his beautiful appearance, and making obeisance with folded hands, led him in haste to his own seat.

308. After he had related how he had lost his kingdom, and the rest, and had asked for help, the Ḍāmara, who thought that he had been made gracious [only] by misfortune, spoke thus to him with deference :

309. "Tantrins or blades of grass, are they counted in battle? Which is the task in which I should not be ready to help you?"

310. "But assuredly, when you have attained power, you will destroy us. For kings forget the help given as soon as their object is achieved."

[311-323. Verses describing generally the proverbial ungratefulness of kings towards those who have helped them in distress.]

aṭṭale is no longer known in Kāśmīr. The passages which mention the akṣapaṭala, permit of the interpretation indicated in the gloss.

From our own passage, as well as v. 389; vi. 287, it is evident that the 'superintendent of the Akṣapaṭala' held an important post. In v. 398, we read of a land-grant being executed in the Akṣapaṭala by the recorder of official documents (paṭṭopādhyāya). Of special interest are the passages vii. 103, 1604, 1609, already discussed in note v. 249. They show the military police of the Ekāṅgas attached to the Akṣapaṭala office. It is now curious to note that the modern Daftar-i Niṣāmat which until the recent administrative changes represented in Kāśmīr the 'Accountant-General's office' of modern Indian administration, had actually under its control the force called Paitun Niṣāmat, to which that of the Ekāṅgas, as shown in note v. 249, closely corresponds.

If the meaning given by the gloss is correct, the five gaṇanāsthānas referred to in iv. 691 may be supposed to have been subordinate sections of the Akṣapaṭala. From an inscription (Epigr. Ind., i. p. 73), Prof. Jolly, l.c., quotes the title mahākṣapaṭalādīhikaraṇādīkṛtya given to a high official who issues a royal land-grant. The word akṣapaṭaliya occurs in a list of miscellaneous terms given in the Loka-prakāśa, i.

Regarding the grīhakṛtya office, see v. 167.

302. The luni-solar month Pauṣa of the Laukika year 4011 began on the 14th November, A.D. 985.

305. L. cañautāyāḥ as emended in Ed.

306. The position of S'riḍhakkha is unknown. Regarding the significance of ḍhakkha, see v. 39.

311-323. For translations of these verses, see BÖHTLINGK, Ind. Sprüche, passim.

324. "Therefore, if you promise to look upon us at all times in kindness, I march before you with troops on the very morrow."

S'AMKARAVARDHANA
(A.D. 985-986).

325. On hearing these words, the king replied, with his lips lit up by a smile of embarrassment: "I shall protect you who have first come to my assistance, as my own self."

326. Thereupon king and Dāmara placed their foot on a sheepskin sprinkled with blood, and mutually took an oath by sacred libation (kośa) sword in hand.

327. Then in the morning, Cakravartman, having collected a numberless host of fierce Dāmaras, set forth to reach the capital.

328. Simultaneously, on the eighth day of the bright half of Caitra, the Tantrin foot-soldiers marched out for battle with S'amkaravardhana at their head. Cakravartman's victory over the Tantrins (A.D. 936).

329. Cakravartman hastened to display his personal valour which he had [hitherto] hidden, while awaiting his time, and with which they had not reckoned.

330. When the terrible fight had commenced outside Padmapura, he spurred on his steed and slew first S'amkaravardhana.

331. As soon as the leader had been killed there, the Tantrin army dispersed in a hundred directions, resembling a ship tossed about on the ocean by the fierce onslaught of a storm.

332. The king, in hot pursuit, cut off their escape by the quickness of his horse and their heads in rows by his sword.

333. As Cakravartman rushed about in battle, the numerous fringes of his head-band (vīrapaṭṭa) appeared like the bushy mane of a lion.

326. By the equivalent expressions kośam kr or kośam pā ('to drink the draught'), K. refers repeatedly to the oath taken by means of a sacred libation; comp. vii. 8, 450, 747; viii. 2091, 3006. Persons who have taken such an oath are spoken of as pītaśośa (iv. 558; v. 422; vi. 225; vii. 492; viii. 280, 1656), or kośapīthīn (v. 423; vi. 211). This form of oath is well-known to several of the Smṛtis, where it figures under the name of kośa as one of the nine kinds of ordeal; see Prof. JOLLY's Recht u. Sitte, p. 145; Yājñavalkya, ii. 112 sq.; Nārada, i. 326 sqq.; Tīrṇa, xiv. A sacred image is bathed in water, and the person to whom the oath is administered, is made to swallow a certain quantity of this consecrated water. If any calamity befall him or any near relative of his within a certain subsequent period, it is taken as a proof of his guilt.

The texts quoted by Prof. Jolly (l.c. p. 140), know of the kośa ordeal or oath both as a means of exculpation and as a procedure calculated to create confidence with reference to a subsequent transaction. K.'s references in the above quoted passages fully illustrate this second employ of the 'Kośa.' We find it there taken either on occasions of a reconciliation between former enemies when a solemn assurance of mutual goodwill for the future is desired, or more frequently in connection with secret confederations and conspiracies. In the latter case the Kośa is intended to secure mutual faithfulness, and to guarantee secrecy among the confederates.

The gloss of A. on our passage and vii. 459 render kośa rightly by divya, 'sacred oath'; comp. also the gloss of A. iv. 558 (śapatha).

Our passage and viii. 3006 refer to another curious custom accompanying the ceremony of kośapīna. By the words of the text, and the explanation given in the gloss of A., we are led to assume that those who went through that ceremony had to place their legs crosswise on a sheepskin over which blood had been sprinkled. I am unable to trace such a custom elsewhere in India.

Ś'AMBHUVARDHANA
(A. D. 985-986).

334. What more [need be said]? Five or six thousand Tantrins fell killed in a short time on the field of battle.

335. Caṅkravarman laid the Tantrins on the ground to rest, as it were, from the brunt of the battle in the shade of the vultures' wings.

336. The valiant S'amkaravardhana adorned the bed of heroes (the battle-field), together with his dead followers of noble descent and good qualities.

337. Who did not envy the Tantrins, who found in close union their success and in close union their end?

338-340. The evil-lived Tantrins had previously, like cruel snake-charmers, reduced princes deserving of respect, unapproachable, and of great descent, to helplessness, as if [they had been tamed] snakes. Making over new demands, they had wantonly, for the sake of their living, exposed them to shame in playful tricks. Caṅkravarman, who felt deep indignation at this contemptuous treatment, destroyed them in a moment, as [if he had been] a great snake, with the hot poison of his secret hatred.

CAṅKRĀVARMAN king
a third time (A. D.
986-987).

341-347. Then on the second day, while the brave S'ambhuvardhana collected the Tantrins, broken up as they were, Caṅkravarman, in the glory of his victory, entered the city surrounded with affection by the feudal chiefs, ministers, and Ekāṅgas who had met him. His shouting troops, who marched on various routes, extended to the horizon. He rode in the midst of his horsemen on a noble steed, which seemed to dance. With his left, which held the reins, he raised his helmet when it slid down. His earrings were illuminated by the rays proceeding from his sword, which reflected the sun, and which was held in the glistening grasp of his other sweating hand. He struck terror by his rigid face, where his brows were contracted in frowns, and which showed the pain caused to his neck by his high armour. With exclamations of disgust, he threatened the marauders who had looted the shops. He encouraged the frightened citizens by signs with his head and his eyes, and the ears he deafened by the din of his kettle-drums, which drowned the benedictory exclamations of the citizens.

348. While he stopped on to the great throne elated with victory, Bhūbhāṣa brought up S'ambhuvardhana from some place in fetters.

349. This wretched man, to show his faithfulness, killed like a Caṇḍāla before the king the prisoner, who, from fear of the stroke, had closed his eyes.

350. From S'ambhuvardhana onwards, servants, in disregard of the sacred law, began treacherously to murder kings who ought to be esteemed like fathers.

336. An allusion to the bamboos (vanśa) and strings (guṇa) of the Indian bedstead is intended.

351. King Cakravartman, after he had got his kingdom clear of enemies, became in time filled with overbearing, and committed cruel and evil acts.

Cakravartman king
a third time
(A.D. 936-937).

352. Led away by the delight of ruminating over panegyrical descriptions of his valiant deeds, he fell under the power of parasites, bards, and other flatterers.

353. Deceived in his mind by these praises, he thought himself a god, and thus committed acts which were devoid of judgment.

354. At that time the king granted an audience in the outer [reception hall] to a famous Domba singer called Raṅga, who had come from abroad.

Raṅga, the Domba, received at court.

355. The doorkeepers seated in proper order the ministers and chiefs who had come, and made an open space before the king.

356. The assembly was lit up by the glitter of lamps, and made resplendent by the white head-dresses, and thus resembled the couch formed by S'eṣa, which is illuminated by the jewels borne on his serpent-hoods.

357. The cool evening winds, which sportively played in the garlands formed by the royal ladies' braids of hair, spread perfume.

358. The rows of round windows were lit up by the faces, fragrant with spirits, of the gazelle-eyed [ladies] of the seraglio who were anxious to watch the musical performance.

359. Then the Domba-singer stepped forward, followed by his band, which was resplendent with necklaces, golden bracelets on arms and hands, and other [ornaments].

360. His sweet-eyed daughters, Hamsī and Nāgalatā, made those assembled stretch their necks in curiosity, and keep [motionless] as if painted.

[361-386. The Domba girls win the heart of the king by their singing and acting, which are described in conventional Kāvya fashion. The enamoured king, encouraged by the sophisms of one of his favourites, pays no regard to the low caste of the singers, and takes Hamsī and Nāgalatā into his seraglio. He falls wholly into the snares of their arts of love.]

367. Hamsī was raised by the love-blind king to the rank of chief queen, and enjoyed among the king's wives the fanning with the Chowries.

368. Those who partook of the food left over by her, had their seats in the court, not only of Cakravartman, but of other subsequent kings.

369. Cunning subservience to the Dombas led to the rise of ministers, and secured important offices like the Akṣapaṭala and others.

370. L pritimān vyājā° better than A pratināvyājā°. verso translated Ind. Sprüche, 6005, comp. gloss of A₂.

374. L viraham preferable to A viraha. 388. Comp. vi. 69.

378. For the correct interpretation of this v. 301. 389. Regarding the akṣapaṭala, see note

CAKRAVARTMAN king
a third time
(A.D. 936-937).

390. Some S'vapākas (i.e. Dombas) did not themselves act as counsellors, as they were fools, but others who were clever, managed the king's affairs as if they were ministers.

Dombas in power.

391. Robbers as ministers, a S'vapāka-woman as queen, S'vapākas as friends: What wonders were [left] for King Calatravarmān [to achieve]?

392. Having bathed after menstruation, the S'vapāka woman made presents of her clothes bearing menstrual stains, and the ministers came to court with the proud ambition to dress themselves in such [clothes].

393. Those few, who, even at the risk of the king's enmity, did not eat at that time the food remnants of the S'vapākas, were equal to the drinkers of Soma.

394. Surely gods of fierce might did not [then] dwell in this land. Otherwise how could then a S'vapāka woman have entered their temples?

395. When she went, on the festival of Tiladvādasi, to visit the [temple of Viṣṇu] Itanāsuvāmin, only the proud Dāmaras among the chiefs did not follow her.

396. An order coming from the mouth of the Dombas, who were proud of their relationship with the king, was respected by everybody as a royal [order], which has to be obeyed.

397-398. When the king had granted the village of Helu to Raṅga as an Agraḥāra, and the recorder of official documents (paṭṭopādhyāya) did not execute the document relating to the grant (dāmapaṭṭaka), then Raṅga proceeded to the Akṣapaṭṭala [office] and thus addressed that [official] in anger: "You son of a slavo, why do you not write: 'Raṅgassa Helu dāṇu' ('Helu to be granted to Raṅga')?"

399. Thereupon he wrote with trembling, frightened by the frowns of Raṅga. What break of decency will not occur under a king of evil conduct?

400. When that [wicked] king inquired as to the expiation of the sin of having had intercourse with that outcast woman, his parasites made him perform ridiculous penances (prāyaścitta).

401. "As snow dissolves snow, so too one sin the other." Thus the parasites told that king of vile character.

393. The eating of food remnants is generally prohibited by the Smṛtis; comp. e.g. Mān. iv. 211; Viṣṇu. ii. 10.

395. The tīladvādasi is a festival celebrated on the 12th day of the dark half of Māgha, when sesamum grains (tīla) are to be offered in sacrifice, etc. The Nīlamata, 488 sq., mentions the Tiladvādasi, and indicates the six-fold rites to be performed on that day with sesamum; from these the festival derives its popular name in Kaśmīr, ṣaṭtīla; comp. P. W., s.v. ṣaṭtīladāna, also Padmapur. i. lvii. 24 sq.

Regarding the temple of Itanāsuvāmin, see note iii. 454.

397-398. The words quoted in the original represent the modern Kaśmīrī Itanāsa Helu dāṇu. The use of the vernacular instead of the official Sanskrit is to characterize the boorishness of the Domba. We have in these words probably the earliest extant specimen of Kaśmīrī.

401. K. had here perhaps the Kaśmīrī proverb in mind: nuv śin chu gūlān prāṇis śinas, 'fresh snow makes old snow melt'; comp. viii. 505.

402. Wishing to remove the sin of intercourse with an impure person by intercourse with a pure one, he dishonoured the wife of a Brahman, who was engaged in a monthly fast.

CAKRAVARMAN king
a third time
(A.D. 936-937).

403. At that time there were some Brahmans even more sinful than he, who took food in his palace and accepted Agrahāras even from him.

404. Bad as he was, he founded the Cakramaṭha for the residence of Pāśupata ascetics. It was half-built when he died, and was completed by his wife.

405. Forgetting their former help, this royal lover of a S'vapāka woman treacherously killed guiltless Dāmaras who trusted in him.

406. Some Dāmara robbers who had his confidence, kept near him in order to kill him by deceit, and waited for an opportunity to carry out their treason.

407. Once they found him at night unarmed relieving himself in the privy which was near the bed-chamber of the S'vapāka woman.

408. Then having found their opportunity, they let suddenly fall upon him, from all sides and quickly, an uninterrupted stream of numberless sharp weapons.

409. When, his eyes yet dimmed by sleep, he was awakened by the strokes of the weapons, he raised terrible cries, just like a person who falls into a pond while asleep on the bank.

410. Searching for a weapon, as he was unarmed, and streaming with torrents of blood, he ran and entered that bed-chamber, followed by his assailants.

411. He found no weapon, and following him, they killed him in the embrace of the crying S'vapāki, while his body rested on her swelling breasts.

412. Freely urged on by the king's own wives, they crushed his knees with a large stone as he lay dying.

413. He who had been exploited by the S'vapākas, was killed by robbers in a privy like a dog, on the eighth day of the bright half of Jyaiṣṭha in the year [of the Laukika era four thousand] thirteen (A.D. 937).

414. Then the wicked son of Pūrtha, called Unmattāvantī, was inaugurated by S'arvaṭa and other foolish ministers.

UNMATTĀVAN I
(A.D. 937-939).

415. After the wicked lover of the S'vapāki had been slain at night by the robbers, one who was worse than wicked became king through the sinfulness of the subjects.

416. With difficulty I get my song to proceed, since from fear of touching the evil of this king's story it keeps back like a frightened mare.

417. This evil ruler, resembling a demon, was to consume his paternal family, just as the kind of fire called Aurva [consumes] the water.

The v.l. recorded in the gloss of A, which makes the king violate one of his father's wives, is evidently a needless conjecture.

404. No further mention is made of this Matha.

417. The submarine fire is meant.

UNMATTĀVANTI
(A.D. 937-989)

Rise of Parvagupta.

418. His chief ministers were those who could make music with their noses, shoulders, etc., and who would bang their skulls with knocks and blows.

419. In the character of strolling singers those very ministers amused him without shame, who were destined to become rulers in the course of time.

420. But dearer than all was to him Parvagupta, who danced in the royal assembly with his loin-cloth taken off.

421. Parvagupta had ever since the Tantrin troubles seen kings who were like worms, and was always bent on securing the throne.

422. Then in secret desire of the throne he closed friendship with the five chief ministers, Bhūbhaka and the others, [all] taking an oath by sacred libation (pītakośa).

423. Bhūbhaka, S'urvaśa, Choja, Kumuda, and Amṛtākara, took the oath by sacred libation, and entered a league with Parvagupta.

424. In the house of the Ḍamara Saṅgrāma there lived Rakka, a Brahman of well-known valour, who had found the goddess S'ri in the water of the Gavākṣā lake.

425. The king noticed his courage in a battle while he was a mere foot-soldier, and raised this [man], who had a big body and great belly, to the position of prime minister (mukhyamantritā).

426. He raised [an image of] the goddess S'ri just [in the form] as she had appeared to him in the lake, under the appellation of Rakkajayādevī.

427. The king destroyed his own family at the instigation of the cunning Parvagupta, who wished to seize the kingdom when it had been cleared of rivals.

Pārtha murdered.

428. Pārtha, whom he had despoiled of all property, lived together with his wives in the illustrious Jayendravihāra, where the S'rīmanas gave him food.

429. S'umkaravarman and his other brothers, who were yet children and lived there, he kept confined, and caused them to die of hunger.

418. In the Ed. the words from ṭakkarū to skandā had erroneously been shown as proper names. The correct interpretation has already been indicated by the P.W.; see ss.vv. ṭakkara, ṭāhkāra. skanda stands in Kāśmīrī MSS. regularly for skandha, 'shoulder.' The P.W. combines ghrāṇaskanda, and gives for it the conjectural meaning of 'blowing the nose, grunting.' Whichever interpretation is adopted, it is clear that various clowns'-tricks are referred to; comp. viii. 98 sqq., 1614.

424. I am unable to make any suitable sense with the reading of the text 'jalo 'nāgalā', and have translated according to a conjectural emendation 'jalo 'nālagā'. For ava-ālay, 'to reside, to live,' see vii. 1232, where the same clerical error as supposed here is found in one MS. (avāgalan instead of avālayan); see also N.P.W., s.v. ava-ālay.

The position of the Gavākṣā lake (saras) is uncertain. The Nilamata, 1033, mentions in a list of Tīrthas a goddess (Gavākṣī), but gives no indication as to the position of her Tīrtha. This goddess may possibly have been worshipped in the lake referred to in our passage.

Regarding the miraculous appearance of a goddess in the water of a sacred lake, comp. i. 35 (Sarasvatī at Bheḍagiri).

425. For mukhyamantritā, compare note vi. 199.

428. For the Jayendravihāra, see iii. 355.

430. He was anxious to kill his father. Upon those ministers who gave their consent, he bestowed head-dresses, but the others he put in fotters.

431. On a certain night, ministers, chiefs, Tantrins, officials and troops, obeying his orders, surrounded Pārtha.

432-434. Kumuda and other favourites of the king struck down his wife, who, in faded and ragged garments, barred the door, while her crying children clung to her like young calves [to their mother-cows]. They dragged him from the house and pulled him along by his hair, while the stones of the ground scratched his body, just as a dead ox [is dragged] from the cattle-pen. Like Caṇḍālas they killed him unarmed as he was, emaciated by hunger and parched up, crying and naked.

435. When the king heard that his father had been killed, he came in the morning full of curiosity, together with his confidants, and looked at him in delight.

436. The king's officers extolled before him their own prowess, [each] saying : "Here at this limb I have struck him."

437. Parvagupta had at that time been admitted again by the king, after having been in disfavour. In order to gratify him, he urged on his son, named Devagupta.

438. The latter thereupon struck his dagger into the body of the dead Pārtha. Amused thereby, the king struck up a long-continued laugh.

439. The land which at the death of Caṅkavarmān had been plundered by the Dāmaras, was punished even more severely by the employ of wicked Kāyasthas.

440. Instigated by wretched companions, he exercised himself in the use of arms by hitting naked women in the hollow between their breasts with thrown daggers.

441. He had the womb of pregnant women cut open in order to see the child, and also cut off limbs of labourers to test their power of endurance.

442. From an obstinate desire for gifts, or from fear of a terrible death, there were [found] Brahmins who accepted Agrahāras even from this, the most degraded of kings.

443. Then the king became afflicted with a consumptive disease which was a fit [punishment] for his cruel sins, and suffered immeasurable pains.

444. Not only his subjects were delighted by these sufferings of his, but also the fourteen queens of his own seraglio.

445-448. The parricide miscreant king, when his descent to hell was near, placed on the throne a young child called S'ūravarman, whom the servant-girls of his seraglio had procured from somewhere and falsely declared to be the king's son, and entrusted him to the chiefs, councillors, Ekāṅgas and Tantrins. He was in terror of Kamalavardhana, the commander-in-chief (kampanādhīpati), who stood in Maḍuvavājya, [and had shown himself] capable of uprooting the Ḍāmaras, as he had made him his enemy. Then he died through the subjects' merits in the month Āṣāḍha of the year [of the Laukika era four thousand] fifteen (A.D. 939).

✓ 447. The term kampana or kampanā, which in contained in kampanādhīpati and in similar designations of frequent occurrence in the following narrative, has hitherto by all inter-

UNMATTĀVANTI
(A.D. 987-989).

S'ŪRAVARMAN II.
(A.D. 939).

449. The child-king, the son of the parricide, proceeded on the seventh day of the bright half of Āṣāḍha to visit the [temple of the] sun-god [called] Jayasvāmin.

450. The youthful king's glory shone forth like a young maid, her charming braids of hair being [represented by] swords, and her [bright] laugh [by the dazzling] umbrella and Chowries.

Kamalavardhana's rising.

451. In the meantime, Kamalavardhana, informed by the report of the spies preters, from Wilson (History, p. 73) to Dutt, been taken as the name of a territory in or near Kaśmīr. The synonym expressions, kampanādhīpati, kampanādhīpa, kampanādhīsa, kampanāpati, kampanesa, have accordingly been interpreted as referring to the governor or feudal lord of this supposed territory. THOMSEN, Rājat., iii. p. 569, proposed to identify 'Kampana' with the Ki-pin of the Chinese, or the valley of the Kabul river. LASSEN, Ind. Alt., iii. p. 1049, connected the name with the river Kampanā mentioned in the Mahā-śharata, and looked for 'Kampanā' somewhere in eastern Kabulistan. No mention of this supposed territory has been found outside the Chronicle, nor has any evidence ever been adduced as to the term kampana in the Rājat. being really used as a local name.

An examination of all passages furnishes convincing proof that kampana and its equivalent kampanā is a term for 'army,' and that by kampanādhīpati, kampanāpati, etc., is meant the king's commander-in-chief or general. The passages in which the simple kampana (masc. or neut.) occurs, indicate for it either directly the meaning 'army,' as, e.g. vii. 365, 1319; viii. 575, or mention it as an important official charge side by side with the dvāra (see note v. 214), the rājasthāna, and other great offices; comp. e.g. vi. 269; vii. 887; viii. 180, 1046, 1624, 1982.

Among the passages in which the kampanādhīpati, kampanesa, etc., is referred to, vii. 1882-86 is, perhaps, the most instructive. When King Harṣa is hard pressed by the pretender Uccala and his relatives, no minister ventures to take charge of the 'kampana.' At last Candrarāja accepts it, and leads the king's troops against the enemy. He is then directly spoken of as senīpati, and compared to Drauṇi, who took the leadership of the Kauravas in their final struggle. The leader of the rebel force whom Candrarāja defeats, is referred to as vipakṣa kampanesa, 'the enemy's general.'

In viii. 1676 we read of the king reinforcing the kampanesa's camp by fresh troops. In viii. 688 a precipice (śvalhva), which has caused the death of a rebel leader, is jestingly spoken of as the victorious 'general (kampanesa) śvalhva.' In the great mass of the passages the Kampanādhīpati, etc., figures as, what his title really indicates, the leader of the royal troops in expeditions, fights, sieges, etc.; comp. e.g. vii. 221, 287, 579; viii. 509, 599, 627, 652, 669, 698, 1039, 1510, 1580, 1674, 1840, 2029, 2190, 2205, etc. For other references, see the Index.

In the Lokaprakāśa, iv. (commencement), the kampanāpati is mentioned in a list of the great state-officers between the dvārapati (i.e. 'the lord of the Gate,' see note v. 214) and the śvapati, 'the general of horse.' The text is corrupt, but seems to describe the kampanāpati as: prajānām paramaḥ kampano mahakampana nīvarayet.

It is curious that the term kampana has not yet been found in any of the published Kośas.

449. This shrine is probably identical with that of the Jayasvāmin image referred to in iii. 350 (see note).

who had come in haste, reached the vicinity of the city, accompanied by feudal chiefs.

S'UBHĀVARMA II.
(A.D. 939).

*452. As he entered the city tired, together with his troops, he was stopped by Ekāṅgas, Tantrins, feudal chiefs, and . . . horsemen.

453. He went forth tired out by the fights [he had had] on the march with the opposing Dāmaras. Yet he overcame the enemy's forces, as he was strengthened by valour.

454. After having with a few horsemen put to flight a thousand cavalry, he rapidly entered the royal palace without meeting opposition.

455. When the troops heard of his victory, they fled and deserted the child-king, who, left alone, was taken away by his mother.

S'UBHĀVARMA II.
deposed.

456. Confused by acts done in a previous existence, or led astray by bad advisers, Kamalavarṇhana foolishly did not ascend the throne.

457. Not being versed in politics, he went that day to his own residence, and on the following collected all the Brahmans, and canvassed them in his desire for the royal power.

458. "Make a countryman of yours, strong and full-grown, king." Thus [he told them, and] in his simplicity thought that they would make him king on account of his ability.

459-460. Who is more to be pitied than he, who, having found a coy young woman alone in a solitary place and intoxicated, does not enjoy her owing to timorousness, but solicits her favours the next day through a messenger,—or than he, who, having gained the power by force, lets it slide from his hands that moment, and strives for it on the next day through diplomacy?

461. When Utpala's dynasty then had come to an end, the Brahmans, dressed in coarse woollen cloaks, assembled in the Gokula, resembling bulls without horns.

Brahman assembly.

462. Long lasted the discussion as to the disposal of the crown, while those [Brahmans] whose beards were scorched by smoke, wished to raise this man or that to the throne.

452. I have left the word syūlahāraka untranslated, as I do not know its meaning. It is possibly a local name.

461. A specific sacred building seems to be meant here, perhaps the same Gokula the construction of which is mentioned v. 23. In viii. 900, the Gokula is referred to as the locality where Brahmans assemble to perform a prāyopaveśa. The literal meaning of the name (cattle-pon) suggests the simile.

462. K., in his not very complimentary but life-like description of the assembled Brahmans, refers here evidently to the burn-marks left by the kāṅṅṛ, or brazier, which has been in general use in Kāśmīr since early times. The Kāṅṅṛ, with its hot embers, is slipped under the voluminous Kāśmīrī gown and worn on the breast; it scarcely ever leaves the poorer classes during winter. The people sleep with it, and in a sitting posture invariably bend their head over the glowing coals. Thus few of the people escape without burn-marks; comp. LAWRENCE, Valley, p. 250. Regarding the mention of the Kāṅṅṛ (hasantikā) in S'rikanṭha, iii. 29, see Dr. HULTZSCH, Ind. Ant., xv. p. 57. Its Kś. name is in all probability derived from Skr. hṛdśphāṅgūrīkā.

Interregnum after
S'ŪRAVARMAN II.
(A.D. 939).

463. While they disputed with each other, nobody received the water of inauguration. Only their own beards [were wetted] by the spittings they ejected in their rough talk.

464. When the simple-minded Kamalavardhana came to recall himself to the memory of [those] Brahmans searching for a person fit for the throne, they drove him away throwing bricks [at him].

465-466. While the Brahmans in this fashion passed five or six days, there assembled an immense host of Purohitas of sacred places (pāriṣadya), causing a mighty din by their drums, cymbals and other musical instruments, raising glittering flags, ensigns and umbrellas, and carrying seats on load-animals.

467. Kamalavardhana felt pained when he saw the regal power in the hands of others, just as [if he saw] his own wife turned into a courtesan.

468. Then the wife of the parricide [king] sent officials to those engaged in voluntary starvation (prūyopaveśa), to beg the throne [from them] for her supposititious son.

Yaśaskara chosen as king.

469-475. In the village of Piśācukūpura, a householder, Viśadeva by name, had a son called Kāmadeva. This son, being distinguished by good qualities, such as the pious performance of ablutions, etc., and having acquired a knowledge of the Akṣaras, became a boys' teacher in the house of Meruvardhana, and in course of time treasurer (gañjādihikārīn). Then his son Prabhākara obtained gradually the position of treasurer under King S'ambhavarman; he was also the secret paramour of Sugandhā. His son, the learned Yaśaskara, whether on account of the enmity between Lakṣmī (Fortune) and Sarasvatī (Learning), or through the calamities of the country, became wretchedly poor, and went abroad, together with a friend called Phalguṇaka. Cheered by auspicious dreams and the benedictions of the Piṭhadevī, he (Yaśaskara) had at that time returned to his native land full of ambition. On account of his eloquence, the envoys sent by the parricide's wife took him up on their way, as they went to talk over the Brahmans, and thus he came before the latter.

463. I read with A, rūṣabhāṣya^o and emend svakūreā śhivanaiḥ for svakūreṣṭhī^o.

465-466. Regarding the pāriṣadyas and their corporations, see note ii. 132.

They appear on the scene, as v. 468 shows, in order by a solemn fast to force the Brahman assembly to come to a decision regarding the future king. The pāriṣadyas seem often to have adopted this procedure, and thus to have played an important part in political complications; comp. viii. 709 and viii. 900 sqq. In the latter interesting passage they are represented as bringing the sacred images and paraphernalia of their shrines along with them to the city when proceeding en masse to their fast.

469-475. Regarding Meruvardhana and Prabhākara, see above v. 267 and v. 230, resp.

By Piṭhadevī is meant probably, as the P.W., s.v. pīṭha, suggests, a form of Durgā worshipped at one of the pīṭhasthānas. These are 'the fifty-one places where, according to the Tantras, the limbs of Satī fell, when scattered by her husband S'iva after she had put an end to her existence at Dakṣa's sacrifice' (Viṣṇu Pur., iv. p. 261).

476. When the Brahmins saw him by the will of fate they became of one accord, and raised the loud cry: "Let him indeed be king."

Interregnum after
S'UNAVARMAN II.
(A. D. 939).

477. Then the Brahmins came quickly to Yasaskara, who had full strength to maintain the earth, and sprinkled water over him, just as the clouds [send down rain] on a mountain.

478. A forest of bamboos is burned down by the fire which their violent friction has produced, and a sudden burst of rain carries off their roots. What does the Creator not contrive in order that he may bring a tree which has come from somewhere [else] after having been uprooted by the vehemence of a storm, to full growth in the gorge of a great mountain?

479-480. If the son of Pārtha had not at the instigation of his servants exterminated his own family, and if Kumalavardhana had not ousted his child, then how could Yasaskaradeva, who was not of high descent, and had wandered over the earth as a pauper, have attained the royal dignity?

481. The route of the king was lined with the eyes of women—clusters of lotus—who wished to see him, [that prince] of blessed rule, who had just been seen by the people walking afoot, without attendants and alike in appearance to everybody.

482. King Yasaskara, on his way to the royal palace, turned with subdued pride the corners of his eyes steadily away, as soon as he caught the sound of the words which the gazelle-eyed ladies of the city wished to speak in the midst of their blessings. [Hence] the wise knew that he was resolved to protect his subjects.

483. The moon of the earth (the king) entered the royal palace, which resounded with the blessings and auspicious shouts of the women, while his glittering umbrella, which shone with a light equalling that of the sun, seemed to draw [around his head] the splendour of an ārātrika [illumination] performed with a silver vessel.

Thus ends the Fifth Tārāṅga of the Rājatarāṅgiṇī, composed by Kalkaṇa, the son of the great Kāśmīrian minister, the illustrious Lord Cappaka.

476. Kings and mountains are alike called kṣmādhara, 'supporters of the earth.'

483. Ārātrika is the name of a ceremony in which burning lights, placed in earthen lamps, are swung around the head of a sacred image. A similar rite is still performed in Kāśmīr and the Panjāb on marriages, the lamps being swung around the bridegroom. Compare also vii. 925.

Colophon. The MSS. have here the following verso: "In eighty-three years and four months there ruled eight descendants of the spirit-distiller, one taken from the high road, a woman, and a minister."

The number of years given in the Colophon for the total of reigns agrees with the dates shown for the accession of Avantivarman and Yasaskara. The number of months cannot be verified, as the exact date of Avantivarman's accession is not indicated. The 'descendants of the spirit-distiller' are the rulers from Utpalavarman's race, the 'one from the high road' Samukaṭa (v. 242), the 'woman' Sugandhā, and the 'minister' Sambhuvardhana.

SIXTH BOOK.

1. May Aparnā (i.e. Pārvati, 'she who in her fast did not eat even a leaf') protect us—she who hears from the mouth of the wives of the gods her own praises, cheerful to the ear, in the following fashion: "It is not the strength of austerities performed by living only on leaves or air [which secures union with S'iva]. Look, on this account these two, the bull and the snake, which live only on the above, are yet now put outside [S'iva's body]. Only through his love you have occupied this one-half of the [body of the] lord of the universe."

YASASKARA
(A.D. 930-948).

2. When he (Ya'askara) then passed the outside enclosure, he commanded the doorkeepers to hold aloof the Brahmins, as he desired to be unapproachable.

3. But when the doorkeepers were scaring them away, he spoke to them thus with folded hands: "You have given me the throne, and you are to be worshipped by me alike to the gods."

4. "As you will become full of arrogance from pride at having been the bestowers of the royal dignity, you are not to come into my presence except at the time of business."

5. When all the people heard this, they knew that he was unapproachable, and forgot that familiarity which arose from having dwelt together with him.

6. Through the power of his intellect he restored the ordinances of former kings which had fallen into abeyance, just as a great poet [restores] the methods of earlier poets.

7. The land became so free from robbery, that at night the doors were left open in the bazaars, and the roads were secure for travellers.

8. As he exercised careful supervision, the functionaries, who had plundered everything, found no other occupation but to look after the cultivation.

9. The villagers, being wholly absorbed by agriculture, never saw the royal residence. The Brahmins, devoted [solely] to their studies, did not carry arms.

10. The Brahman Gurus did not drink spirits while singing their chants. The ascetics did not get children, wives and crops.

1. The introductory verse is addressed to Pārvati in her union with S'iva Ardhanārīśvara. The snake is supposed to live on air. S'iva carries a snake round his neck and rides on the bull.

10. By the term guru K. probably means here and in the next verse the persons officiating as priests in the Tantric ritual; comp. vii. 278, 523. For Bhiksus with families, comp. note iii. 12 and vi. 135.

YASĀSKARA
(A.D. 939-948).

11. Ignorant Gurus did not perform Matsyāpūpa sacrifices, and did not by texts of their own composition revise traditional doctrines.

12. There were not seen house-wives figuring as divinities at the Guru-consecration (gurudīkṣā), and by shakes of their heads detracting from the distinguished character of their husbands.

13. Astrologer, doctor, counsellor, teacher, minister, Purohita, ambassador, judge, clerk—none of them was then without learning.

14. The officers watching cases of voluntary starvation (prāyopaveśūdāhṛta), reported a certain person engaged in Prāyopaveśa. When the king had him brought before himself, he spoke :

Story of merchant.

15. "I was once a wealthy citizen here. In the curso of time I became a pauper, through the will of fate."

16. "When my indebtedness had become great, and I was pressed by the creditors, I resolved to throw off my debts and to travel about abroad."

17. "Thoreupon, I disposed of all I owed to clear my debts, and sold my own mansion to a rich merchant."

18. "From the sale of this great building I excepted only a well fitted with stairs, having in view the maintenance of my wife."

19. "I thought that she would live by the rent given by the gardeners, who at summer-time place flowers, betel-leaves, etc., in that very cool well."

20. "After wandering about for twenty years, I have come back from abroad to this my native land with a small fortune."

21. "Searching for my wife, I saw that good woman with a wan body living as a servant in other [people's] houses."

22. "When I asked her, distressed, why she had, though provided with a sustenance, taken to such a life, she told her story."

23. "'When, after your departure abroad, I went to the well, that merchant drove me away, beating me with cudgels.'"

11. The Matsyāpūpayāga is a complicated sacrifice occurring in the Tantric ritual and still known in Kāśmīr. It is mentioned in connection with Tantric Śrāddhas in the v. chapter of my MS. of the Mṛtitattvānusruta. Fish and cakes (apūpa) are offered at it.

It appears as if K. wished to allude here indirectly to some ritualistic controversy of his own time. It is still a practice, not unknown to Kāśmīrian 'Bach'batṭs' of the present time, to support erroneous views on points of the ritual, whether Vedic or Tantric, by newly concocted Paddhatis, etc.

12. The gurudīkṣā is a Tantric rite by which the pupil (sādhaka) is initiated as a guru or teacher. This Dīkṣā is described, e.g. at the commencement of Rāghavānanda's Paddhatiratnamālā, Jammu MSS. No. 5293. The tradition of Kāśmīrian Paṇḍits knows of cases, as alluded to by K., in which women have assumed the position of Tantric Gurus. At the gurudīkṣā and other Tantric ceremonies, the Guru and his spiritual predecessors are worshipped by the sacrificers under their proper names coupled with those of certain deities. K.'s sally is directed against women who, having assumed the dignity of Gurus, presume to criticize their husbands' conduct,

YASAKARA
(A.D. 989-948).

24. "Then how could I otherwise maintain myself?" After saying this, she stopped. Hearing this, I fell into the depths of grief and anger."

25. "I then began a Prāyopaveśa, but somehow the different judges decided against me, giving on each occasion judgment in favour of the defendant."

26. "In my simplicity I do not know the law, but my life I stake for this: I have not sold the well with the stairs."

27. "Deprived of my property, I die for certain here at your door. Decide the matter in person, if otherwise you have fear of committing a sin."

28. The king, on being thus addressed by him, proceeded to hold court himself, and after assembling all the judges, inquired into the real facts.

29. The judges spoke to him: "This man has been repeatedly dismissed [with his claim] after due consideration. Full of deceit, he does not respect the law, and should be punished as a forger of a written document."

30. Thereupon the king read himself the words as they stood in the deed of sale: "The house is sold together with the well [fitted] with stairs."

31. While the councillors cried: "From this it is clear," an inner voice of the king, as it were, declared that the claimant was in the right.

32. After apparently reflecting for a moment, the king diverted for a long time the assembled councillors by other very curious stories.

33. In the course of the conversation he took from all their jewels to look at, and with a laugh drew the ring from the defendant's hand.

34. After with a smile asking all to stay thus only for a moment, he retired [into another apartment] under the pretence of cleaning his feet.

35. From there he despatched an attendant with an oral message to the merchant's house, handing him the ring, so that he might be recognized.

36. Showing the ring, this attendant asked the merchant's accountant for the account-book of the year in which the deed had been executed.

37. When the accountant was told that the merchant required that [book] that day in court, he gave it, keeping the ring.

38. In this [book] the king read among the items of expenditure [an entry of] ten hundred Dinnāras which had been given to the official recorder (adhikara-nulekhaka).

34. For pādakṣāṇa° we ought to read perhaps pāyukṣāṇa°.

36. The words by which the gloss of A₂ renders gaṇanāpatṭrikā, 'account-book,' correspond to the modern Kā. gaṇat-patṭar and Hindi-Panjābi bāñ, which have the same meaning.

38. The gloss of A₂ explains correctly the adhikara-nulekhaka as the official in whose presence the sale of a piece of land is concluded, and who, after measuring the land, draws up the deed. This function was discharged in Kāśmīr towns until a few years ago by specially appointed but unpaid officials, who actually bore the designation Sarūf, as indicated in the gloss. In recent times the Sarūf could claim from the seller a small fee for his trouble.

The gloss of A₂ rightly renders dinnārū by the Kā. dyār. Regarding the value of 'the ten hundreders,' see Note H, iv. 495.

39. From the fact that a high fee had been paid to that person, who was entitled only to a small sum, the king knew for certain that the merchant had got him to write a sa for a ra.

40. He then showed this in the assembly, questioned the recorder whom he had brought up under a promise of impunity, and convinced the councillors.

41. At the request of the councillors, the king granted to the claimant the house of the merchant, together with his property, and exiled the defendant from the land.

42. One evening when the king had done his daily business, and was wishing to take his food, the doorkeeper, afraid on account of his untimely announcement, reported [as follows]:

43. "A Brahman stands outside [and threatens] to commit suicide unless he can see [you], though I have told him that your Majesty has done with business for to-day, and that there is time to-morrow for his communication."

44. The king stopped the cook and gave the order for the admission of the Brahman, who entered, and on being questioned, spoke in great distress:

45. "After having wandered about abroad, I have returned to my country on hearing of its good government, and have brought with me a hundred gold coins (suvarṇavṛpaka) I had earned."

46. "Proceeding in comfort on the roads, which under your rule have become free from robbers, I stopped yesterday evening, when tired, at Lavanotsa."

47. "Fatigued from having done a long march, I slept there during the night without apprehension at the foot of a tree standing in a roadside garden."

48. "When I got up, that sum, which was tied up in a knot of my garment, fell into a well close by, which on account of the thicket I had not noticed."

49. "Having thus lost everything, I was lamenting for a long time, and was about to throw myself into that deep well, [but] the people prevented me."

50. "Thereupon, some person ready for the daring enterprise, spoke thus to me: 'What will you give me, if I get you the money?'"

51. "To him I said: 'I in my helplessness, what power have I got over that property? Whatever seems right to you, let that be given to me from it.'"

52. "He then descended, and when he had got up again, he gave me two of the coins and openly kept for himself ninety-eight."

39. The words of the deed, as quoted in vi. 50, are supposed to have been: sopānakūpasahitāṃ vikṛitāṃ gṛham. The document ought to have had rahitāṃ instead of ahitāṃ, with the meaning: "The house is sold without the well."

46. See regarding Lavanotsa, note i. 329.

51. The words in the text are ambiguous, and permit also the interpretation: 'Whatever seems right to me, let that be given from it to you.' Comp. vi. 65 sq.

YASASKARA
(A.D. 989-948).

53. "When I remonstrated against this arrangement, the people scornfully met me by saying : 'Under King Yasaskara transactions depend upon the letter [of the contract].'"

54. "I have lost my earnings through the fraudulent abuse of a polite expression straightforwardly employed [by me], and I dio now at your door who has introduced such injustice."

55. When the king asked him about the character and name of that man, he replied that he knew him only by his face.

56. The king promised him that he would next morning help him to what he desired to obtain, and thus with difficulty induced him to partake of food by his side.

57. On the next day the Brahman pointed out to the king that man standing among the inhabitants of Lavanotsa, who had been summoned by messengers.

58. When he was questioned by the king he related everything exactly as the Brahman had stated it, and pointed out that his conduct was based upon the words [used by the Brahman].

59. Those who could see no difference between the actual facts and the observance of the given word, looked down on the ground with their minds wavering in doubt.

60. Then the king, seated in court, adjudged ninety-eight coins to that Brahman, and two to the other.

61. And to those who raised questions, he spoke : "Difficult to perceive is the course of mighty Justice (dharma) when it hurries to strike down Injustice as it raises its head."

62-63. "As the sunlight, when it passes in the evening into the fire and into the watery orb of the moon, endows with its own brilliancy the lamps and the moonlight, and setting up these strikes down the rising darkness, thus Justice, which follows the same course, drives off Injustice."

64. "Justice invisibly keeps ever close to Injustice, and seizes it immediately, as fire [is ever present in and at once seizes] fuel."

65. "Instead of saying : 'Whatever you give, let that be given,' he let fall the words : 'Whatever seems right, etc.'"

66. "To this greedy Brahman ninety-eight coins appeared the right sum. This he (the villager of Lavanotsa) did not give him, but gave him the two coins, which were not [what he] desired."

67. Distinguishing between right and wrong with acuteness in this and similar [cases], the king, ever bent on exercising supervision, made [as it were] the Kṛta Yuga come back again.

68. While he thus guided his people, he became [himself] an object of ridicule, on account of his own imprudent conduct, and thus resembled a physician who prescribes wholesome food for another, but himself eats what is bad.

69. Though he was careful to perform his purifications with earth and water, like a [Brahman] versed in Vedic lore, yet he did not dismiss from his side the attendants who had eaten the food-remnants of the Dombas.

70. He amassed riches through four city prefects (nagarādhipāta), who helped themselves in turn to money, and were hanging about each other's back.

71. Though this prince had deposited his sword at the base of the illustrious [Linga of Śiva] Raṇeśvara, and though he honoured his given word, yet the foot-soldiers found their end through him.

72. When his eldest brother died, he exhibited such long-continued joy that men of sense imagined that he had given him a poison of his own invention.

73. When a Velāvitta who had been raised to the rank of a provincial governor (maṇḍaleśa) intrigued with the queens, the king connived at it.

74. A courtesan, Lallā by name, whom he had raised from love to the foremost place among the ladies of his seraglio, got him entirely under her control.

75. The Creator has, as it were, because there is no room in the heart of women for good conduct (śuṛtta), put outside them their well-rounded (śuṛtta) breasts.

76-77. The Creator has made women who are pure in their outward [appearance], women, because he knew that their conduct was the same whether they attached themselves to the highest or the lowest. Thus it came that the beautiful-eyed Lallā, though treated by the king with affection, yet had meetings at night with a Caṇḍāla watchman.

69. See above, v. 388.

70. In the succeeding reigns only one prefect of the City, i.e. of Śrinagar (nagarādhipāta, nagarādhipa, etc.), seems to be mentioned; comp. vi. 296; vii. 108, 580, 1542; viii. 266, 682, 814, 838, 1459, etc. K. represents Yaśaskara as appointing four prefects in order to increase his revenue by the contributions they have to offer in competition. The officials have, of course, to recoup themselves by increased exactions from the citizens. For a curious account of the fines, etc., a city prefect could levy, and his powers generally, comp. viii. 383-4 sqq. The policy of subdividing charges for the sake of fiscal advantages, has continued in Kāśmir until quite recently; comp. Mr. Lawrence's description of the 'old' revenue administration, Valley, p. 421.

71. K. seems to allude here to some violent measure by which Yaśaskara rid himself of the troublesome Tantrins, the authors of so many revolutions in the preceding reigns. The solemn deposition of the sword before some sacred image is referred to again, vi. 98, 206 sq. It seems to have been a symbolic act indicating renunciation of worldly aspirations; comp. also vi. 100.

For the shrine of Śiva Raṇeśvara, see iii. 453. For satyaśikhāra as an adjective, comp. vii. 561; viii. 2291.

73. The meaning of the term velāvitta is uncertain; comp. v. 226.

Maṇḍaleśa (maṇḍaleśvara, maṇḍaleśī) as the designation of the governor of a province is often used in the last two Books, e.g. of the governor of Lohara, vii. 996; viii. 1228, 1814, 2020. For other references, see Index.

YASASKARA
(A.D. 939-948).

Yaśaskara's court.

YASASKARA
(A. D. 939-948).

78. There must have been some charm in the Caṇḍāla youth, which caused even a queen to fall in love with him, and to become subject to his power.

79. Perhaps she was descended from a Caṇḍāla family, or he possessed of the art of enchantment. How could otherwise such an incredible union come about?

80. As to the manner in which he met her, no account came to light anywhere.

81. Only to an official called Hāḍi this love-intrigue of these two sinners soon became apparent from an observation of their glances.

82. The king, after having ascertained by means of spies that this was a true fact, exhausted himself in the performance of expiatory rites, and put on the skin of a black antelope.

83. In his blind love he did not kill her, though he felt enraged, and on this account he became the object of injurious suppositions on the part of the censorious.

84. From the intercourse with those who had taken the Dombas' food remnants, impurity fell upon Yaśaskara, just as the evil of leprosy [spreads] through the touch of a leper.

85-86. The king, who was anxious to secure the royal dignity also for his future births, wisely bestowed the royal insignia upon a Brahman, without their being in danger, because he believed that being only a common person, he must have obtained the throne through some similar pious acts, [which he had performed] in a previous existence.

87. The king being fond of endowments, built on a piece of land which had belonged to his father, a Maṭha for students from Āryadeśa, who were devoting themselves to [the acquisition of] knowledge.

88. To the superintendent of this Maṭha he presented the royal insignia resplendent with umbrellas and Chowries, with the exception of the mint-dies (tan̄ka) and the royal seraglio.

89. On the bank of the Vitastā, he granted to Brahmans fifty-five Agrahāras furnished with various implements.

Varnaṭa's Abhiṣeka.

90-91. Then seized by an abdominal disease, he had Varnaṭa, the son of his paternal grand-uncle Rāmadeva, consecrated as king by the ministers, Ekāṅgas and feudal chiefs, and entrusted him [to their care]. His own son, named Samgrāmadeva, he left aside, as he knew that he was not begotten by himself.

82. Regarding the custom of wearing skins of cows and other animals in the case of serious penances, comp. Mitākṣarā, III. v. 264, 263 sqq.; also Caturvargac., Dānakh., x. p. 393.

88. For the meaning here given to tan̄ka, comp. P.W., s.v. tan̄kapati, 'mint-master,' tan̄kaśālā, 'mint'; also vii. 926.

89. The gloss of A₁ records a tradition which places these Agrahāras at Kāṣṭhela, now Kāṣṭhīl, a quarter of Srinagar on the left bank of the Vitastā above the second bridge. Comp. note on Kāṣṭhīlā, viii. 1169. Vikram. xviii. 25 mentions in the same locality Brahman-Agrahāras founded by King Ananta.

92. Those who were lusting for the crown, became then disconsolate, when the child which could have been [easily] ousted from the throne, was not consecrated.

93. The favourable opportunity for the execution of Parvayupta's scheme, which was on the point of appearing, seemed to vanish on that day.

94. Varnaṭa did not visit the dying [king], who had given him the crown, [not] even to inquire after his condition, though he was yet in the palace.

95. Then the king in his fainting state felt remorse, and was urged on by the ministers, who gave him fresh hope, to grant the throne to Samgrāmaḍevu.

96. By the king's order Varnaṭa was kept for one night in 'the hall of the eight columns' (aṣṭastambhamaṇḍapa), which was locked from outside, to be turned out in the morning.

97. His servants, whose bowels were moved by fear or by waking, turned the assembly-hall into a latrine.

98. A servant of the one-day king, Devaprasāda by name, who was of royal blood, deposited on that occasion his sword out of shame at [the shrine of] Vijayeśvara.

99. After Samgrāmaḍeva had been inaugurated, the king, whose sufferings became intense, left the palace and proceeded to his Maṭha to die.

100-101. The royal servants in feigned gratitude had, while the king lived, solemnly affirmed that they were ready to cut their hair and beards, that they would throw away their head-dress, take at once to the brownish-red garments [of mendicants], and lay down their swords for ever. [All] this they left undone when his death was imminent.

102-103. The dying king had left his palace with two and a half thousand gold [pieces] bound up in the hem of his dress. This his property was taken away from him by Parvayupta and other ministers, five [in all], while he was yet alive, and divided amongst themselves in his presence.

104-106. The king stopped in dense darkness inside a hut which stood in the courtyard of the Maṭha, rolling about on his bedstead, while his inner parts were consumed by pain. Not having lost consciousness, he saw before him his people bent on evil. When after two or three days he had not departed from life, his confidants, relatives, servants and Velāvittas, who were in a hurry and anxious to seize the kingdom, destroyed him by giving him poison.

107. Among the ladies of his seraglio only the single Trailokyadevī became a Sati and followed her husband, just as the sun [is followed] by his own light.

YASASKARA
(A D 939-948).

Yasaskara's death.

97. I have translated according to Durgapr.'s convincing emendation vīrakinān for A vīvekinān; र and य are easily mistaken for each other in S'aradā characters,

YĀŚASKARA
(A.D. 930-948).

108-112. "The king [was ever] ready to exercise control over the castes and conditions of life [among his] subjects. On discovering that at Oakramelaka (?) a Brahman-ascetic, Oakrabhānu by name, had departed from proper conduct, the king, in accordance with the law, punished him by having the mark of a dog's foot branded on his forehead. Infuriated by this, the uncle of that [Brahman], the magician Vīranūtha, who was the king's own minister of foreign affairs, then took revenge upon him." This is confidently related by certain Gurus who by [referring to] the supernatural power of former masters would exalt their own greatness. Through them, too, the story has been propagated that he died in seven days. But how is this likely [in view of the fact] that he died by a lingering disease?

113. If it is said that this event occurred in the course of his illness, then also Varṇaṭa's and others' curse might figure here as a cause [of his death].

SAṆGRĀMADEVA
(A.D. 948-949).

114. After having ruled for nine years, he died in the year [of the Laukika era four thousand] twenty-four (A.D. 948) on the third day of the dark half of Bhādrapada.

115. Parvagupta installed the child-king's grandmother on the throne as his guardian, and [himself] wielded the power, together with the five, Bhābhata and the rest.

116. In due course the strong Parvagupta put the others out of the way, together with the grandmother, and thus established himself in the palace as the sole master.

117. Displaying a conduct in which the royal dignity was combined with the functions of a minister, he created the mingled impression of king (rājan) and Rājānaka.

108-112. K. gives here a summary of another version regarding Yāśaskara's death, which, however, he does not accept. By the gurus to whom this version is attributed, probably Tantric teachers are meant; comp. v. 12.

The branding with the mark of a dog's foot is mentioned Mamū ix. 237 as a punishment for theft.

I have taken Oakramelaka as a local name. The word is found only here. The effaced gloss of A₂ seems to have explained it differently; comp. perhaps oakramilana, viii. 2730, and note v. 267.

117. The title Rājānaka, meaning literally 'almost a king,' used to be given for services rendered to the king; compare Prof. BÜHLER, Report, p. 42, and below vi. 261. The title has survived in the form Rāzān as a family name of very frequent occurrence among the Brahmins of Kāśmir. It was borne by Rājānaka Ratnākara, the author of the Haraviṣṇaya (9th century), and by many Kāśmīrian authors of note enumerated in the vamśapurāṇa which Ananda Rājānaka (17th century) has appended to his commentary on the Naiṣadhacarita (see Deccan College MS., No. 148 of 1875-76); comp. also Haracar. i. 4; xiii. 218.

As the designation of certain high officers (Muhammadans), the term Rājānaka is often used by S'rivara and in the Fourth Chron. (also in the shortened form Rājāna); comp. S'riv. i. 88; iii. 162, 388, 390; iv. 225, 298, 355; Fourth Chron. 33, 64 sqq., 188, 906.

The title was also known in Trigarta-Kāṇḍa; comp. Prof. BÜHLER's edition of the Baijnāth Prāśastis, Ep. Ind., i. p. 101; my notes, ib., ii. p. 483, and below viii. 766.

118. Parvagupta himself served the child-king by bringing him food, etc., and thus seemed to honest people free from guile.

119. Just those of whom Yasaskara thought that they dreaded treason, and whom he therefore put in office, were instrumental in the ousting of his son.

120. As if he (Parvagupta) were the king, he put a brilliant saffron pomade on his beard which spread like a plot of grass, and which had exactly the tawny colour of a young camel's hair.

121. As he was unable to destroy the child openly from fear of a rising of the Ekāṅgas, he employed witchcraft for his extermination.

122-125. When he heard at night a supernatural voice which said: "On the first day of Caitra the kingdom belongs legally to you and your race. If you proceed otherwise, there will be an early end for your life and family,"—he recognized the futility of witchcraft, and became still more uneasy. Fearing the hostile Ekāṅgas, and losing command over himself owing to his rising agitation and apprehensions, he became so miserable day and night that he suddenly collected his troops on a day when people did not move outside on account of a heavy snow-fall, and surrounded the palace.

126-129. After he had slain in a fight the faithful minister Rāmavardhana, who offered resistance in company with his son called Duddha, he tied a string with flowers [attached], which had been brought as an offering by his father's (Yasaskara's) Volāvitta, round the neck of Samgrāma, 'the Crooked-footed,' (Vakrāṅghri-Samgrāma), and dragged him from the throne. He then killed him in another hall, and threw him, with a stone bound to his neck, at night, into the Vitastā. On the tenth day of the dark half of Phalguṇa, in the year [of the Laukika era four thousand] twenty-four (A.D. 949), that evil-doer seated himself with sword and armour on the royal throne.

130. He (Parvagupta), who then became king, was the son of Samgrāmagupta, who had been born in Pāreviśoka from a writer (divira) called Abhinava.

131. Some had previously affirmed that they would oppose him. They all, in terror of him, made obeisance that very morning.

132. The malevolent princes, Ekāṅgas, chiefs, ministers, officials, and Tantrins were afraid of him, and showed nothing but treason.

133. An Ekāṅga called Madanāditya, who was descended from the race of Śuṅga, burst his large drum through carelessness in the king's assembly-hall.

SAMGRĀMADEVA
(A.D. 948-949).

PARVAGUPTA
(A.D. 949-950).

120. K., when making this satirical allusion to Parvagupta's toilet, seems to have had in his mind the Kāśmīri saying: gāsa lōva his chas dār, 'his beard is like a bundle of grass.' This is commonly used of a too big beard.

The use of saffron as an unguent is repeatedly referred to as a royal privilege; see viii. 1119, 1897, 3166.

130. Regarding the position of Pāreviśoka, comp. note iv. 5; for divira, see note v. 177.

PARVAGUPTA
(A.D. 949-950).

134. The angry king had his garment taken off and ill-treated him. Having his hair and beard shaved off, he became an ascetic.

135. In this condition he had yet a wife and children, and his descendants live to this day at Tripuresvara.

136. King Parvagupta accumulated treasures, and thus again raised to power the functionaries, those plagues of the people.

137. Yet even he with his ill-gotten riches founded the [shrine of Ś'iva] Parvagupteśvara near the site of the Skandabhavanavihāra.

138. Among the [ladies of the] illustrious King Yaśaskara's seraglio, one pure-minded queen, like Gaurī, removed all evil report.

139. This virtuous woman cleverly practised a pious fraud upon Parvagupta, who, taken by a late-sprouting love, asked for her favours.

140-141. "When the construction of this temple of [Viṣṇu] Yaśaskaravāmin, which my husband left on his death half-finished, is completed, I shall for certain and without fail accord your desire." Thus spoke the fair-browed [lady] to her tempter.

142. Then the king in full pride had that temple completed in a very few days.

143. The pious queen [thereon] suddenly sacrificed her body in a sacrificial fire which had been nourished with ghee, together with a full offering (pūrṇāhuti).

144. Upon her who had sacrificed her life, there fell in abundance showers of flowers, and upon him who lusted after her, [there fell] words pouring forth reproach.

145. Withered by the long cares and agitations [connected] with his violent enterprises, Parvagupta was then soiled by dropsy.

146. Foolish persons, though they know from their [vain] efforts to appease pains and cares that their existence is short-lived, do yet not cease to push on, deceived by the desire for treacherous fortune.

147. Though in this state he was full of apprehensions, yet through some former merits which had not lost their efficacy, he found his end in the precincts of the Sureśvari [Tīrtha].

148. On the thirteenth day of the bright half of Āṣāḍha in the year [of the Laukika era four thousand] twenty-six (A.D. 950) this king lost the royal power which he had attained by treachery.

134-135. From the text it is not clear whether K. means that Madanāditya's family followed him into his new status, or that the Ekāṅga, who had after his humiliating punishment turned into a mendicant, married again subsequently.

Regarding the cutting off of the hair as a degrading procedure inflicted, with other punishments, on Brahmins, see Prof. Jolly's Recht u. Sitte, Gröndries, p. 120.

For Tripuresvara, comp. note v. 46.

137. The position of the Skandabhavanavihāra (Khandbhavan in Ś'rinagar) has been discussed in Note K in Appendix.

147. Regarding the sacred site of Sureśvari, see note v. 87.

149. If one did not see in this [life evil acts followed] quickly by a death which predicts as consequences terrible sufferings in the other transmundane existence, who would not strive for power through evil acts?

150. Then his son called Kṣemagupta, in whom the fever [produced] by wealth and youth was increased by the drinking of spirits, became king.

151. Bad by nature, he became still more terrifying through the society of wicked persons, just as a dark night [becomes more terrible] when obscured by a threatening cloud.

152. A hundred evil-conducted favourites, with Phalgūna at their head, attended upon the king, wearing dresses and ornaments alike in value to his own.

153. Though his parasites plundered him, and though he was [given] to dissipation with dice, spirits and women, the king did not become devoid of splendour.

154. The king who yields to the passion of love, is fond of wine, is addicted to dice, and is surrounded by drunkards who plunder the riches of his treasury, is like a lotus which is red (rāgī), is full of sweet honey (mādhurāṇayuvīn), carries seeds (vihitāleṣasaktī), and is frequented by bees (mādhurair) which abstract the essence of its calyx (kośa). If then splendour attaches itself to the lotus, be it for the day only, there is no reason whatever to be astonished [at splendour attaching itself to the king].

155. Vāmana and other roguish sons of Jiṣṇu took the heart of the king and reared in him impure tastes resembling those of a demon.

156. The king, wholly bent on mischief, was sharp in laughing at others, fond of the love of others' wives, and subject to the will of others.

157. He spat at the beards of venerable men, poured abuse into their ears, and dealt blows on their heads.

158. Women gained his attachment by joining their hips, hunters by roaming about [with him] in the forests, and parasites by applauding indecencies.

159. The royal assembly, filled with whores, villains, idiots, and corrupters of boys, was unfit to be visited by the wise.

160. Did the cunning sons of Jiṣṇu not make King Kṣemagupta dance, just as [if he were] a doll pulled by strolling players with strings?

161. They had given him the name 'Rainer of bracelets' (Kaṅkaṇavarṣa), and pleased themselves by making him often shower bracelets on their arms.

162. They secured the king's favour by finding fault with the faultless, by exhibiting curiosities and knocking the heads of unimpeachable persons.

PARVAGUPTA
(A.D. 949-950).

KṢEMAGUPTA
(A.D. 950-958).

154. As the several puns contained in the first line make a literal translation of this verse impossible, a paraphrase has been given.

161. Compare vi. 801. Kaṅkaṇavarṣa is found as the name of a magician, iv. 246.

KṢEMAGUPTA
(A.D. 950-958).

163. They took the amorous king to their houses, showed him their wives with breasts and waists exposed, and looted him at gambling.

164-165. They vied with each other in offering him undisturbed enjoyment of love-pleasures, and shamelessly gave up to him their own wives, asking him to indicate their special qualities after a trial. When he had finished and they asked him as to who had pleased him, he let them have [whatever] riches they wished.

166. Among his minions the two beggars Hari and Dhūrjati were simpletons in [the art of] procuring, as they protected the virtue of their mothers.

167. By making their own body the object of jocular sayings, the [parasites] abandon their honour; by themselves corrupting their women, they deprive their families of integrity; by continuing long in service they destroy their [own] comfort. If, then, just that is renounced [by them] which is worth striving for, I do not know what parasites wish to attain by service.

168. Bhuṭṭa Phalguṇa, though he had been a councillor of Yasaskara, yet became in the end his (Kṣemagupta's) courtier. Fie upon the desire to enjoy pleasures!

169. He founded the [temple of Viṣṇu] Phalguṇasvāmīn and other shrines. Behind his back the king often laughed at his counsel.

170. Rakha, the old commander-in-chief (kumpaneśa), took his place in [this] bad company, and needs accepted blows on the head and the like from him in order to remove disfavour.

171. In order to kill the Ḍāmarā Saṃgrāma, who, when attacked by assassins, had entered the famous Jayendravihāra, he (Kṣemagupta) had the latter burned down without mercy.

172-173. Taking from this Vihāra, which was entirely burned down, the brass of the image of Sugata (Buddha), and collecting a mass of stones from decaying temples, he erected the [temple of Ś'iva] Kṣemagaurīśvara in a market-street of the City, thinking foolishly that the foundation of this shrine would perpetuate his fame.

170. Compare regarding Rakha, v. 424 sqq.
172-173. The image of Sugata is evidently the colossal Buddha statue mentioned iii. 353 in connection with the Jayendravihāra.

The temple of Kṣemagaurīśvara is referred to as a building of imposing character in Bilhana's description of Pravarapura or Śrinagar, Vikram. xviii. 23. Its Maṇḍapas are said there to extend to a 'Saṃgama' of the Vitastā, described in the preceding verse. Bilhana has omitted to indicate the stream which forms this 'Saṃgama' with the Vitastā. We are therefore unable to fix the position of the Kṣemagaurīśvara temple with certainty.

In speaking of a Saṃgama in Śrinagar, Bilhana may think either of the confluence of the Vitastā with the Mahāsarīt (Mār, comp. note iii. 339-349), or of that with the Dugdha-gaṅgā (S'velagangā, now Chātākul). The latter stream joins the Vitastā from the S., at the western extremity of the city and below the last bridge. The Dugdha-gaṅgā is distinctly mentioned by Bilhana in a preceding passage, xviii. 7, under the name of Dugdhasundhu, and its confluence with the Vitastā is, therefore, more likely to be meant by the poet than that of the Mahāsarīt.

Our passage is of interest, as it shows clearly

174. One [man] dies; another takes his property and feels excessively elated. He does not know that on his own death that [property] will go into the treasury of another. O the false reasoning which spreads darkness by its unsurpassed delusions!

175. The lavish Kṣemagupta took thirty-six villages from the burnt Vihāra, and gave them into the tenure of the Khaśa ruler.

176. King Simharāja, the lord of Lohara and other strongholds, who resembled Indra [in power], gave to him his own daughter (Diddā) in marriage.

Marriage of Diddā.

177. As Diddā, the S'āhi's daughter's daughter, wholly engrossed his mind, the king became known by the humiliating [appellation] Diddākṣema.

178. The maternal grandfather of this queen, the illustrious Bhīma S'āhi, built the high temple [of Viṣṇu] Bhīmakeśava.

KṢEMAGUPTA
(A.D. 950-958).

that the use of stones and other materials from earlier shrines for the erection of new buildings began already in the Hindu period. As to the continuation of the practice in Muhammadan times, and to the present day, the extant buildings of Srinagar furnish ample evidence.

175. I translate according to the conjectural emendation of Durgapr., nīrdagāhāt grāmāḥ, instead of A nīrdagāhān grāmāḥ, which would suppose the burning of other Vihāras besides the Jayendravihāra.

By the 'Khaśa ruler' must be understood Simharāja, the chief of Lohara. That the latter territory fell within the region in which Khaśa settlements are mentioned by the Chronicles, has already been shown in note i. 317.

From our passage, as well as vii. 773, where King Utkarṣa, a direct descendant of Simharāja, is designated as a Khaśa, it is clear that the ruling family of Lohara belonged itself to the Khaśa tribe. The chiefs ruling at Rajapuri were of the same race; see e.g. vii. 1276, 1281; vii. 1466. The two families repeatedly intermarried; comp. viii. 1464, 1644 sqq.

176. Regarding Lohara, the modern Lohran, compare Note E (iv. 177) in Appendix.

177-178. It has already been shown in Note J, v. 152-155, that Bhīma S'āhi, Simharāja's father-in-law and Queen Diddā's maternal grandfather, is identical with King Bhīma, whom Albēri mentions in his list of the 'Hindu Shāhīyas of Kābul' as the successor of Kamalū (Kallhana's Kamuluka, v. 233). In the parallel passage, vii. 1081, K. refers distinctly to Bhīma as 'the S'āhi ruler of the town of Udabhaṇḍa.' By the latter name, the ancient capital of Gandhāra is meant. Compare my paper, Zur Geschichte der Gūhis von Kābul, Festgruss an R. v. Roth, p. 197 sqq. For coins of Bhīma S'āhi, see CUNNINGHAM, Coins of Med. India, p. 64.

The royal house of the S'āhis gave also subsequently daughters in marriage to the family of the rulers of Lohara; comp. vii. 966, 1470.

BHĪMAKEŚAVA.—It is an indication of Bhīma S'āhi's power that he erected a temple bearing his name in the adoptive country of his granddaughter. This shrine of Bhīmakeśava must also have been richly endowed. This is evident from the interesting story which K. relates, vii. 1081 sqq., of the rich treasure of gold and jewels confiscated there by King Harṣa more than a century later.

As already indicated in the paper above quoted, I believe that we can recognize Bhīma S'āhi's shrine in the ancient temple found at Bumzu, about one mile to the N. of the sacred springs of Mārtāṇḍa (Bavan), and on the left bank of the Lid'r river. It is now converted into a Muhammadan Ziārat, and covered inside and outside with a thick coating of plaster which prevents a close examination of the details. An accurate description of the building has been given by Bishop Cowin, J.A.S.B., 1806, p. 100 sq.

The temple is at present supposed to be the resting-place of a Muslim saint Bāba Bām'din Shāhib, and forms as such a popular pilgrimage place for the Muhammadans of the Valley. But a recollection of the original character of the building survives in the local tradition, which relates that the saint, who had built this shrine for himself, was originally a Hindu ascetic (sādhu). According to the Kāśmīrī legendary of the Ziārat, of which I acquired a MS. copy on my visit in Sept., 1891,

KĀSMAGUPTA
(A.D. 950-958).

179. Diddā became jealous of Phalyuṇa, the lord of the Gate (dvārapati), who had given his daughter Candratekhā to the king.

180. The instruction which the king had received from his teachers, and the great pains [which he had taken to acquire] the art of [throwing] darts, were rendered ridiculous by the despicable use [he made of them].

181. He indeed thought his unerring darts, which ought to have been employed in heroic exploits, appropriate for the hunting of jackals.

182. The people saw him ever roaming about with dogs and surrounded by bands of Dombas carrying nets and jungle-folk.

183. His life was passed in the enjoyment of jackal hunts, in places like the Dāmodarāranya, Lalyāna and S'imikā.

the saint, before his conversion to the true faith, bore the name of 'Bhīma Sādhi.' This form must remind us all the more of the name Bhīma Sāhi, if we take into account the old variant of the latter as recorded by A, in the text of our passage, *śrībhīmasādhī*². The substitution of Sādhi for Sāhi is probably the result of a popular etymology, which endeavoured to find in the name a reference to the supposed original character of the saint; sād is a common appellation of the Hindu ascetic in Kāśmīr.

We are led to the same identification by an examination of the name Bum²zu, borne by the locality itself. This name is mentioned in the Māhātmya of the neighbouring Mārtāṇḍa-Tīrtha, ii. Paṭala, under the form of Bhīmadvīpa. Here dvīpa is clearly a rendering of zu, which means 'island' in Kā. In Bhīma, which corresponds to Bum², we may recognize an abbreviated form of the name Bhīmakeśava. The Lik²r forms several small islands immediately in front of the rocky cliff at the foot of which the temple stands, and this circumstance accounts sufficiently for the formation of the present name of the locality.

The Māhātmya, which is of comparatively recent origin, knows nothing of Bhīmakeśava, but derives the name Bhīmadvīpa from Bhīmā, one of the S'aktis of Mārtāṇḍa. Against this it must, however, be noted that the pilgrimage route of the Mārtāṇḍatīrtha does not include a visit to Bum²zu. This locality would scarcely have been omitted if an ancient tradition had connected the name of Bum²zu with Bhīmā and the worship of Mārtāṇḍa.

[Not much importance can be attached to the mention of Bum²zu under the name of Bhīmādevī in the Fourth Chron. 330. The work dates from the end of the 16th century, and its authors betray in more than one instance ignorance of the old local names of the Valley.—Bhīmādevī was in reality worshipped near the modern village of Brām not far from S'rīnagar; comp. note ii. 135.]

Close to the temple above described, there is a small cave in the cliff containing a well-preserved little temple. The latter has been fully described by CUNNINGHAM, J.A.S.B., 1848, p. 252, who, upon grounds by no means conclusive, was prepared to ascribe to it a great antiquity. As far as our present knowledge of the history of Kāśmīr architecture goes, both this shrine and another small cella, situated a few stupa to the S.W. of 'Bam²-Din Sāhil's Zīrat,' and also converted into a Muhammadan tomb, may well be attributed to the time of Bhīma Sāhi, or even a later period.

DIDDĀKṢEMA.—It is very probable that the story here indicated as to Kāsmagupta's nickname Diddākṣema, is connected with the legend shown on the coins of this king, Di Kṣemaguptadev[ra]. In the legend, Cunningham has long ago recognized an abbreviation for Diddā-Kāsmagupta; comp. now Coins of Med. India, p. 45 and pl. iv. 11. Whatever the reason may have been which induced Kāsmagupta to show his queen's name on his coins, it is clear that this unusual procedure would in itself be sufficient to account for the use of that nickname. Regarding the fondness of the modern Kāśmīrī for giving nicknames to his rulers, see LAWRENCE, Valley, p. 277. For royal nicknames mentioned by K., see v. 254; vi. 128, 161; vii. 868, 904, 1445.

179. Regarding the office of 'lord of the Gate,' see note v. 214.

183. The Dāmodarāranya is the alluvial plateau called Dāmdār Uḍār, referred to as Dāmodarasūda in connection with the legend of King Dāmodara; see note i. 157, 167.

Lalyāna is not otherwise known. S'imikā is mentioned again vii. 869, and seems to have been a locality in the vicinity of Vij²brār. Its exact position I am unable to trace.

184. Then, when hunting on the fourteenth day of the dark half of the month, the king saw a flame issuing from the mouth of a howling she-jackal.

185. Shaken with fright at this sight, he was thereupon seized by the lūtā-disease [accompanied] by fever, which caused his death.

186. And he proceeded to die at Varāhakeśetra, where he had founded the [Mathas called] S'rākaṇṭhamuṭha and Kṣemumuṭha, close to Huṣkapura.

187. His body was covered with eruptions (lūtā) resembling split lentils, and he died on the ninth day of the bright half of Pauṣa, in the year [of the Laukika era four thousand] thirty-four (A.D. 958).

188. Then Kṣemagupta's child-son Abhimanyu became king under the guardianship of Queen Diddā, whose character knew no mercy.

189. The officers who held charge of foreign affairs, the royal household, and other posts, visited the queen's bedchamber without scruples.

190. In the reign of Abhimanyu there arose suddenly a terrible conflagration from the neighbourhood of the Tuṅgeśvara-market.

KṢEMAGUPTA
(A.D. 950-958).

ABHIMANYU
(A.D. 958-972).

It is probable that both Lalyānu and S'imikā are names of Uḍars or alluvial plateaus. The latter being little suitable for cultivation, are generally uninhabited, and hence favourite haunts of jackals. The Dāmdār Uḍar has in recent years been more than once hunted over by the 'Kashmir foxhounds.'

184. It is not clear to which month the date here given is to be referred. As in the Kāśmīr reckoning the month begins with the dark half, the 14th vadī of Pauṣa (see vi. 187) might be meant. Possibly K. refers to the corresponding day of the preceding month Margasīras, which under the name of Sivacaturdaśī is a holiday still observed in Kāśmīr; comp. P.W., s.v. Sivacaturdaśī.

185. Regarding the lūtā-disease, see iv. 524 sqq.

186. By Varāhakeśetra is designated the site and vicinity of the ancient Varāhamūla which is marked by the present town Varāhmūl (vulgo Bārāmūla) at the western entrance of the Valley. This locality has enjoyed great sanctity since early times as the dwelling-place of Viṣṇu in his incarnation of Ādivarāha or 'Primeval Boar.' The legends connected with the sacred site and the various localities in its neighbourhood are related in the Varāhakeśetramūh., and often alluded to in other Mahātmyas as well as in the Nīlmatā (1180, 1348 sq.). An abstract of these legends, and a very accurate description of the Tirthas and antiquities of the neighbourhood, will be found in Prof. BÜLLER's Report, pp. 11 sqq.

K. uses here and vi. 204 the expression Varāhakeśetra for the whole neighbourhood, including the site of Huṣkapura on the left river bank. In the later Chronicles, and in the Mahātmyas, we find Varāhakeśetra, Varāhakeśetra, Varāhatirtha used indifferently in the same sense; see e.g. S'iv. i. 403; Fourth Chron. 403, 520, 644; Haracar. xiii. 43, etc.

The ancient temple of Varāha (Rājat. vi. 206; vii. 1310; Jonar. 600) was situated on the narrow strip of ground between the foot of the hills and the right river bank. The town which has sprung up near this shrine, and which occupied the same position as the present Varāhmūl, is named Varāhamūla, vii. 452; Fourth Chron. 77, or Varāhamūla, vii. 1309.

Huṣkapura, which, as shown in note i. 168, corresponds to the modern Uṣkūr, had the advantage of being situated in an open plain, and was evidently in old times a larger place than its sister-town Varāhamūla. This accounts for the repeated mention of religious foundations at Huṣkapura; comp. iv. 188. Hiuen-tsiang refers only to Huṣkapura (Life, p. 68), but Al-Bēruni knows both 'Uṣkūrā' and 'Baramūla' at the entrance of the Valley (India, i. p. 207). Subsequently Huṣkapura: Uṣkūr has dwindled down to a small village, while Varāhamūla has remained a town of importance and the trade emporium to the west.

The position of the two Mathas founded by Kṣemagupta at Huṣkapura can no longer be traced.

190. As a temple of S'iva Tuṅgeśvara is mentioned in ii. 14, it may be assumed that by Tuṅgeśvarāpaṇa of our passage is meant the Bazaar near this shrine. The position of the latter has not been ascertained.

ABHIMANYU
(A.D. 958-972).

191. This [fire], reaching as far as Bhikṣukīpāraka near the [shrine of Viṣṇu] Varḍhanasvāmin, destroyed the great buildings within the [limits of 'the'] Vetāla's measuring line' (Vetālasūtrapāṭa).

192. The fire, as it were, purified the land, by burning the great buildings which the contact of the kings who had been touched by Dombas and Caṇḍālas had defiled.

193. The king's mother and guardian, confused in her mind and listening to everybody, after women's wont, did not reflect what was true and what not.

Phalguṇa ousted from prime ministership.

194-195. Previously, while her husband was alive, she had been in omity with Phalguṇa, the prime minister, on account of the daughter which he had given in marriage to the king. Hence, out of malice he gave a quick assent when on her husband's death she wished to become a Sati, sooting other wives [of the king] ready to immolate themselves.

196. But in front of the funeral pyre she felt regret, and the minister Naravāhana, moved to compassion, prevented her by persistent remonstrances from seeking death.

197. Then Rakka, who was malignant by nature, put into the embittered queen the apprehension that Phalguṇa would usurp the kingdom.

198. When Phalguṇa became aware, from signs which indicated dislike, that she with all the other ministers felt aversion and anger [towards him], he too fell into apprehension.

199. He was, indeed, an object of hatred for all, since he held the post of prime minister (sarvādhikāra) and outshone [them all] by counsel, courage, energy and other good qualities.

200-203. When his son Kardamurāja had gone to take the bones of

191. The Varḍhanasvāmin temple has already been mentioned, iii. 357, as marking on one side the extreme limit of Pravarasena's city. Its position is unknown, and so is that of Bhikṣukīpāraka.

The term Vetālasūtrapāṭa contains clearly a reference to the legend told iii. 348 sq. of the demon which indicated to Pravarasena the site for his new city. The territory which was supposed to have been originally marked off by the demon's measuring line, might have borne the name Vetālasūtrapāṭa. Regarding the position of the oldest parts of Pravarapura, see note iii. 339-340.

199. Sarvādhikāra, literally meaning 'charge of all [offices]', is the designation of the post of prime minister, the 'Down' of modern native States. This is made quite clear by a comparison of viii. 2300 and viii.

2460, 2470, where the terms sarvādhikāra and maukhyamantriṭā, 'prime ministership,' are used as equivalents for the designation of the identical position. Judging from the comparatively rare mention of the post, it may be concluded that it did not figure regularly as the highest step in the official hierarchy, but was bestowed only on dignitaries of exceptional influence and power. This is indicated by the fact that Tunga, Queen Didda's all-powerful minister, bore this title, vi. 333, and also by the administrative measures recorded of the Sarvādhikārin Gauraka, viii. 560 sqq. A division of the powers attached to the Sarvādhikāra is referred to on occasion of Śṛṅgāra's death, viii. 2471. For other references see vii. 364, 508; viii. 862, 1860.

202. By Kāṣṭhavāṭa of our passage cannot possibly be meant the territory of Kiṭvār

Kṣemagupta to the Ganges, Phalguṇa, who distrusted the palace and apprehended [evil] from his enemies, resolved to stop at Parṇotsa until his [son's] return. He left the city followed by numerous troops, and had arrived near Kāṣṭhavāṭu, together with his possessions and soldiers, when Diddā, at the instigation of Rakkha and others, took a quick resolve, and instead of polite requests sent staff-bearers after him.

204. The proud [Phalguṇa], thereupon, grieved by this fresh dishonour, turned back and marched to Varāhakeśetra, attended by a large armed force.

205. On hearing that that man of dignity had returned with an army, Diddā with her ministers feared an attack and trembled.

206. He, after long lamenting his master who had gone to rest at that site, laid his sword at the feet of [the image of] Varāha.

207. By depositing his sword, the minister allayed [both] the suspicion that he contemplated treason, and the alarm of the king's mother.

208. When employed by a person whose mind does not discriminate between right and wrong, learning (śāstra) as well as the sword (śastra) creates great misfortune. If he use [either of them] in anger as a remedy, it brings upon him the accusation of deep treachery. For these [two, learning and sword,] which give [to him] such deficient help, only a man of judgment is right in showing a sort of passionate attachment.

209. When Phalguṇa with his troops had thus proceeded slowly to Parṇotsa, the ministers rejoiced as boys when left by their teacher.

(Kishtwar) to the S.E. of Kāśmīr which otherwise bears this name, as the route to Parṇotsa or Prūṭsa (see note iv. 140), which Phalguṇa wishes to reach, lies in an entirely different direction. But the locality meant in our passage is clearly the same as the Kāṣṭhavāṭu mentioned in viii. 390, in connection with an expedition which Sussala led from Lohara (Lohrīn) to Kāśmīr. I have already shown in Note E (iv. 177), that on this expedition Sussala must have proceeded by one of the routes which lead from the Sadrūn Valley (to the N. of Prūṭsa) into the Valley of the Vitastā below Varāhamūla. It is exactly by one of these routes (over the Hajji Pir or Pajja Passes), that Prūṭsa is most conveniently approached from Kāśmīr. In the above quoted passage, we read that Sussala, after reaching Kāṣṭhavāṭu, is stopped by an opposing force assembled at Huṣkapura. In like manner we find in our own narrative that Phalguṇa, when stopped on the way to Parṇotsa, returns from Kāṣṭhavāṭu to Varāhakeśetra, i.e. Varāhamūla.

It follows from the above that Kāṣṭhavāṭu must be the old name of some locality in the western part of the Kruhin Pargana, or in the hills lying immediately to the W. of the latter (Valleys of Bunīr and Nushehra). I have not been able to trace in this direction a local name corresponding to Kāṣṭhavāṭu, but it is worth noting that Kaṣṭvār, the direct phonetic derivative of Kāṣṭhavāṭu, occurs elsewhere as a local name in Kāśmīr. There is a small village called Kaṣṭvār close to Nuwar in the Dūṭsa ('Doonsoo') Pargana, situated about 74° 45' long, 33° 58' lat.

To the Kāṣṭhavāṭu of our passage refers probably also viii. 468. Regarding Kāṣṭhavāṭu as the designation of a territory on the Cināb, see note vii. 590.

203. The term yaṣṭika, 'staff-bearer,' used here and below, vi. 215, 217, 237, corresponds literally to the cōḍār of modern India. It seems to designate a special class of royal attendants or guards, and is probably the equivalent of veṛm, vi. 3; viii. 524.

Regarding the worship of Viṣṇu as Ādivarāha at the Varāhakeśetra, see note vi. 186.

208. By śāstra the Nitiśāstra is meant.

ABHIMANYU
(A.D. 958-972).

Mahiman's rebellion.

210. Kṣemagupta's wife, too, thought of the extension and preservation [of her power], and was kept awake at night by [schemes for] the destruction of her enemies.

211-213. At an earlier time, when Parvagupta was aiming at the crown, he had married two daughters to the ministers Chaja and Bhābhata, who had taken [with him] the oath by sacred libation (koṣapāthini). The two sons who were born from these, the renowned Mahiman and Pāṭala, grew up in the king's palace as if they were his own sons, and had remained there up to that time. These two, eager for the throne, entered a conspiracy with Himmaka and others who knew no restraint.

214-215. These two powerful [persons] had been turned out from the royal palace by the weak queen. While, full of anger, they were going hither and thither from their own house, she sent staff-bearers in open hostility behind Mahiman, who had left one [place], in order to have him banished.

216. He had gone to the house of his father-in-law S'aktisena. Knowing this, they followed him there also.

217. As the staff-bearers did not leave after S'aktisena had politely requested them, he openly gave shelter to his son-in-law, who was in fear.

218-219. Having found a refuge, he was joined by Himmaka, Mukula and one Īramantaka, a resident of Parikṣapūra, as well as by the famous Udayagupta, son of Amṛtākara, and by Yaśodhara and others, who came from Lalitāḍḍityapūra.

220. Each of them made the earth shake with the [tramp of the] troops [he collected], and forming a confederacy by the side of Mahiman, they raised a rebellion.

221. At that time of great danger, the faithful minister Naravāhana was the only one who, together with his relatives, did not abandon the side of Diddā.

222. Then as their forces increased, the enemy with glittering weapons came into the vicinity of the [temple of] Padmasvāmin, eager for battle.

223. Diddā, thereupon, sent her son to the S'ūramaṭha, and in distress sought various means for averting the disaster.

224. With plenty of gold, she quickly bought off the Brahmans from Lalitāḍḍityapūra, and thus broke up the league of her enemies.

211. Compare iv. 424 eq.

213. The Tārīkhe of Haider Malik and Narāyan Kaul give Himmaka's name as that of a Turk.

219. Lalitāḍḍityapūra is the same as Lalitapūra referred to in iv. 187. Its site is marked by the modern Litpūr on the Vitastā.

222. The temple already mentioned, iv. 695, was probably situated in Padmapūra (Pāmpar); see note l.c.

223. The mention of the S'ūramaṭha in vi. 243, shows that this building was situated in S'rinagara; regarding its foundation, see v. 38.

225. They took an oath by sacred libation (pīṭakośa), declaring that if one were attacked they would all resent it, and [then] brought about a reconciliation between Mahiman and the queen.

226. The lame [queen] whom no one had thought capable of stepping over a cow's footprint got over the ocean-like host of [her enemies], just as Hanumat [got over the ocean].

227. Reverence to wealth which possesses [such] wonderful power! For, when given away, it brings about just what jewels and valuable herbs [achieve] when collected,—the cessation of troubles.

228. Thinking that favours were superior even to gold given in bribes, Diddā bestowed upon Yaśodhara and the rest the command of the army (kampana) and other [offices].

229. After a few days she put Mahiman out of the way by witchcraft, and the rule of the widow became undisputed in the land.

230. Once the commander-in-chief out of spite, together with his relatives, undertook an expedition against the S'āhi ruler Thakkana.

ABHIMANYU
(A.D. 958-972).

231. Possessed of full energy, he rapidly invaded that country, which is difficult of access on account of its streams and mountains, and captured Thakkana by force.

Expedition against S'āhi Thakkana.

232. He took tribute from that king, who did homage, and watered afresh the creeper of Fame with the water [sprinkled] at the inauguration ceremony (abhiṣeka).

233. At that time, Rakha and other wicked persons, who had access to the foolish queen, stirred up enmity in her against the commander-in-chief.

234. Into a king, into a crystal, and into the heart of a woman of bad disposition, there enters a fresh passion (or colour, rāga) when their constant companions are absent.

235. Parasites, by cunningly speaking words which agree with their own thoughts, get a hold over the mind of vulgar people and of courtesans, and [so do] house-slaves over that of their masters.

236. When they said in their conversation that he (Yaśodhara) was betraying [her], and that he had taken money for keeping Thakkana [on his throne], she took their slander for the very truth.

237. Thereupon, when the commander-in-chief, swelled with glory, had

230. Nothing is known of the ruler here referred to. He may have been some small chief in a neighbouring hill region claiming descent from the great S'āhi family of Kābul and Gandhāra; comp. regarding the latter, note iv. 153 and Note J (v. 152-155). In viii. 913 a Darad chief, Vidyādharma, is mentioned with the title S'āhi. The name Thakkana occurs elsewhere; comp. vii. 422, 447, etc.

232. The captured king on being installed as a tributary prince receives a fresh abhiṣeka.

ABHIMANYU
(A.D. 958-972).

Rising against Diddā.

reached his residence, Diddā despatched staff-bearers with the evident intention of banishing him.

238. When they heard of this insult, Himmaka, Bramantaka and the others remembered what they had agreed upon under their oath by sacred libation (kośa), and raised a rebellion as before.

239. As on the previous occasion, thus again the queen's own troops became disaffected, but Naravāhana and those with him did not desert her side.

240. When S'ubhadhara and others entered the City in fury, Diddā once more sent away her son to the Bhattārakamaṭha.

241. Deluded by fate, they did not destroy her at that moment, while she stayed without her son in the barricaded palace.

242. On the following day already the queen's forces assembled, with the help of which she then secured a somewhat safer position.

243. Then commenced the fighting with the enemy's troops, which held positions extending from near Jayābhaṭṭārikā to the vicinity of the S'ārumaṭha.

244. When the royal force, fleeing in a panic, threw itself into the palace, the Ekāṅgas displayed their array at the main gate of the palace (śimhadvāra).

245. Without regard for their own lives, they rallied the routed force, attacked the enemy's troops, and turned to flight some of [their] opponents.

246. At that moment there arrived Rājakulabhaṭṭa, scattering the enemy's force by the sound of his martial music, and delighting his own [side].

247. When he arrived, the enemy's army [which was already] scattering, vanished. The deities of war (śāstradevutā) do not tolerate vile treason.

248-249. Himmaka, of terrible valour, who [before] had proved the truth of the report that he could cut through iron chains and split stones in two,—when his sword fell in fierce combat on the waist of Rājakulabhaṭṭa, could not even cut through the leather of his armour.

250. On seeing this incredible occurrence the [enemy's] force became dejected, and Himmaka was slain, and Yaśodhara captured by the soldiers.

251. Bramantaka, who, in spite of this, had yet for a short time struggled on in the fight, fell from his horse with his sword broken, and was caught alive.

240. The name of the Bhattārakamaṭha survives in that of Braṭmar, a quarter of Srinagar, situated between the fourth and fifth bridges on the right bank of the river. This identification is indicated by the gloss of A., vii. 298, and is well-known to the Paṇḍits; comp. BÜHLER, Report, p. 16. Another reference, viii. 2426, shows that the Bhattārakamaṭha was a building of considerable size; see also Vikram. xviii. 11.

From our passage and vi. 228, it appears that Maṭhas, built probably in massive quadrangles, were more defensible places than the royal palace, and hence used as places of refuge; see also viii. 374, 1052.

243. Jayābhaṭṭārikā, only here mentioned, is possibly the designation of a temple.

244. Compare for śimhadvāra, literally 'the lions' gate,' vii. 879, 882; viii. 345, 461, 1452.

252. The illustrious Udayagupta, whom, on account of his relationship with the royal family, they did not wish to seize, left the battle and escaped somewhere.

253. As soon as she had thus secured victory, the queen, in wrath, punished Yaśoḥara, Subhadhara, and Mukula, together with their relatives.

254-255. The valiant Bramantaka, too, he of Purīhūsapura, who had relieved the Kaśmirians from the tax for Ś'rāddhas at Guyā, was thrown into the water of the Vitastā, with a large stone bound to his neck, and thus received from the infuriated queen the reward for his false conduct.

256-258. Those treacherous ministers, who, during sixty years from the year [of the Laukika era three thousand nine hundred] seventy-seven (A.D. 901/2) onwards, had robbed sixteen kings, from King Gopāda [varman] to Abhimanyu, of their dignity, lives and riches,—they all, together with their descendants and followers, were quickly exterminated by the angry Queen Diḍḍā with a mere terrifying frown, just as the great Asuras [were exterminated] by Durgā.

259. After destroying those whom pride had made overbearing, the queen placed Rakha and others in charge of the chief command [of the army] and of the other state offices.

260. Thus the faithful Naravāhana, the best of ministers, made the widow [acquire power] over the whole land, and made her resemble Indra [who rules over the whole heaven].

Naravāhana's ascendancy.

261. The queen, too, in gratitude herself called that faithful one into the council of ministers with the title of Rājānaka.

262. She slept when he slept, took food when he took it, rejoiced in his joy, and from sympathy felt dejected when he was despondent.

263. When he kept within his house, she was not happy without inquiring about his health, without requesting his advice, and without sending him things of her own.

264-266. Sindhu and Dhruya were the two sons of a litter-carrier called Kuṇya. The older, Sindhu, had been previously a favourite in the house of Purva-gupta, and in due course treasurer. In time he obtained charge of the treasury

254-255. Reference is made here to a certain tax which pilgrims performing Ś'rāddhas at Gaya had to pay, and from which Bramantaka had freed Kaśmirian visitors of the Tirtha, perhaps by means of a great donation. Exemption from this tax is mentioned again, vii. 1008.

The 'freeing of Gaya,' which is recorded in an inscription of Samvat 1516, translated by CUNNINGHAM, Arch. Survey Rep., iii. p. 181, relates probably to a similar act of munificence. Dr. G. A. Grierson kindly informs me that a pilgrims' tax has been levied at Gaya until quite recently for municipal purposes.

256-258. Compare for the exact date of Gopālayarman's accession, v. 222.

261. Comp. regarding this title, note vi. 117.

265. I translate according to the conjectural emendation, gaijādhyakṣas tataḥ, shown in note of Ed.

266. Regarding the employ of the term gaija, see note vii. 126.

ABHIMANYU
(A.D. 958-972)

from the queen. In this continued employ as lord of the treasury (gāṇḍeśa) he created new imposts, and became the founder of the [revenue-office called [after him] Sindhuganīja.

267. This wicked person told the queen, whose mind was easily impressed, that Naravāhana took from her most of the royal power.

268. While she was expressing her agreement, the minister just then by chance, out of fond devotion, requested her to come to his house and partake of a meal.

269. When Sindhu told her that if she went there he (Naravāhana) would for certain imprison her and her attendants, the terrified [queen] asked him for advice.

270. Unnoticed, she hurried [back] to the palace without saying [anything], and subsequently sent word that she had got her menses.

271. When the queen had thus turned back from the way to him after the courteous attention which he had shown [her], the minister's attachment and good feeling ceased.

Estrangement between Diddā and Naravā- hana.

272. Subsequently when their [mutual] affection had been removed (nīṣkṛṣṭa-snehayoḥ), intriguers produced between them a thorough ostrangement, such as [there is] between sesamum and oil-cake.

273. The diamond can be held as proof against all metals, and stone dykes against the waters, but nothing [is proof] against the false.

274. Those who are more foolish than a child, and yet [at the same time] more cunning than the teacher of the gods (Bṛhaspati),—verily we do not know of what atoms they are composed.

275. The crow, which has a distrustful mind, takes the young ones of other [birds] for its own. The swan, which has the power of separating [by its beak] milk and water, is in dread of an empty cloud. The king, whose mind is sharp [enough] to take care of the people, thinks the words of a rogue true. Fie upon the order [established] by Fate in which cleverness and stupidity are blended!

276. That foolish [queen] who was unable [to use] her feet (caraṇahīnā), became, through her want of moral principles (śrutibahyutā), an object of reproach, being in character just like a stupid Brahman [who, being foolish and ignorant of the ritual (caraṇa), becomes an object of reproach through his want of Vedic knowledge (śruti)].

277. She exasperated Naravāhana on repeated occasions to such an extent, that tormented by his disgrace he committed suicide.

272. There is a double sense in nīṣkṛṣṭa-snehayoḥ which in connection with the simile would have to be rendered 'after the oily substance has been extracted.'

278. When men of honour have their sense of dignity outraged by [a slight] for which there is no remedy, and their mind tormented [thereby], what other refuge have they but death?

279. The royal dignity, when separated from Navavāhana, did not spread lustre, [as little] as the night without the moon [or] speech without truth.

280. Hardened by continued cruelty, the queen resolved to kill the sons of Saṃgrāma, the Dāmara, who had shown prowess, while they were stopping near [her].

281. They fled in fear of her to Ghoṣa in Uttara, their own [place], and killed Kayyaku, the lord of the Gate, and others who attacked them.

282. The queen, fearing a rebellion, disregarded the shame of humiliation, and exerted herself to appease them. How can those who are absorbed by selfishness have a sense of honour?

283. After returning again into her presence, full of apprehension, they took [fresh] courage in an union with Sthāneśvara and other chief Dāmaras.

284. When Rakha died, the queen, who was afraid of them, and was in need of a strong man, called again Phalguna to her side.

285. Though he had before laid down the sword, he grasped it again while discharging the affairs of the crown. It is indeed difficult to abandon the desire for pleasures.

286. The wonderful greatness of this conqueror of Rājapuri and other [regions] became ultimately, [as it were], the paramour (avaruddha) of this dissolute old woman.

287. The wicked Jayagupta, who was the favoured associate of Udayarāja, the queen's brother, was in charge of the Akṣapaṭala [office].

281. By Uttaraghoṣa, K. means evidently the present village of Gus in the Uttar Pargana, 74° 17' long. 34° 31' lat. The place is mentioned under the name of Ghoṣa in the S'radāmāh. 124, and its Naga is probably referred to under the name of Goṣa in the Nilamata, 939.

The Uttar Pargana in the extreme N.W. of Kamarājya (Kamrūz) is mentioned as Uttaraka in Lokapr., ii.

286. For avaruddha as the designation of a man who lives with a widow, comp. note iv. 678.

Rājapuri is the old name of the hill-territory now known as Rajauri. It lies to the south of the central part of the Pir Panisāl range, and comprises the valleys which are drained by the Tohi of Rajauri and its tributaries. Its modern Kāśmīrī name is Rās'vīn (the Rājāvira of the Fourth Chron., 542 sq.). Comp.

CUNNINGHAM, Anc. Geogr., p. 129 sq. The relations between this small hill-state and Kāśmīr are often referred to in the narrative of the last two Books; see Index.

In the time of Hsiao-kiang, Rājapuri (Ho-lo-she-pu-lo) was subject to Kāśmīr; comp. Si-yu-ki, i. p. 163. In Didda's time, and during the subsequent reigns, the rulers of Rajapuri must have practically enjoyed independence, though the important position held by Rajapuri on the main route to the south seems to have induced the later kings of Kāśmīr to make frequent attempts of extending their power in this direction. Alberuni, India, i. p. 208, describes correctly the position of 'Rajawari,' and speaks of it as the farthest place to which Muhammādan merchants in his time traded. Regarding the later history of Rajauri, comp. Vigne, Travels, i. pp. 226 sqq.; Drew, Jummoo, p. 155.

ABHIMANYU
(i.d. 958-972).

Phalguna recalled
by Didda.

ABHIMANYU
(A.D. 968-972).

288. In company with him, other officials of cruel character plundered Kaśmīr, in consequence of the sins which this [land] had accumulated.

289. And at that time Abhimanyu, whom the sins of his evil-conducted mother rendered miserable, fell into consumption.

290. He had eyes resembling lotuses, was learned, cherished by the sons of learned men and versed in the S'āstras; learning and youth rendered him brilliant.

291. Him who was of such a noble character, the intercourse with the wicked withered, just as the sun's heat [withers] the S'irīṣa-flower.

292. While yet half-full, this moon of the subjects was seized by the eclipse of fate on the third day of the bright half of Kārttika in the year [of the Laukika era four thousand] forty-eight (A.D. 972).

NANDIGUPTA
(A.D. 972-973).

293. On his throne stepped his son Nandigupta, and into the heart of Diddā [entered] great sorrow for her [lost] child.

294. Her grief hid her cruel nature, and she became composed and mild (cool), just as a small sun-crystal [becomes cool] when its peculiar property of producing heat is concealed by darkness.

295. From that time forwards the wealth which she had acquired by evil acts, became purified through her astonishing deeds of piety.

296. Bhuyyu, Sindhu's brother, a man of virtue, who was city prefect, encouraged her in this pious activity.

297. From the time that he had roused in her the priceless affection for her people, and she had abandoned her evil ways, the queen became esteemed by everyone.

298. Rare to find, indeed, is the minister who, free from fierceness, makes it easy [for the subjects] to serve the king, just as the winter [makes it easy to enjoy] the sun.

Pious-foundations of Diddā.

299. To increase her deceased son's merit, she founded the [temple of Viṣṇu] Abhimanyuvāmin and [the town of] Abhimanyupura.

300. She built further the [temple of Viṣṇu] Diddāvāmin, together with Diddāpura, and a Maṭha for the residence of people from Madhyadeśa, Lāṭa and Sauśotra (?).

299. Neither the temple nor the town are otherwise known. Regarding another place called Abhimanyupura, see i. 175.

300. Nothing is known of the Diddāvāmin temple and of Diddāpura.

The Maṭha here referred to is undoubtedly the Diddāmaṭha mentioned vii. 11; viii. 349. It has left its name to the Diddāmar quarter of S'rinagar, situated between the sixth and seventh bridges on the right bank of the river. This identification is well known to the Paṇḍits, and is borne out by numerous passages of the later Chronicles which refer to that part of the city under the name of Diddāmaṭha; comp. S'riv. iii. 173, 186 sqq.; iv. 123; Fourth Chron., 322, 550, 629, 698.

/ Regarding the significance of the term Madhyadeśa, 'the middle country,' see LASSEN, Ind. Alt., i. p. 119, and FLEET, Ind. Ant., xxii. p. 169.—For Lāṭa, see note iv. 209.

For the name Sauśotra, which is otherwise

301. To increase the eminence of the merit of her husband, the 'Kankaravaru,' this charming lady, who gave gold in showers, built Kankarapura.

302. She also built a second [temple of Viṣṇu called] Diddāsvāmin, of white stones, which was dazzling as if bathed with the waters of the Gaṅgā as it issues from the feet [of Viṣṇu].

303. She of charming beauty built a Vihāra with a high quadrangle, as an abode for Kāśmīrians and foreigners (daśika).

304. Under the name of her father, Simharāja, she erected the illustrious [shrine of Viṣṇu] Simharāmin, and a Maṭha for the residence of foreign Brahmins.

305. By the construction of Maṭhas, by the placing of Vaikuṇṭha (Viṣṇu) images and other pious works of her own, she sanctified the confluence of the Vitastū and Sindhu.

306. Why enumerate [so] many pious works? It is related that she made sixty-four foundations in different localities.

307. The queen, being bent on the restoration of ruined buildings (jīrṇoddhāra), enclosed with stone walls almost all the temples the surrounding walls of which had been burned down.

308. Valjā, a porter-woman, who used to carry about on her back the lame queen at games which required running, caused the Valgāmaṭha to be erected.

309. The Timi-fish, though living in sacred water and keeping silence like a Muni, habitually eats those of his own stock; the peacock, though feeding only on rain water, yet daily swallows the snakes; the heron, though keeping in pretended meditation, eats the unsuspecting fishes. There is no knowing either unknown, the authors of the P.W., s.v., śauḍa, proposed to read Sauḍoḍra, which would give us the two names of Sauḍa and Uḍra. The latter is the old designation of Orissa; see FLAHERTY, l.c. p. 192. Sauḍa is, perhaps, as suggested in N.P.W., s.v., the same as the ethnic name Sauḍa mentioned between Malava and Gurjara in an inscription published Ind. Ant., xii. p. 218.—LASSEN, Ind. Alt., iii. p. 104, had suggested the emendation of Gauḍa for Sauḍa.

301. For Abhimanyu's epithet or nickname Kankaravaru, 'Rainer of bracelets,' see vi. 161.

Kankarapura is, perhaps, the modern Kangan, a village on the right bank of the Sind river, 74° 57' long. 84° 16' lat.

308. The word daśika in our passage has been assumed to designate 'people of [Didda's] own country' (P.W.), or 'teachers' (N.P.W.). The context, however, shows that it designates the 'foreigner' in contrast to the Kāśmīrian. This is also the meaning distinctly given to the word by Jonarāja in his commentary on Srikanṭha. xxv. 102 (deśāntarīya). K. uses the word clearly in the same sense, viii. 1328, where no other interpretation is possible, and in vii. 97, 189, 193; viii. 493. Another passage, viii. 8058, is doubtful. For daśika, 'foreigner,' comp. Vikram. xviii. 44, and above note iii. 9 on deśya. The meaning 'traveller,' given by Hemacandra for deśika (see P.W., s.v.), may also be referred to.

Didda's Vihāra is not mentioned elsewhere.

304. From the reference made to the Simharājamāṭha in vii. 1568, it might be assumed that this shrine stood somewhere near Vijayaśvara. A temple of Viṣṇu Simharājamāmin is mentioned in viii. 1822 at Lohara.

305. Regarding this confluence (sangama), see Note I, v. 97-100.

NANDIGUPTA
(A.D. 972-978).

about the pious practices or about the change to sinful acts [on the part] of wicked people.

310. After a single year, when her grief had been allayed, that unfaithful woman, lusting for pleasures, employed witchcraft against her little grandson.

311. On the twelfth day of the bright half of Mārgaśīrṣa in the year [of the Laukika era four thousand] forty-nine (A.D. 973), he was destroyed by her persisting on her unholy course.

TRIBHUVANA
(A.D. 978-976).

312. In the same fashion she destroyed her grandson Tribhuvana, on the fifth day of the bright half of Mārgaśīrṣa in the year [of the Laukika era four thousand] fifty-one (A.D. 975).

BHĪMAGUPTA
(A.D. 976-980/1).

313. Then the cruel [queen] put without hesitation her last grandson, Bhīmagupta, on that path of death which bore the name 'throne.'

314. At that time there died also the old Phalguna, from respect for whom Diddā had concealed her cruelty and malignity.

315. Thereafter she committed hundredfold excesses by open misconduct, infuriated just as a female elephant in rut which has torn off its face-covering.

316. Alas, the course of women even of noble descent moves by nature downwards, like that of rivers!

317. Born from the resplendent ocean, the sovereign lord of the waters, Lakṣmī yet takes her permanent abode in the lotus (jalaṇḍa), which is born in a pool containing but little water. Thus too women of high origin abandon themselves to the low.

Rise of Tuṅga.

318-320. Tuṅga was the son of Bāṇa, a Khaṣa whose native village was Baddivāsa in Parṇotsa. He had come as a herdsman of buffaloes. After reaching Kāśmīr, together with his five brothers, Sugandhāsīha, Prakaṭa, Nāga, Aṭṭayika, and Ṣaṇmukha, he obtained employment as a letter-carrier (lekhaḥāraka). Once before the minister of foreign affairs he was seen by the queen and won her heart.

312. The rare coins of this nominal ruler show his name as Tribhuvanagupta; see CUNNINGHAM, Med. Coins of India, pl. iv. 14.

313. Bhīmagupta is named as the resigning prince in the Laukika year 4052 (A.D. 976/7), when Kayyapa, son of Candraditya, composed his commentary on the Devīśāstra of Anandavardhana; comp. Colophon of the latter text in Kāvyamālā, ix. p. 31.

317. In jalaṇḍa an allusion is intended to jaṭṭa, 'born from a fool'; comp. notes iv. 10; vii. 1108.

318-320. The modern glossator A, identifies Baddivāsa with Bādāl, i.e. Būdīl, a well-known village situated to the south of the Pir Panjal on one of the upper tributaries of the Āns River, circ. 74° 48' long. 33° 22' lat. It has given its name to a pass over the range and to a once much-frequented mountain-route; comp. DREW, Jummo, pp. 137, 524. It is to be doubted whether this identification is correct, as Būdīl lies a considerable distance from the territory now belonging to Prāṇṭa (Parṇotsa), and is separated from it by a high range of mountains. [Cunningham seems to have heard the same identification, as he mentions, Anc. Geogr., p. 133, 'Badwāl or 'Yaddivāsa', in a list of hill-states to the S. of Kāśmīr. 'Badwāl', a name which I have not been able to trace, is here probably intended for Būdīl.]

The early career of Tuṅga finds its parallel in that of many Pahāris, in particular Gujars

321. She had the youth brought up secretly by a messenger, and took, as fate willed, an affection for him, though she had [already] many paramours.

322. Then the queen, who knew no shame, and was filled with love for Tuṅga, killed Bhūyṣa by poison, as he had shown dissatisfaction.

323. Shame upon those bad masters, thoughtless and of perverse mind, who, when pleased, bestow empty praise which carries no reward, and punish a fault with the loss of life and property!

324. The Velāvitta Devakalāśa, Rakha's son, a shameless wretch, who acted as a procurer, was placed by her in Bhūyṣa's office.

325. Even leading men like Kurūlamarāja, lord of the Gate, and other [chief] officers, even they did procuring. Others [who did the same], how could they be counted?

326-328. When the child Bhīmāgupta, after living four or five years in the palace, had become a little more developed in intellect, and recognized in his mind that the affairs of the kingdom and his grandmother's ways of living were not right, and in need of reform, he became an object of suspicion to that fickle [queen], who was by nature merciless and deficient [not only] in body [but also] in moral feeling.

329. He was the scion of a noble family whom Abhimanyu's wife had secretly substituted [as her own son. It was] for this [reason that] he was of such character.

330. Thereupon the shameless queen, feeling alarmed, openly imprisoned Bhīmāgupta on Devakalāśa's advice.

331. The doubt which had [till now] been felt by the people as to the mischief secretly done to Nandigupta and the others, was dispelled by this open act of hers.

332. Having put Bhīmāgupta to death by various tortures, she herself ascended the throne in the year [of the Laukika era four thousand] fifty-six (A.D. 980/1).

333. Then Tuṅga, whom the queen's infatuation made day by day [more] insolent, became prime minister (sarvādhipārin) and was raised above everybody.

334. The former ministers whom Tuṅga and his brothers had ousted, were filled with dissatisfaction, and exerted themselves to raise a rebellion in the kingdom.

335. They met in council and brought to Kāśmīr Prince Vigraharāja, the son of Diddā's brother, who was strong and possessed formidable valour.

BHĪMAGUPTA
(A.D. 976-980/1).

DIDDĀ
(A.D. 980/1-1008).

of the present time. Coming to Kāśmīr from Prānta and the neighbouring hill-districts with their buffaloes, they find ready employ as Shikāris, dāk-carriers, etc., owing to their comparative energy and reliability.

The lekhaṇāraka is the lekhaśid of modern Indian courts.

324. Compare vi. 296.

328. aṅgaśilavikṣmāyāḥ: an allusion to Diddā's lameness; see vi. 308.

DIDDĀ
(A.D. 980/1-1003).

336. On his arrival, he sensibly at once induced the Brahmans holding the chief Agrahāras to enter upon a solemn fast (prāyopaveśa), in order to cause disturbance in the kingdom.

337. When the Brahmans had united, the whole of the people was in uproar too, and searched daily in different places for Tuṅga, wishing to kill him.

338. Diddā, fearing a revolt, hid Tuṅga for some days in an apartment with closed doors.

339. By presents of gold, she gained over Sumanomantaka and other Brahmans, and then the fast ended.

340. As soon as she had by her bribes warded off this great trouble, Vigraharāja's power was broken, and he went as he had come.

341. Tuṅga and his people, having [again secured] the power and strengthened their position, put to death, in due course, Karḍamarāja and others who had raised the rebellion.

342. When dissatisfied, they exiled Sulakkama, Rakka's son, and other chief councillors, and brought them back [again], when pleased.

343. Vigraharāja, whose omity was growing, again by secret emissaries caused the Brahmans to begin a solemn fast (prāya).

344. The Brahmans met again to hold a fast, [but] as they were willing to take bribes, Tuṅga, who had firmly established himself, got rid of them.

345. Āditya, a favourite officer (? kaṭakavārika) of Vigraharāja, who had secretly kept among them, fled and was killed.

346. A chamberlain called Vatsurāja was wounded and caught alive in his flight by Nyaṅkotaka and others.

347. Also Sumanomantaka and the other Brahmans, who had taken the gold [of Diddā], were all caught and put into prison by Tuṅga.

Expedition against Rājapurī.

348. The ruler of Rājapurī showed then arrogance in consequence of Phalgunā's decease, and all the ministers in anger started an expedition against that [land].

349. Thereupon Prthivīpāla, the valiant king of Rājapurī, attacked the Kāśmīr force in a defile, and destroyed it.

350. There the ministers S'ipātaka and Haṃsarāja found their death. Candra and others fell into [such] distress that death would there have been a relief.

351. Then the heroic Tuṅga, with his brothers, suddenly penetrated into Rājapurī by another route, and at once burnt it down entirely.

345. The exact meaning of the designation kaṭakavārika is uncertain. It is found only once more, viii. 861, where too it is used of a person in the service of the Rājapurī ruler.

352. By this diversion King Pṛthvīpāla was defeated, and the forces of the other ministers were extricated from the defile.

Diddā
(A.D. 980/1-1008).

353. In his helplessness the king paid tribute to Twiga. Thus that [minister] retrieved on this occasion a lost cause.

354. Twiga on his return thence to the City (S'rīnagar) received the command of the army, and with the courage of a lion destroyed the hosts of the Dāmaras.

355. And Diddā without scruple raised the son of her brother Ulayarāja, called Saṅgrāmarāja, to the rank of Yuvarāja after testing him [as follows] :

Saṅgrāmarāja made Yuvarāja.

356. In order to test her nephews, children all, who were assembled before her, she threw down before them a heap of apples (pālevata).

357. "How many of these fruits can each get hold of?" Thus she spoke and caused thereby a scramble among the princes.

358. She saw that the others had got but few fruits, but had received their knocks, while Saṅgrāmarāja held plenty of fruits and was yet untouched.

359. When she asked him in surprise how he had secured that large number of fruits without getting a blow, he replied to her thus :

360. "I got the fruits by making those [boys] fight furiously with each other, while I kept apart, and thus I remained unhurt."

361. "What successes do not fall to the share of those who without exerting themselves excite the passions of others and stand by with a cool mind?"

362. On hearing this his reply, which showed his collected mind, she who was timid, after woman's nature, thought him fit for the throne.

363. Because the courageous think an object attainable by courage, just as the timid [think it attainable] by a cautious course, and this could not be otherwise.

364. Wood even without burning may relieve the cold of monkeys; water and fire may serve to clean the skin of antelopes which purify themselves in the flames (agnīśauca). Things serve the object of each being according to its ways; they never possess in reality an innate nature.

365. When the queen had gone to heaven on the eighth day of the bright half of Bhādrapada in the year [of the Laukika era four thousand] seventy-nine (A.D. 1003), the Yuvarāja became king.

356. Pālevata is believed by the Kāśmīrian Pandits to mean 'apple.' The fruit is mentioned by S'rivara, i. 196, together with lāṅka (pear?) and cirā (apricot?), in the description of a Kāśmīr famine. Compare also the verse quoted in the commentary on Mahākha's Kośa, s.v. bhāṇya.

364. The wood which, without burning, is supposed to warm the monkeys, is referred to again in viii. 2627, under the designation vānarendhara, 'the monkeys' fuel.' The latter passage shows that a wood is meant which cannot be ignited. I have not been able to trace any tree to which such a belief is attached at present in Kāśmīr.

Regarding the antelopes which are supposed to clean themselves in the fire, comp. note v. 15.

DIDDĀ
(A.D. 980/1-1008).

366. This is the third wonderful change in the royal dynasties of this country which has taken place through relationship by marriage.

367. In this land cleared from the mass of enemies (or, thorns), and abounding in rich possessions, the race of the illustrious Sātavāhana attained its rise; as a mango-shoot [grows up] in a pleasure-garden in which inferior trees have been consumed by a forest-fire, and which has been moistened by the water of the clouds.

368. Then Samgrāmarāja, whose power of firm resolution was hidden by gentleness, supported easily on his arm the whole land, just as the lord of the snakes (S'eṣanāga), while concealing the power of his breath under [his snake-hoods, which have] the charming appearance of a mass of lotus-roots, [supports the whole earth] on the mass of his hoods.

Thus ends the Sixth Taraṅga of the Rājataranṅinī, composed by Kaḷhaṇa, the son of the great Kāśmīrian minister, the illustrious Lord Cāṇpaka.

366. K. refers here to the marriage of Durlabhavarādhana with Anangalekhā, which brought the Karkoṭa dynasty to the throne, iii. 481 sqq., and to the succession of Nir-jitavarman, which was brought about by the latter's relationship with Queen Sugandhā, v. 251 sqq.

367. Compare regarding Sātavāhana, the ancestor of the Lohara family, vii. 1282 sqq.

The adjectives nirnaṣṭakauṭṭakakule and vasusahpadāṭhyc may refer either to Kāśmīr or to the pleasure-garden with which the land is compared.

368. S'eṣanāga, the king of the serpents, supports the earth on his thousand heads. These, on account of their intertangled mass and relatively small size, are compared to lotus-roots.

Colophon. A has after this the following verse: "There ruled here in sixty-four years, one month, a half [month] and eight days, ten kings who enjoyed the pleasures of the earth." The figures here indicated are in agreement with the dates given for Yaśaskara's accession (Laukika era 4015 circ. Āṣāḍha śudi 14) and Didda's death (4079 Bhādrapada śudi 8).

It is probable that the somewhat awkward expression māse 'pyarāḍhe, which is liable to be mistaken as 'one half month,' is but an old misreading for māse 'dhyarāḍhe. In S'āradā writing 𑖦 and 𑖧 are easily mistaken for each other. This identical clerical error is found viii. 3407.

SEVENTH BOOK.

1. May the lord of Gauri (S'iva) bless the world, he who worshipped the Twilight (Saṁdhyā) also, while he praised the Daughter of the mountains (Pārvatī), who felt jealous at the prayers addressed to Saṁdhyā, with the following artful words : "[O Pārvatī], the adorable body of your mother has been created by Brahman in the spotless family of the Pitṛs. When joined in my embrace in the twilight, you sportively play with my underlip, which is red like the China rose (japā)."—Or, "[O Saṁdhyā], Brahman has created the adorable body of you, the mother of the spotless family of the Pitṛs. When you make your appearance in the twilight, you are again and again on my lip which is engaged in murmuring prayers (japa)."

2. The king bore forbearance (kṣamā) in his mind and the earth (kṣamā) in his arm; he surpassed leaders of armies (vāhinīpatīn) in strength and oceans (vāhinīpatīn) in profundity.

SAMGRĀMARĀJA
(A.D. 1003-1023).

3-4. While the people all thought that Tuṅga would fall at the death of the queen, as the sun [goes down] attended by the twilight when the splendour of day departs, they saw him, on the contrary, even rise after breaking through the host of his various rivals. Who ever knows the course of the Creator?

5. At that time died the valiant and powerful Candrākara, who had become related to the king and who was worthy of the prime ministership.

6. The valiant sons of Puṇyākara, a rich clerk in the village of Bhīmatikū, were others who found eternal rest.

7. In the absence of capable ministers, fate led the king against his will to side with Tuṅga, no other course being left to him.

8. The queen (Diddā) had before, when she was on the point of death, made Samgrāmarāja and Tuṅga and the rest take an oath by sacred libation (kośa) that they would not harm each other.

1. The words put into the mouth of S'iva may by a series of puns be understood as referring either to his consort Pārvatī or to Saṁdhyā, the personification of the twilight and of the prayer recited at twilight. Menā, the mother of Pārvatī and wife of Himavat, belongs to the race of the Pitṛs or Manes. Saṁdhyā figures as the mother of the Pitṛs. In the above paraphrase both interpretations have been given.

2. Compare note iv. 146.

6. The name Bhīmatikū probably survives in that of Bumai, a large village in the Zain'gir Pargana, situated 74° 30' long. 34° 22' lat. Comp. Bumai : Bhīma-keśava, note vi. 177-178.

SAMGRĀMARĀJA
(A.D. 1003-1028).

9. The king then, being unable to take pains and also on account of the [weight of] business, entrusted the affairs of the subjects to Tuṅga, and became slack through indulgence in pleasures.

10. How could his timid nature be still more completely illustrated? He allowed his royal dignity to be lowered by unequal matrimonial relations.

11. Anxious to secure assistance, he thus gave his daughter Loṭhikā in marriage to the superintendent of the Diddāmaṣha, Preman by name, who possessed wealth, courage, and other [good qualities].

12. How [great is the distance] between a princess fit for a king who is bent on universal conquest, and a Brahman of small mind whose hand is wet with the water of presents!

Rising against Tuṅga.

13. Then the Brahman councillors, in order to bring about the fall of Tuṅga, made the Brahmans and the Purohitas of sacred shrines (pāriṣadya) start a solemn fast (prāya) at Parihāṣapura.

14. It was difficult for the king to allay this revolt, which was caused by the common resolve of the Brahmans and the ministers, as when fire and storm combine [to cause a conflagration].

15. The Brahmans had been ready even to dothroné the king. When somewhat appeased by supplications, they insisted upon the expulsion of Tuṅga as a kind of expiatory oblation (kṣānticaru).

16. When the king and Tuṅga and his people had agreed to this, those wicked-minded Brahmans persisted in demanding something else.

17-19. They said: "Let us burn this Brahman who has died through Tuṅga's violence, in his (Tuṅga's) house." These rogues had taken the body of some dead person out of a well, and were carrying it towards the residence of Tuṅga, when the evil spirit (kṛtyā) which they had raised by performing a sacrifice of their hair (keśahoma), fell back upon them. A strife arose, and suddenly swords were drawn for the destruction of these impure Brahmans.

20. Thereupon the Brahmans fled, and in fright betook themselves to the house of Rājukaśa, who had been their secret instigator.

21. He, whose perfidy had become evident, kept up the fight for a long time, but the Brahmans fled through openings other than the gate and went to their homes.

12. Presents to Brahmans have to be offered accompanied by drops of water; comp. viii. 3401; Nīlmatu, 999; Caturvarga. i. pp. 185, 299, 333, etc.; ii. p. 40.

13. For pāriṣadya, comp. note ii. 132.

15. K. evidently alludes by the expression kṣānticaru to a particular sacrificial oblation.

The expression is used once more in a simile, viii. 2513.

17-19. The keśahoma is mentioned in Purāṇic stories; comp. Padmapur., II. xxiii. 5 sqq. The Rsis throw their locks into the fire, from which rises a goblin to avenge their wrong.

22. When Rājakaśa was defeated, the seven sons of S'rūhara, who were Brahmins and councillors, came and fought in the same cause.

SAMGRĀMARĀJA
(A.D. 1008-1028).

23. Having performed great deeds in the fight, they found their death, and all seven entered straight into the world of Sūrya.

24. Then when these had fallen in the fight, Tuṅga had Rājakaśa, who had been vanquished by Sugandhisīha, brought to his own house in fetters.

Tuṅga's victory.

25. Tuṅga's grooms quickly carried him wounded and disarmed on their shoulders, and made him dance on the roads.

26. Another minister, Bhūṭikaśa, who had also been defeated, went with his son Liājalen to the S'ūrumaṭha.

27. When after some time Sugandhisīha and the rest had let him free from a feeling of pity, he went abroad, together with his son, burning with the fire of humiliation.

28. This commotion in the land which had arisen from Parihāsanurva, turned out, as fate willed it, just to the glory of Tuṅga.

29. Subsequently, when the king had been propitiated through the minister Gṇadeva, Bhūṭikaśa returned after having made his ablutions in the Gaṅgā.

30. When he had again slowly secured some foothold in the palace, the king secretly sent emissaries to kill Tuṅga.

31. Tuṅga became aware of this, and disclosed the matter, whereupon the king again oxiled Bhūṭikaśa and his son.

32. Māyāmanataka, the son of Oandrakara, who in the course of time had attained some position, also died at that time.

33. The illustrious Prēman too, the well-wisher of the king, died after having enjoyed for a brief time his union with the king's daughter.

34. All the other friends of the king, like Gaṅga and the rest, died also. Only Tuṅga, with his brothers, remained to enjoy pleasures.

35. Thus every occurrence which was expected to cause his fall, by the favour of fate only brought him greater predominance.

36. Thus those very floods of the river which, one might fear, would cause the fall of the tree on the bank where the ground has become loose by the lapse of time, and whose only support is in its roots—they, in truth, give firmness to the soil on which that [tree] stands, by the earth they bring down.

37. But Tuṅga, who had been eminently prudent in his conduct, and wholly bent on satisfying the people, became gradually, when the merits of his former [existence] were exhausted, unsteady in mind.

24. Sugandhisīha was a younger brother of Tuṅga; see vi. 319.

SAMGRĀMARĀJA
(A.D. 1008-1028).

Rise of Bhadreśvara.

38. [Thus it happened] that, to his own misfortune, he took a low-born man Kayastha Bhadreśvara by name, as his assistant.

39-41. This [man's] proper hereditary occupation as a gardener (ārāmika) had been to trade in night soil, to act as a butcher, to sell fuel, etc. Then for a living he had hung at the back of officials, carrying their bags and ink-bottles, while a rough woollen cloth rubbed his [own] back. When Tuṅga, who was worn out by the cares of endless official and other affairs, made him his assistant, he did not know that by this association he brought about the destruction of [his own] fortune.

42. Ousting the pious and noble-minded Dharmārka, he put that wicked person in charge of the Gṛhākṛtya office.

43. Resembling an untimely death, that evil-minded person cut off the sustenance of gods, cows, Brahmins, the poor, strangers, and royal servants.

44. Even a fear-inspiring Kāpālīka, who lives on corpses, gives maintenance to his own people; but the wicked Bhadreśvara did not allow even his own people to live.

45. In Caitra, Tuṅga made Bhadreśvara the master over everything, and in the month of Āśāḍha, Sugandhisikha died.

46. When this brother of his died who had been able to bear all cares, the distressed Tuṅga felt as if his head had been cut off.

47. In the month of Mārgaśīrṣa the king despatched him to the country of the illustrious S'āhi Trilocanapāla, who had asked for help.

Expedition in support of Trilocanapāla.

39-41. K. evidently means by ārāmika the market-gardener, the modern maliār of Kāśmīr. The work of the latter is invariably connected with the use of night soil or poudrette as manure, and is, therefore, considered degrading; comp. LAWRENCE, Valley, pp. 307, 322. An agriculturist who takes up the work of a market-gardener, cuts himself off from agricultural Muhammadans. Butchers, too, in Kāśmīr, now exclusively Muhammadans, are esteemed men of low occupation, and it is clear that in Hindu times a still stronger taint must have attached to their calling; comp. above iii. 6. From the curious account given in our passage of Bhadreśvara's career, we may conclude that that plasticity of the social system in Kāśmīr which at present strikes the observer coming from other parts of India, is not a development of modern date. The peculiar elasticity of social organization in Kāśmīr has been duly noted and illustrated with remarkable facts by Mr. LAWRENCE, loc. cit. pp. 306 sq.

42. Regarding the Gṛhākṛtya office, see v. 176.

44. The term kāpālīka usually designates a sect of Śaiva mendicants who feed out of skulls. Our passage attributes to them the practices of the modern Aghōris.

47-69. S'āhi Trilocanapāla is identical with Trilocanapāla, son of Anandapāla, whom Albēruṇī (India, ii. p. 13) mentions as the last independent prince of the 'Hindu Shāhiya dynasty'; comp. REINAUD, Mémoire, p. 260 sq.; TROYER, Rādhat., iii. p. 649, and regarding the earlier history of that dynasty, also above Note J, v. 152-155. He succumbed to Mahmūd of Ghazna after a long struggle, of which detailed accounts are given by the Muhammadan historians dealing with that period; see ELLIOT, History of India, ii. p. 434 sqq. From the same sources it appears that Trilocanapāla was already during his father's reign (A.D. 1002-1018) at the head of the armies which endeavoured to stem the Muhammadan advance. Trilocanapāla's name appears often greatly disfigured in the Arabic writing of these texts, as 'Puru Jaipal,' 'Nardajampal,' etc.; comp. ELLIOT, loc. cit. ii. p. 426 sq.

There can be no doubt that K.'s narrative, vii. 47-69, relates to one of the campaigns which Mahmūd of Ghazna directed against Trilocanapāla and his allies. The identity of 48. A large army, attended by many Rājaputras, chief councillors, feudal chiefs, and others [of rank], capable of making the earth shake, followed him.

SANGRĀMARĀJA
(A.D. 1008-1028).

Hamīra of our account with Mahmūd has been recognized by REINAUD, l.c. Already before him, THOMAS (J.R.A.S., ix. p. 190 sq.) had shown the derivation of this term from the Arabic title Amīr al-mūmenīn, and its application on coins and elsewhere to the Ghaznavide Sultan. Reinaud has also rightly pointed out that the expression Turushka used for Trilochanapāla's opponents, vii. 51, 56, is particularly appropriate for Mahmūd's army, which consisted chiefly of soldiers of Turkish origin.

In my paper 'Zur Geschichte der Gāhis von Kābul,' p. 201 sq., I have pointed out that the discrepancy which the Muhammadan accounts show as to the chronology and the topographical details of Mahmūd's later expeditions, do not permit us at present to identify with certainty the campaign to which K.'s narrative relates. It is also to be regretted that K. has omitted to indicate the year of Tugha's expedition. A critical examination of the Muhammadan sources may, however, yet lead to a definite settlement of the question.

Judging from the materials accessible in Elliott's work, most facts seem to point to Mahmūd's expedition of the year 1013 (the ninth, according to Elliott's reckoning); see l.c. ii. p. 450 sqq. Trilochanapāla appears to have met the invader on this occasion for the last time in the Panjāb.

The detailed account which the Turikh-i Fāimī gives of the decisive battle in this campaign (see ELLIOT, l.c. ii. p. 37 sqq.), agrees in some particulars, regarding the positions occupied by the opposing forces, and the changing fortune of the contest, closely enough with K.'s description. Mahmūd seems to have won his victory in one of the valleys which lead from the region about Jhelam towards Kāśmīr, and to have pursued Trilochanapāla in the latter direction. Some chiefs on the confines of Kāśmīr are said to have made their submission to the Sultān in consequence of this victory. Also the forcible conversion of Kāśmīris to Islam is mentioned on this occasion.

These details agree fully with what the Chronicle tells us of the support given to Trilochanapāla by a Kāśmīrian force, and in particular with the locality which K. indicates for the defeat of the allies. The Tausi mentioned in verso 53, can scarcely be any other river but the Tohi, which flows through Parnotsu (Prūts), and joins the Vitastā above the town of Jhelam. Through the valley of the Prūts Tohi leads the most convenient route towards Lohara (Loh'rin). From there again a route much used in old times, leading over the Toṣmaidan Pass, opens access to Kāśmīr. It is actually by this route that we find two years later Mahmūd attempting the invasion of Kāśmīr; comp. Note E, iv. 177, § 12. The fortress of 'Lohkot,' Albērūnī's 'fortress of Lauhūr' (India, i. pp. 208, 317) which stopped his advance on the latter occasion, has been identified in the last quoted note with Lohara.

As the valley of the Prūts Tohi contains to this day a considerable Kāśmīri population as far down as Kōlī, we can understand the notice about the conversion of Kāśmīris. It is not, as has been supposed (LASSEN, Ind. Alt., iii. p. 1048), in contradiction with the fact that Kāśmīr remained actually unconquered.

K. is evidently right in representing the battle on the Tausi as having finally decided the fate of the S'āhi dynasty. The Muhammadan historians, in full agreement with the Chronicle, make mention of the subsequent occasions on which Trilochanapāla bravely endeavoured to retrieve his lost fortune. They also show that those battles were no longer fought in the Panjāb, the seat of the power of the later S'āhi kings. Their accounts prove further that K. was justified in the enthusiastic praise he gives to Trilochanapāla's personal bravery and to his indomitable courage in misfortune (vii. 60-65).

Trilochanapāla's death is placed by Albērūnī in the year A.H. 412 (A.D. 1021/2). His son Bhimapāla, who survived him only by five years, is no longer mentioned as an independent prince by the Muhammadan historians. The rapid downfall of the powerful S'āhi dynasty must have left a deep impression on the mind of contemporary observers. The great qualities of its princes had been acknowledged even by their Muslim adversaries.

Albērūnī, who had witnessed the events which led to the annihilation of the S'āhi power, says regarding them: "This Hindu Shāhiya dynasty is now extinct, and of the whole house there is no longer the slightest remnant in existence. We must say that, in all their grandour, they never slackened in the ardent desire of doing that which is good and right, that they were men of noble sentiment and noble bearing" (India, ii. p. 13).

The words with which K. refers to the extinction of this great dynasty, vii. 66-69, may thus be taken as representing correctly the feelings which the catastrophe had roused in the hearts of the people.

SAMGRĀMARĀJA
(A.D. 1008-1028).

49-50. When he, together with his son, had been hospitably received by the S'āhi who had gone to meet him, and had been in that land for five or six days, the S'āhi noticed that they gave no thought to night-watches, the posting of scouts, to military exercises and other [preparations] proper for an attack, and spoke thus to Tuṅga, who was intoxicated [with self-confidence]:

51. "Until you have become acquainted with the Turuṣka warfare, you should post yourself on the scarp of this hill, [keeping] idle against your desire."

52. This good counsel of Trilocana[pāla] he in his pride did not accept, but remained, together with his troops, eagerly looking out for battle.

Battle with Hammitra.

53. Then he crossed thence with a rather small force to the other bank of the Tauṣī, and defeated a corps which Hammitra had sent on a reconnaissance.

54. Though he was filled thereupon with pride, the S'āhi, experienced in war, repeated again and again the same advice he had given before.

55. Blinded by his desire for battle, he did not accept the S'āhi's counsel. Advice is of no use for those whose destruction is near.

56. In the morning then came in fury and in full battle array the leader of the Turuṣka army himself, skilled in stratagem.

57. Thereupon the army of Tuṅga dispersed immediately. The S'āhi's force, however, was seen for [some] time moving about in battle.

58. Even when the S'āhi's army was gone, Jayasimha rushed about fighting, also S'rivardhana and Vihvamārka, the Dāmara, of Samgrāma's family.

59. These three valiant men, fighting on the terrible field of battle which resounded with [the tramp of] horses, preserved the honour of their country from being lost.

60. Who would describe the greatness of Trilocanapāla, whom numberless enemies even could not defeat in battle?

61. Trilocana[pāla], causing floods of blood to pour forth in battle, resembled S'iva (trilocana) when sending forth the fire which burns the world at the end of the Kalpa.

62. After fighting crores of armour-clad soldiers in the battle, this [prince],

53. Prof. BÜHLER, Report, p. 3, has already pointed out that Tauṣī is the ancient form of the appellation Tohi which is now borne by several mountain-streams joining the Vitasta and Cināb from the south slopes of the Pir Panśāl Range. A Tauṣī is mentioned by the Nilamata, 113, along with the Apagā (Ayak) and Candrabhāgā. Though Prof. Buhler is quite right in stating that Tohi is a generic appellation now given to any perennial mountain stream in the hill regions to the S. of Kāśmīr, yet there can be little doubt, for the reasons indicated in the preceding note, that in our passage the Tohi of Prūṭis is meant. The nearest other stream generally known as Tohi, that of Rajauri, flows too far to the E. to have been on Mahmūd's line of advance. Regarding another mention of the Prūṭis Tohi under its proper name, see note viii. 2006.

The term Tauṣī is probably, as suggested by Prof. Buhler, connected with Skr. tūṣāra, 'snow,' and means thus etymologically 'a river coming from the snows.'

58. See v. 306 regarding Samgrāma.

who was experienced in affairs, came forth singly from among the foes pressing [around him].

SAMGRĀMARĀJA
(A.D. 1003-1028).

63. When Trilocana[pāla] had gone afar, the whole country was overshadowed by hosts of fierce Caṇḍālas which [resembled clouds of] locusts.

64. Even after he had obtained his victory, Īammāra did not breathe freely, thinking of the superhuman prowess of the illustrious Trilocanapāla.

65. Trilocana[pāla] displayed great resolution also after he had fallen from his position, and relying on his force of elephants endeavoured to recover victory.

66. I have not described here at length how rapidly the royal glory of the *S'āhi*s has vanished even [down to their very] name, this being only an incident.

Destruction of S'āhi kingdom.

67. Nothing is impossible to Fate. It effects with ease what even in dreams appears incredible, what fancy fails to reach.

68-69. That S'āhi kingdom whose greatness on the earth has above been briefly indicated in the account of King S'unhavarman's reign,—now one asks oneself whothor, with its kings, ministers and its court, it over was or was not.

70. Then Tuṅga, after having by his defeat brought about the descent of the Turushkas on the whole surface of the earth, marched back slowly to his own country.

71. The king, whose character was equal to his courage, felt no anger against Tuṅga for his fault, though he had been beaten like a jackal.

72. Still the king felt annoyed at his dependence on Tuṅga; even an animal's spirit is pained by dependence on others.

73. Also Kandarpasinha, Tuṅga's son, who was full of pride on account of his wealth and strength, caused him uneasiness by behaving like a king.

74. His brother Vigraharāja, too, who was waiting for his opportunity, urged the king at that time by secret letters to have Tuṅga put out of the way.

Intrigue against Tuṅga.

75. The king wavered for a long time in his mind, remembering the oath by sacred libation (kośa) and other [facts], and then, irritated by the repeated urging, spoke thus to the instigators:

76. "If he comes some day within our reach while alone with his son, at that time let us see what we can do."

77. "If otherwise attacked, he is sure to put us to a violent death." Having said this to gain time, the king stopped.

78. Those few words fell into their hearts like seeds, and they endeavoured to bring Tuṅga into such a situation.

74. Regarding Vigraharāja, see vi. 335 sqq.

75. Compare above vii. 8.

76. I have followed Durgapri's reading, gocara, as a very acceptable emendation for gocaro of A.

SAṆGRĀMARĀJA
(A.D. 1003-1028)

79. Within six months [it happened] by the will of fate that Tuṅga, when called by the king, left his house in his son's company, though he had had a bad dream.

80. After he had entered the palace and had been in the presence of the king for a short time, he proceeded, accompanied by five or six attendants, to the council hall.

81. Parvaśarhara and others followed Tuṅga there, and struck him with their swords without having even spoken to the king.

82. Among the attendants of Tuṅga only Śimharatha deserved praise, a descendant of Mahāratha who had been a minister of S'amkaravarman.

83. He, though unarmed, threw himself that very moment on the back of Tuṅga, at whom they were striking, in order to protect him.

Murder of Tuṅga.

84. Tuṅga's breath stopped from fear at the first stroke, while the king gave a sigh of relief when Tuṅga's breath failed.

85-86. The wretched Pārtha, son of the Brahman Dharmā who belonged to the royal council (āsthānabrāhmaṇa), and the foolish Kaṇka, were with Tuṅga. These two [persons] had their bowels moved, put their fingers into their mouths to protect themselves, as if they were cattle, and dropped their weapons in terror.

87. Caṅga and others who were Tuṅga's intimates and advisers, sat still in their fright like women, though they were armed.

88-89. The king feared that Tuṅga's followers, if they did not know of his death, would raise in that tumult conflagrations, fights, and the like, and at once had Tuṅga's and his son's heads cut off with the sword, and thrown outside to give courage to his own servants.

90. The troops, when they saw their master's severed head, turned away dispirited. Some of Tuṅga's followers, [however], brilliantly displayed the character of [true] servants.

91. Bhujāṅga, the son of a Brahman feudal chief (sāmanta), who had arrived from his house, made Samgrāmarāja flee from one apartment to the other.

85-86. The term āsthānabrāhmaṇa recurs viii. 1620, and seems to indicate a certain rank which, perhaps, corresponds to that of a Durbārī in modern India. The term āsthāniya, vii. 1505, has probably the same significance.

K. seems to allude to the ancient Indian custom according to which persons in danger of their life put grass into their mouths to implore mercy. By symbolically representing themselves as cattle, they become inviolable. The Kāśmīrian heroes of our narrative have no grass at hand, and use their fingers as a substitute.

It must, however, also be kept in view that the cutting off of a finger is repeatedly referred to in the Rājat. as a mark of submission; comp. note viii. 1594.

90. Tuṅga was commander-in-chief of the army; see vi. 854; vii. 101.

SAMGRĀMARĀTA
(A.D. 1008-1028).

92. Breaking the closed door with his golden staff, he then killed twenty soldiers in the royal assembly hall.

93. The treasurer, Trailohyarāja, was killed in the fight, and the brave Abhinava, milk-brother of Kaṣṣyāmāntaka.

94. In the courtyard, thirty brave Ekāṅgas who were in the employ of Tuṅga lay dead in a row, [which seemed like] a staircase leading to heaven.

95. One Padmarāja, though he had taken part in the fight, escaped unhurt, and removed the burning pain caused by the misfortune of the master's death by visiting Tīrthas.

96. Others throw away the sword which helps to protect life in both worlds on the scene of the fight, and lost honour and life.

97. Caṇḍa, who fancied himself a good fighter, a foreigner (daiśika), Arjuna by name, and the Dāmara Helācalakra, throw away their swords and were killed by the foes.

98. With his residence plundered and his treasures robbed, Tuṅga was made by the king a mere subject of stories on the twelfth day of the bright half of Āṣāḍha.

99. After Tuṅga, whose conduct was free from treachery, along with his son had been slain by the king, it was chiefly rogues who rose to power in the royal palace.

100-101. The king then gave the chief command of the army to Tuṅga's brother Nāga, who had caused the death of his brother and nephew by corrupting the king's mind through secret calumnies, and who, as the destroyer of his own family, was branded with infamy.

Affairs after Tuṅga's
death.

102. Kṣemā, the most unfaithful wife of Kaṇḍarpasimha, had love-meetings with Nāga, just as the dark night with the goblin.

103. Four days after the disorder had ceased, Bimbā, who was a daughter-in-law of Tuṅga and a Sāhi daughter, entered the fire as a Sati.

104-105. Manikhanā, the wife of Tuṅga, left the country in misery, and took up her residence at Rājapurī. She took [with her] the two sons, the well-known Vicitrasimha and Māṭṛsimha, whom Mamma, a concubine (uvvrudhā), had borne to Kaṇḍarpasimha, as well as this daughter-in-law [herself].

106. The king then put in Tuṅga's place the wicked Bhadreśvara, who plundered the treasury and what else [belonged to the shrines] of Bhūteśvara and other gods.

97. Compare regarding daiśika note vi. 308.

103. It is of interest to note that Tuṅga, notwithstanding his modest origin, secured a Sāhi princess (sutā Sāheḥ) for his son. Are we to understand that Bimbā was a daughter of the Sāhi, i.e. Trilocanapāla? In this case we should have to assume a nexus between this marriage and the support given to Trilocanapāla by the Kāśmir king.

106. For the shrine of S'iva Bhūteśvara, see note i, 107.

SAMGRĀMARĀJA
(A.D. 1003-1028).

107. How could the king's want of judgment be shown further? He gave offices even to people like Pārtha.

108. The thoughtless king appointed the most foolish Pārtha, who was known to keep up intrigues with his brother's wife, as city prefect (nagarā-dhikṛta).

109. Pārtha, whose mind was entirely devoid of merit, committed slaughter and other sins on the holy platform (? raṅgupīṭha) of [the Liṅga of Ś'iva] Pravareśa.

110. Matāṅga, Sindhū's son, the chief of misers, was an expert in the science of fleecing the subjects, and filled the treasury of the greedy king.

111. A clerk, Devamukha by name, had once a son called Candramukha from a loose woman who used to sell pastry.

112. This [son] under Tuṅga's patronage became the king's favourite, and beginning with a cowrie (varāṭaka) accumulated orores.

113. He remained a miser when he had reached a great position, and used to sell to his own servants the cakes which others brought him as presents, in accordance with the [hereditary occupation of his] family.

114. The people laughed at him, because he who before had a powerful digestion and sound health, became dyspeptic and sickly when he attained prosperity.

115. He did one pious act at the time of his death, when he gave the third of a crore towards a restoration of the illustrious [shrine of Ś'iva] Raṇeśvara.

116. His three sons, Nāna, Bhāga and Nandimukha, had been made by the king commanders of an army division, subordinate to Tuṅga.

117. It was a ridiculous [act] on the part of the king to give them the position of Tuṅga. [It was] as when a child collects barley-ears, taking them for gold.

118. These, on being sent by the king to fight with the Turushkas like Tuṅga, turned, fled, and came back again to their own country.

119. Thus, while the ministers were incapable and the king prone to show forbearance, some Darads, Diviras (clerks), and Dāmaras obtained predominance.

107. See regarding Pārtha, vii. 85.

109. The meaning of raṅgupīṭha is quite uncertain. The term recurs at the commencement of Lokaprakāśa, iii, in a list mentioning also the liṅgapīṭha and bhādrapīṭha, but without any explanation. The above rendering has been suggested by the usual meaning of raṅga. The simple pīṭha designates the base on which a Liṅga or other sacred image is placed (also called bhādrapīṭha); comp. iii. 350 and note v. 46.

113. Small offerings are meant such as are made at receptions to persons of consequence; the modern nazar.

115. Regarding the shrine of Raṇeśvara in Ś'rinagar, see note iii. 363.

118. It seems that we have here an allusion to a subsequent expedition of Maḥmūd against Kaśmir, perhaps the one on which he reached Lohara ('Lohkot'); see note vii. 47.

119. The mention of the Darads along with the Diviras and Dāmaras is evidently made for the sake of the alliteration.

120. The king's daughter Loṭhikā constructed the Loṭhikāmaṭha, and founded another Maṭha under the name of her mother Tilottamā.

SAṆGRĀMARĀJA
(A.D. 1008-1028).

121. O, even sinners think sometimes of pious acts! Thus even Bhadreśvara built a Vihāra of distinguished merit.

Pious foundations.

122. Saṅgrāmarāja showed true judgment, and did not establish even a drinking-place (prapā), saying that the wealth he owned was unlawfully acquired.

123. The Queen S'ṛilekhā, daughter of the illustrious Yaśomanṣala, as her husband was of feeble power indulged in licentious conduct.

124. Tribhuvana, who was the son of Sugandhisīha and Jayalakṣmī, became the ardent lover of that queen.

125. Also the sharp-witted Jayākara, who worked well in the interest of the treasury, and established the Jayākaragañja and other funds (gañja), was her paramour.

126. This beautiful [queen], who was very fond of accumulating wealth, and had established 'the Gañja of Mayagrāma' and other [funds], obtained great power by the king's favour.

127. This king died on the first day of Āṣāḍha in the year [of the Laukika era four thousand one hundred] four (A.D. 1028), after having had his son Harirāja consecrated.

HAIRIRĀJA
(A.D. 1028).

128. This [prince], who was attended by wise men (sumanas) and who made all hopes (āśā) appear, gave delight (hlāda) to everyone, just as the festive time of Caitra, [which is attended by flowers (sumanas) and which illuminates all regions (āśā), brings coolness (hlāda) to everyone].

129. He whose orders were never infringed cleared the land of thieves, and prohibited the closing of doors in the market-street at night.

120. Regarding Loṭhikā, see vii. 11.

The Loṭhikāmaṭha appears, from vii. 141 and viii. 435, to have been in Srinagar.

121. No mention is found elsewhere of this Vihāra.

122. The use of unlawfully acquired wealth for pious works is declared profitless; see e.g. the passage from the Viṣṇudharma quoted Caturvargya, i. pp. 89 sq. It would also be possible to divide yo nyūyjalō 'rjitam.

125-126. The term gañja (see iv. 589) designates here and in the parallel passages, vi. 206 (Sindhugañja); vii. 570 (Kalāgañja), clearly separate funds for which special sources of revenue were assigned, and which were managed by distinct officers. These funds seem to have received their names from the person who had organized them, or from the place which supplied their revenue.

*The latter form of designation is used in the case of the 'Mayagrāmaṇagañja.' This name is taken from the village Mayagrāma, which, as viii. 729 shows, is identical with the present Mañgām situated in the lower Sind Valley, 74° 52' long. 34° 17' lat. Mañgām is a large village with a great area of excellent rice-fields. Under the last settlement the village pays the (for Kāśmir) considerable sum of Rs. 2200 as annual revenue assessment.

In P. Sahibram's Tirthas, the village figures both under its old name as Mayagrāma and as Manyagrāma (!).

128. In the month of Caitra falls the commencement of the Kāśmir spring. The adjectives characterizing Harirāja may, by a series of puns, be taken also as referring to the month.

HABIRĀJA
(A.D. 1028)

130. The rule of this king, which was of unexpected distinction and of brief duration, deserved to be praised among men, like the crescent of the young moon.

131. After ruling the earth for twenty-two days, this king of unblemished fame died on the eighth day of the bright half of Āṣāḍha.

132. The splendour which attends men who shine forth for a short time like stars, passes away just as a [brief] summer night.

133. There was a general report, which was not contradicted, that the licentious queen-mother herself had used witchcraft against her son, who was dissatisfied [with her conduct].

ANANTA
(A.D. 1028-1063).

134-135. While the king's mother, S'rīlekṣhā, who wished the throne for herself, was coming after taking a bath [where] the arrangements for the installation had been made,—the assembled Īkāṅgas and the [king's] milk-brother, Sāgara, made her child-son Ananta king.

136-137. If a person anxious to take out a treasure which has already been removed kills the snake which greedily keeps watch over it, this [procures] for him merely a sin. Even so, when the king's mother destroyed her son in her desire for the throne, this only [procured] for her a sin, since the throne was taken by another.

138. Such deceptive vision of the throne made that perverse queen forget the love for her child. O, the [false] desire for the enjoyment of pleasures!

Vijraharāja's incursion

139. Then came the child-king's old paternal uncle, Vijraharāja, to secure the throne, and displayed his valour.

140. He proceeded from Lohuru in rapid marches, burnt down the 'Gate' (dvāru), and after two and a half days unexpectedly entered the City.

141. He had thrown himself into the Loṭhikāmūṭha, and there the troops sent by S'rīlekṣhā killed him and his followers by setting fire [to the place].

131. This verse, in conjunction with verse 127, proves that the luni-solar months were reckoned in K.'s time, as at present in Kāśmīr, purvāmānta, i.e. began with the dark fortnight.

134-135. The relationship indicated vii. 139, 261 makes it clear that Ananta was Saṃgrāmarāja's son; comp. vii. 74.

140. It has been explained in Note E on Lohara, iv. 177, that it is possible during the summer months, when the Toṣṭmaidan Pass is open, to do the distance between Lohr'n and S'inagar in the short time indicated by the text. As, however, the distance is at least sixty miles, and as a pass of over 13,000' in height has to be crossed, it is clear that a performance like that of Vijraharāja presupposes great marching powers on the part of an armed force. Compare Albēri'nī, India, i. p. 317: 'the distance from Lauhūr to the capital of Kāshmir is fifty-six miles, half the way being rugged country, the other half plain.'

By dvāra is meant here the watch-station on the Toṣṭmaidan route properly known as Kārkoṭa-dranga. Its position is indicated by the village of Drang; comp. note viii. 1590, also viii. 1997 and note i. 302. The place where the route passes the scarp of the Toṣṭmaidan plateau before descending to the village of Drang, is still closed by old watch-towers marked on the map. This locality is now called bar-bal, i.e. 'the place of the Gate' (Skr. dvāra > Kā. bar).

142. The lavish queen then built two Maṭhas in honour of her husband and son, and thought day and night of high treason.

143. When in time the king had a little outgrown his childhood, he became, like one born on the throne, addicted to extravagance and other [vices].

144. Most dear to him were Rudrapāla and other S'āhi princes who exhausted the kingdom's revenues by the large salaries they drew.

145. Though receiving from the king one and a half lakhs [of Dinnāras] daily for his maintenance, Rudrapāla yet never got rid of his money troubles.

146. Diddāpāla, though he drew daily eighty thousand [Dinnāras] from the king, could yet not sleep in peace at night.

147. Anaiṅapāla, [that] Vetāla, who was the king's favourite, was ever planning the breaking up of the golden statues of gods.

148. Rudrapāla protected those who robbed [others] of their property and lives, and was a safe refuge for thieves, Caṇḍālas, and the like.

149. Kāyasthas, who were Rudrapāla's intimates, oppressed the people. The foremost among them, the famous Utpala, founded a Maṭha for the blind.

150-152. What more need be said of the king's affection for him (Rudrapāla)? He himself had married the elder daughter of Inducandra, the lord of Jāluṇḍhara, the moon-faced Asamati, on account of her beauty, the same who built a Maṭha called after herself at Tripureśvara. He then married her somewhat younger sister, the Queen Sūryamatī, to the king.

153. Through the companionship of Rudra[pāla], who pleased his ears, the king was led into evil habits, just as Suyodhana through that of Kurṇa.

154. At that time, Tribhuvana, the powerful commander-in-chief, collected the Dāmaras and came to deprive the king of the throne.

155. He arrived for battle after drawing to himself the whole army, [except] the Ekāṅgas and the mounted soldiers, who did not leave the king's side.

144. The 'S'āhi princes' (S'āhiputrāḥ) here mentioned may be assumed to have been members of the royal S'āhi family who had come to Kāśmīr as refugees. Their names, Rudrapāla, Diddāpāla, etc., show the same formation as the names of the last four S'āhi kings, Jaipāl (Jayapāla), Trilocaṇapāla, etc.

145-146. The real value of these salaries must be estimated with reference to what has been explained regarding the Kāśmīr monetary system in Note II, iv. 405.

147. Compare Harṣa's procedure, vii. 1091 sqq.

149. As Maṭhas are otherwise regularly designated after their founders or the latter's relatives, it seems probable that the differently formed name Andhamatṭha must be taken in its literal meaning as 'a Maṭha for the blind.'

✓150. As the old kingdom of Jāluṇḍhara included also Trigarta or Kangra (see note iv. 177), we may recognize with CUNNINGHAM, Anc. Geogr., p. 139, in Inducandra the Indracandra of the genealogical lists of the Kangra Rājas. That K. himself wrote the name as Inducandra, is proved by his use of the expression indumukhim immediately after it.

Bilhaga, too, Vikram. xviii. 40, calls this queen a daughter of Indu, i.e. Inducandra (devitasya . . . candrikvendurjātā).

153. Suyodhana, i.e. Duryodhana, the head of the Kauravas.

ANANTA
(A.D. 1028-1068).

Predominance of S'āhis.

Rising of Tribhuvana.

ANANTA
(A.D. 1028-1068).

156. With praiseworthy bravery, Anantadeva attacked in person Tribhuvana in the fight, warding off his unerring darts with his sword.

157. He (Tribhuvana), who was hurt by his mighty strokes, though the armour protected his body, fled and seemed to vomit his glory in the blood [which flowed] from his mouth.

158-159. When, on seeing the king's unexpected strength, he had left the battle and fled, the king, who was [yet] almost a boy, and had hidden his manliness under a modest behaviour, defeated with laudable prowess at S'ālāsthala the valorous [attack of] Abhinava, a Āmāra from S'amālā, who was fighting with darts.

160. King Ananta, whose sword became covered with flesh and blood [until it looked like] a club, moved about in the battle like a Bhairava, and made the earth shake.

161-162. When the king saw at every step Ekāṅgas whose bodies were slashed with cuts, and had their names reported to him by the attendants, ho out of kind feeling relieved the Ekāṅgas of the uncertain dependance on the Akṣapātala office, [and gave them instead] a fixed assignment (? vilābhasthāvara).

163. Thus in gratitude he there granted to his servants successively an assignment (vilābhī) to [the amount of] ninety-six crores of Dinnāras.

164. The story goes that when the king returned from the battle, the hilt of his sword, which had become fixed in his firm grasp, could [only] be removed from his hand after some time, and by sprinkling milk [on it].

165. O, the greatness of the king! When Tribhuvana came back from abroad in distress, the king received him, such [as he was], without anger.

166. He had made a relative of his, Brahmarāja by name, superintendent of the treasury (gaṇjādhipu). The latter having fallen in enmity with Rudrapāla, became disaffected and departed.

159. S'ālāsthala is evidently the older form of the name Halthal which Abu-l-Fazl, ii. p. 863, gives as that of a village in the Yech Pargana. Kā. ā regularly replaces Skr. ś. A village Halthal seems to be known in the Yech Pargana, but I have not been able to trace its position. The same place is probably meant by the S'ālāsthala (sic) mentioned Fourth Chron. 225 in connection with a rebellion in the neighbouring district of Nāgām.

S'amālā is the old name of the modern Hamal Pargana, which lies in Kamrāz to the W. of Sōpur. S'amālā is frequently mentioned in the last Taraṅga (see viii. 1003, 1011, 1132, etc.), and in the later Chronicles; comp. Jonar. 92, 107, 262; S'iv. iv. 108, etc. The Āmāras of S'amālā are referred to vii. 1022; viii. 591, 1517, 2749.

161-162. The interpretation of the term vilābhī is doubtful. The word recurs only in the next verso, and from the latter a guess has been made as to its meaning. The probable character of the Akṣapātala (chief office of accounts), and its connection with the Ekāṅgas, has been discussed in notes v. 249, 301.

The purport of our passage seems to be that the king, to show his gratitude, relieved the Ekāṅgas who had been wounded in his service from their harassing duties at the Akṣapātala, and fixed for them an assignment independent of that office, i.e. a sort of pension.

167. Having allied himself with certain Dāmaras, he by great efforts [succeeded in] leading [against the king], Alcalamaigala, king of the Darads, together with seven Mleccha princes.

ANANTA
(A.D. 1028-1068).
Invasion of Darada.

168. When that [Darad ruler] had reached the village of Kṣirapṛṣṭha, the most valiant Rudrapāla, eager for battle, went to meet him.

169. After the two forces had arranged to fight on the morrow, the Darad ruler went to amuse himself at [a pool which is] the residence of a Nāga called Piṇḍaraka.

170. In his wickedness he threw his dart at the body of a fish which was swimming there, though his attendants kept him back.

171. Then the Nāga came forth from that round pool in the shape of a jackal, and the Darad ruler threw himself after him, eager for the chase.

172. When the king's troops saw him rushing up, they thought that he was breaking the agreement, and fearing an attack they moved out for battle.

173. Then there arose a battle-feast in which brave men were wedded to the heavenly maids (Apsuras), while the clash of weapons seemed to kindle rows of fires.

174. In that great concourse of warriors, the head of the Darad lord was cut off, while the fame of Rudra[pāla], whose splendour was awe-inspiring, rose afresh.

175. The Mleccha kings were slain or captured, while the king of Kāśmīr obtained gold, jewels, and other [treasures].

176. Rudrapāla brought before his lord the Darad king's head, the dripping blood of which was purified by the water[-like] glitter of the pearls on its crest-ornaments.

177. Many similar troubles (avadālīkā) he had with his brother Udayanavatsa and with Brahmins, who held solemn fasts (prāya).

168. The gloss of A₃ identifies Kṣirapṛṣṭha with 'Kharof, a village in Kramarājya.' I have not been able to trace this place, though I have heard of the existence of a locality called Kharuf in the Uttar Pargana. It is probable that Kṣirapṛṣṭha must be looked for on one of the several routes which lead from the N. of Kamrāj into the Kishanganga Valley. The greater part of the latter has always been inhabited, as it is at present, by a Darad population. As the Kishanganga Valley is connected by several passes with Gilās and Astōr on the Indus, it is possible that the Mleccha, i.e. Muhammadan, chiefs mentioned vii. 167 came from those regions. For a similar invasion of Darads and Mleccha chiefs in K.'s time, see viii. 2760 sqq.

King Ananta's victory over Darads and Sakas is alluded to by Bilhana, Vikram. xviii. 34.

169. It is curious that this Nāga name, which is well-known to the Epics and Purāṇas, does not occur in the long lists of Kāśmīrian sacred springs given by the Nilamata and the Mahatmyas.

173. The sparks from the weapons are imagined to represent the sacrificial fires in the presence of which marriage ceremonies take place.

177. The word avadālīkā seems otherwise unknown. Its apparent etymology from ṛdat, lit. 'rupture,' and the context, justify the above interpretation.

ANANTA
(A.D. 1028-1068).

End of Ś'āhi princes.

Queen Sūryamati's
pious foundations.

178. Then Rudrapāla died of the lūtā-disease, and the other Ś'āhi princes too found an early death.

179. When the blindness created by his affection for the Pālas (i.e. Rudrapāla and his brothers) had passed away, the king found pleasure in a virtuous life, and became, as it were, a mirror reflecting Queen Sūryamati.

180. She founded the [temple of Ś'iva] Gaurīśvara, and, having the second name of Subhāṭā, constructed the meritorious Subhāṭāmaṭha on the bank of the Vitastā.

181. On the consecration of [the temple of] Sadāśiva, she made many Brahmins rich by giving away cows, gold, horses, jewels and other [presents].

182. From love for her younger brother Kallana, who was also called Āśvacandra, she built a Maṭha provided with an Agrahāra under his name.

183. She founded also two Maṭhas by the side of [the shrines of] Vijayaśeṣa and Amarēśa under the names of her brother Sillana and of her husband [respectively].

184. And at the glorious [temple of] Vijayēśvara she bestowed, as a gift of great merit, one hundred and eight Agrahāras on learned Brahmins.

185. She also granted under her husband's name Agrahāras at Amareśvara, and arranged for the consecration of Trisūlas, Bāṇalingas and other [sacred emblems].

178. Regarding lūtā, see iv. 524 sq.

180. Bilhāṇa, who devotes to this queen a lengthy eulogium, knows her by the name of Subhāṭā. He mentions a temple of Ś'iva built by her on the bank of the Vitastā, and a Maṭha which she established under her own name in the capital for the residence of students; comp. Vikram. xviii. 40-46.

The 'Maṭha of Sūryamati' is mentioned again, vii. 1658, and its restoration in K.'s time is referred to in viii. 3321. Sūryamati's temple of Ś'iva Gaurīśvara is mentioned also vii. 207, 678. These passages show that both structures were situated in Ś'rinagar.

181. Regarding the Sadāśiva temple, see note vii. 186-187.

183. It is probable that K. refers here and in verse 185 under the name of Amareśa or Amareśvara to a shrine situated at the site now marked by the village of Amburhēr, about four miles to the N. of Ś'rinagar on the road towards the Sind Valley. This place, the modern name of which is clearly derived from Amareśvara (comp. Kōṭhēr < Kapateśvara; Jyēṭhēr < Jyēṭhesvara, Note C, i. 121), is certainly meant in viii. 506, 590, 729, 766, 1124. All these passages describe fights in the immediate vicinity of Ś'rinagar. It is also mentioned as Amareśapura by Jonar. 890.

P. Sahibram in his Tirthas, gives correctly Amareśvara as the old name of the village, and refers to an Amareśvara Liṅga worshipped there. On a visit paid to the place in June, 1895, I found considerable remains of an old temple built into the Ziarat of Farrukhzad Salih. A little to the W. of the latter, on the shore of the Anohār lake, are two Nāgas, one of which, named Gaṅgā, is still annually visited by the pilgrims proceeding to the Tirthas of Mount Haramukh.

The now popular Tirtha of Amarnāth (Kā. Amburnāth) situated at a great altitude above the source of the Lid'r (see note i. 267), can scarcely be meant in our passages, as its situation would render the erection of a Maṭha by the side of the sacred imago quite impossible.

184. Bilhāṇa, Vikram. xviii. 46, refers generally to gifts of land and other presents made by Subhāṭā to learned men.

One hundred and eight is a sacred number, observed, e.g. in the number of the beads in rosaries.

185. Trisūlas, representations of Ś'iva's trident, as usually displayed on and near Ś'iva temples.

Bāṇalingas are liṅga-shaped pebbles brought from the bed of the Narmadā:

186. When their son Rājarāja died, the king and his consort left the royal palace, and took up their residence in the vicinity of [the shrine of] Sadāśiva.

187. From that time onwards the kings abandoned the residence of the former dynasties, and in accordance with the custom thus [established] took up their abode in that same [locality].

188. As the king was fond of horses, his favourite horse-trainers obtained through his largesses, as well as by the plunder they made in the country, a position altogether equal [to his own].

189. The foreigner Dallaka, to whom the king, like one born on the throne, was attached, because he was clever in jests, looted the people at all times.

ANANTA
(A.D. 1028-1068).

New palace built.

comp. note ii. 131. They are still used in Kāśmīr, as elsewhere in Northern India, for purposes of worship. Their name is derived from Bāṇa, the Asura, who worshipped Indra. Another designation is Narmaleśvara.

186-187. This passage is of considerable interest, as it helps us to fix approximately both the position of the temple (or Linga) of Sadāśiva, and of the royal palace in Kalhana's time.

As regards this later palace, we possess a clear topographical indication in the passages viii. 732, 955, which place the royal residence near the stream (sarī) called Ṛṣiptikā. The latter is, as will be shown in note viii. 732, undoubtedly identical with the canal now known as Kuṭṭkul. This leaves the Vitastā on its left bank below the Shēr Garhī, and after a course of about one and a half miles rejoins it close to the seventh bridge. Combining the evidence of the above two passages with that of vii. 1539, where the northern or right bank of the river is spoken of as that opposite to the royal palace, we must conclude that the later palace was situated somewhere between the left bank of the river and the present Kuṭṭkul. As to its exact position we are, however, yet left in doubt.

The subsequent references made by K. to the Sadāśiva shrine, vii. 673; viii. 934, 1124 sq., do not help to solve this question. But all the more useful are the indications furnished by the Fourth Chronicle.

There we find Sadāśivapura, i.e. the quarter near Sadāśiva, repeatedly mentioned as a part of the city of Śrinagar; see 508, 549 sq., 617, 697, 766, 806. Among these passages there are two which clearly place Sadāśivapura on the left river bank and opposite to the quarter of Samudrāmāṭha. In 508 sq., we read of a city fight in which the partisans of the Cakras (Tsaks) posted on the river bank in the Samudrāmāṭha fired across at their opponents who occupied Sadāśivapura. Verses 617 sq., again, describe a great fire which broke out at Sadāśivapura, and subsequently crossing the Vitastā, destroyed the Samudrāmāṭha with the neighbouring parts of the city.

By Samudrāmāṭha (called Samudramāṭha by Śrivarā, iv. 121, 169) is meant certainly the present Mahalla of Śivārmar (comp. Kā. sudār, 'son' < Skr. samudra). This quarter is situated on the right bank of the river, immediately below the second bridge. Opposite to it on the left bank lie the quarters of Zaiṇdar Mahal, Puruṣyār, Karaphal Mahal, Malikyār, all belonging to the Zilla Tāqṣīn. Here, then, we have to assume, was situated the shrine of Sadāśiva and the royal residence of Kalhana's time. As the Kuṭṭkul flows in this neighbourhood parallel to the Vitastā, and at a distance of scarcely more than 400 yards from the latter, the above quoted passages of the Rājāt, which speak of the palace as close to the Ṛṣiptikā or Kuṭṭkul, fully support our identification. ✓

With the evidence above recorded curiously agrees a local tradition which has survived in this neighbourhood. An ancient Linga, which was standing until a few years ago on the Ghaṭ (yārbal) of Puruṣyār, about fifty yards below the second bridge, has been known to the old Pinohitas living in those quarters by the name of Sadāśiva. It has recently been placed in a small temple erected close to its original position on the left river bank. It is possible that we have in the traditional name of this old Linga the last surviving trace of the ancient designation of the locality.

The 'old palace' (purāṇarājadhāni) is mentioned viii. 837, but its position is not indicated. We may safely assume that, with the rest of the city founded by Pravarasena, it was situated on the right bank of the river.

189. For the meaning of daiśika, see vi. 804.

ANANTA
(A.D. 1028-1068).

190-193. Padmarāja, a foreigner, who supplied betel-leaves, was a favourite of this [king], who was lavish and fond of the habit of taking betel. It was through this [man] that Bhoja, the lord of Mālava, had the round tank (kuṇḍa) constructed at Kapaṭeśvara with heaps of gold that he sent. King Bhoja had vowed that he would always wash his face in water from the Pāpasūdana Tīrtha, and this [man] made the fulfilment of his difficult vow [possible] by regularly despatching from this [Tīrtha] large numbers of glass jars filled with that water.

194. This man who sold betel-leaves with Nāgarakhaṇḍa and other [ingredients], made the king then give up almost the whole revenue of the country.

190-193. Bhojarāja is undoubtedly the King Bhoja of Dhārā, famous as a patron of literature, who ruled over Mālava in the first half of the 11th century. The period of his reign can now be fixed approximately as extending from about A.D. 1010 to beyond A.D. 1068; comp. Prof. Bühlmann's remarks, Epigr. Ind., i. pp. 292 sq., and below vii. 250, where King Bhoja is mentioned as living after Kalāśa's coronation, A.D. 1068.

The ancient Tīrtha of Pāpasūdana at Kapaṭeśvara, the modern Kōṭhēr, has been discussed in note i. 82.

In the note on my tour of 1891, Vienna Or. Journal, v. p. 347, I have already briefly referred to the remains still extant of the enclosure which, according to our text, Bhoja constructed around this sacred spring. The latter now rises in a circular tank of at least sixty yards in diameter, which is enclosed by a solid stone wall, and by steps leading down to the water. The depth of the tank I was unable to ascertain on my short visit in Sept., 1891, but it seemed considerable. From the formation of the ground, it is evident that this tank has been formed by closing artificially the gully in which the spring rises on the hillside. The dam which effected this forms the W. side of the tank.

The local tradition of the Purohitas of the Tīrtha, as communicated to me by an old Sādhu (Mahādev Kaul), residing at the spring, maintains that the tank and its stone enclosure were constructed by a Rāja from the Dekhan, called Mutsukund (Mucukunda). This king was disfigured by horns which had grown on his head, and had in vain sought relief by visits to numerous sacred sites. When near Kapaṭeśvara he noticed that a wounded dog was healed by entering the water of the sacred spring. The king followed his example, and got rid of his horns. Thereupon he testified his gratitude by the construction of the tank. To the same king is ascribed the erection of a temple in the usual Kāśmīr style, of modest dimensions, situated to the E. of the tank, and of several still smaller cellas of which the ruins, more or less well preserved, are found close by.

It is highly probable that this legend, which is known with slight variations also to the Muhammadan villagers of Kōṭhēr, is a reflex of the story recorded by K. of King Bhoja's daily ablutions in the water of Kapaṭeśvara.

That the latter story itself had some foundation in fact is by no means impossible. The holy water of the Ganges used to be carried in considerable quantities to great distances before the construction of modern roads and railways. Thus Jamādār Khushhāl Singh, at Ranjit Singh's court, is said to have bathed regularly in Ganges water, and the late Mahārāja Ranbir Singh of Kāśmīr never to have drunk any other water but that despatched for him from Hardvār.

A lingering recollection of King Bhoja's treasures, to which K. alludes in verse 190, seems to survive in the story told to me by the villagers, according to which the king, when building the tank, had deposited below it gold and other valuables. These were intended as compensation for the person who would repair the tank. An inscription 'in various characters' is said to have existed until Sikh times near a door in the stone enclosure on the N. side of the tank. In this inscription, which was thrown into the tank by the Muhammadan Jāgīrdār of the place under Ranjit Singh, the king is believed to have given directions as to where his treasure would be found!

It has to be noted that the circular wall around the tank and the temple above mentioned show architectural features of a comparatively late date, which permit us to assign these structures to King Bhoja's time.

194. It is not clear what is meant by nāgarakhaṇḍa. Ginger is called nāgara, but I

195. As the king's creditor, he took from him a diadem which was adorned with five resplendent crescents, and the throne, as a security for more money which was due to him.

ANANTA
(A.D. 1028-1068).

196. In every month on the day of solemn reception, these emblems of regal dignity were brought from his house to be used in the royal assembly.

197. The Queen Sūryamatī then put an end to the disgrace caused to the country by Padmarāja, by handing over the savings of her own treasury.

198. When consequently the troubles caused by the horso-trainers, by Dallaka and the rest, had been removed, affairs became once more settled in the country.

199. From that time onwards it was the queen who took the king's business in hand, while the king left off talking about his prowess, and did what he was [bid] to do.

Sūryamatī's ascendancy.

200. The husband's woman-like submission and her domination over her husband, did not give occasion for blame, as their behaviour towards each other was irreproachable.

201. Wise Anantaśva surpassed even the Munis by his devotion to Ś'iva, his vows, bathings, liberality, morals and other virtues.

202. During the long rule of this king the light of the royal [favour] passed on from one servant to the other, turning over towards some fresh [suitor], like a maid who has to choose her husband.

203. ~Kṣema, a barber, filled the king's treasury, securing revenue by the [impost of] one-twelfth (dvādaśabhāga) and other means.

204-205. Then Keśava, an honest Brahman from Trigarta, became minister, and threw lustre on the king, just as the moon [throws her light] on a stuccoed terrace. Yet this very person was seen by the people [subsequently] going about alone and in poverty. Fortune, [which is like] a stroke of lightning from the cloud of fate, for whom is it lasting?

206. Considering that possessions are subject to fate, the pride which foolish people take in the greatness of their family and power is false and vain.

207. Bhūti, a Vaiśya, who was watchman at the temple of Gaurīśa, had [three] sons, Haladhara, Vajra and Varaha.

208. Of these Haladhara rose daily higher in Sūryamatī's service, and obtained the prime-ministership (sarvadhikāritā).

Haladhara prime minister.

am not aware of its ever being used as an ingredient of betel.

The eating of betel is almost unknown in Kāśmīr at the present time. The transport of fresh betel leaves to Kāśmīr must have been in old days a difficult matter, and the article accordingly an expensive luxury.

195. For pañcacaṇḍrakā, comp. note v. 231.

196. For māsūryahavāsara, comp. viii. 170.

207. For the temple of Ś'iva Gaurīśvara, see vii. 180.

208. Agraharas founded by a Haladhara, evidently the minister here referred to, are mentioned by Bilhana, Viṭram. xviii. 19.

ANANTA
(A.D. 1028-1063).

209. As by skilful management he made the smaller chiefs submit, the king, together with his consort, used to watch his face [for orders].

210. The Pādāgra office, which Kṣema had first organized, was put by this high-minded [minister] openly above all offices.

211-212. He wisely abolished the royal privilege of marking the gold according to colour (quality), price, etc., which served to bring to light the savings of the people, knowing that succeeding kings would endeavour to seize through punishments and other [means this] accumulated wealth.

213. By executing some of the detested horse-trainers who robbed property and women, he appeased the sufferings of the people.

214. This abolisher of imposts made the confluence of the Vitastā and Simlu resplendent with temples glittering in gold, with Maṭhas and Agrahāras.

215. His brothers and sons, exalted by the accumulation of riches (lakṣmī), never ceased to give rich gifts (dāna), just as elephants [rendered mad by the familiarity with Lakṣmī never cease to secrete ichor from their temples (dāna)].

216. The illustrious and brave Dimba, son of his brother Varāha, who held charge as lord of the Gate, showered his bounties just as the clouds at the end of the world [pour down water].

217. He who had brought untimely death upon many Dāmaras, lost his life in a fight with the Khaśas when he had but few followers and [yet] declined to retreat.

Foreign expeditions.

218. King Ananta, who won victories over various kings, uprooted at Campā King Sāla, and placed a new ruler on the throne.

210. The term pādāgra is used here and vii. 571, 994: viii. 1482, 1964, 2224, 2352, clearly as the designation of some high office. It has not been found outside the Chronicle, and the character of the office to which it refers cannot be established with certainty. From our own passage it would appear that the Pādāgra office could be directly managed by the prime minister (see vii. 208), and that it was connected with the finance administration (see vii. 211 sq.). In vii. 571, King Kalaśa, who did not give charge of the pādāgra to a certain minister, though the latter was clever in raising revenue, is praised for the regard he heroically evinced for his subjects.

That the officer in charge of the pādāgra was concerned with the collection of taxes, may be concluded also from viii. 861 and viii. 2224. In the latter passage we read of a Pratyopaveśa which the Brahmins start against Citrāntha, the Pādāgra officer (viii. 1482), owing to his obstinate persistence in raising the imposts. The same officer is mentioned, viii. 1964, as holding at the same time the posts of Pādāgra and Dvārapati.

Etymologically, the term pādāgra might mean 'the [officer who stands] before the foot [of the king].'

211-212. A kind of assay for articles of gold is meant, which enabled the officials to estimate the private means of individuals. In old Kāśmīr, no doubt, as in modern India, the acquisition of ornaments in gold or silver was the only popular form of effecting investments.

For a tax 'on increments of gold,' see Mamu, vii. 180, and the authorities quoted in the note of Prof. Bühler's translation.

218. Campā is the modern hill-state of Cambā, which comprises the valleys of all the sources of the Ravi and some adjoining valleys draining into the Cinab; comp. CUNNINGHAM, Ann. Geogr., p. 141.

King Sāla has been rightly identified by

219. The king, while rashly making wanton inroads into foreign territories, often ran into danger.

220. When on an expedition against Kalaśa, the son of Tukka, his troops had become worn out, Haladhara extricated him from Vallāpura by cunning.

221. When he had invaded Uraśū, and the enemy had blocked the routes, his commander-in-chief made his retreat possible by clearing the roads.

222. While King Ananta was engaged [abroad] in difficult contests with his enemies, various acts of violence occurred [at home] every moment.

223. The illustrious Rājēśvara, son of Bhadreśvara, who was lord of the Gate, fell by the [hand of] Dāmaras residing in Kramarājya, and likewise a great many others.

224. How can a person do service in the king's palace without suffering insults, even if he look upon his task with the eye of prudence and act with discretion?

225. Even Haladhara became an object of slander on account of his

ANANTA
(A.D. 1028-1083).

Haladhara's fall.

Prof. KIRLHOFF with Sālavāhana, who is mentioned as King Somavarmadeva's predecessor in the Cambā grant published Ind. Ant., xvii, pp. 7 sqq. The latter was executed in the reign of Asaśa, whose name occurs below, vii. 588, as the ruler of Campā under Kalaśa (A.D. 1087).

CUNNINGHAM, Arch. Survey Rep., xiv, pp. 114 sq., has pointed out that the references made by K. in vii. 588, 1612; viii. 538, 1088, 1443, to members of the ruling family of Campā, and their relations with Kaśmīr, are in agreement with the traditional list of the Cambā Rājas as preserved in the family which still rules that hill-state.

✓Bilhāna, Vikram. xviii. 88, speaks of King Ananta's supremacy being acknowledged in Campā, Darvābhisāra, Trigarta and Bhartula (Vartula?). CUNNINGHAM, Anc. Geogr., p. 141, places the invasion of Campā by Ananta between A.D. 1028 and 1081, but does not give his authority for these dates.

It deserves to be noted that our text shows everywhere the spelling Campā, whereas the name (in its alternative form) is written Campākā in the grant above quoted. The latter spelling with q is regularly adopted in all S'aradā MSS. for the name of the Campaka flower; comp. also the name of Kalhana's father, written Campaka throughout in A.

Regarding the character ascribed to the inhabitants of Campā, see viii. 1531.

220. Vallāpura has been rightly identified by CUNNINGHAM, Anc. Geogr., p. 155, with the old chiefship of Ballāvar, situated in the lower hills to the E. of Jammu. The petty Rājas of Ballāvar, some time before their territory was swallowed up by the State of Jammu, had transferred their seat to Basauli on the Rāvi. But the small town of Ballāvar, 75° 40' long, 32° 37' lat., still retains in the ruins described by DREW, Jammu, p. 84 sq., marks of its former importance.

Kalaśa, the lord of Vallāpura, is mentioned again, vii. 588, as one of the hill Rājas who presented themselves at the court of Kalaśa of Kaśmīr in the winter of A.D. 1087-88. Subsequently in Sussala's reign we find Padmaka of Vallāpura, together with his son Anandarāja, joining a league of hill chiefs which supports the Kaśmīrian pretender Bhikṣatara; see viii. 539 sqq., 547 sqq. This prince is at a later date brought from Vallāpura to Rājapuri by Sussala's enemies, viii. 622.

On the other hand, a 'chief of Vallāpura,' Brahmajajjala, is named in the list of faithful Rājaputras from abroad, who stood by Sussala in his greatest straits. Here probably a scion of the Vallāpura family is meant. Sussala also had a wife Tajjalā from Vallāpura, viii. 1444. Finally, we are informed, viii. 2452, that King Jayasinha, after a successful expedition, replaced Vikramarāja by Gulhana in the rule of Vallāpura. CUNNINGHAM, l.c., states that he found the name of Kalaśa in the genealogical lists of the Ballāvar family. Al-Bēṛūnī, India, i. p. 205, mentions Ballāvar on the route from Kanauj to Kaśmīr.

221. For Uraśū, and the route to it, see note v. 217.

ANANTA
(A.D. 1028-1068).

continual attendance upon the queen, and was thrown into prison by Āśāandra and others who were enraged against him.

226. Deprived by the king of all his property, he underwent the pains of imprisonment. How [can there be] absolute happiness when the power of fortune is uncertain?

227. When the king set him free from prison, the regal majesty [seemed] to return towards him and to embrace him, while the smile of embarrassment which lit up [his] face was [like the brightness produced by] a regal parasol.

228. He experienced in the queen's behaviour from one moment to another sudden changes of wrath and favour, as [one experiences] in the course of the rainy season [sudden changes of] clouded sky and sunshine.

229. Then in course of time the simple-minded king fell [completely] under his wife's domination, which was the harbinger of evil issues.

Ananta's abdication.

230-231. Continually urged on by his wife, who was blinded by love for her son, he was anxious to hand over the royal dignity to his son Kalaśa, though wise persons like Haladhara endeavoured to dissuade him by referring to the evil consequences of his abdication, which would cause him to regret [it].

232. He ordered the Chamberlain Raṇāditya to make the preparations for the coronation, though this [officer] warned him that he would feel regret.

KALAŚA
(A.D. 1063-1089).

233. On the sixth day of the bright half of Kārttika in the year [of the Laukika era four thousand] thirty-nine (A.D. 1063), the king had his son crowned.

234-235. When Raṇāditya was then presenting the princes in the king's assembly, he, filled with the thought of the greatness of the royal dignity, and being blunt in his manners, put his hand on the king's neck and introduced him with the words: "Your Majesty, this is Prince (rājaputra) Ananta."

236. When the king turned round and looked at him in anger, he openly laughed, and thus spoke to him bluntly:

237. "Where the rulers of Kāṇyakulja and other [countries] are introduced in this manner, why should there be another procedure followed with you who have resigned the royal power?"

238. "Verily, you will regret it day by day. Not even a Muni can abandon his pride."

239. When the king heard these words which went to the heart of the far-seeing ministers, he was unable to give an answer.

240-241. When the wise Haladhara saw on the next day the new king attended by a regal court, and the old one accompanied only by a few followers, he

234. L gives the correct reading nivedayan, as conjectured by Durgapr.

reproached the king in aptly feigned anger, and thus induced him to resume the [royal] dignity.

242. "Do you not feel ashamed to have rendered your young son unhappy by placing upon him the burden of the crown, and to have looked [only] after your own comfort in this your old age?"

243. "Therefore, you should transact yourself the affairs of the state. Let your son not be deprived of [his] pleasures while he is young."

244. By such words he caused the [old] king to resume his power, and thus defrauded King Kalaśa by his diplomatic skill.

KALĀŚA
(A.D. 1068-1089).

245. Henceforth Kalaśa was king merely in name, taking even his meals, etc., regularly in the presence of his parents.

Ananta resumes the royal power

246. At all assemblies, at the worship of weapons and other royal functions, he appeared like an assistant, acting as if he were his father's Purohita.

247. There is no reliance whatever on those who rejoice and are grieved without reason, just as [there is none] on animals.

248. [Thus it came about] that the queen, after having by such persistence induced her husband to yield up the royal power, came to feel regret, and appeared to lose the love for her son.

249. Full of jealousy and embittered in her mind, she would not permit that her daughters-in-law should make in their dress, ornaments and the rest that display which befitted them as a king's young wives.

250. She made the queens of her son constantly do the work of slave-girls, until they did not refuse [to do even] the smearing of the house-floor [with cow-dung, etc.].

251. Once there came to the king his cousin Kṣitirāja, the son of his uncle Vigraharāja.

Kṣitirāja's visit.

252. He related to him the grief which tormented his mind, on account of his son Bhuvanarāja who was lusting for his throne, and was most vicious.

253. This son of his had taken refuge with the ruler of Nilapura, and was preparing an expedition against his father with the forces of that [ruler].

243. Read yauvane bhagair with L.

246. By astropūjā are evidently meant rites in honour of the sword and other weapons, as are performed to the present day among certain Rājput communities, e.g. in the Dōgrā country.

248. It is noteworthy that the v.l. kṣipram evānu which A. quotes as 'from another manuscript,' is actually found in L.

251. Kṣitirāja, lord of Lohara, is praised by Bilhana as distinguished in arms as well as in learning, and as a patron of poets, equal in fame to Bhoja; comp. Vikram. xviii. 47-50. Bilhana also mentions a victory he won over

Rājapuri, and refers to his association with ascetics and his devotion to the worship of Viṣṇu; comp. below vii. 255 sqq. [The printed text of Bilhana's poem, xviii. 47, seems to make Kṣitirāja a brother of Queen Sūryamati; bhṛātā, however, must be taken there, as in our verse, in the sense of cousin.]

Regarding Vigraharāja, see vi. 335.

253. Nothing is known about Nilapura. Can it be connected with the locality called Bappanila, viii. 1989, 1993? Its ruler, Kīrtirāja, is mentioned once more, vii. 582.

Read Nilapurarājān with L.

KALĀṢA
(A.D. 1088-1089).

Utkarṣa installed at Lohara.

254. And with impious mind he had given the names of [certain] Bhāgavatas whom his father honoured, to dogs, which he invested with the Brahminical thread.

255. Though his wife was opposed to it, he (Kṣītirāja) was piously resolved to seek the nectar of complete renunciation, which would remove the pains of his soul.

256-257. He bestowed quickly his kingdom upon Utkarṣa, the second eldest son of Kalāṣa, who was born from the Queen Rāmalokhā, though he was [still a child] at the breast. Then this royal Ṛṣi set out to visit Tīrthas in the company of wise men.

258. After enjoying the blessings of quietism for many years as a most devout Vaiṣṇava, this pious [prince] attained absorption in Viṣṇu at Cakradhara.

259. He and King Bhāja, both [themselves] learned and friends of poets, were at that time equally renowned for their exalted liberality.

260. King Ananta entrusted his young grandson (Utkarṣa) to the keeping of Tanvaṅgarāja, who was the son of his father's cousin (Jassarāja).

261. Tanvaṅga, after raising to vigorous strength that dominion [of Lohara] as well as that boy, returned to Kāśmīr, and also died at Cakradhara.

262. Up to that [time] the members of the royal family in this [land] enjoyed all possessions in common, and their relationship was not stained by treachery.

263-265. Buddhavarāja, the son of Indurāja, had a son Siddharāja, who begot the brave Madanarāja. The latter's son, named Jindurāja, a most arrogant man, had, when the king showed himself unfriendly [to him], gone far away from the king's dominions. As he possessed abundant courage, he was now called back to his home by the queen herself, who was troubled by the insolence of the Dāmaras, and was appointed minister.

266. He thereupon attacked Śobha, the one-eyed Dāmara of Degrāma, who had caused great trouble to the king, and executed him.

254. The Bhāgavatas are adherents of an ancient Vaiṣṇava sect.

256-257. Bilhana, Vikram. xviii. 67, refers to Utkarṣa, 'who, holding Lohara, once the glory of Kṣītipati, freed far and wide the earth from the footprints of the Mlecchas'; comp. Prof. Bühler's Introduction, p. 10.

Regarding Utkarṣa's subsequent succession to the Kāśmīr throne, see vii. 708 sqq.

258. For Cakradhara, see note i. 38.

259. This verse agrees closely with the terms in which Bilhana, Vikram. xviii. 47 sqq., praises Kṣītirāja; comp. above notes vii. 261 and iii. 378.

260. For the relationship between Tanvaṅga and Ananta, see the gloss in Ed. and the genealogical table of the Lohara family in Appendix.

264. I have translated above according to the v.l. durāś nṛpati^o, quoted by A., 'from another manuscript.' This reading is now supported by L, which reads with a slight variation āre nṛpati^o.

266. Degrāma, mentioned only here, is in all probability the modern hamlet of Dēgām, situated about one and a half miles to the W. of S'upīyan on the left bank of the Rambyan, about 74° 58' long. 33° 48' lat. A few hundred yards to the S. of Dēgām lies the well-known sacred spring of Kapālamocana (marked as 'Naghal' on the map). In the Mahātmya of the Tīrtha, the place bears the name of Dvigrāma, and a fanciful legend is told to account for this name. P. Śāhībrām also writes the name Dvigrāma in his Tīrthas. There is nothing to indicate a special antiquity for this Tīrtha.

267. The king then bestowed upon this renowned [leader] the chief command of the army, and forced Rājapuri and other regions to pay tribute.

KALASA
(A.D. 1063-1089).

268. Haladhara, who had been like a staff supporting King Ananta's rule, which was in a critical condition owing to various blunders, died [at that time].

269. When he was dying at Calcradhara he spoke thus to the king, who, together with his wife, was by his side, and asked for advice:

270. "Do not undertake hastily reckless expeditions against foreign countries. I had to avert your disaster in Vallūpura and elsewhere by cunning."

271. "Beware of this Jindurāja, who has raised himself to the highest position. Jayānanda will create dissension between you and your son."

272. Remembering this his advice, the king had the powerful Jindurāja thrown into prison by Bijja, after cunningly making him lay down his arms.

273. Then in the course of time King Kalasa, whose character was not pure, Kalasa's evil conduct was induced by his servants to take to a way [of living] which is followed by the wicked.

274. Four arrogant princes (rājaputra) from the S'āhi family, Bijja, Pittha-rāja, Pāja and another, were his favourites.

275. Also Jayānanda, the son of the treasurer Nāga, was his trusted servant and his instructor in deceit.

276. When the excellent Brahman, Amarakaṇṭha, had obtained absorption in S'iva, the king became the pupil of his son Pramadakaṇṭha.

277. This teacher (guru) instructed him, who was evil-disposed by nature, in wicked practices, and made him ignore the distinction between those [women] who are approachable and those who are not.

278. What more need be said about the unscrupulousness of this teacher? He, without fear, lived in incest even with his own daughter.

279-280. Those honourable and learned men (bhaṭṭapāda) who knew how to behave at great rites without fear, and who, grimly conscious of their power and inaccessible to terror, would not pay any regard even to Bhairava,—they fell to the ground in fear and bent their knees before the 'cat-merchant,' and were put at ease [again] when he placed his hand on their heads.

270. Compare vii. 220.

275. For Nāga, Tuṅga's brother, see vi. 319; vii. 101.

276. The Cat. Catalog. mentions an Amarakaṇṭha as the author of a commentary on the S'aiva Mahimnastotra.

279-280. K. refers, as the following lines show, to a trader who by his quack practice and other swindling acquired reputation as a Guru in the Tantra line. That the rites of the latter are meant here, is shown by the expression samaya, often used in Tantra works in the sense of 'observance, rite' (comp. P.W., s.v. samayācāra, also below vii. 523), and by the mention of Bhairava. Faith-healing by means of Mantras is still commonly practised in Kaśmir by persons who are versed in Tantra—or pretend to be so.

KALĀṢA
(A.D. 1068-1089).

281-283. There was here before a certain merchant who, from the peculiarity of [keeping] a black cat, had received the nickname 'the cat-merchant,' which supplanted his proper name. Deceitful in his ignorance and vaunting his [learning] as a physician and Guru, he had gradually established a position [for himself] as a Guru of dyers and other craftsmen. This merchant gave relief to honourable and learned men by putting his hand, which smelt strongly of cats' droppings and Assafetida (hiṅgu) on their heads.

284. By such Gurus who were thundering daily [in their perorations], worthless though they were in character, he (Kalaśa) was led into darkness, just as the day by the [thundering] clouds.

285-289. There was a strolling player, Camaka by name, who knew how to play on the flute, a persistent corrupter of women. At night he was employed along with musicians who kept late hours, ate much food, always exhaled a fetid odour from their throats through vomiting the undigested meat, and resembled sewers, inasmuch as they let pass down [through their throats] the streams of drink as quickly as [the sewers let flow down] the water poured on the back for purification [after a call of nature]. In a drunken freak, Kanaka, a son of Haladhara, had become angry with him, had him bound to a post, and his nose cut off by his servants. This parasite, whose disfigurement foreboded evil, gradually acquired the new king's attachment by acting as procurer.

290. This cook of a man (nrkukhura) obtained as the king's favourite a place even among the councillors, and received the title of Thukhura.

291. Just as when he obtained renown he quickly cut off the family connection (vaṁśa) which caused him humiliation, so he must have been pleased before with the cutting off of his nose-bridge (nāsavaṁśa).

292. The things which that shameless [king] committed in the wickedness kindled [in him] by that person, are, though unfit for relation, told here as connected [with the narrative].

293. Lusting after the wives of others, he did not forbear to enjoy the king's sister Kallanā and her daughter Nāgā.

281-283. The account given here as to the manner in which this trader got his curious name, is of interest, as it agrees fully with what has been observed regarding the surnames in vogue at present with the Kāśmīrī city population. Mr. LAWRENCE, Valley, p. 310, rightly states: 'In the city the Krām name is purely a nickname.' Surnames taken from familiar animals, like brōr, 'cat,' gagur, 'mouse,' hund, 'sheep,' śāl, 'jackal,' punz, 'monkey,' etc., as well as other often equally unpleasant appellations taken from personal habits, occupations and places, are in general use both among the Brahmans and Muhammadans of Srinagar.

290. Thakura is a title which is otherwise applied in the Chronicle only to the small nobility, presumably Rājputs, from the hill territories to the south of Kāśmīr; comp. vii. 535, 706-780, 1040; viii. 1828, 1942, 1989, 2223, 2378. At present the name Thakur is borne in those regions by the chief cultivating class, which ranks next below the Rājputs; see DREY, Jummoo, p. 55.

293. Regarding Nāgā, compare vii. 1148.

294. When the old king, together with his wife, came to know of this, he refrained from shame to express censure, but concealed his anguish.

295-297. There was a silly Brahman village-astrologer, called Loṣṭaka, who was born at the village of Ovanā, and who used to go begging for handfuls of rice. Roaming about at night, he secured the help of the tutelary spirit (kṣetrapāla) of the village, and became well-known for guessing the things hidden in people's fists (muṣṭi), [which got him the surname of] Muṣṭiloṣṭaka. As Guru, procurer, and astrologer, he was most dear to the dissolute young king.

298-302. The superintendent of the Bhaffārakamaṭha [was] the pious mendicant Vyomaśiva, who in order to obtain the title of Khurkhua (?) had undertaken constant austerities. Mamma, a blind musician whom he employed at his worship, [kept] a ragamuffin of a Brahman, born at Avantipura, Madana by name, who used to lead [him about] by his hand. When the latter had left [Mamma], he (Vyomaśiva) had taken him under his protection. Changing his (Madana's) miserable hemp-made garments, he sent him with flowers into the presence of the king, whereupon that garrulous fellow joined the bad company of procurers and gradually became the greatest intimate [of the king].

303. Quickly deceived and depraved by these and other flattering parasites, Kalaśa took even sins for virtues.

KALĀṢA
(A.D. 1068-1088).

Kalaśa's licentious-ness.

304. Those for whom sayings which make one blush are a jest, [for whom] oppression of the subjects is a rightful course, shamelessness distinction, intercourse with women not to be approached a charming attraction, and quiet acceptance of abuse from rogues a matter of honesty,—for such [persons] no action whatever is a bad action, to be avoided from a recognition of its wrongfulness.

305. The king in his lust after illicit amours, used to roam about from house to house during the night, finding no pleasure in the embraces of his own wives.

306. The enjoyment of the wives of others, in which the exceptional pleasure is due to a dependence on others, is for those who are filled with passion [just like] ghee poured into the flaming fire of desire.

295. Ovanā is identified by the gloss of A, with the village of Uyan, situated about three miles to the N.E. of Pampar (Padmapura), about 75° 2' long, 34° 2' lat. Its hot spring is mentioned by VIGNÉ, Travels, ii. p. 34.

Regarding the kṣetrapāla, a 'genius loci,' see P.W., s.v. The Tijayēśvaramāhātmya (Poona MSS., Coll. 1875-76, No. 87) gives, vi. 1 sqq., a definition of the kṣetrapāla, in which his functions as an enlightening guide and remover of doubts are specially referred to.

L correctly bhikṣako for A bhikṣako.

298-302. Half a verse is missing in the text, which makes the interpretation of the passage doubtful. I am unable to explain the term khurkhua, which occurs only here. It can hardly have any connection with the word kharkhola, 'sorcery,' discussed in note iv. 94.

Bhagū, 'hemp,' Kś. bang, grows plentifully in Kāśmīr, and 'furnishes an excellent fibre from which strong and durable ropes are made'; see LAWRENCE, Valley, p. 69. This material is, as far as I could ascertain, no longer used for clothing. In viii. 93, hemp-made clothes are mentioned as the wear of prisoners in jail.

KALĀṢA
(A.D. 1088-1089).

307. Having put those five or six procurers at work, the king once proceeded at night to the house of Jindurāja, lusting for illicit love.

308. There, in her own house, the daughter-in-law of Jindurāja, a very licentious woman, had given an appointment at night to King Kalāṣa.

309. As he entered the gate of the house, the barking dogs betrayed him, and the Caṇḍāla [watchmen], fearing thieves, rushed at him with drawn swords.

310. When his followers saw that those [Caṇḍālas] were about to strike that [prince], who in his fright had fallen to the ground, they threw themselves over his body and thus saved him.

311. While those [Caṇḍālas] were belabouring him with their fists, his servants liberated him with difficulty by telling them: "Stop, this is King Kalāṣa."

312. That he had approached the woman after sending before him that [man] who had lost his nose, just that had brought him misfortune in his love-affair.

313. He had left his residence enslaved by the glances of his mistress; having been met by the glances of Death, he escaped his end by the will of fate.

314. While he was violating decency, he had suffered through the fault of his own mind humiliation from persons unfit to be touched, king though he were.

315. If even Indra, Candra, and other gods have been brought into shame by the senses, how could then the honour of a man escape being sullied by them?

316. First comes to light mean dishonour, then blameful lust; first righteousness vanishes, then the inherited self-respect; first one's good birth becomes doubtful, but next [one's tenure of] life. What does not change for the worse when that philosopher's stone, 'honourable character,' dissolves?

Rapture between Ananta and Kalāṣa.

317. That very night, when the dissolute king reached the palace, his parents heard what had happened.

318. They wept long, filled with shame and pain from affection for their son, and decided to imprison him for his faults.

319. They passed that night wishing to put on the throne their eldest grandson Harṣa, [Queen] Bappikā's son, who was the embodiment of all sciences.

320. When, then, in the morning they sent for King Kalāṣa, he, filled with apprehension, told Bijja and Jayānanda that he was in fear of his father.

321. In this belief he got somehow to his parent's apartments, taken by the hand by Jayānanda and followed by Bijja.

312. Camaka is meant; see vii. 289. Persons suffering from some disfigurement are supposed to bring ill-luck; comp. Raghuvamśa, xii. 43, of which verse our passage is an evident reminiscence.

313. The correct reading is supplied by L, kālakatāḥṣānām.

316. L reads purejivitaṁ, 'further life,' for A pumar jivitaṁ.

319. Bappikā was a princess from the Campā family; comp. note vii. 1512.

322. As soon as he entered his father slapped him in the face, and thus addressed him : " You wretch, give up your dagger ! "

KALĀśA
(A.D. 1063-1089).

323. Bijja supported with his hand Kalāśa, whose limbs gave way from fright, and touching his sword, he spoke resolutely to the king :

324. " O king, though the foremost of the proud men, do you not know that men of honour should never break the great vow of keeping their self-respect ? "

325. " How can I as a Rājaputra, when I have taken my pay and carry arms, abandon my master in these straits while life is in me ? "

326. " You are the father, this your son. At another time, when I am not present, you may do, O king, what is proper. "

327. After confusing the simple-minded king with words in which were [combined] tender feeling and roughness, Dijja left his presence, taking with him his own lord.

328. Wise men praised that superhuman courage of Bijja, that he behaved thus even in the presence of Anantadeva.

329. Exasperated by the overwhelming force of inevitable events, the wife of the king remained that day in silent prayer.

330. If she had set herself to act, then for certain nothing else could have taken place but either Kalāśa's entire destruction or his imprisonment.

331. Bijja then conducted the trembling Kalāśa quickly to the apartments of his wife Dilhā.

332. This clever [woman], who knew what had happened, announced that her husband suffered from headache, and rubbed oil on the head of the frightened [Kalāśa].

333. Forbidding all people under this pretence from entering, she kept her husband concealed and put Bijja as a guard at the door.

334. The Queen [Sūryamati] then relinquished her devout meditation, and, after saying harsh words to the king, went to her son under the pretext of inquiring regarding his health.

335. When the king went in the same way with the fixed resolve of imprisoning him, he was admitted only singly by Bijja.

336. The king was angered by the non-admission of his followers, and thereupon, in the excitement of his rage, set off to proceed to Vijayaśetra.

Ananta pravarṣaḥ sa Vijayaśetra.

337. When he, with his wife, had reached Avantipura on their way, Viśśāvatṭa and other local Brahmins approached him and said :

338. " O king, having voluntarily abdicated your power, why do you feel repentance ? It is useless to regret what one has done, whether it was right or wrong. "

• KALĀṢA
(A.D. 1063-1089).

339. "And it is not proper for you to blame your bad son, if you remember that you have yourself abandoned your subjects to his wickedness."

340. "There is, indeed, no force whatever in a king, [as little] as in a mechanical doll. He will be good or bad according to the subjects' good or bad fortune."

341. "That the clouds send down upon the trees rain as well as lightning, is the result of the retribution for good and bad actions [of a former existence]."

342. "And how is it right that you should have started leaving behind your treasures, when you desire to enjoy comfort after leaving your son who has entered upon a bad course?"

343. "Who would concern himself with a man who has no means (kośa), though his abilities may be raised to the highest point (dhārā), though his descent (vamśa) may be noble and his character pure,—or who would touch a sword which is without a scabbard (kośa), though there is strength in its blade (dhārā), though its hilt (vamśa) is good, and though it is spotless (śucimān)?"

344. On hearing these words, the king wished to return. While he reflected, there approached him his son, with his wife, to soothe him.

345. Thereupon he proceeded to the City, took away all his possessions except the palace buildings, and started once more with his wrath unappeased.

346. He left, after taking along with himself horses, arms, armour, and other [possessions], and then stopped for a short time on the river bank, awaiting the queen.

347. The royal ladies put their various possessions on board ships, and when starting left not even the iron nails in the [walls of the] palace.

348. Not aware of [these] events, the people had, on the first occasion, been silent at his departure. But now, on their learning what was taking place, their mouths poured forth lamentations.

349. The people seemed to offer to them in the guise of the tears they shed continuous propitiatory gifts to obtain their pardon, while the town threw [before them] handfuls of flowers.

350. No other sound was then heard on the road but pitiful cries: "O mother! O father! where do you thus go?"

351. When the lamentations from here and there had ceased on the road, there was heard the noise of the torrents, which seemed like the sound of plaintive sighs from the mountains.

352. Their ears, which had become accustomed to the frequent lamentations on the road, seemed to hear lamentations again and again even in the solitude.

343. The puns contained in the epithets necessitate a paraphrase of this verse.

349. The citizens' tears are compared to the propitiatory gifts (argha) offered, along with flowers, to the deity at the conclusion of a pūjā.

353. The people, when they saw them on the road [brought] to such a condition through their son's fault, would reproach even the birds nesting on the trees for bringing up their young ones.

354. When they, tormented in their minds by their son's misconduct, caught sight of [the shrine of] Vijayeśvara, their hearts were cheered as by the [sight of] a beloved relative.

355. Then they passed the day there, occupied in putting their treasures, horses, servants, and other [belongings] under shelter, and by making the [necessary] arrangements.

356. In the place which was crowded by the mass of bags containing their treasures and belongings, the market streets appeared as if covered with logs of firewood.

357. The princes, who were the sons of Tanvaṅgarāja, Guhga, and other relatives, followed him (Ananta); [so did also] Sūryavarmacandra and other Dāmaras.

358. The king secured his position by posting Kṣīrabhṛpa and other Dāmaras as guards at their own [respective] places, Naumagara, etc.

359. The illustrious King Ananta abandoned all cares, and the days began to pass for him in festivities at Vijayeśvara.

360. The hosts of Rājaputras, horsemen, soldiers, and Dāmaras, all took up their quarters near the old king.

361. Having left [S'rinagara] in the month Jyaiṣṭha of the year [of the Laukika era four thousand one hundred] fifty-five (A.D. 1079), he found the delights of heaven on reaching Vijayakṣetra.

362. Kalaśa, on the other hand, found on the king's departure that the land had lost its wealth, just as [one finds] the place of a hidden treasure empty when its guardian-snake is gone.

363. Wishing to give lustre to his rule, though he was deprived [of means], he consulted with Biḍḍa and others, and appointed [persons] enjoying respect as state officers.

364. He put Jayānanda in the post of prime minister (sarvādhikāra), and Varāhadēva, who was a native of the town of Vitastābra, in charge of the 'Gate.'

356. The gloss of A₁ gives to gaṇḍālī the meaning of Kā. ganyar (plural ganya), 'log of wood.' This meaning of the word is not known to the dictionaries.

357. In the text °guhga° should be read with A₁ instead of °tuhga° of A₁; L °gyptā°.

Regarding Guhga, brother of Tanvaṅgarāja, see vii. 1286.

358. Naumagara is the name of the alluvial plateau now called Naumagar Uḍar, which stretches on the left bank of the Vitastā from S.E. to N.W. between 75° 5' long. 33° 51' lat. and 75° 2' long. 33° 55' lat. Compare VIENNA, Travels, ii. p. 39. This plateau offers a position commanding all the direct routes between Vij'brūr (Vijayeśvara) and S'rinagar on the left river bank. It is mentioned only once more, viii. 995.

359. I translate according to Durgāpr.'s very suitable emendation °sarvaśāntasya.

364. See regarding Jayānanda, vii. 275. Vitastābra is the present Vih'outar; comp. i. 102.

KALASHA
(A.D. 1068-1089).

Ananta established at Vijayeśvara.

KALĀṢA
(A.D. 1069-1089).

365. Vijayamitra, who had been superintendent of clothing during Jindurāja's chief command (kampana), was made by the king commander-in-chief.

lāṣa attacks Ananta.

366. After appointing others, too, to official posts, according to their merits, the king, who was agitated by the [thought of] having to fight his father, set about to provide funds.

367. Then Jayīmānda, wishing to collect foot-soldiers, raised eagerly loans from rich people, even if they were disreputable.

368. Having got together an infantry force, he marched to Avantipūra, accompanied by a band of Rājaputras like Biṣṇa and others, in order to fight the old king.

369. Jindurāja, who had left his prison, and had been induced by the king's requests to take this opportunity, proceeded to the attack by the route of S'imikā.

370. The Dāmaras, horsemen, and others who were on the old king's [side], when they heard of the efforts of these [leaders], became excited and joined him with zeal.

371. The whole ground at Vijayēśvara, which was shaded by the [royal] parasol, and thus resembled a forest (chattraśchāyā), became narrow, [when filled] with the troops of horses which were playing with the balls (guḍa) put down [before them].

372. Then Sūryamatī, from affection for her son, obtained with much trouble an armistice of two days from her husband, who was in the greatest fury.

373. She despatched thereupon at night Mayya and other Brahmins whom she fully trusted, and in her fond love sent through their mouth the following secret message to her son:

374. "Whence this perversity of mind, O son, which forebodes your destruction, that you wish to-day thus to fight your father, whose prowess is terrible?"

375. "Why do you wish to rush, like a moth, into the fire of the wrath of him who has destroyed the king of the Darads and other [opponents] by his mere frown?"

369. As to Jindurāja's imprisonment, see vii. 282; for S'imikā, comp. note vi. 183.

371. I have translated above according to the reading of L chattraśchāyāṭavi, which seems preferable to that of A (and the Ed.) śastraiḥ satrāṭavi; comp. vii. 417. The parasol meant might also be that over the temple of S'iva Vijayēśvara.

By guḍa seem to be meant balls made up of crushed sugar with an admixture of certain condiments, such as are commonly given in India to horses on occasions when greater exertion is required from them. These balls are still known in the Panjab by the name of guḍ (gōḍ in Kā.).

376. "When the king, who is like fire, has once mounted his steed, who will protect your troops resembling mere straw?"

KALĀṢA
(A. D. 1068-1089).

377. "What are the divisions of troops, what the valour and the means with which you rashly proceed to fight him, the foremost of the strong?"

378. "Enjoy the whole kingdom which, as fate willed it, he has abandoned to you. What harm does your father do to you by living at a sacred spot?"

379. "Brought by those who desire dissension to this fearful plight, you will, already poor, fall within [a few] days into utter destitution."

380. "Lead away your troops. While I live, there is no fear for you from your father. But rather you should appease him, straightforward as he is, by conciliatory words."

381. When the son had heard this secret request of his mother from the mouth of the envoys, he withdrew during that very night his troops from all directions to his own [residence].

Retreat of Kālāṣa.

382. When the [king's] consort heard of the retreat of the troops, she went in the morning to her husband to whom the messengers had brought gladness, and boldly reproached him in turn.

383. Though the queen had put a stop to their mutual insults, yet their minds were again and again perturbed by the instigations of malignant persons.

384. Because that is the character of an enmity, that it enters the heart again and again, even though allayed (samdhīyamānam), just as a wet garment rouds [again and again even though repaired].

385. When the king, after hoaring in the outer court (bāhyāli) and elsewhere of the doings of his son, returned to his residence with a mortified mind, he became [still more] depressed by the remarks of his bold wife.

386. As the naturally pure-minded [king] was thus getting excited (lit. heated up) every day and cooling down every night, he resembled a pool [of pure water] which is reduced by the autumn [and in this condition gets warm in day-time and cools down at night].

387. The son destroyed the houses and other [property] of those who were on his father's side, while the hen-pecked father did nothing to those of the son's faction.

388. Vexed by the rough words of the queen who was blinded by affection for her son, and by those of his harassed followers, the king felt very miserable.

389. He wished to take back the royal dignity from his son, as he knew his force to be lacking brave men, and as he held [but] a low opinion of Jindurāja's prowess.

390. The v.l. of L nayānūratvam is evidently a misreading for nayānūratvam*, which is preferable to A nayasvārāvam.

384. I am unable to find a suitable sense in the verse unless connecting dhedam with the simile; for the latter compare vi. 849.

385. Regarding bāhyāli, comp. below A 392 and note iv. 82.

KALASA
(A. D. 1063-1089).

390-391. When in his desire of deposing his son he had offered the royal dignity to the sons of Tanvatiya, who were averse to [taking] it, the queen, fearing evil for her own descendants, talked him over at night and called Harṣa through messengers in order to make him king.

Harṣa joins Ananta.

392. When Harṣa was called by the messengers of his grandparents, he started prepared for the daring feat, though he was guarded by guards who were in attendance in the outer court.

393. Full of energy, he accomplished the [way of] five Yojanas in half a moment by spurring on his steed which was as fast as thought.

394. Many troop-horses in their endeavour to follow that steed which surpassed its training, became wretchedly exhausted on the road.

395. When he had arrived and had thrown himself at the feet of his grandparents, they sprinkled him with drops of their joyful tears [and thus performed, as it were, his abhiṣoka].

396. When his son had reached them, Kalaśa trembled in his heart, and refrained from hostile acts in the desire of conciliating his parents.

397. He prudently sent from the City letters to him (Harṣa), and did not openly show his enmity in the disturbed [state of the] country.

398. Thus King Kalaśa for a brief time seemed to follow, to some extent, his mother's advice, though the hostility [between him and his father] was growing.

399. When the commander-in-chief, by Kalaśa's order, wished to proceed to Khaśūli, she induced her husband to allow him to pass after he had done homage.

400. In the meantime the Brahmins held a solemn fast (prāya) against both father and son, in order to put a stop to their hostility which caused ruin to the country.

401. When, in compliance with their [demand] a reconciliation had then been effected, the [royal] couple came together to the City for a period of two months.

402. When they learned that their son, by the advice of Jayānanda and others, was preparing to imprison them, they left in dismay and went once more to Vijayaśvara.

403. The son set at night his (Ananta's) stacks of horse-fodder on fire, and destroyed his foot-soldiers by the use of poison, sword and fire.

390. Read with I. yaḍā for A. taḍā.
398. The direct distance by road from the Srinagar to Vijābrō is about thirty miles. This corresponds exactly to five Yojanas or satrāḥ twenty Krośas, if the Krośa is taken at the night-val valuation of the modern Kāśmīrī Kṛh. Vijayaśvara as equal to one and a half miles; comp. i. 286.

399. Instead of A. Khaśūlāḥ, I read Khaśūlāḥ, which is preferable in view of Khaśūlāḥ, Sṛiv. iv. 456. I assume that the territory meant is the same which is called Khaśūlāya in the Fourth Chronicle, and now Khaśūl (obl. Khaśūli, fem.). For its situation, see note i. 317. The direct route to Khaśūl via the Marbal Pass leads past Vijābrō.

404. Though the enmity was thus growing, the pious queen, enslaved by her [maternal] affection, kept back her husband from reprisals.

KALAŚA
(A.D. 1068-1080).

405-406. There was then a woman of oazy virtue belonging to the fishermen's caste, Lulāḍā by name, and her lover was a bald Dāmara, called Thakka, over whose mind she had complete control. The face of the wicked [Kalaśa] was always lit up by an amused laugh when he heard his attendants mentioning his parents by the names of those two.

407. The king and his consort again relieved the sorrow of their heart by remarkable works of piety, and both gave away their own weights in gold (lulā-puruṣa).

408. As on account of their wealth their firm position remained undisturbed, that unnatural son, in his envy, caused fire to be laid [to their residence] by night.

Vijayśvara burned down.

409. By that fire, the town of Vijayśvara was laid in ashes along with all the stores of the king.

410. The distressed queen, who from grief at the loss of everything was seeking death, was dragged with difficulty from the burning house by the sons of Tanvanga.

411. All the king's soldiers, who had taken off their clothes to sleep and had risen at night from their beds, were left with [no other] covering [but] the sky.

412. Seeing this [fire] from the highest terrace of the palace, King Kalaśa danced about in joy, along with the flames, sheets of which were encompassing the sky.

413. The king, who had lost all his possessions, crossed to the other side of the river, but was sinking [at the same time], together with his wife, in an ocean of sorrows difficult to cross.

414. In the morning the queen recovered a Liṅga made of a jewel which had not been consumed by the fire, and sold it to Tākas who had come before her, for seventy lakhs [of Dinnāras].

415. With this money she first purchased food and clothes, which she gave to the servants, and then she also repaired with it the burned houses.

416. So much of gold and other valuables the king got out from the ground below the heaps of ashes, that its mere mention nowadays engages our curiosity.

407. Regarding the custom of distributing in pious gifts one's own weight in gold, see Prof. JOLLY, Recht und Sitte, pp. 103 sq.

414. By the name Tāka a family seems to be designated. According to information supplied to me, there still survives at Vijayśvara the recollection of a great Muhammadan family called Tāk, which was resident there. Its members are said to have enjoyed considerable reputation as merchants until early in this century.

Prof. BÜHLER, as he kindly informs me, thinks that the family was called Tāka, because it came from Takkadeśa (regarding this territory see above note v. 150). He further points out that Madanapāla, in whose genealogy as given in the opening of the Madanapārijāta (see Aufrecht, Cat. Bibl. Bodl., p. 275), the term Tāka also occurs, was a native of the same district.

416. Read bhasmakūṭa° with L for A bhasmakūla°.

KALĀḌA
(A.D. 1088-1089).

417. The king, with his followers, resided there in the town which was shaded by umbrella-shaped roofs made of reed-matting, and which had become [like] a deserted forest.

418. The old king endeavoured to restore that town, but though he had such large means at his disposal, he did not succeed, for want of the necessary orders from the king.

419. The new king being left unchecked through his mother's favour, was always causing pain to his father by various evil communications.

Ananta asked to leave Kāśmīra.

420-422. The son wished to make his father leave the country, and persisted in ordering him repeatedly, through messengers, to go to Parṇotsa. His masterful wife, too, urged him on again and again with taunts to effect this project. Enraged thereupon, he once spoke to her in private, [only] Thakkana, Tanvaṅga's son, being present, harsh words such as he had not uttered before :

423. "Pride, honour, valour, royal dignity, power, intellect, riches,—what is it, alas, that I have not lost by following my wife's [will]?"

424. "People hold women to be a useless accessory for men, but in the end men are [but] an instrument of play for women."

425. "Who, indeed, have not in this [world] been made the guests of death, either by the hatred which has arisen in passionate wives, or by the grudge which disaffected [wives have borne them]?"

426. "Some wives have destroyed by magic their husbands' beauty, others their strength, others their intellect, others their virility, and others again their life."

427. "Wives proud of their high-swelling breasts (payodharaunnatyāt) destroy the land [of their royal husbands] by [substituting] sons born from another race, just as the rivers [overflowing with rain on the rise of the clouds (payodharaunnatyāt) destroy land] by the stones [they bring down]."

428. "Wives foster the children, but destroy the husbands [thinking]: 'Those are a support to the end. What is the use [on the other hand] of such worn-out [husbands]?'"

429. "Though I have known all the time these faults committed by

417. By naḍatvac, K. evidently means, as the gloss of A. explains, the material obtained from the swamp-plant pīṭa which is used in Kāśmīr for the making of mats; comp. regarding this industry Mr. LAWRENCE'S Valley, p. 69. This excellent matting is often employed by the poor as a temporary roofing.

418. "It is said, and with some truth, that even if bidden to a feast, the Kashmiri will not go unless he is forced, and when urgent work is necessary to prevent some disaster to the crops, the villagers themselves say: 'We do not want pay, but we want the slipper' (i.e. compulsion)." LAWRENCE, Valley, p. 278.

422. The correct reading Tanvaṅga (for A Tanvaṅga) is found in L. That Thakkana is the son of Tanvaṅga, is proved by the text of vii. 517, as restored with the help of L.

[my] wife, yet from regard for [my] high position, I have not put her to disgrace."

KALĀŚA
(A.D. 1063-1089).

430. "This over-powerful [woman], after ruining my happiness here in this [world], is endeavouring to destroy also my hope of happiness in the other world."

431. "Near the time of death [as I am], with wrinkles [in my face] and grey hair, where else is it proper for me to go if not to Vijayakṣetra?"

432. "How [otherwise] could I appease that desire of stopping near the door of Śiva's [residence] which [alone] can remove sinfulness?"

433. "A son [ought to be his father's] protector in both worlds. Who else has got [a son] like this, who wishes me to leave a sacred spot and to die on an evil road?"

434. "Now the often repeated story appears true to my mind that this [son] has sprung from another stock, and has been substituted by her."

435. "One should know that a son who differs in looks and manners, who is at enmity with his relatives and without affection for his father, is born from another's seed."

436. When her husband spoke thus, throwing off the restraint upon his energy, which allowed his feelings to manifest themselves [only] after a very long time, she was out to the quick.

437. When she was thus accosted with harsh words in the presence of a relative, and the secret of her son's origin laid bare, she felt excessively humiliated.

438. Because there was a rumour that he (Kalaśa) was the son of a Mahattama called Prasasta, and that she had substituted him on the death of her own child.

439. Women who hold their husbands in subjection, think the free word of their husband [as great an insult] as if they had been kicked on their head by the foot of a person of the lowest rank.

440. Then in her rage she addressed to him, like a vulgar woman, and in a loud voice, vehement words the abusiveness of which [indicated] her accustomed self-assertion :

435. This verso looks like a quotation from some Nitiśāstra or Purāṇa.

436. It is doubtful whether the text is here in order; prāṇāya does not seem to fit into the construction.

438. The term of mahattama seems to designate an office, but the character of the latter is not clear. Sahelaka, an important person, is spoken of as mahattama, vii. 1106, 1170, 1176; viii. 440, 560. The last-named passage shows that there could be more than one mahattama at the same time.

Rogarding mahattara, which is a different title, see vii. 659.

The Lokaprakāśa, i., mentions in its list of officials a rājamahattama. His duties, as defined in an unfortunately corrupt passage of the iv. Prakāśa, seem to have had some connection with the regal court of justice.

KALĀṢA
A.D. 1068-1089).

441. "This pauper, mendicant, idiot, whom fortune has deserted, who has grown old to no purpose, this fool does not know where and what to speak."

442. "He who had before nothing to cover himself with when getting out of his bath,—the people here know what he has not lost when he got me."

443. "Whatever you have said of me, that is true of your own female relatives. This is the time to practise penances. Why do you not do it?"

444. "It might be said: 'He is useless, past his time, turned out of the country by his son: [now] his wife, too, leaves him.' This, indeed, is what I am afraid of."

Ananta's suicide.

445-446. Afflicted by her words, which were full of reproaches and contained references to taints of his family, etc., he remained silent. Then was seen clearly a stream of blood flowing forth from the edge of the couch, [on which he kept] with unchanged appearance.

447. Then while the queen was reeling, Thakkaṇa, with tears in his eyes, noticed that the king in his rage had driven a knife into his anus.

448. Moved by shame, the king spoke to him with great firmness: "Let it be announced outside that the king had a hæmorrhage."

449. Kings who are under the will of women; who stubbornly put afresh confidence in a servant who has proved vile; who by their inconsiderate attacks give importance to a small enemy,—[such kings], who have no prudence, find before long their final destruction.

450-451. The servants of the king kept the secret, and spread the story that the king, when troubled by the autumn heat on a ride and thirsty, had drunk coriander-water, which had brought on hæmorrhage. [Thus it came about] that nobody outside learned what had [really] happened.

452. It was on the full moon day of the month Kārttika in the year [of the Laukika era four thousand one hundred] fifty-seven (A.D. 1081) that the king departed from life before [the shrine of] Vijayaśa.

453. The king, who [ought to have been] accustomed to ease, found at last occasion, freed from the worrying of his wife and son, to stretch out his legs and to sleep.

441-443. K. reproduces here faithfully enough selections from the vituperative phraseology of the common Kāśmīri woman. Abuse of the husband's female relations is, according to my informants, a favourite form of defence adopted by her.

Of a very poor man it is said: śrāṇ'paṭh ti chūy na, 'he has not even a bathing cloth [for his loins]'.
450-451. I have translated according to the gloss of A₂, which renders dhānya by the Kā. dānyaṇa, 'coriander'; comp. P. W., s.v. dhānya. Coriander-water is taken in Kāśmīr, as also in the Panjāb, as a cooling drink in certain diseases. Dhānyāmbu might literally also be understood as 'rice-water', i.e. water from a rice-field. But the date of the king's death, the end of Kārttika, speaks against this, as the rice is then cut, and there is no water on the fields.

454. He bore [after death] no grudge against anyone, nor did anyone bear a grudge against him. Death made [this king] of proud spirit happy and serene.

455. The heir of Samgrāmarāja lay asleep on the ground, covered with a cloak, as if he were a person dear to no one and helpless.

456. The king who had given away all he had became familiar with the long sleep, rejoicing neither in the laments of his friends nor feeling angry at hostile words.

457. When the husband had sacrificed his life as if in atonement for his breach of courtesy, his wife in gratitude became the guardian [of his interests].

458. To all followers, from prince to Candāla, she gave the daily allowance due to them, just as if she were at ease, in order to fulfil her husband's obligations.

459. When they had received their allowances, she herself made all followers take before the [Ling of Śiva] Vijayśū an oath by sacred libation (kośa) in order to [assure] the safety of her grandson.

460. When her grandson crying touched her feet with his head, as she banded [him] the sacred libation, she kissed him on the head, and told him: "Do not trust your father."

461. Then she stood up, and as a Sati herself taking the stick, performed the office of doorkeeper for her husband while she had him adorned for the last [rites].

462. She first ordered a hundred mounted soldiers to watch there over her grandson; then she sent forth her husband placed on a litter.

463. Having thus passed one night and half a day, this devoted wife paid her reverence to [Śiva] Vijayśū (Vijayśū) and proceeded outside seated in a litter.

464. When the people saw those two going forth, the horizon was rent, as it were, by their tumultuous lamentations, which mixed with the vibrating sounds of the funeral music.

465. The moving [imagos of the] people reflected in the ornaments of the hearse, which was decorated with flags, made it appear as if they were close to the king and striving to follow him.

466. Waving in the wind, the locks of the princes who had put their shoulders under the hearse appeared like splendid Chowries [held] over the king, who was placed in it.

467. Viewing the last service of the troops, the queen reached the burning-ground as the day was sinking.

455. Hindus at the point of death are placed on the ground, where the body is left until the funeral.

459. Regarding the term kośa, see note v. 326.

462. I. reads paraś, which is better than A paraś.

KALASHA
(A.D. 1063-1080).

Ananta's funeral.

KALUŚA
(A.D. 1068-1088).

468. Whether from maternal affection, which is hard to abandon, or for some other reason, she longed at that moment to see her son.

469. Thinking that the dust which the wind had tossed up was raised by an armed force, she looked out, trembling with agitation, in the hope of Kaluśa's coming.

470. At that moment some people arrived by the road from the City (S'rinagar). These she herself asked: "Well, has Kaluśa come?"

471. But the son, who had wished to come to his mother, was kept back that time by the fomenters of the quarrel who frightened him in various ways.

Sūryamati becomes a Sati.

472. After this the queen abandoned the hope of seeing her son, and asking for water from the Vitastā, recited the following verse:

473. "But those who die with Vitastā water in their body, obtain for certain final deliverance, just like those who proclaim sacred learning."

474. When she had drunk the water brought to her, and had sprinkled it [over parts of her body], she thus cursed those who had destroyed affection [between parents and son] by their calumnies:

475. "May those who have caused the fatal enmity between us two and our son quickly be destroyed together with their descendants!"

476. Through this unfailing curse of the afflicted [queen] Jayānanda, Jindurāja and others found an early death.

477. In order to put a stop to the slanderous rumours which had grown up with regard to Maladhara's position as her confidant, she, the Sati, took an oath in proper form, pledging [her happiness in a] future life.

478. Having thus attested the purity of her moral character, she leaped with a bright smile from the litter into the flaming fire.

479. The sky became encircled [and reddened] with sheets of flames, just as if the gods, in order to celebrate her arrival, had covered [it] with minium.

480. The people did not notice the crackling of the fire owing to their lamentations, nor its heat owing to their hot grief. It thus appeared to them as if it were merely painted in a picture.

481. Gaṅgādharma, Ṭakṣibuddha and the litter-carrier Danḍaka, and of the female servants Uddā, Nonikā and Valgā, followed her.

473. This verse actually occurs, with a slight variation in the second half (surve mokṣaḥ gamiṣyanti yathā te brahmanvādinah), in the Vijayesvaramahātmya, alleged to belong to the Ādipurāṇa. It is very probable that K. has quoted the verse from this very text. Like modern Pandits, he is likely to have been familiar enough with the Mahātmya of so popular a Tirtha. The general habit of Indian authors to quote from memory accounts for the difference of the text.

477. Comp. above vii. 225.

479. It is customary to paint sacred buildings, etc., with minium on the arrival of honoured guests, and on similar festive occasions.

481. L reads Canḍaka for Danḍaka, and Uddhā for Uddā.

482. Senāṭa and Kṣemaṭa, of the families of Bappaṭa and Udbhaṭa, who had been the king's favourites, renounced the world [and stopped as mendicants] at Vijayaśvara.

KALASA
(A D. 1063-1089).

483. The beings here do not last long, being fragile, as they are [mere] mechanical contrivances. The mind and the glass bottle have [both however] this one lasting quality, that the astonishing tale and the divine Gaṅgā-water which are preserved in them [respectively], do not escape, nor become stale nor decrease.

484. The king's age exceeded sixty-one years when he attained, along with his wife, the union with Purā's enemy (Ś'iva) and with Gauṛi.

485. Then on the fourth day all the sons of Tunvaṅgarāja proceeded with their bones to the Gaṅgā.

486. Harṣa, however, [remained] at Vijayaśvara along with his grandparents' treasures and surrounded by their retinue, [and] fell into amity with his father.

487. In the first feud between father and son, the father had been at the famous Vijayaśvara; in this, on the contrary, the son stopped at that [place] and the father in the vicinity of the City (Ś'rīnagar).

488. Then the father, who was without means and feared poverty, prudently approached his son who was very extravagant, and through envoys asked him for a reconciliation.

Reconciliation of Kulasa and Harṣa.

489. By coming again and again, and using the proper words, with difficulty they induced the haughty prince to enter into a compact with his father.

490. Being granted a daily allowance, the father promised to the son safety for the treasures of his grandparents and for his own person.

491. As he (Kulasa) proceeded to Vijayaśvara to fetch his son, his eyes were tormented by the charred ruins and his ears by the reproaches of the people.

492. After taking an oath by sacred libation (pīṭakośa) he came [back] to the City, bringing with him his son, and placed [there] the treasure which he had put under a seal bearing the latter's name.

493. In the meantime there arose in the king a righteous disposition and a legitimate care for wealth which altogether removed his poverty.

494. Jayyala, who was the clever son of a householder at Selyapura, called Mayana, had gradually attained the position of a Dānara.

482. By Udbhaṭa is probably meant King Jayāpīḍa's Sabhāpati of that name, iv. 496, whose family is again referred to, viii. 2227.

Bappaṭa is scarcely the person referred to in vii. 574.

487. This verso receives a proper sense only by reading with L pīṭāputravaire, instead of A pīṭā putravare. This reading had already been rightly conjectured by Durgapr.

494. Selyapura is in all probability the modern S'ilyūr, a large village in the Dūnta Pargana, situated circ. 74° 45' long. 34° 1' lat. (wrongly spelt 'Shalipoor' on map). This identification is supported by viii. 200 sq., where

KATARA
(A D. 1033-1039).

495. By the rovenue of his land, and by selling victuals as a trader to far-off regions, this greedy person accumulated wealth, and became in course of time a rival to the lord of wealth (Kubera).

496. After having the ground dug up for a Krośa and a half, he filled it constantly with heaps of money (dinnāra), and then had rice plentifully sown over it.

497. He had the money deposited every night by his servants, and put many secretly out of the way from fear of betrayal.

498. While he endeavoured to take Bhāṅgila, his force suddenly fled, and his horse being caught by a vine-cropper he was killed by some foot-soldier.

499. His riches were recovered from the soil, and sufficed to relieve the king for his whole life from money troubles.

500. The water of the Vīṇastā became turbid for many months while day and night his money (dinnāra) was being washed from the earth [sticking to it].

501. A wonder [it is that] high-spirited persons greedily guard riches with much trouble, without giving them away or enjoying them [themselves, merely] that in time they may benefit others.

502. The snake keeps himself alive by feeding on air; he lies in a hole of blinding darkness; being naked, he requires at sexual intercourse that another should give him a screen to remove his embarrassment; exhibiting such miserliness, he guards the treasures for another's sake. Nobody else is great in doing good to others except only the greedy one.

503. Also in many other ways riches of various kinds plentifully reached the fortunate king, just as the rivers [all go] to the ocean.

504. Riches come to a person hundredfold by themselves when his fortune rises, just as the birds gathering from all directions [come] to the tree when the evening [sinks].

505. The rivulets grow strong and nourish the earth at its roots; from the sky flows down the rain, and from [all] directions issues water through the mouths of the conduits. Thus the empty tank is filled in during the rainy season. By which doors do riches not come a hundredfold when good fortune rises?

Selyapura is mentioned in connection with Sussala's march from Lohara to S'rinagar. S'itpōr lies on the direct route connecting the Tośmaidan Pass, and thus Lohara (Loh⁴rin), with the capital.

498. Bhāṅgila corresponds to the modern Pargana Bāngil, to the S.W. of Paraspōr (see Am-i Akh., ii. p. 371, 'Bānkai'). The Pāmaras of Bhāṅgila are referred to in viii.

3130, in connection with 'S'amkaravarman's town,' i.e. Paṭan (see note v. 156). Comp. also Jonar. 251, 616; S'riv. iii. 380, 404; Fourth Chron. 65.

Jayyaka may be supposed to have been engaged in some local feud with the Pāmaras of the neighbourhood.

501. L has for A kūla klekena the v.l. kūyakeśena, which also gives a suitable sense.

506. Thereafter through a rise in the subjects' [fortune caused by their previous] merits, Kalasa's mind was ever profitably [occupied], just like that of a father, [with plans] for the kindly protection of the people.

507. He showed skill in keeping account of his wealth like a merchant, was careful to spend it in the right way, and had ever an open hand.

508. He himself watched over the present and future income and expenditure, and kept always by his side birch-bark (bhūrja) and chalk, like a clerk.

509. No sellers of goods could cheat him, as he purchased jewels and other things personally and according to their intrinsic value.

510. Living in comfort, he divided his time with due regard to the threefold [objects], and was from the afternoon onwards invisible for all officials.

511. As he was watching the acts of his own people and of strangers by means of spies, only the dreams of his subjects remained unknown to him.

512. As he looked after the country just as a householder after his house, no one among the people ever felt misery.

513. The king, who dreaded slander and was conciliatory towards his enemies, never meted out punishment openly, even to thieves.

514. He never had any loss which the ministers had to make good. He rather replaced what the ministers had lost.

515. Under his rule the people were always seen cheerful and happy, occupied with hundreds of marriage-feasts, sacrifices, pilgrimages and other great festivities.

516. The neighbouring rulers, over whom he established his ascendancy through a prudent policy, could not even take their food without his superintendents.

517-518. His relatives who were in his service, [namely] Thakana and the other two sons of Tanvaṅga, who had returned from abroad, and Gruṅga's sons, Malla and the others, who were the younger brothers of one who had died, he delighted with splendid gifts, just as the moon [delights] the gods and Pitṛs with the divisions of its disc (kalā) which are dripping with nectar.

508. Bhūrja is the inner bark of the Himalayan birch (Betula Bhojpatra), which has been used in Kāśmīr and in the adjoining hill regions as the general writing material (bhūrjapattira) up to the 17th century. Regarding its preparation for writing purposes, etc., compare the detailed account of Prof. BÜHLER, Report, pp. 20 sq. Birch-bark is still largely used by village-shopkeepers, Patwāris and others in Kāśmīr for keeping brief notes and accounts.

The custom of writing with a white chalky paint on small blackboards of wood or slate has been duly noted by Alberūni, India, i. p. 182. It prevails to this day in Kāśmīr, as all over Northern India, among school-children and shopkeepers.

510. The triad of Dharma, Artha and Kāma is meant. The threefold division of a ruler's time is prescribed Muhūbh. II. v. 20. K.'s expressions seem to indicate a reminiscence of this passage.

511. Read with L abhavat param for A abhadat yadi.

517. L gives here the correct reading tanvaṅgaṅgāṁ thakka°, instead of the meaningless tanvaṅgasthasthakka° of A.

The other two sons of Tanvaṅga are Ajaka and Dhammaṅga; see vii. 1083, 633 sqq.

KALASA
(A.D. 1063-1089).
Kalasa's administration.

KALASA
(A.D. 1068-1089).

519. Though the king had reached a mature age, he did not get rid of his vice and the evil habits which the wretched foreigners had taught him.

520. The Takka called Vulliya bought from Turushkas girls born in various distant regions and brought them to him.

521. With these and the wives which he had taken away from others being enticed by their beauty, he brought the number of the ladies of his seraglio to seventy-two.

522. Though he disported himself daily with many women, his strength did not fail him, on account of [the use of] fish-broth and other aphrodisiacs.

523. And eagerly bent on the celebration of the great rites (mahāsamaya) he took great cups in the company of his Gurus, without regard for moderation.

524. This [king], whose doings were thus of a mixed character, built afresh the town and Śīva's stone temple at Vijayaśetra, which had been burned down.

525. On the top of the stone temple of Vijayaśa, the king placed a parasol of gold which kissed the summit of the firmament.

526. At Tripureśvara he founded a permanent endowment (vijayasthiti) and a temple of Śīva, the Āmalaka ornament (āmalasāra) of which was of gold.

527. Then he who was versed in pious acts founded the [shrine of Śīva] Kaluśeśvara, the stone temple of which had a roof [adorned] with innumerable golden cups (ghaṭi).

520. Regarding the ethnic designation Takka, see note v. 160.

521. L reads pauradāraśca, 'wives of citizens.'

522. The use of matsyayūga (matsyasūpa) is repeatedly mentioned by Kṣemendra; see Samayam. ii. 26, 71, etc.

523. Tantric rites connected with the drinking of spirits seem to be alluded to. Regarding the expression mahāsamaya, compare note vii. 279.

524. See regarding the temple of Śīva Vijayaśa, note i. 106. L read rightly ca śūlīnaḥ for A na śūlīnaḥ.

526. Compare for Tripureśvara, note v. 46.

The expression svaṃāmalasāra recurs in the description of temples, vii. 938; viii. 3360, and refers evidently to that crowning portion of the temple spire or śekhara which in Hindu architecture is known by the name of āmalaka; comp. FERGUSSON, Ind. Arch., p. 222, where the typical form of the Āmalaka is shown in the illustration. The term Āmalaka is derived from the name of the Āmalaka tree (also known as Āmalā, see N.P.W., s.v.), the Emblic Myrobalan, the architectural device so called bearing a striking resemblance to the kernel of the Āmalaka fruit.

Fergusson, loc., doubts whether the form of the Āmalaka was in reality copied from the fruit so named, and calls the resemblance between the latter and the device a "supposed" one. The resemblance, however, is in reality unmistakable, and our passages show clearly that the architectural term was generally understood as referring to it. Āmalasāra, the more exact expression employed by K., means literally 'kernel of the Āmalā [fruit].' Hsuen-tsiang too knows Āmalaka (O-mo-lo-kia-ko) as an architectural term; see Si-yu-ki, ii. pp. 95, 136. [I owe this reference to my friend, M. A. Foucher.]

The Āmalaka device, which might roughly be described as having the shape of a melon longitudinally divided by strongly pronounced ribs, is a constant and apparently very ancient feature found in all the styles of architecture prevailing through Northern India. It must have been regularly used also for the decoration of the high roofs of Kāśmīr temples. It is found on the Pāyech temple (the only one whose roof is quite intact), as well as on all well-preserved old temple models I have seen; comp. the illustrations, FERGUSSON, Ind. Arch., pp. 288, 290, 295.

527. The position of this temple is unknown. The passages vii. 1073, 1077, show that the gold used in its decoration exposed it to serious risks already in Harṣa's time.

528. When the king wished to put a gilt parasol over the [temple of S'iva] Kalāśa, there came to him an artist from the Turuṣka country.

KALĀŚA
(A.D. 1068-1089).

529-531. This [man] said that he could make the parasol with many thousands of gold [pieces], secreting the art he knew of putting gold on copper. He remained for several days enjoying the king's hospitality, till the minister Nonaka, who had a very sharp intellect, discovered his art by means of inference. Put [thus] to shame, he went as he had come, and that parasol was constructed at [the expense of] a very small number of gold pieces.

532. The king, whose magnificence exceeded that of Indra, consecrated a Bāṇalinga called Anantēśa and numerous other sacred images.

533. When King Sahajapāla died, his son Saṃgrāmapāla had been placed on the throne of Rājapurī.

Expedition to Rājapurī.

534. The child-king's uncle Madanapāla, who possessed great power and was full of pride, exerted himself to usurp the throne.

535. Through fear of him Saṃgrāmapāla's sister took refuge with the king and implored his help; [so also did] the Thakkura Jasavarāja.

536. The king received the two favourably, and then gave them Jayānanda, with Bijja and other brave men, as support.

537. When he (Jayānanda) had dispersed there the enemy, and had done his task, he became suspicious to the councillors of Saṃgrāmapāla, as he attained prominence and held the country in his power.

538. In their desire to see him gone they tried various means of intimidation, and endeavoured to frighten him; but that brave man did not tremble.

539. He then suspected that Bijja had put this apprehension into the Rājapurī [councillors], and felt anger against him.

540. When they had put their request to him and had given him presents, he withdrew, but thoughtfully left his troops there under the pretext of [ensuring] security.

541. King Kalāśa, who was intelligent and had a deep insight into affairs, rejoiced when he returned after having thus secured Rājapurī.

542. Then while Bijja and the rest conducted themselves as if they were kings, Jayānanda by the will of fate fell into a fatal illness.

543. When the king came to his house to inquire after his health, he told him in the course of conversation that he had to say to him something in secret.

544. When after all [others] had left he kept silent, Bijja [also] went outside under the pretext of having to take out betel from his mouth.

By ghaṭis are meant the hemispherical cups, made of various metals, which may still be seen affixed to the pinnacle on the spires of modern temples. Often two of them are combined into a globe.

532. For bāṇalinga, see note vii. 185.

KALASĪ
(A.D. 1068-1089).

545. Though the trusted minister and the king asked him as he was going why he went, yet he with good sense proceeded outside and stopped there.

546. Jayānanda related to the king what had happened at Rājapurī, and spoke to him thus : "Clearly the kingdom does not belong to you, since Bijja has come to power."

547. He also made up for the king a heavy account of the profits which Bijja had made for himself in official transactions.

Bijja's exile.

548. When the king disquieted returned to his residence, Bijja, who understood the signs, asked for permission to retire [abroad].

549. When he insisted, the king, while seemingly remonstrating with some scant politeness, gave him permission, feeling inwardly glad.

550. Having received the order he went to his house, and after sending his brothers ahead with all his belongings, came to the king to take his leave.

551-552. The behaviour of king and servant, of whom the one was as firm in [maintaining] his royal dignity as the other in [keeping] his reserve, was at that moment somewhat astonishing, [inasmuch] as the king did not keep his favourite servant from going, and the latter, though filled with anger, did not remonstrate with the king to whom he was attached.

553. After conversing for some time in a low voice with the king, who had risen [to take] a few steps with him, Bijja departed smiling.

554. Just as Haladhara had, on his death-bed, brought about the fall of Jindurāja, thus [the dying] Jayānanda ousted Bijja from his position.

555. The ministers spoke to the king : "There he goes, after leaving nothing in the country but what wealth you have yourself. Let his property be confiscated." But the king did not act upon this.

556. In the expectation that the sovereign would certainly call him back, all people, except the king, followed Bijja.

557. Fearing an attack from powerful Bijja, the king kept awake during five nights, trembling even when a grass blade moved.

558. When those who had followed him, returned after his departure from S'ūrapura, the king, freed from his fear, communicated that apprehension to the ministers.

559. When those who had given their opinion for the confiscation of

545. L transposes the words bhūdhujā and mantrinā, which is preferable in view of the position of the adjective āptena.

555. Read with L tvallakṣmī°, for A tallakṣmī°.

558. The journey from Srinagar to S'ūrapura (Ilūpūr; see note v. 39) is nowadays put at two and a half daily marches. This gives for Bijja's march to S'ūrapura, and the return journey of those who so far accompanied him, a total of five days.

Bijja's property heard this, they recognized that the king was wise in not acting upon it.

KALASA
(A.D. 1068-1089).

560. Innocent Bijja, however, and those with him were honoured like jewels in every country where they took their abode.

561. Though Bijja had risen to still greater importance, he kept his faith, and ever swore by the feet of Kalasa-deva as if [he were] a deity.

562. After having thus driven Bijja and the others into exile, Jayānanda soon died through the curse of Sūryamatī, having held the power but for a short time.

563. Jindurāja, too, who had opposed King [Ananta], died at that very time, proving that the curse was unfailing.

564. Also Bijja and those with him all found an early death in the Gauḍa land in consequence of the curse, after enjoying prosperity for a short time.

565. Bijja was killed in an accidental brawl, and his younger brothers underwent the sufferings of a long imprisonment.

566. On their escape from this captivity, Pājaku was killed by a tiger, and the rest of his younger brothers perished after having gone through sufferings.

567. Two or three of those who had fomented dissension, like Madana, did not perish [then], but were destined before long to find an evil death.

568. Vāmana, who had been Jayānanda's assistant, and was the guardian of his children, was thereupon made prime minister (sarvādhikārin).

Vāmana made prim minister.

569. The various wonderful official acts of this politic [minister] are related even to this day by old men in the gatherings of thoughtful people.

570. By confiscating the villages which formed the endowments of the Avantisvāmīn and other [temples], the greedy king established the [revenue] office (karmasthāna) called Kalasa-gaṇja.

571. Knowing how to guard [the interests of] his subjects, he did not give the Pādāgra office to the minister Nonaka, though he was expert in raising revenue, as he was afraid of his cruelty.

572. Prasastakalasa and the other sons of Rājakalasa as ministers obtained great favour before the king.

573. The king wisely restrained such sons as showed a self-willed disobedient spirit, thieves, and those who were connected with confederacies and the like, and kept them outside his service.

565. I have translated according to L kalake, which seems preferable to A pramaye.

570. Regarding the temple of Avantisvāmīn, see note v. 45; for the meaning of gaṇja ('fund'), comp. note vii. 125-126.

KALANĀ
(A.D. 1068-1080).

Foreign expeditions.

574. When the lord of Rājapuri was again attacked by Madanapāla, the king sent the commander Dappaṇa for his support.

575. Through the king's lustre, Madanapāla was defeated even by so small an officer, and sent to Kaśmīr in fetters.

576. Varāhadeva's brave brother Kandarpa, whom the king made lord of the Gate, crushed the Dāmaras.

577. He had learned diplomacy and bravery from Jindurāja, and the neighbouring chiefs touched his orders with their crest-ornaments.

578. He won victories in Rājapuri and elsewhere; being very irritable, he resigned repeatedly the charge of the 'Gate,' whereupon the king himself conciliated him, and made him accept it [again].

579. Madana, whom the king made commander-in-chief, killed Bopa and numerous other Dāmaras who had grown over-powerful.

580. The falconer Vijayasinha, whom the king appointed as town prefect from regard for his services, destroyed all thieves.

581. Sending Kandarpa, Udayasinha and others at the same time to Lohara, the king forced Bhuvamarāja to retreat far away.

582. And when he had received [in marriage] Bhuvanamatī, the daughter of Kīrtirāja, lord of Nilapura, he got rid of the trouble [caused] by this enemy.

583-584. Taking the office of city prefect from Vijayasinha, the king bestowed it on Malla, the son of Guhya, in order to give him practice in the discharge of official work. He was subsequently made lord of the Gate, [and as such] caused [neighbouring] kings to bear his lustre on their jewelled crowns.

Uraśā invaded by Malla.

585. What is told of the bravery of the proud Malla at the invasion of Uraśā, is equalled [only by the story] of the son of Prithā, when he recovered without assistance the cows of Uttara.

586. Having crossed the Kṛṣṇā with five or six horses, he (Malla) carried off King Abhaya's kingdom, together with his herds of horses.

579. Regarding Madana, see vii. 299-303.

580. I. has here the v.l. sevāvaśīkṛtastena-pālam, which would turn Vijayasinha into a captain of thieves who was taken into service and employed against his former accomplices, — a procedure often adopted in the East; comp. viii. 62.

581. Read with I. prahitair.

582. Compare note vii. 253.

583. Malla's father, Guhya, was the brother of Tanvaṅga, and the grandson of Kāntirāja of Lohara; see vii. 357, 517, 1286, and the genealogical table. Malla's family obtained the Kaśmīr throne through his sons Ucala and Sussala.

585. By Prithā's son is meant Arjuna. The story how he recovered the cows of Virāṭa, Uttara's father, which Duryodhana had carried off, is told at length in Mahābh. iv, Adhyāyas xxxv. sqq.

586. The Kṛṣṇā is the Kāngarā river which on the route, discussed in note v. 217, has to be crossed above the present Muzaffarābād in order to reach Uraśā, the modern Hazāra. The river is referred to under the abbreviated name also in viii. 3401; Nilamata, 1308; Havacar. xii. 44.

I translate according to I. pañcaśais for A. pañcāśais.

587. When the king versed in policy had thus brought the earth under his supremacy, there came eight kings at the same time to his capital in the year [of the Laukika era four thousand one hundred] sixty-three (A.D. 1087/8).

588-590. In the presence of the king appeared Kīrti, the ruler of Baddhāpura (?); Asaṭa, king of Campā, and Kalaśa, Tukka's son, lord of Vallāpura; king Samgrāmapāla, too, lord of Rājapuri; Utkurṣa, Lohara's ruler; Sanḡaṭa (?), king of Uraśū; Gāmbhīrasīha, chief of Kānda, and the illustrious Ullamarāja, the ruler of Kāṣṭhavāṭa.

591. Even this important assemblage of kings could not be noted in the closely packed mass of people, [as little] as the flood of a rain-swollen river in the ocean.

592. Though it was winter at that time, and the water of the Vikustū was [frozen as hard] as a rock, yet the kings enjoyed full comfort.

593. Whatever the rulers could imagine in their mind, that they found before their eyes, since Vāmāna obtained it.

594. The skill of this minister was splendidly revealed as, without confusion, he made the arrangements for this occasion which others could not have met, just as [if it had been] an ordinary one.

588-590. Of the hill-chiefs here enumerated, the name and territory of the first is quite uncertain. The reading of A in our passage, Kīrtinyabbapurā^o, is certainly faulty, as it does not give the name of the king in the nominative, as required by the analogy of the other names. Above I have followed the reading of L, Kīrtir Baddhāpurā^o, though I am unable to verify the name of the territory.

In the Addenda to the text edition, I have already pointed out that 'the ruler of Baddhāpura,' mentioned viii. 538 in a list of Rājās from the hills to the E. of Kāśmīr, corresponds in all probability to the chief named in the first place in our list. This suggestion is confirmed by the fact that L gives there the name of the territory as Bandhāpurā. It should be noted that the difference between the combined letters bb, ddh and nāh, is comparatively small in S'arada characters. This explains the variations of the MSS. I cannot identify the local name in any of the above forms.

Could Kīrti be an abbreviation of the name of Kīrtirāja, who is referred to as ruler of Nilapura in vii. 582? After the marriage mentioned in the latter passage it is strange to miss Kīrtirāja in the list of princes assembled at Kalaśa's court.

Regarding Asaṭa of Campā, see note vii. 218; for Kalaśa of Vallāpura, vii. 220. Samgrāmapāla and Utkurṣa (Harṣa's brother) have been mentioned, vii. 533 and 256 sq., respectively

The name of the ruler of Uraśū (L has correctly Auraśo for A Aurvaśo) is doubtful; A gives it as Muhgaṭa, and L as Sanḡaṭa. I have preferred the latter form, because it is found again, viii. 2178, as the name of a person, and because we have in A a similar mis-spelling (Muhgaṭa for Sanḡaṭa) in viii. 1090.

A Rājā of Kānda is referred to in viii. 1345, as well as 'a route of Kānda' in viii. 538. No clear indication is available as to the position of this territory. But as in the last-named passage Kānda seems to be spoken of as on the way from Bhadravakāśa or Bhadravāḥ to Kāśmīr, it may be conjectured that Kānda was the name of one of the hill districts immediately to the S.E. of Kāśmīr.

By Kāṣṭhavāṭa is meant the present hill-district of Kaṣṭh-vār ('Kishwar') in the valley of the upper Cinib, to the S.E. of Kāśmīr. This territory, of whose present population more than one-half is Kāśmīrī, is often referred to by the later chroniclers; see Jonar. 76, 313; S'ri i. 46; Fourth Chron. 735 sqq., 781, 810, 827, 991.

For a description of Kaṣṭh-vār, see Dnw, Jummoo, pp. 116 sqq. There will be found too an interesting account of the history of its Rājput Rājās who remained Hindus till Aurangzeb's time, and practically independent until Gulāb Singh's conquest.

For another Kāṣṭhavāṭa in Kāśmīr, see note vi. 202.

593. Read with L puro for A pure.

KALASHA
(A.D. 1068-1089),
Assembly of hill Rājās
(A.D. 1087/8).

KALĀŚA
(A.D. 1063-1089).

595. When after the king's departure Malla showed himself disinclined to [keep his] office, the king induced Kandarpa again to take [charge of the] 'Gate.'

596. This minister, full of pride, undertook an expedition at his own expense and took the strong castle called Svāpika by stratagem.

597-599. Then returning to the City he resigned his office, being dispirited for some reason, though the king requested him [to retain it]. Thereupon Prasastakalāśa, who had continually to carry messages [between the king and Kandarpa], and who had been angered by his (Kandarpa's) haughty words, plucked up his self-confidence, collected a large number of soldiers with his own money, of which he had a great deal, and obtained [Kandarpa's] place for his own brother Ratnakalāśa.

600. Though the latter had purchased a great position with money, he was not in any respect equal to Kandarpa. How could a painted lion do the acts of a real one?

601. In due course the king induced again, with much difficulty, that excellent servant to accept the charge of the Rājasthāna in the City.

596. The position of this fort is unknown; L gives the name as Māsika.

597-599. L better praviṣṭo 'tha for A praviṣṭo 'pi; L confirms the emendation Prasastakalāśa.

601. The office called rājasthānādīkṛā, or simply rājasthāna, is repeatedly referred to in the last two Books, and was evidently a high post judging from its mention along with the great official charges of the kampāna and dvāra; comp. vii. 181, 573, 1046, 1982, 2624. Regarding the functions attached to this office, we can gather some indications only from our own passage and from what K. tells us as to the employ of the 'Rājasthāniya' Alaṅkāra in Jayasīma's reign. Our passage shows that the Rājasthānādīkṛā was connected with the administration of justice. If we assume that its holder was discharging duties equivalent to those of Chief-Justice, we could account for the literal meaning of the title. That rājasthāna is used as the equivalent of rājagrha, or 'royal palace,' is proved by the indifferent use of the titles rājagrhya and rājasthāniya in the case of Alaṅkāra; comp. vii. 2618, 2671, 2925.

The administration of justice has always been regarded in India as a direct function of the king, who is to hold court, according to the Smṛtis, in a separate building within his own palace; comp. JOLLY, Recht u. Sitte, pp. 132 sq. The delegation of this regal duty to a locum tenens, i.e. a Chief-Justice, is equally well-known to Indian tradition. This delegate, who in the Dharma texts figures under many different names (see JOLLY, loc.), may well have taken his title from the royal palace in which his court was held.

In support of this explanation we may refer to vii. 2657, where the same Alaṅkāra is described as holding charge of the duties of the outer palace (bāhyarājasthānādīkṛābhāṅk), and to the Lokaprakāśa's note on the rājasthāniya. The list of great officers given at the commencement of Prakāśa iv., describes him as looking after the protection of the subjects (prajāpālānārthanudvachati rakṣayati sa rājasthāniyaḥ). That judicial functions are mentioned here, becomes evident from the passage immediately following, which mentions a fourfold division of courts: pratiṣṭhītā, apratīṣṭhītā, mudrītā and śāsītā. The third designation is exactly that applied to the court held by the king's judicial representative (see JOLLY, loc., p. 184).

Subordinate judicial officers may be meant in vii. 766, where rājasthāniyamantriyaḥ are mentioned, as well as in vii. 1501 and vii. 3132, where several rājagrhyas are referred to. The term rājasthāna seems to be used in a more general sense, 'royal court,' vii. 270 (see note) and vii. 576. In the latter passage the account-office called Seda is described as a 'Rājasthāna.'

Rājasthāniya is found as an official title also in inscriptions of the Gupta period; but its mention there throws no light on the character of the office; comp. Mr. FLEISCHER'S note, Corpus Inscr. Ind., iii. p. 167.

602. A thief having died from an over-severe beating, that kind-hearted [minister] left in dismay also this office and proceeded to the Gaṅgā.

603. When the king tried to keep him back by [taking hold of] the hem of his garment, he beat off the king's hand in anger, and proceeded abroad, [where-upon] the king felt incensed against him.

604. When he was again brought before the king, the latter, though he had been deeply hurt, tried only to take away his pride but not his life.

605. Thus the king with great firmness and discrimination put up patiently with the acceptance and resignation [of office] on the part of brave men.

606. It was this king who introduced into this [country] the taste for choral songs (upāṅga-yīta) and a careful selection of female dancers, as customary in other lands.

607. Then the king set about to found near Jayavanṇa a town full of great houses, which was to bear his own name.

608. Rows of Maṭhas, Agrahāras, mansions and great buildings with fine tanks and gardens, were built there by the thousand.

609. In the meantime Prince Harṣa, who was possessed of exceptional prowess, obtained renown by merits rarely to be found in other kings.

610. Knowing all languages, a good poet in all tongues, and as a depository of all learning, he became famous even in other countries.

611. He took [into his service and] assigned salaries to persons distinguished for good qualities and valour who had arrived from various countries, and whom his greedy father had left unnoticed.

612. As the allowance granted by his father was insufficient for [the prince], who was given to extravagance in his liberality, he had his meals only every second day.

613. Amusing his father in public with songs, as if [he were] a singer, he kept up his establishment with the presents the former gave him.

KALĀṢA
(A D. 1063-1089).

Conduct of Prince
Harṣa.

603. Read with L yātanī tsh.

607-608. Jayavanṇa is the modern village Zevan about six miles to the S.E. of Srinagar; comp. note i. 320 and BUTLER, Report, p. 6. Sculptured stones are found at the Muhammadan burial grounds and also in the houses of the place, but not in sufficient masses to justify the belief that the buildings referred to by K. were really of great extent or massive construction. No reference is found elsewhere to a 'town of Kalāṣa.' The Maṭhas which Harṣa is said to have plundered, vii. 961, are perhaps those referred to in our passage.

609-610. Bilhāṇa, too, Vikram. xviii.

64-66, praises Harṣa for his personal bravery in battle, and for his skill as a poet, by which he surpassed even Sriharṣa. He also refers to his power of composing sweet songs in all languages (sarvalhāsakavīra). Prof. BUTLER, Vikram, Introduction, p. 19, has rightly pointed out that this very passage, by its reference to an earlier royal author, Sriharṣa, makes the suggested attribution of certain compositions, like the Ratnāvalī, to Harṣadeva of Kāśmīr very doubtful.

It is uncertain also whether we have in any of the verses which the anthologies ascribe to a Harṣadeva (see Cat. Catalog, p. 764), compositions of the Kāśmīr prince.

KALASA
(A.D. 1063-1089).

614. Once as he was singing before him, and those assembled were delighted, the king got up and went outside to [attend to] a call of nature.

615. The thoughtful prince seeing his dignity injured by this interruption, was agitated with shame and anger and looked down to the ground.

616. A master who has no patience, a very deceitful friend, a woman of harsh speech, an overbearing son, servants who give haughty replies,—all these can be tolerated, nay, even attendants who cause heart-burning; but not a hearer who shows disregard by contemptuously moving the corners of his eyes to and fro.

Harṣa's disaffection.

617. Then Viśśavaṭṭa, a parasite of his father, told him as if in jest: "Kill him and rule the kingdom."

618. As he (Harṣa) reproached him in anger, Dhammaṭṭa too, who was sitting close by, said with a laugh: "He has not spoken what is improper."

619. Greedy of future advantages, the father's followers would like to attach to themselves the youthful princes by showing them secret devotion, just as courtesans [desire to attach to themselves] the companions of their lovers.

620. When his father returned to the assembly, he pleased that proud [prince] by various presents and compliments.

621. But on the next day when he had returned to his own apartments, after having taken his meal by his father's side, Viśśavaṭṭa came and secretly spoke to him as [he had done before].

622. Then when in spite of his repeated remonstrances he persisted in indicating various devices, he (Harṣa) struck him angrily with his hand.

623. When the noble prince saw that the stroke had made him bleed from the nose, he showed compassion.

624. He had his blood washed off by his servants and clothes given to him, saying with a smile: "This much comes even from [merely] saying what is wicked."

625. From the gift that wretched person concluded that he wished what he indeed did not wish, just as [one might infer] from a mere smile [the amorous desire] of another man's wife.

626. Thereupon he urged him on to that act for a very long time, making repeated efforts and using Dhammaṭṭa as an intermediary.

Harṣa's conspiracy.

627. He yielded to the sin which arose from his growing treacherous desire, and conspiring [with others], everywhere posted bravos (śākṣa) to kill his father.

628. Often as he (Kalasa) came into their power, his son, touched by a remnant of affection, did not permit him to be killed; yet he did not abandon that project.

619. I translate after the correct readings of L: °akamam, anugāh, kāmisakkin iva.

620. Read mānānam with L.

628. Read with L °bhūtasena and °apṛāṣā.

629. When, then, the band of bravos had obtained the position of confidants [with Harṣa], Viśśūvaṭṭa, fearing betrayal, quickly reported the matter to the king.

630. When the prince heard this, he became alarmed, and did not go that day for his meal to his father, though invited through messengers.

631. As he did not arrive, his father too abandoned all doubt about that affair, and from mental anguish did not take food that day along with his attendants.

632. When Thakkaṇa came in the morning with his brother, he (Kalaśa) related to him his misfortune, and putting his head into his lap wept for a long time.

633. After relating the story regarding Dhammaṭṭa, he also said to him in the course of his confused remarks that he ought to seize him (Dhammaṭṭa) and give him up.

634. But the two sons of Tanvaṅga spoke to him thus on behalf of their brother [Dhammaṭṭa]: "We have no knowledge of his acts."

635-636. "We two, O king, who on the strength of your favour have consecrated ourselves to the protection of those in misfortune, and whose door is open even at night for their admission, how should we, O lord of the earth, though our lives may be at risk, forsake our younger brother, be he innocent or not?"

637. "Should unfaithfulness towards the ruler be imputed to us on account of the protection [offered] to him, then surely there is no other refuge for us but exile."

638. When, weeping and bonding their heads down to his feet, the two had thus spoken to him, the king with difficulty granted them permission to leave [the country].

639. Fearing that some one might kill Dhammaṭṭa on the way, they took him between themselves, and then left the country with their troops and horses.

640. When the palace had become empty on the departure of the sons of Tanvaṅga, the king sent for his son and spoke to him with kind words:

641. "Since the beginning of things, people in this world have everywhere known the son by his famous father."

642. "I, on the contrary, O son, am known to all people through you, my good son, whose fame has become renowned in all regions of the earth, just as Atri [is known] through [his son], the moon."

632. L reads correctly nivedayan.

633. Read with L °bhayaḍḍhatṭāpi.

635. L better vyaktadūravau.

636. L has sambhāsya for A sambhāya.

KALASA
(A.D. 1088-1089).

643. "Say, why do you who are the foremost of the excellent, and whose glory is unrestrained, follow the road of the wicked?"

644. "That I have not handed over to you the treasures of your grandfather and my own, for that you should not blame me till you hear the reason."

645. "I keep the treasures because I bear in mind that a king without means falls under the will of his own people as well as of his enemies."

646. "After completing the foundation of [my] town, I shall throw upon you the burden of the crown and go as an ascetic to Vārāṇasī or to Nandikēśetra."

647. "Thus, before long you are to be master of the throne and the treasures. Why do you aim with all your might at something that does not befit the honourable?"

648. "I do not believe what rogues have reported to me regarding you. Let the false rumour be dispelled by a truthful statement."

649. The king said those words with full purpose, wishing from paternal affection that he would deny his action so as to clear himself.

650. For being ready to pardon him, he wished to convince the people by his mere denial.

651. But Harṣa acknowledged with respectful words of assent [the truth of] what his father had said, and retired, saying that he would state the facts through a trusted person.

652. The person whom his father sent, he told in embarrassment: "I wished to do that at the instigation of others,"—and [then] went home.

Attack on Harṣa.

653. When the king saw the dejected expression in the envoy's face, he beat his head with his hands, and exclaiming: "Woe, O son," ordered him to be attacked.

654. By the order of the king, who had said that if he (Harṣa) were killed, he would cut off his own head, the soldiers halted after merely surrounding his residence.

655. The braves on the other side, who felt certain of their death, closed the gates, gathered round the prince, and thus spoke to him insulting words:

656. "You wretch, who wildly and hoodlessly have played at dangerous treason, do you expect to remain alive after having got us killed?"

657. "The father will protect you [as] you protected the father. Between you there is blood-relationship, but we are lost."

658. "Fight in our midst, otherwise we slay you. Clearly there is thus no chance whatever for you to live."

646. L reads muniḥ for the meaningless putraḥ of A.

647. Read hate with L.

652. L gives the correct reading ma-mānya° for A sa-mānya°. L has svāvasatham as emended.

659. On hearing of this, his own chamberlain (mahattara), Daṇḍaka by name, who had stood before the distressed king, went to Harṣa.

KALĀḤA
(A.D. 1068-1089).

660. When the bravos had admitted him as one of the household, this clever [man] approached the prince and spoke thus, deceiving them all :

661. "O son of a Kṣattriya woman, even the [deities which are the] prime causes (kāraṇa), after having lived for ever so many world-periods, must by necessity follow the will of Fate."

662. "Therefore, as unfailing death has now arrived, preserve that pride for the sake of which arms are carried."

663. "You are young, a noble Kṣattriya, you are learned and your renown is widespread. Then what advantage do you expect [to gain] by delaying the fight?"

664. "With such good companions as these, and with me to go in front, death and victory, O illustrious one, are now [equally] brilliant for you."

665. "Get up, have your nails, hair and the rest dressed quickly, and fasten [on your head] the hero's band (vīrapaṭṭa), [which is to be] the garland for the marriage with the celestial maids (Apsaras)."

666. After speaking thus he made the prince, with a barber, go to the inner apartments to be shaved, while the bravos complimented him.

667. At [that] moment he threw down his dagger, jumped up in joy, and following behind, bolted firmly [the door of] those apartments.

668. Then he called out to the Rājasthāniya from the window: "The prince is safe here. Do what is proper for you!"

669. Danger arising from ghosts, planets and the like is removed by herbs, that from enemies by armed forces, that from weapons by armour. But wherever on the earth danger may arise for kings, it is quickly removed by those who are old in wisdom.

670. Thereupon the soldiers with tumultuous shouts proceeded to scale the walls, buildings and the rest, in order to penetrate into the prince's residence.

671-672. While the bravos, leaving the prince, who was behind the heavy doors of the mansion, endeavoured to break out and were falling in their eagerness to fight, two or three brave self-respecting men who were innocent, and had been drawn into the affair by being accidentally present, escaped outside.

659. L gives the name as Canḍaka; comp. vii. 481.

661. By kāraṇas are meant here, as the gloss of A₂ indicates, the five deities recognized as such in the S'āiva S'āstra: Brahman, Viṣṇu, Rudra, Īśvara, Sadāśiva.

668. I have followed here L, which reads tamorād for tamārād of the MSS. copied from A, this codex itself showing now from verse 667 onwards a lacuna of one leaf. I cannot find elsewhere the form tamora for the usual tamorī, 'window,' but the context clearly requires a word of that meaning.

670. L reads correctly pravivikṣavah.

KALĀśA
(A.D. 1088-1089).

673. After leaving the house, which was near the [shrine of] Sūryamatī-Gaurīśa, they got close to the [temple of] Saśāśiva, killing those who opposed them.

674. Sahaja, a relative of the king, though protected by the order of the king who had regard for his kinsmen, was the first to be slain among them.

675. A Brahman named Tivya, a brave man and a learned one, Rāmadeva, who was distinguished by his valour, and Keśin, who was from Karṇāṭa, were killed by the opposing soldiers.

676. Some wretches threw away their arms, some killed themselves with their own hands. Thus they found death, imprisonment and other [punishments] fit for cowards.

Hirya imprisoned
(A.D. 1089).

677. On the sixth day of the bright half of Pausa in the year [of the Laukika era four thousand one hundred] sixty-four (A.D. 1088), this riot was brought about by the rogues who had sown enmity between father and son.

678. Persistent indulgence in extravagant expenditure, the instigation of a young and beloved wife, attachment to wicked persons, the loss of the former affection on the father's part, quarrelling with a minister, a brother, or with another wife of the father,—these estrange the minds of young princes from their fathers.

679. Thus this prince, owing to the thoughtlessness he acquired in the company of wicked men, was thrown into prison, and fell into misery though accustomed to comforts.

680. When he was thrown into prison the proud Queen Bhuvanamatī, who had been made a party to the covenant [between father and son] as a surety, committed suicide by cutting her throat.

681. The king placed trusted councillors as guards over him, and from paternal affection, sent him daily suitable dishes.

682. The king left with him his personal servant, Prayāya by name, thinking that the latter was incapable of intrigues.

683. As to Harṣa, Nonaka advised the king that he should take his life or eyesight, either himself or through others.

684. The king, who in depravation of character sank to the level of animals, abandoned shame and had intercourse with some of his son's wives, just as [if they were those] of an enemy.

673. Regarding the position of these temples, see notes vii. 180 and vii. 186 sq.

675. L gives the first name as Trivya.

676. Read with L baddhaḥ for A bandhaḥ.

680. The covenant made between Kalāśa and Harṣa on Ananta's death seems to be alluded to; comp. vii. 490 sqq. and vii. 733.

684. L has rightly °vaikalyāt paśutulyo.

KALĀĀA
(A.D. 1063-1089).

685. Among these Sugalā, the grand-daughter of King Tuhka, endeavoured, when she had obtained her father-in-law's favour, to kill her husband

686. Nonaka and she, the two, then consulted together, and induced a wicked cook to mix poison into Harṣa's food.

687. When Prayāga learned this from the mouth of another cook, he got his master to refrain from the food which those [two] had sent.

688. When Harṣa heard that the two dogs to which this food had been given for a test had died, he gave up the hope of life.

689. As he believed that his father had arranged this for his secret execution, he henceforth left the dishes, day by day, after merely touching them.

690. He kept himself alive only with food of some sort which Prayāga always secured from outside.

691. When the king heard the report of the cooks as to his not taking the food, he sent for Prayāga and inquired about the reason of this [conduct].

692. He related the whole story of the poisoning, without mentioning the two instigators and the cook, and that his master knew himself of it.

693. Subsequently, though his father had the cooks changed, the prince ate nothing but what Prayāga brought.

694. As all were against him, he took every day which he passed in that [prison], as a gain, without concerning himself about those [days which might be] in store.

695. In the meantime there took place suddenly an unheard-of change for the worse in the king's conduct, which foreboded his end.

696. He destroyed first the copper image of Sūrya, called Tūmravāmin, and also seized without fear the brass images from the Vihāras.

697. The dissolute king in his cruelty disregarded [all] rules of honourable conduct, [and went so far as] to seize the property of those [who died] without issue.

698. Then he became suddenly afflicted with vital exhaustion which was brought on by over-indulgence in sensual pleasures, [and which] made it manifest that he was suffering under a curse.

Kalāśa's final illness

699. When he was about to prepare for the consecration of sacrificial cups in a Śiva temple, blood from his nose dropped into the cup of Mahākāla.

700. This sudden bad omen could not in the least be stopped by the application of remedies, but on the contrary increased.

685. L confirms the emendation in the text by reading napti bhartur vadhārthini.

686. L has rightly sūdam.

692. Read with L sūdam so 'palapya.

696. Buddha-images are likely to be meant here. Harṣa in his financial difficulties seems to have made a system of the melting down of sacred images; comp. vii. 1091 sqq., 1344.

699. Comp. regarding the rite of the kumbhapratiṣṭhā, note iv. 699; for Mahākāla, iv. 102.

KALĀḌA
(A.D. 1068-1089).

701. By this continual flow of blood his health waned, and gradually he became confined to his bed in the inner [apartments].

702. By defective digestion and other ailments his body became weak in strength and flesh, and came to resemble the moon when reduced to the sixteenth part of its orb.

Utkarṣa brought from Lohara.

703. He wished to bestow the crown on Harṣa, but then noticing the opposition of the ministers, he had Utkarṣa brought from the Lohara hills in order to have him inaugurated.

704. All persons, high and low, he presented with gifts on his death-bed, but not the wives of his seraglio, being influenced by jealousy.

705. He asked the ministers to bring up Harṣa, saying that he would send him out of the country after granting [him] money.

706. They, however, sent away the former guards, put on Tiakkuras from Lohara to watch him, and delivered him to Utkarṣa.

707. The latter had the emaciated [Harṣa] taken out of the dancing-hall (nūtyamaṇḍapa) and imprisoned in the hall of four columns (caturstambha), separated from his friends.

708. The king, knowing in his helpless condition that his life was about to escape, hurried to proceed to a Tīrtha to die.

709. In the belief that the god [Sūrya] was angered by the destruction of the [image of] Tāmravāmin, he proceeded to take refuge at [the temple of] Mūrtāṇḍa to save his life.

710. He therefore left Vijayaśeṭra, which bestows [upon those who die there] final beatitude, and impelled by fear started for that [Tīrtha], though he was a worshipper of Sīva.

711. The official who when he has got his post thinks the whole universe a straw, cries and bends down even before the female servants of the household when he feels pain. Shouting and filled with foolish notions from receiving much wrong advice, what false steps will he not take, child-like, when his end is nigh?

712. The pride [which he had before shown] in the instructions of his Gurus, was rendered ridiculous by such cowardly submission more befitting miserly wretches and the like.

713. On the third day of the bright half of Mārgaśīrṣa, in the evening, the king got from his bed into a litter and started to die.

703. Read with L 'bhīṣektum utkarṣam.

705. L rightly tena for A tenā°.

709. Regarding the famous shrine of Sūrya-Mūrtāṇḍa at Maṭan, see note iv. 192.

710. The correct reading māheśvaro, conjectured by Durgapr., is found in L.

711. L rightly mūrkhaṣṇānti, °upadeśādhi°.

712. An allusion is made here to the king's former initiation into Tantra and Śaiva lore, which makes his late conversion to Vaiṣṇava-worship contemptuous; see vii. 279 sqq.

713. Read talpād with L,

714. While the sounds of the kettle-drums drowned the wails of the people, he set out by the water-route in boats, along with his ministers and seraglio.

715.^a When there remained yet one-fourth of the following day he arrived before the feet of Mārtāṇḍa, and offered for the preservation of his life a gold image [of the god].

716. As in his suffering he was looking out eagerly for his elder son, without his orders being obeyed by his attendants, his misery increased.

717. Sighing deeply, he listened through the open door to the singers who outside sang an air composed by Harṣa.

718. That at the approach of death their power of command dwindles away, just as the power of quick movement [is lost] in a dream, that, indeed, cuts kings to the quick, and increases the pains caused by the death-struggle.

719. After he had requested that gifts be made to the people and to his eldest son, and while he was giving instructions to Utkarṣa, his tongue became heavy.

720. As he was again and again uttering indistinctly [the name] Harṣa, Nonaka, in order to conceal [the king's] real thought, held a mirror (ādarśa) before him.

721. This he pushed back with a smile, biting his lips, shaking his head, and murmuring something; then he kept silent for two and a half days.

722. Then when the last breath was near, he called the ministers by a gesture, and had himself carried by them, recognizing [his desire], before the [image of] Mārtāṇḍa.

723. Having enjoyed life for forty-nine years, he reached his end on the sixth day of the bright half of Mārgaśīrṣa in the year [of the Laukika era four thousand one hundred] sixty-five (A.D. 1089).

724. Mammanikā and six other wedded queens, as well as a concubine called Jayamatī, followed him [into death].

725. But the whole of womankind was disgraced by his favourite concubine named Kayyā.

726. If she did not remember that her lord had given her the foremost position in the whole seraglio, no matter, let her not remember it: because she was of low origin.

714-715. The usual route from Vijayaśvara (Vij'brōr) to the temple of Mārtāṇḍa, lies by the Vitastā to below Anantnāg (Islāmābād), and hence across the alluvial plateau for a distance of about five miles.

Read with L prāptāḥ sa.

720. Nonaka pretends to mistake the name Harṣa for the word ādarśa; see gloss of A.

721. L reads kim iva (for kim api), which taken as an utprekṣā figure would mean that the king did not utter even a murmur.

KALĀṢA
(A. D. 1063-1089).

Kalaka's death
(A.D. 1089).

KALASA
(A.D. 1063-1089).

727. But it causes us pain that she, subsequently residing near Vijayaleśetra, became the concubine of a village official.

728. Her body, which a king had enjoyed, and which continued comforts had beautified, she yielded up to a villager. Shame upon women of lowly mind!

UTKARSA
(A.D. 1089).

729. While all ministers were taken up with the coronation of Utkarṣa, the grateful Vāmana alone performed the funeral rites for the king.

730. On the one side there rose the sound of music [accompanying] the coronation ceremony, together with joyful songs, on the other the din of the funeral music, together with wails.

731. Then Vijayamalla, King Kalasa's son from the Queen Padmasrī, placed himself in opposition to his brother.

732. To him King Utkarṣa promised the same daily allowance which his father had granted to Harṣadeva.

733. To inspire confidence, he made certain feudal chiefs and ministers sureties, and gave an allowance to Jayarāja, a son of Kaṣṣṣā.

734. Fickle young women, with tears in their eyes, yet look about for other means [of living]; sons, while in front of the very pyre, discuss [affairs connected with] the property. Having noted a hundred times such concern at the death of others, yet there are, O wonder, dull-minded persons who accumulate wealth by evil means for the sake of wives, children and others.

735. Then the new king in his splendour made his way into the City, but not into the heart of the citizens, who longed for Harṣa's rise [to power].

736. Though it was the day of his advent to the throne, it did not appear to the people as such, being spoilt by the absence of joy, just as a festive day [does not appear as such] to a person suffering from illness.

737. Harṣadeva, who had been thrown into a fresh prison in the hall of four columns (caturṣṭambha) when his sick father set out to die, did not take food on that day.

738. On the next day, as he kept in mute grief like a wanderer who has lost his companions, he was induced with difficulty by the requests of the Ṭhakkuras to take food.

739. They also promised to get him the throne in their own land, saying that he (Utkarṣa) did not deserve to rule both kingdoms in his single person.

740. Having thus been assured of their sympathy, he heard of his father's death, and on the following day, while keeping a fast, was informed of Utkarṣa's arrival.

729. For Vāmana, see vii. 568.

739. The Ṭhakkuras refer to Lohara, which by Utkarṣa's elevation to the Kāśmir throne had become united with the latter kingdom; comp. vii. 256, 703.

741. While with his flowing tears he was, [as it were], offering handfuls of water as an oblation [to the Pitrs], his younger brother, the king, sent word to him by messengers that he should bathe.

742. While he took his bath, the king was preparing for the coronation ceremony, and there arose the sound of the music [accompanying tho] Abhiṣeka, together with shouts : "Be victorious."

743. He being versed in [interpreting] omens, knew by this good omen that he would obtain the regal dignity, [just as] by the flash of lightning [one knows the coming of] thunder.

744. Henceforth favourable omens began to present themselves day by day before him whose reign was approaching, just as [if they were] his attendants.

745-746. When his brother sent messengers to induce him to partake of food, he dismissed them with the message : "Let the king exile me after setting me free. I would take a covenant on an oath by sacred libation (kośa) not to oppose him. Otherwise I seek death by refusing food."

747. The king then made a false promise, and sending envoys with kind words, induced him to take the oath by sacred libation and to partake of food.

748. The king, when asked by him [for his release], always said that he would do it the next day, and by this procrastination roused in him apprehensions.

749. Thereupon he (Harṣa) sent Prayāga secretly to Vijayamalla, after placing in his hand his own ear-ring in [token of his] trust.

750. He (Prayāga) spoke to him : "Your unfortunate elder brother speaks to you in these very words : 'While you are the prince royal and he (Utkarṣa) is king, I wither away in captivity.'"

751. He (Vijayamalla) thought long over it in distress, and replied : "How would the politic king do this at my bidding?"

752. "Notwithstanding, I shall use all possible efforts to free you. You, on the other hand, should carefully protect your life."

753. With this message he sent him back to Harṣadeva, and thought about means for effecting that object.

754. Utkarṣa, as if stupefied by the gods, made after his advent to the throne no effort suitable for putting affairs in order.

755. He did not question Kandarpa and the others about state business, though it was he who had given them posts, nor did he transact it himself.

741. Persons who are prevented from attending their parents' funeral, are required to bathe on receiving the news of the latter, just like those who return from the burning-ground.

748. I read taḍarthamāna, as emended.

750. I prefer to read with Ā rājñya and śuśyāmo for Ā rājye, śuśyāmo.

UTKARṢA
(A.D. 1080).

756. The only daily occupation of the king was to inspect the hoards of the treasury and to weigh them.

757. Far-sighted people became certain of his avaricious character, from the fact that he did either what cost nothing, or pondered over the cost.

758. The wives of his father, who were difficult to keep in check, spread the story of his greediness because he gave them food with Mudga.

759. Miserly like a priest (śrotriya) and of mean character in his actions, he was not liked by the people, who are [eager] to have masters of large minds.

Vijayamalla's depart-ture.

760. Vijayamalla, who did not receive from the greedy [king] his fixed allowance, was then in his anger preparing to leave the country.

761. In order to protect himself, he asked all those who had been sureties to accompany him, and these readily went with him.

762. When after his departure from the City he stopped for one night at Lavanotsa, the soldiers in the force of the sureties came over to his side.

763-764. "If you go while Harṣa is in fetters, the king has attained his object. Therefore it is proper for you to go after you have freed him from his captivity." When they with raised arms thus urged him on, the prince turned back and marched in the morning for the City.

Rising in favour of
Harṣa.

765. Some Dāmaras, too, when they heard that he had turned back for this purpose, joined him.

766-769. Madhurāvatta, the commander of the cavalry, had, as he had been one of the sureties, sent his son Nāga to escort the prince when he wished to leave. As the faithful [Nāga], who did not desert the king's side, was proceeding with some mounted men by the route of Paḍmapura to [join] the king, he was delayed by evil omens, and before he had reached the City, the fast-marching prince, whom good omens had encouraged, was investing the palace and burning the houses with his troops, who had fixed firebrands at the points of their darts.

770. Prince Jayarāja, too, deserted the king as he was moving out to battle, and joined his (Vijayamalla's) side.

771. The two princes, keeping together, speculated as to what his (Utkarṣa's) course would be, just as two young poets [might speculate as to the course] of a poet famous for his diction.

757. I translate according to L cintya-mūnaryayena.

758. Mudga is the Phaseolus Mungo, a common pulse much cultivated in Kāśmīr under the name of Mung. Comp. LAWRENCE, Valley, p. 338. The dāl made with it is not regarded as a favourite dish by well-to-do people.

760. L deśād gantum.

761. L te cāpi. Compare vii. 733.

762. L reads mādhyasthasainyātusyāgre, probably for °sainyāt tasyāgre.

Regarding the position of Lavanotsa, see note i. 329.

766-769. In order to get a proper sense, we must read with L in verse 766 rājasūnor yiyāsar yaṁ mādhyasthād, and in 769 śūlāgro°.

770. Read with L samarāya and °śiriyat.

771. Read with L sahasthitau.

772. He (Vijayamalla) had then the stables of the elephants, buffaloes, etc., set on fire by his soldiers, who declared that they would not go until Harṣa was set free.

773-774. Respectable citizens too said: "Let Harṣadeva be crowned, who showers gifts like the cloud which is to drown the world. Let this avaricious Khaśa, who is like a shopkeeper, be turned out of the kingdom." Then they went to Harṣa and covered him in his prison with flowers thrown through the openings of the windows.

775. While this tumult arose Harṣa despatched the Ṭhakkuras, and made the force of the king, whose troops had been defeated, take up a neutral position.

776. Having thus inflicted this injury on his enemy [Utkarṣa], though still in prison, he then with limbs trembling from excitement, addressed them thus:

777. "I am to-day in fearful danger, so release me from my fetters. Else for certain evil will befall [me] from the king."

778. While they consulted together again and again upon these words, kicks fell upon the gate from outside the building.

779. And a loud voice was heard: "On what perfidy are these rascals bent? Fie, Ṭhakkuras, upon the door!"

780. Then as the Ṭhakkuras were frightened, Harṣa, courageously disregarding the danger, got the door opened himself.

781. His life kept only in his eyes, when he saw marching up sixteen soldiers of the guard (vārika) from Lohara who came to kill him.

782-786. These had been despatched by Utkarṣa to kill him, after he had heard again and again the advice which Nonaka gave him, that all this danger would cease the moment Harṣa's head was cut off and exposed. Then as he reflected on what he should have to do thereafter, he recognized that moment that he (Harṣa), if not killed, might yet some day be of use. As they were going, he [therefore] gave them the order: "Relieve the Ṭhakkuras on guard and kill him if I should send this ring as a sign. But if this [other ring] is sent, then set him free from prison." After saying this, he showed them the two rings on his hand, and told them to make sure of delaying [the execution]. [It was for this] that they did not strike him at once after relieving the Ṭhakkuras.

772. L rightly vāḍibhiḥ for A vāḍināḥ.

773. Regarding the term Khaśa as applied to the rulers of Lohara, see note vi. 175.

778. Read with L dvāri gṛhāḍ.

779. L has ca for A sa.

781. The meaning of the term vārika is doubtful; it may be derived from vāra, 'fixed time,' i.e. 'turn of duty.'

782-786. The text of these verses becomes clear if we read with L in 783 coṭṭā and vivīcatā, and in 785 āṅgulī-yake.

UTKARSA
(A.D. 1080).

787. He (Harṣa) called each of them by his name, offered them betel, and made them take their place in front of him.

788. They felt ashamed at this hospitable reception, and, when taking betel, let go their weapons from their hands and the intent of murder from their minds.

789. Speech (go) brings wealth, creates fame, removes sin, and indeed procures friendship even from the enemy; with every word (pratipadam) it follows paths which are agreeable to the wise. Resembling the cow of plenty, what misfortune can it not put right?

790. The prince spoke to them: "Why do you stand as if ashamed? Servants are always free from guilt when executing their masters' orders."

791. "Yet you may delay, in order to watch the wonderful course of affairs, how they will change from moment to moment."

792. "As up in heaven the small clouds change, assuming the appearance of elephants, panthers, beasts of prey, snakes, horses and other [animals],—just thus [change] the waves of emotion in the heart of men, undergoing [in turn] transitions between kindness and harshness as the moments vary."

793. "Therefore, as I stay here accommodating myself to every moment, so you too may keep watching what shall be the next task."

794. "Or [it may be that] such dangers to the life producing changes of sentiment are [destined] for persons about to ascend the throne."

795. "The heat of summer becomes more oppressive when rain is near. The darkness of night becomes denser on the approach of morning. Thus, too, when exceptional good fortune of overwhelming splendour appears for a person, receding ill-luck increases the vehemence of its afflictions."

796. Speaking in this fashion, he related to them stories of virtuous persons which had a happy issue and bore a resemblance to his own story, while he gathered a good omen from the course of his breath.

797. In order to gain time, he related to them the story about Harīścandra, in which he brought out the essential points by clear incidental remarks.

798. Owing to his skill, it was not noticeable that he was [at the same time] endeavouring to gratify them, to protect himself and to secure news from outside.

799. In the meantime ever new plans arose with regard to him, and royal Fortune and the goddess Kālī came and went a hundred times.

789. The word go is intended to be taken here also in its usual meaning of 'cow'; the verse must be understood as referring equally to the latter.

796. The various forms of breath as means of divination are treated at length in texts like the Svarodaya (Jammu MSS. Nos. 2928, 3994).

797. For the story of Harīścandra, see e.g. Mārkaṇḍeya Pur., ix. 82 sqq.

800. Because King Utkarṣa often thought of letting him free, and [as often] gave orders to different attendants to kill him.

801. But when he gave the order for his death, he forgot to send the ring [which was to be] the token. Hence the guards did not carry out what his messengers told them.

802. When he found that they had gone in vain, he remembered the arrangement regarding the token, and sent thereupon the Rājaputra S'ūra, son of Satya (?).

803. At the moment he was putting the token into his hand, fate willed that he made a mistake, and the rings got exchanged.

804. The lord of the Sindhu-land (Jayadratha), the supporter of [the race of] Vṛddhakaśatra, had his own head cut off through the very boon which he had obtained for the cutting off of another's head. King S'rutāyudha was, indeed, struck down in battle by his own divine mace. What is intended to serve for protection, that very thing may, by the will of fate, bring about destruction.

805. Thus the king secured rather his destruction [instead of safety] by forgetting one token and then substituting the other [for it].

806. By the familiar ways of Harṣa the guards soon became his well-wishers, and opposed to Utkarṣa's commands.

807. When S'ūra approached the gate in violent excitement, they thought that he had come for his execution, and were preparing to kill him with their raised weapons.

808. When they opened the fold of the door they saw in his hand the ring, and jumping in joy came up with him to Harṣa.

809. When they bent their heads down to his feet and asked him to go out, the prince stood for a short time in thought, not feeling assured.

810. At that time Vijayamalla believed that Harṣudeva had been killed, and in his fury fought with still more excessive courage.

811. He was about to set fire to the palace when the followers of the king stopped him with difficulty by calling out: "Your elder brother lives."

812. Thereupon the king immediately sent to him Sugālā, Harṣa's wife, with her husband's earring, to assure him.

799. Kālī, a form of Durgā, is here put into relation with Kāla, the god of death.

801. To be read with L tenoktin, °tiṣṭhan na.

802. L gives the name as Satya, A as Satva, which can scarcely be right.

804. Read with L vṛddhakaśatradhārā-dharaḥ, an epithet of Jayadratha. The stories of Jayadratha and S'rutāyudha are told in the Mahabharata, vii. cxlvi. 105 sqq. and vii. cxii. 41 sqq., resp.

806. The gloss of A, explains the rare word ābhijanya by its Kā. derivative, ābzan, 'familiarity.'

811. The emendation te'grajāḥ for A te'nujaḥ, as proposed in Ed., is confirmed by L tegdha-jah. The latter is a misreading for te'grajāḥ, easily explained in S'aradā characters.

UTKARṢA
(A.D. 1089).

Attempts to exorcise
Harṣa.

UTKARṢA
(A.D. 1089).

Harṣa's liberation.

813. When the prince saw her, he abstained from burning [the palace], and the king thought that Harṣa's liberation would remove the danger.

814. Nona, Prasastakalāśa and other ministers then went themselves, and after freeing Harṣa from his fetters, made him leave his prison.

815. With difficulty this invitation proceeded from their mouths, after having come and gone like the breath departing at the point of death.

816. Harṣa, however, covered with the flowers which the citizens showered [on him], mounted a horse and proceeded with the ministers to the king, who was still in the fight.

817. After a greeting, the king, his younger brother, spoke to him: "Come back after making your brother [Vijayamalla] withdraw. Then we arrange what is suitable."

818. When he (Harṣa) had agreed to this and had started he (Utkarṣa) left the scene of the fighting, and proceeded with the ministers into the treasury where the gold and other [valuables] were kept.

819. When Vijayamalla saw Harṣadeva by his side, who had escaped from [so] great a danger, he became for a moment motionless with joy.

820. Then he made obeisance to his feet, and he (Harṣa) again raised him up and embraced him. Many things the helper and the helped had to tell [each other].

821-822. A trusted person then spoke secretly to Vijayamalla: "Have that one (Harṣa) first put out of the way. Then killing Utkarṣa, you will be king, without a rival." The faithful Vijayamalla did not accept this advice, but Harṣa recognized it from the hints he noticed, and for a moment he stood trembling.

823. Resembling a bird deprived of its wings, he protected his person, which between his two brothers was like a prey between two falcons, by roaming about on horseback.

824. When the forest-fire has passed away owing to the downpour of the near cloud, the tree is threatened by the lightning; he who has escaped from the crocodile's throat, must fear to get drowned in the ocean. Thus fate soon creates a fresh terror for the person who has warded off a danger, in order that he may realize the sweetness of the good fortune which he is to enjoy afterwards.

825. While he was pretending to give exercise to his horse, [and was thus]

815. L reads kṣēṇa (for A śokena) and bahiḥ kṣaṇāt.

820. Read with L cotthāpyā°.

821-822. The proper text is restored by

L, which reads hatvotkarṣam and harṣas tat tathau tu.

823. Read with L nirpākṣapattirpratimā.

825. Read with L raḥṣantam.

protecting his life, some of his own people who had learned the state of things, joined him on foot.

UTKARṢA
(A.D. 1089).

826. Then, after consulting for a short time with Vijayamalla, he went to the king to announce the cessation of hostilities.

827. As he left the prince, and had arrived before the residence [of the king], Vijayasinha stopped him from entering.

828. He said: "Having escaped, why do you again go to die, O imprudent one? Go and seat yourself without fear on the throne!"

829. As he spoke thus, his servants brought the throne from the treasury, and Harṣadeva immediately ascended it.

ILARṢA
(A.D. 1090-1101).

830. And there came before him Sugali, hiding by boldness her great offence, to claim her position as the chief queen.

831. The rumour of his coronation made the councillors assemble from all sides, as the thunder of the cloud [attracts] the Cātaka birds.

832. The cunning Vijayasinha, too, dragged Utkarṣa, who had become distressed on hearing this news, from that hall and lod him to another mansion.

833. Deprived of his dignity, and followed by few, he was seen passing before King [Ilarṣa], who was in the assembly hall. Whose greatness is lasting?

834. As he entered that building, Vijayasinha posted guards outside, and reported to the king that he had executed this task.

835. The king brought to his side the Thakkuras with whom he had become familiar in his prison, and got rid of the danger from Vijayamalla, by having their soldiers posted before [him].

836. He too (Vijayamalla), when he heard that his elder brother had ascended the throne, was going towards him, [but] the latter's messengers conducted him quickly, in a respectful manner, to his own quarters.

837. When the king then saw that that [prince's] soldiers had come before him, he, with politic sense, had him that very moment brought into his presence.

838. With folded hands he rewarded him for his trouble, saying: "You have given me my life and kingdom."

839. Through the favour of fate his well-directed policy at once brought thus the kingdom to rest.

840. The new king, though he yet retained the clothes he had worn in his prison, shone forth on his throne by the dignity which enveloped [him].

827. For Vijayasinha, see vii. 580.

836. Read with L rājā pārśvam.

839. Read with L nityaivaṁ tad rājyaṁ.

840. L has sīṁhāsane sa.

IIARSA
(A.D. 1089-1101).

841. At the end of the day, tired out by such violent emotions, he who had effected his rise fell down on his couch, just like [a load-carrier] who has put down his load.

842. Looking, as it were, at this vanity of all things, he did not find 'thero the relief of sleep, though he kept his eyes closed.

843. Utkarṣa, however, who had fallen into captivity by a stratagem, was asking advice from his councillors. Ho had scolded others, when Nonaka spoke to him these harsh words :

844. "O king, you did not do what you wore advised in the morning. Hear what is appointed regarding [thy] future, which has fallen through this want of wisdom."

845. "To-day you delivered him who was in fetters to those who eat food-remnants; to-morrow, however, he will deliver you into the hands of those who feed on dog's meat."

846. "Hence what other refuge is there at present but death? Even this has become difficult for us to reach since we abandoned fighting."

847. "Or do not the onemics show that refined skill in reviling, which excruciates deeply at the time when one has to touch the fruits of defeat?"

848. "The device which you employed, without thinking of its danger, has lost everything at once and within a moment."

849. "Even a small mischief, if repaired without skill, breaks out again by a hundred openings, just as an old garment [when repaired] with a needle."

850. When he (Utkarṣa) heard this, he left their midst and went into an inner apartment with the concubine called Sahajā.

851. Telling her that he would stop there for his evening prayer, he remained for a short time quite alone behind a curtain.

852. Then, as he had no arms, in his desperation he applied a pair of scissors, [used] for cutting cloth, to his throat, and cut the vital arteries.

853. As the scissors fell on the ground with a thud, Sahajā became alarmed and saw the blood oozing forth from behind the curtain.

854. Then she saw him with the head hanging down and the thick blood flowing from it, just as when the minerals ooze out of the highest crag of a hill which has been struck by lightning.

855. The noble conduct which she then displayed makes women who are beloved by their husbands carry their heads higher even to this day.

843. Read with L ākṣipyānyān.

845. The correct readings are those of L adhyārpipe (for A adhyākṣipo) and śamāśāśinām, Caṇḍāla, or other people of low caste, are alluded to, who act as executioners.

849. Compare the simile in vii. 384.

852. L has prāṇavahas (for prāṇavahāṣ).

Utkarṣa's suicide
(A.D. 1089).

856-857. Night leaves the moon [her husband] somewhere when he wanes, and moves away, while dawn follows the footsteps of the sinking sun. For this reason wise men, remembering that love may vary in the end, should not for certain blame or praise women. [Thus it came] that while their origin, social position and their love for their [respective] lords were alike, the conduct of Kaṣṣyā and of Śaṅkṣā deserved blame and praise [respectively].

HARṢA
(A.D. 1089-1101)

858. She too had been a dancing girl attached to a temple. He had seen her on the dancing-stage, and had taken her as a concubine into the royal seraglio.

859. She made her love shine forth brilliantly, just as [if it were] gold, by entering the pyre after smearing thickly over her limbs the blood of her lover, [which resembled] liquefied red chalk (gairika).

860. When she had been a courtesan, she had been favoured also by Harṣadeva. Though he, therefore, wished her [to remain alive], she did not renounce death.

861. He (Utkarṣa) was in his twenty-fourth year and had been king for twenty-two days, when he died. After having been left for one night, he was cremated in the morning.

862. Also some quick-eyed [ladies] of his seraglio, who had been on the Lohara hill, soon followed his footsteps by the path of fire.

863-865. When the king's followers were disarming his counsellors, Nonaka, desiring death, refused for a short time to give up his sword, whereupon Prasastakalaśa, who belonged to his own band, spoke to him thus: "Who else besides ourselves could be the king's ministers? In [a few] days therefore he will set us free. Considering this, you ought not to throw away your life." Then he made him deliver up his sword, and gave up his own.

866. Nona[ka], Silhāra, Bhaṭṭāra, Prasastakalaśa and the rest were then put in fetters and imprisoned by Harṣadeva.

867. In this fashion that wonderful overthrow of a king was effected by Harṣadeva in a single day, just as [if he had been] Fate.

868. Many are the kings whom [my narrative has dealt with] some way or another and passed on. [But] now, O ill-luck, a path has been reached which is hard to traverse for the understanding.

869-873. How is it to be related, that story of King Harṣa which has seen the rise of all enterprises and yet tells of all failures; which brings to light all [kinds of] settled plans and yet shows the absence of all policy; which character.

Description of Har

856. Regarding Kaṣṣyā, comp. vii. 725 sqq.

859. Red chalk (gairika) is used in melting gold to give it greater brilliancy.

L reads °gairikasyanda°.

865. L better samārpipat.

869. L correctly °otsāhodāyaksatram.

हारषा
(A.D. 1089-1101).

displays an excessive [assertion of the] ruling power and yet has witnessed excessive disregard of orders; which [tells] of excessive abundance of liberality and of [equally] excessive persistence in confiscation; which gives delight by an abundant [display of] compassion and shocks by the superabundance of murders; which is rendered charming by the redundancy of pious works and soiled by the superabundance of sins; which is attractive on all sides and yet repulsive, worthy of praise and deserving of blame; which sensible men must magnify and deride, regard with love and yet feel aggrieved at; which is to be blessed and to be condemned, worthy of memory and yet to be dismissed from the mind?

874. Surely he must have been born from atoms of light. How otherwise could he have been, even for the great, difficult to look at, just like the sun?

875. An appearance like his is not to be seen anywhere among mortals or gods. But if the wise were to look out for him [they would soo him] among the chiefs of the demons.

876-878. He wore earrings which flashed like the reflected image of the sun; on his round, broad head-dress was fixed a high diadem; he used to look around like a pleased lion; his bushy beard was hanging down low; his shoulders were like those of a bull, his arms great, and his body of a dark-reddish complexion; he had a broad chest with a narrow waist, and his voice was deep like thunder. Thus even superhuman beings would have lost [before him] their presence of mind.

879. At the palace gate (śikhadhvāra) he hung up great bells in all four directions, to be informed by their sound of those who had come with the desire of making representations.

880. And when he had once heard their plaintive speech, he fulfilled their desire [as quickly] as the cloud in the rainy season [fulfils] that of the Ośaka birds.

881. Nobody in his court was seen without brilliant dress, without gold ornaments, with a small following, or without a resolute bearing.

882. At that gate of the king's palace at which people from various nations presented themselves, the riches of all countries seemed always to be piled up.

883. In the king's palace, councillors, chamberlains and other [attendants] moved about without number, adorned with golden chains and bracelets.

884. While thus displaying the lustre of his new sovereignty, the king regarded the opinion of Vijayumalla just as that of a Guru.

885. As his word was followed by the grateful king, his assembly was thronged with followers like that of the king himself.

873. Read with L carā kathān.

874. L pūṣeva (for A prasave) gives the right sense.

881. The lacuna of A is filled by L vigatotsāha.

882. L letter nānājanapaśāś ite.

886. He (Harsa) did not pay special regard to his own [personal] servants, and guarding against any subversion of the established order of things, bestowed the state offices upon his father's ministers.

887. He placed Kandarpa in charge of the 'Gate,' Madana in chief command of the army (kampana), and others like Vijayasinha and the rest, each in his own [previous] post.

888. When his wrath was appeased, he set Prasastakalasa and the rest free from prison, and employed them in their own [former] posts.

889. The minister Nonaka, however, and his milk-brother he had executed on the pale, as he remembered with anger their very numerous offences.

890. But from time to time, when matters grow difficult, he remembered that he (Nonaka) had been [a man] of a large mind and devoted to his master, and he felt regret.

891. A capable person is useful sometimes, even if he has committed offences. The fire which has burned down the house, offers assistance for preparing the meal.

892. Viśśava was put to death on the pale by the king's servants, after cutting off his ears and nose in the presence of his wife.

893. In his prosperity, he (Harsa) bestowed rich gifts on his servants who had come out of captivity, just as the tree blossoming in Caitra [gives rich food] to the black bees which emerge from the holes in the ground.

894. Sumna, the son of Vajra and grandson of Kṣema, who was a descendant of Rakha, was together with his younger brother raised to the chief rank among the ministers.

895. When the king went on a journey, and on other occasions, each minister was in turn everywhere mistaken by the spectators for the king.

896. Jayurāja, his younger brother, whom he had put at the head of the whole host of chamberlains, was to him more than his own life.

897. Dhammaṭa, too, the son of Tanvaṅga, who on the death of his two brothers had repaid the debt [of gratitude he owed them] by a pilgrimage to the Gangā, came back together with the sons of his brothers.

898. The king welcomed him as one whose two elder brothers had died in his own cause, and looked upon him and his nephews as if they were of his own [family].

886. L rightly samārpayat.

892 A gives the name as Viśśubhaṭṭa, L as Bhiśśavaṭṭa; comp. vii. 617-620.

894. Regarding Rakha, see v. 424 sqq.

897. The text of this verse, partly missing in A, is restored by L reading bhrātṛor ānṛṇ-yān śāntayor (recte śāntayor) gataḥ, and tān-vāṅgiḥ. Dhammaṭa had been protected by Thakkana and his other brother; comp.

vii. 632 sqq. The two elder sons of Tanvaṅga seem to have died in exile.

HARṢA
(A.D. 1089-1101).

Administrative appointments.

HARṢA
(A.D. 1080-1101).
Vijayamalla's rising.

899. In the course of time Vijayamalla, at the instigation of wicked persons, became disaffected and planned treason against him, though he (Harṣa) had in the above manner divided the regal power [with him].

900. Evil-minded persons had spoken to him: "Why did you give up the throne to the other when you had conquered it?" To win it he planned the murder of his elder brother.

901. Resolved to kill him in his lonely mansion, he arranged a sacrifice as a pretext, and invited the king [to it].

902. The plan reached the ears of the king, who apprehending an attack, immediately ordered his troops to get ready.

903. As the king's troops got ready, Vijayamalla came forth quickly and carried off the king's horses from the stables.

904. Taking the horses, he bravely attacked the king's force when he saw it, and fighting with might hastened to leave the City.

905. Riding on horseback while his wife with him kept holding to his back, he carried on a superhuman fight.

906. Just at that time unseasonable clouds sent down torrents of rain, and the land seemed everywhere flooded.

907. In this fight, where the howling winds produced a noise [similar to that] of many kettle-drums, the prince was enveloped by the shower of rain and by the arrows.

908. As he was moving along with a [gradually] dwindling force, the sons of Caṇḍaka, anxious to kill him, kept behind him, just as the acts of a former existence [follow man].

909. The confluence of the Vitasā and Sindhu where the bridge had been broken by the flood, he crossed swimming, along with his wife, after descending from his horse.

910. Full of resolution, he had plunged with his wife into the thick of the enemy. His steed too crossed the swollen stream, and came after him.

911. After remounting his steed, the brave [Vijayamalla] disappeared from the view of the enemies, and proceeded towards the country of the Darads by the route of Lahara.

902. L °nodyaman, as emended.

908. For A prākṛtānīva to be read prākṛtānīva; comp. L prākṛtānī°.

910. The text of the first Pāda is scarcely in order. L has sattvatvānākarot. Could this be a corruption for sattvaśān nākarot, 'Brave as he was, he did not drop his wife in the thick of the enemy'?

911. The upper Valley of the Kiṣangga is meant, which is to this day inhabited by Darads; see note i. 312. It can be reached by several mountain tracks from the Sind Valley, i.e. Lahara (Lār); comp. note v. 51. By crossing the Vitasā at its confluence with the Sindhu (opposite Shād'pōr), Vijayamalla avoids the necessity of crossing subsequently the latter river on his way to the Dard country.

912. Though Kundaśpa, the lord of the Gate, had closed everywhere the routes, he crossed the mountains and reached the town of the Darads (Daratpuri) hidden in the mountains.

913. There he was hospitably received by the illustrious Vidyādhara S'āhi, the Darad [ruler], and was joined, as time went on, by some of his own followers.

914. When King Harṣa heard that Dāmaras and others were taking up the feud, he felt terrified, and day by day employed [fresh] stratagems.

915. These failed. After passing the winter in the town of the Darads (Daratpura), he (Vijayamalla) precipitately started on an expedition in the month of Caitra, having received messages from the Dāmaras.

916. This proud [prince], after escaping from his [previous] dangers, lost his life accidentally by an avalanche, while stopping in a tent on the road.

917. The object for the execution of which resolute men display great zeal, is frustrated by fate through a very slight matter.

918. The lotuses which the sun exerts himself to open with a thousand rays (kara),—the Creator uproots them, if he is angored, by the single trunk (kara) of an elephant.

919. King Harṣa's royal power, which for some time was reduced by the fear of a struggle for the crown, began then again to expand.

920. At that time the title 'Rāja' could not be applied to anyone; not to him, because he was too exalted, not to the other kings, because they were too petty.

921. The king, who was free from jealousy, introduced into his land elegant fashions, just as the spring [brings flowers] into the forest. Harṣa's innovations.

922. Formerly people in this country had, with the single exception of the king, worn their hair loose, had carried no head-dress and no ear-ornaments.

923-924. In this land where the commander-in-chief Madana, by dressing his hair in braids, and the prime minister Jayānanda, by wearing a short coat of bright colour, had incurred the king's displeasure, there this ruler introduced for general wear a dress which was fit for a king.

✓919. By the 'town of the Darads,' mentioned here and viii. 1153, is, perhaps, meant the modern Gurēz, the chief place of the Upper Kisanganga Valley; comp. Drew, Jumnao, pp. 804 sq. The epithet giriguptā, 'hidden in the mountains,' would well apply to that place. Gurēz lies in a valley whose level ground is nowhere more than about one mile broad; all around rise high mountain ranges.

918. The title S'āhi of the Darad ruler is indicated by L, which fills the lacuna here shown in A. The title Shah has been borne for centuries back by the Darad rulers of Citrāl and Yasin (comp. CUNNINGHAM, Numismatic Chron., Third Ser. ix., p. 281). But whether it is of pre-Muhammadan origin and connected with the royal title of the S'āhis of the Kābul Valley, is doubtful.

919. Read with L prabhavishu for A prabhayato.

922. Read with L niṣkaraṇābharaṇāḥ.

923. Compare regarding Madana, vii. 579; Jayānanda, vii. 275, 364.

Can the change of fashion here referred to have had something to do with the spread of customs from the Muhammadan West?

Harṣa
(A. D. 1089-1101).

925. When some of his ministers had got themselves up in brilliant finery, he, without feeling jealous, got his own female attendants to swing lights (ārātrika) around them.

926. As he was fond in his amusements of the Dākṣiṇātya (Dekkan) fashion, he introduced a coin-type (tauṅka) copied from that of Karṇāṭa.

927. People appeared in his assembly hall with waving palm-leaves, adorned with big forehead-marks of sandal ointment, and wearing splendid long daggers.

928-931. His ladies of restless brows wore long garlands formed by their hair-braids into which were [woven] golden Ketaka-leaf [ornaments]; the pendants which they wore over their forehead-marks made the latter unsteady; they joined the corners of their eyes with their ears by a line drawn with collyrium; into the ends of their locks which were not veiled, were twined golden strings; with the hanging-down train of their lower garments they kissed the ground; their breasts were dressed in jackets which covered [but] half the length of their arms; their smiles seemed to spread [the perfume of] camphor as they moved about; when dressed in man's attire they wore a delusive likeness to the god of love.

932. By addressing their prayers to him, beggars became able to support others, just as the clouds through the aid of the ocean [become] capable of refreshing all beings.

933. By the favours of this liberal king who showered gold about, all bands of singers came to vie with kings.

934. The king, who was the crest-jewel of the learned, adorned men of learning with jewels, and bestowed upon them the privileges of [using] litters, horses, parasols, etc.

935-937. Bilhana, who had left Kaśmīr in the reign of King Kalaśa, had been made by Parmāṇḍi, the lord of Karṇāṭa, his Chief Paṇḍit (vidyāpati), and 925. Regarding the ārātrika ceremony, see note v. 483.

926. CUNNINGHAM, Coins of Med. India, p. 84 (plate v. 22, 23), has described the actual coins to which K. refers here. They are of gold, and bear Harṣa's name. Their type is quite different from that maintained through the whole of the Hindu coinage of Kāśmīr. According to CUNNINGHAM, 'the fact of the coins being made in imitation of those of Karṇāṭa is fully corroborated by the coins of that country.' It may be noted that these coins are extremely rare, while the ordinary copper (or brass) coins of Harṣa are quite common to the present day.

The word tauṅka means here, as well as vii. 152 sq., simply 'coin-type' or 'die,' and does not, as assumed by Cunningham (see l.c.

note 16), designate a coin of 'fine gold'; comp. also vi. 88.

931. The smile is compared to the camphor on account of its brightness.

935-937. The bearing of this interesting passage has been first recognized by Prof. BÜHLER, who has translated and discussed it in the Introduction to his edition of Bilhana's Vīṭramāhadevacarita, pp. 21 sq. The name of the poet had previously been hidden by the erroneous reading Rilhana for Bilhana found in the Calcutta Ed. and Troyer's translation. The available data regarding the life and works of Bilhana have been set forth exhaustively in Chapter i. of Prof. BÜHLER's Introduction; comp. also the notice in Prof. AUFRICHT's Cat. Catal., s. v.

Parmāṇḍi is the well-known surname or when travelling on elephants through the hill-country of Karṇāṭa, his parasol was borne aloft before the king. When he heard that the liberal Harṣa was like a kinsman to true poets, he thought even so great a splendour a deception.

HARṢA
(A.D. 1089-1101).

938. The very numerous palaces of the king shone forth with wonderful splendour, having golden Āmalaka ornaments and buildings which reached to the clouds.

939. In his Nandana grove there were of all trees only the wishing trees (kalpadruma) absent, as he had put them to shame by his liberality.

940. He made the lake called Pampā, which was full of water [and the resort] of various kinds of birds and animals, extend its curved shores to the horizon.

941. Surely, not even Bṛhaspati is able to name clearly all the sciences in which he was versed.

942. Even to this day, if one of the songs which he composed for the voice is heard, tears roll on the eye-lashes even of his omniscients.

943. Ever fond of amusement, he slept for two watches of the day and kept awake at night, when he held his assemblies.

944. He passed his nights in the assembly-hall, which was illuminated by a thousand lamps, attending meetings of learned men, musical performances and dances.

945. When the conversation ceased, there was heard only the rustling sound from the chowing of betel, and that which was caused by the movement of the ladies' locks and the S'aphālī flowers [bound up with them].

946-949. What Bṛhaspati could fully describe the nightly court [held] by this king whose splendour surpassed that of Indra? The canopies were like clouds, the lights like a wall of fire; the golden sticks resembled the lightning and the multitudes of swords were like smoke; lovely ladies took the place of the Apsaras and ministers that of the stars; its scholars were like an assembly of biruḍa of the Chalukya king Vikramāditya-Tribhuvanamalla whose family history and exploits form the subject of Bilhana's above mentioned poem. He reigned at Kalyāṇa in the years 1076-1127 (see l.c. p. 20).

K.'s statement as to the honours paid to Bilhana at Parvāṭi's court, agrees closely with what the poet himself tells us in Vikram. xviii. 101 ("There the lucky poet received from the Chalukya king, the terror of the Colas, the dignity of Chief Poet, distinguished by the grant of a blue parasol and a mast elephant." BÜHLER). Possibly K. knew this very passage; comp. above note vii. 259.

K.'s notice that Bilhana left Kāśmīr during the reign of Kalaśa, is of importance for the poet's biography. With reference to the weighty reasons shown by Prof. BÜHLER, we must assume that the period between 1063-1081 is meant here when Kalaśa was nominally ruler, not the time of his actual rule after his father's death.

The reading of L viniryātām, verse 935, is preferable to A viniryātām; L has also kāle for rāṅge.

938. Regarding the term āmalasāra, comp. note vii. 526.

939. Nandana is the name of Indra's grove. Harṣa might have given this appellation to a pleasure garden.

940. The lake (saras) here referred to is in all probability the lagoon called now Pampa Sar. This lies to the E. of Patan, and extends as far as Gūnd-Ibrūhim (74° 39' long. 34° 10' lat.), and the stream marked Aḍin on the map.

943. Read with L dattāsthānasya.

HAṚṢA
(A.D. 1089-1101).

Ṛṣis and its singers like Gandharvas; it was the fixed meeting-place of Kubera and Yama and the one common pleasure-grove of liberality and terror.

950. At that time the use of gold and silver money (dāmnāra) was plentiful in this land, but that of copper money rare.

951. At that time only the mean Sunna was close-fisted from avarice, though he had become the prefect of police (daṇḍanāyaka), and was exalted above all.

952. His own Maṭhas at Jayavana, Sūryāmūlaka and Vijayēśvara, which were [left] without endowments [for their maintenance], attest his avarice.

953. The royal fortune of Puṭṭa found its proper object in the relief of the sufferings of those who were hungry, sick, helpless, poor or otherwise [distressed].

954. Caṇṇaka spent every year seven days at Nandikēśetra and turned there to pious use the wealth he had acquired during the whole time [intervening between his visits].

955. The king, who completely relieved the distress of his supplicants, profusely provided Brahmans with skins of black antelopes, cows with calves, and other presents.

956. Vasantalekhā, the king's wife, who belonged to the S'āhi family, founded Maṭhas and Agrahāras in the City and at the holy Tripurēśvara.

957. Thus it seemed as if in some degree the flame of S'aiva-devotion was rising [at his court], yet one cannot call his reign one of noble transactions.

958. When the new ministers had gradually attained power, they caused delusions in the king's mind from spite against his former advisers.

959. The peacock, whose feet are attacked by leprosy, runs and catches the many-footed snake; the sun, which has a thousand feet (rays), is guided step by

950. The fact underlying this poetical extravagant statement is that Haṛṣa is the only later Kaśmir king of whom authentic gold and silver pieces have hitherto been found; comp. CUNNINGHAM, Coins of Med. India, pp. 80 sq. and plate v. 21-23, also above note vii. 926.

Of copper and brass coins Haṛṣa appears to have struck a very large quantity, these pieces being far more commonly met with in the Bāzār's nowadays than those of any other Kaśmir ruler. His gold and silver coins are, on the contrary, extremely rare.

951. The term daṇḍanāyaka is found only in the vii. Book as the official designation of Sunna. Its literal meaning is 'prefect of punishments.' The term, as well as sarva-daṇḍanāyaka, is found in Nepāl and Canarese inscriptions; see Ind. Ant., viii. p. 19 sq.; ix. p. 167; x. p. 129.

952. Sūryāmūlaka is only here mentioned. Regarding Jayavana, see above, vii. 607.

954. Caṇṇaka, repeatedly mentioned in the subsequent narrative (vii. 1117, 1177, 1586, 1628) as a chief official of Haṛṣa, cannot be anyone else but Kālhaṇa's father, who in the colophons bears the title prabhu, 'lord.' Any doubt on this point is removed by the evident care shown by K. in his account of Haṛṣa's end to justify Caṇṇaka's conduct in those critical circumstances; comp. vii. 1586 sqq. From viii. 2365 it might be concluded that Caṇṇaka had ultimately retired to Nandikēśetra, i.e. the Tirtha of Śhīteśvara; comp. regarding the latter, notes i. 36 and i. 107.

955. The skin of the black antelope is required at religious ceremonies for the seating of the Purohita.

956. Regarding the Tirtha of Tripurēśvara, see note v. 46.

step by the Thighless (the Dawn). It is the amusement of fate that the strong are deceived by the weak, and that those who hold all affairs in their hands are confused by those without power.

960. [Thus it came to pass] that the lord of the people, who was eminent by the knowledge of all sciences, had his mind perverted, even by foolish ministers.

961. In order to revenge the enmity shewn by his deceased father, he plundered the Maṭha and other [endowments of the latter] which bore the name of Rājadhūnī.

962. In his liberality he squandered right and left the riches which his greedy [father] had accumulated, and called him by the name of ' Pāpasena ' (' he whose army was one of villains ').

963. Confused in his senses, vorily the king placed three hundred and sixty women of doubtful character in his seraglio.

964. He took there continually whatever women [he could get]; only women of the Domba and Chudala class he excluded.

965. In the meantime Bhuvanarāja, secretly instigated by the foot-soldiers garrisoning the castle (koṭapadāṭi), was again forming designs to seize Lohara.

966. When on reaching Darpiṭapura he heard that Kandarpa, the lord of the Gate, had marched out to fight him, he again disappeared.

967. About this time also King Saṁgrāmopālu, the proud lord of Rājapuri, became, for some reason, disaffected.

Expedition against Rājapuri.

968. While Kandarpa was engaged in bringing the discontented soldiers garrisoning the castle (koṭabhṛtya) under control, the king in his anger sent the prefect of police (Sunna) against Rājapuri.

969. Marching with great forces by the route of Lohara, he unwisely delayed for one and a half months on the outskirts of the castle [of Lohara].

970. Fearing the [heat of the] approaching Āṣāḍha month, as well as the ardeur of the enemy, he did not show any determination [to start] on the expedition.

961. The Maṭhas and other buildings which Kalāśa began to erect at Jayavana, vii. 307 sq., might be meant here.

965. The context clearly requires here the emendation of loharā° for A. loharā° and of praryamāno for pūryamāno; comp. regarding Bhuvanarāja, vii. 252 sqq., 581. The identical clerical error has occurred in the name Lohara viii. 914; comp. note v. 51. [Reference to L. is impossible for our passage, as the leaf of the MS. containing vii. 953-978 has not come into my hands.]

The 'soldiers garrisoning the castle' (koṭapadāṭi or koṭabhṛtya) are repeatedly mentioned in connection with Lohara: see viii. 10, 1796, 2029. They correspond to the killahdār troops kept up in small detachments until a few years ago for the garrisoning of the numerous small forts in the hill-regions around Kāśmīr; see DEEW, Jummoo, p. 95. These troops were permanently settled in particular forts, and generally hold land in their neighbourhood.

966. The position of Darpiṭapura is unknown; comp. note iv. 183.

970. The summer heat in the valleys immediately to the S. of Lohara is considerable, and bad fevers prevail; see viii. 1873, and Note E, iv. 177, § 10.

PARSA
A.D. 1089-1101).

HARSA
(A.D. 1089-1101).

971. Thereupon the king in his want of discrimination addressed his reproaches to Kandarpa, who was keeping inactive.

972. Vexed by these reproaches, the latter took a vow that he would fast till he had conquered Rājapuri, and then set out, though he had no supplies.

973. On the sixth day which Kandarpa passed fasting in the depth of the mountains, Rājapuri was at [a distance of] more than one Yojana.

974. Not stopped by the enemy's forces, and shaking off the opponents' weapons, he entered [Rājapuri], just as a lion [enters] the forest, treading down the plantain twigs.

975. From the forces of the prefect of police only one leader followed him, Kularāja, a descendant of the family of Buddharāja.

976. When he fell in the outer court of [the palace of] Rājapuri, after having slain a host of opponents, the enemy thought from his white parasol that Kandarpa was killed.

aptitude of Rājapuri.

977. But at midday the mighty Kandarpa himself penetrated into the royal palace of Rājapuri with twenty or thirty soldiers.

978. Three hundred of his foot stopped before Rājapuri thirty thousand of the enemy's soldiers who would not turn to flight.

979. In that battle there fell two hundred of the Kāśmīriyas, but of the Khaṣas, four hundred covered the ground.

980. When the enemy had been routed, Death had his kitchen in the numberless pyres [extending] far away which were cremating the dead of the battle.

981. Thus that brave man appeased his master's reproach, which was [troubling him like] a Vetāla, by the flesh and blood offered with violence on the deadly field of battle.

982. When only one watch of the day remained, the enemy rallied once more, and exasperated by their defeat came to attack Kandarpa.

983. Thereupon he threw into the mêlée burning arrows smeared over with vegetable oil, struck by which the enemies caught fire.

984. Believing that he knew [the use of] the weapon of fire (āgneya astra), they became frightened and fled in bewilderment, cursing their return.

971. Emend °pātratān with Durgāpr. for A °mātratān.

973. The distance from Lohara (Loh'rin) to Rājapuri, i.e. the town of Rajauri, via Sūran and Thāna, may be estimated at four marches. Kandarpa took, perhaps, a more difficult track across the mountains.

976. For Buddharāja, see vii. 283.

979. Read adhyakṣerata with L.

980. The correct text is restored by L hatān āśid rāṇe.

981. Read with L rabhasārpitān.

983. L correctly utīaptān, oṣadhi°, prāj-vaṇa dvigāḥ.

984. For the āgneyāstra repeatedly referred to in the Epics, see Dowson. Mythology, p. 6.

985. Intrepidity, presence of mind, strength, skilful use of contrivances and calmness do not even in great dangers abandon great men's minds, which are armed with firmness.

986. After re-entering the palace, when the sun was sinking, he saw the outer court (bāhyālī) again occupied by large forces.

987. As he was preparing to go out to fight, he heard that the prefect of police had arrived, whose soldiers had hidden themselves from fright on seeing the terrible battle-field.

988. Some by seeing their own men killed become more spirited in battle, others tremble on seeing killed enemies. Who knows the difference between mortals?

989. Then he (Kandarpa) went out and brought him in who had strayed into the danger, just as a crow when omnubating the wild goose dives into the ocean.

990. Who else with only his personal fortitude would invade an enemy's country in which the subjects are faithful, which has a large army, is united, and possessed of a full treasury?

991. Kandarpa then took tribute from the lord of Īḥjapuri, who paid homage, and returned within a single month to his own country.

992. That the king honoured him by going to meet him, and by other marks of respect, caused violent head-aches to the prefect of police and to others.

993-995. The hard-hearted Ananda, who, when acting as administrator (?) at Parīhāsapura, had made his name in the priest corporation (parṣad) called Vātayāṇḍa, had been put by the king, upon the advice of councillors who were won over by large bribes, in charge of the Pādāgra and other [offices] after ousting Vāmana. He was at that time aspiring to the office of lord of the Gate, and was greatly supported by the ministers who were Kandarpa's enemies.

988. Read with L. kecid, parakīyaś.

990. Read with L. ryaḥśasainyam.

991. L. rightly svāh bhuvan.

993-995. It is not certain what is meant by the expression pārīpātyaś kurran. From the reference made to the corporation of priests at Parīhāsapura, it might be concluded that Ananda had something to do with the administration of the property of this corporation, and of the shrine to which the latter was attached. In note ii. 132 it has been shown that by parṣad is designated a corporation of Purohitas which receives jointly the revenue of a temple or pilgrimage-place.

In all modern corporations of this kind I have come across in Kāśmīr and the Panjāb, there is a kind of manager usually called Dārāgha, who realizes the income of the corporation from grants, pilgrims' donations, etc., and distributes it among the individual Purohita families. This manager takes for himself a respectable share of the revenue, and at the greater Tirthas is a person of considerable influence and means. He holds his office generally by inheritance, but care is taken that he should not be a Purohita himself or connected with any of the local Purohita families. Ananda may have been an administrator of this sort at one of the temples at Parīhāsapura; comp. iv. 191 sqq. and Note P. Ananda himself is called Vātayāṇḍa in vii. 1177.

Regarding the term pādāgra, see note vii. 571.

ILARSA
(A.D. 1089-1101).
Kandarpa at Lohara.

996. At his instigation the king sent Kandarpa to guard Lohara, where the enemies [of the king] were in rebellion, after bestowing on him the governorship.

997. By this trick those wicked ministers, who desired their own rise, removed that man of resource and courage from the foolish king.

998. A foolish and ignorant king devoid of judgment soon finds his end, when at the instigation of rogues he sends abroad the eloquent [adviser], because he might make a good envoy; abandons the wise one, because his words might cause ostrangement from relatives; and forsakes the strong one, because he might usurp the throne.

999. The attachment to Kandarpa, though much cherished, disappeared gradually from the king's heart when he did not see him, just as sand [passos] from one's fist.

1000. "Kandarpa has taken to himself Utkarṣa's son, and plans to make him lord of Lohara." Thus spoke the ministers to the king.

1001. The king agreed with this, and immediately sent Puṭṭa and a Ṭukku, Asidhura by name, with a force to kill that relative.

1002-1003. Kandarpa, who had learned of that scheme through a mis-delivery of letters, felt after their arrival for a short time disheartened and apprehensive. Then Asidhura tried to seize him, as he was amusing himself at dice, by [coming] before him as if he were his servant, and rubbing his hand.

1004. Thereupon he (Kandarpa) drew out his hand and rubbed the hand of the other with the fore-joint of his thumb [so strongly] that he lost his skin just like a wetted bird.

1005. In his indignation he reproached the king for his want of judgment, and himself for his attachment to the king, and thus addressed Puṭṭu :

1006. "The king, whose mind is ruled [by others], should send my family [to me]. Then I shall deliver the castle and go abroad."

1007. When he had been joined by his relatives, whom they brought and handed over to him, the minister left his post and proceeded to Vārāṇasī.

1008. By slaying one chief and appointing another, he freed the Kāśmīrians from the tax on S'rāddhas at Gayā.

996. The office of governor (maṇḍaleśvara) is mentioned in connection with Lohara, viii. 1228, 1814, 2029. The title is very frequently given in the vii. Book to Ananda; see vii. 1178, 1227, 1281, etc. The latter, as governor, seems to have held charge of Kāśmīr proper.

998. Read śura with L.

1000. The reading of L utkarṣaputram is preferable to that of A (°putrāṇ), because the following verso speaks only of one relative of Harṣa.

1002. Read with L bhūḍ yadā.

1004. L nistavakṣaṇ as emended.

1008. Compare note vi. 254.

1009. He also, by killing a captain of robbers together with his men on a dangerous road, made the eastern region free from enemies for travellers.

1010. He removed and destroyed a terrible tiger at Taraga, and embellished the eastern region with Mañhas devoted to pious uses.

1011. The evil counsellors, who had obtained their aim by his expatriation, then injured the undertakings of the king by their mutual jealousy.

1012. Where had counsellors, deeply intoxicated by over-indulgence and perverted in their minds by unrestrained jealousy, rush at each other like bucks which wish to relieve their itching horns, in a few days the king comes totally to grief like a post between [them].

1013. As time went on, Dhammaṭṭa, Tancanga's son, who was lusting for the throne, formed a treacherous design to kill the king.

1014-1015. He instigated Jayarāja to kill the king, after having long reflected in his crooked mind: "The reproach of treason will fall upon him, while I shall succeed to the throne, as he is unfitted by his descent from a courtesan."

1016. He (Jayarāja) engaged for the king's murder some desperadoes from the village of Bilāva, and drew two or three women from the [king's] seraglio into the plot.

1017. When this plan was approaching execution, the king by chance despatched Dhammaṭṭa as envoy to Rajapuri, with great honours.

1018. While he was stopping at the house of Sahasramahāyāla [to which he had gone] for the sake of an auspicious day, Jayarāja, who apprehended failure, came to visit him.

1019. While they were in the hall secretly conferring together about this matter, a servant of Prayāga was listening, hidden behind the wall.

1020. He gave information of the affair to Prayāga, upon whose report the king prohibited Dhammaṭṭa from leaving.

1021. The king, being afraid of destroying his own kin, was slow in taking counter-measures, and only guarded his own person, daily living in terror.

1022. Jayarāja, however, on seeing that he had failed [in his design], summoned to himself two brave Damaras from Samālā, called Pāga and Pāja.

1023. When the king heard from [Jayarāja's] own servants, who betrayed

PARSA
(A.D. 1080-1101).

Dhammaṭṭa's conspiracy

1009. Read with L. sūrasāyān and adhva- nānānām.

1014-1015. Read with A. L. veṣṇa; comp.
regarding Kaṣṇā, Jayarāja's mother, vii. 725, 877.

1016. Bilāva, only here mentioned, is probably the present village of Bilim, situated in the Chirāṭh Pargana, circ. 74° 55' long. 33° 51'
lat. ('Belloh' on map).

1018. If the auspicious time for the con-mentment of a journey astrologically falls earlier than the time by which the person concerned finds it convenient to start, he may pro forma leave his own residence and proceed to the house of a friend or other conveniently situated building in the same place.

He can then begin his real journey whenever convenient. This innocent ruse is still cannonically practised by Kāśmīrī Brahmins.

1022. L. gives the first name as Nāga.

HARSA
(A.D. 1088-1101).

and deserted him, that he was preparing to leave, he placed by night guards in all directions.

1024. In the morning Tanvaṅga's son (Dhammaṭa), giving out as a pretext that he was ready for his journey, foolishly took Jayarāja to the four-pillared pavilion (catusṭha) to [attend at the king's] worship.

1025. Then, as the king kept himself locked up in his apartments, he (Jayarāja) went with Dhammaṭa and his nephew into the assembly hall.

1026. Thereupon Prayāga, by the king's orders, placed guards outside, and told Dhammaṭa, in a low voice, to seize Jayarāja.

1027-1029. To the king, who, by the favour of fate, showed a clear intellect on frequent occasions, this plan had appeared the best. He thought: "Jayarāja, relying on Dhammaṭa, will certainly give up his sword. Dhammaṭa must conclude from that order that he has not been found out. If the two fight, and one or both fall, it is our advantage, or in case they should openly show their being in league, even the people will approve of their execution."

1030. Thereupon Tanvaṅga's son, feeling assured that the king had certainly not found him out, went up to Jayarāja and boldly spoke to him:

1031. "The king is dissatisfied with you. If you are indeed free from guilt, at once give up your sword to show your innocence."

Jayarāja's execution
(A.D. 1096).

1032. He (Jayarāja), who was skilled with the sword and bow, gave up his sword as if [he had been] a common person, being deluded by fate or infatuated by his confidence in him (Dhammaṭa).

1033. Disgusted at the sight of his weakness, Ṭulla, the son of Ajjaka and grandson of Tanvaṅga, spoke to him these harsh words:

1034-1035. "O you wretch, not of Kaṇṇyā by King Kalaśa were you begotten. Your father was surely some coward, whoever he [may have been]." When thus addressed by that [prince], who knew no yielding in resolute conduct, he became like one over whom cold water had been poured in his sleep.

1036. When he was asked to give an account of his treason, he showed fortitude, and, though subjected to tortures, named only himself as concerned in it, but not Dhammaṭa.

1037. As poisoned food failed [to kill him], owing to the strength of a spell against poison [which he possessed], he was put to death at night by a rope drawn round his neck.

1038. After the chamberlain Jayyaka had cut off the head, his body was 1024. For catusṭha comp. note on catusṭhikā, vii. 1550.

1025. L. rightly sthitasyāstihāna°. The nephew is Ṭulla (see vii. 1033), the son of Tanvaṅga's second son Ajjaka.

1029. Read prājñasya with L.

1033. The name Bhaṭṭāraṇaḍṇalā survives in that of the Brārinambal, a lagoon fed by the Mār (Mahāsarit) and situated between the south-eastern quarters of Srinagar in thrown into the water of the Bhaṭṭāraṇaḍvalā, and became food for the fishes.

IIARṢA
(A.D. 1080-1101).

1039. After killing him in the month Bhādrapada of the year [of the Lankika era four thousand one hundred] seventy-one (A.D. 1095), the king, whose mind was deep, planned also the murder of Dhammaṭa.

1040. In order to execute this, he secretly gave orders to a valiant Thakkura from Lohara, called Kalaśarāja, the best of his soldiers.

1041. "When Prayāga sends a messenger to you, you carry this out." This he said to him, showing him many marks of kindness.

1042. Prayāga, from fear of failure, did not despatch that messenger, but spoke to the angry king: "Let this be done after holding council."

1043. When thereupon the king was holding a council, after calling the five chief ministers, Viṃśana locked the door, and, barring it with his own body, said:

1044. "If that [deed] is accomplished, before this resolution and the ministers here go out, then success cannot fail."

1045. Then Prayāga, by the king's order, despatched a messenger, and the murderer (likṣṇa) Kalaśarāja came up along with his two sons.

1046. At that time the son of Yanuvāga (Dhannuṇṇa) was with two or three attendants inside the palace, spanning his falcon. Dhammaṭa murder 1047. While he was expressing his fear at seeing Kalaśarāja in front and his sons behind [himself], his own attendants deserted him.

1048-1049. Just as he was getting up from his seat and putting his hand on his sword to strike at Kalaśarāja, who called out: "O Dhammaṭa, can you draw your sword?"—he received strokes from him in front and from his sons behind, and was dead in a short time.

1050. In his agony he struck the elder son of Kalaśarāja, but strangely enough wounded him but slightly on account of his bad weapon.

1051. By ill-luck the sword of this valiant [prince] had got broken just in those days. Hence [it came that] he was badly armed.

1052. After killing him they threw him on the back, as hunters [throw down] a bird, and by the king's order the *S'vapāka*s left him there as food for the dogs.

1053. The king himself came into the court-yard and protected Raḥaṇa and Salhaṇa, the grandsons of Yanuvāga, who had laid down their swords.

front of Dilāwor Khān's Bāgh. [Brāri is an obl. case of brār, the Kā. derivative of bhaṭṭāraka. Kā. nambai < Skr. naḍvalā is a term commonly applied to lagoons and marshes.]

1042. It clears the text by reading tam dūtam aprahīṇvan and kupitam.

1048. Read with L. śaknoṣi dhammaṭa and tam (for A. tu).

हार्षा
(A.D. 1099-1101).

1054-1055. Tulla and others who were preparing for an attack and were eagerly wishing to fight, were artfully deceived by the cunning Udayasimha, who came and said: "You are my sons." Relying on him as a man of honour, and wishing [to save their] life, they laid down their arms.

1056. Accepting his advice that they should clear themselves by going before the king, they took their way towards the royal palace.

1057. Then Tulla's parasol-bearer, who from his childhood had been brought up on the food-remnants from the house of Tanvaṅga's son, spoke to him with a laugh:

1058. "O grandson of Tanvaṅga, you have forgotten what you said before to Jayarāja: 'O you wretch, not of Kṛṣṇā, etc.'"

1059. "Just such a critical moment has presented itself for you. O fool, why do you cling to weakness when it is the time for firm resolution?"

1060. "Surely, therefore, you were begotten by my father who fed on food-remnants; I, on the contrary, by your father who enjoyed renown."

1061. After saying this he put himself fighting under the splashing shower of the swords, and fell while nobly washing off, as it were, the impurity of his origin.

1062. While Tulla and the others were resolving to go before the king, they were [arrested and] thrown into prison by the king's men.

1063. Intoxicated by the excess of youth, like trees in the spring, they appeared to the king deserving to be spared from compassion.

1064. But a wicked Takka, Bimbīya by name, prevailed upon the king to have them executed, and strangled them at night.

Execution of Tanvaṅga's grandsons.

1065. Tulla, Vijayarāja, Bulla and Gulla, these four grandsons of Tanvaṅga, rolled in death at the place of execution.

1066. The beauty which remained with them even in death is described to this day by those of great age, who let flow showers of tears while relating [their story].

1067. Their young teeth, which, by the continued use of betel [had become red], fell out and made the place of execution appear for a long time as if a necklace of rubies had been scattered.

1068. The king, uprooting his own family, put to death by secret execution also Domba, the elder of the two sons of Utkarṣa, whom he had [himself] brought up.

1054. A gives the name as Udayasimha, L as Udayasimha; the first form is found in both MSS. vii. 581, the latter vii. 1299.

1056. Read with L samākārya, for A samāgārya.

1058. Compare vii. 1034.

1060. L °pusṭinā gives a better sense than A °muṣṭinā.

1061. A °jalajjalām has probably to be emended with Durgapr. in °jalajjalām; L °jalajjalām.

1064. For A samprakeya read with L samprerya.

1068. In Domba we have an example of an opprobrious name given for the superstitious reasons fully explained in Major 1069. He also destroyed Jayamalla, the son of Tijayamalla, looking upon the child which had displayed brightness, as [if it were] a spark of fire.

1070. The kings whom fate ruins, clear their kingdom from rivals by killing their relatives who would preserve it, [with the result] that some one [else] enjoys it alone.

1071. The foolish Aśvattha tree, in order to make the well-grown comb of honey in the dense thicket of its numerous high branches easy to approach and seize by any lucky person, by fate's instigation takes to shaking spontaneously, and puts the bees which guard that [honey] well out of the way by killing them with the blows of its [falling] leaves.

1072. The king, whose mind was perverted by the most sinful perfidies against his relatives, came then to be exploited by rogues [to such an extent] as would be incredible even of simpletons.

1073. Kṛṣṇa, the son of Umanā, knowing that he hated his father, urged him on to remove the gold on the parasol which was placed over the [shrine of S'iva] Kalaśeśa.

1074. The pious Prayāga cunningly stopped this plan of his, just as a firm mahaut [stops] the wish of the run-away elephant to throw himself over a precipice.

1075-1076. The wretch Laṣṭadhara, Haladhara's grandson, who was as clever in insinuating himself always with kings of depraved conduct (naṣṭareṣṭānām) as a Vetāla in getting into [motionless] corpses, spoke thus once in secret to the king, in the hope of gratifying him :

1077. "Let the villages, the gold, and other [property] bestowed upon the [temple of S'iva] Kalaśeśvara be taken away. With the stones of that temple I shall build you a bridge over the Vitasṭā."

1078. "I paint a picture on the sky; with lotus-threads I weave a dress; I procure the gold seen in dreams; I build a wall with snow." A king of obtuse mind takes verily even such and similar sayings for truths. That [king] who in bewilderment has nothing to say to such things, has no maturity [of mind], and can only be deceived.

1079. But Prayāga dissuaded his lord also from this intention, just as the careful attendant [dissuades] a sick person from demanding unwholesome food.

TEMPLE'S Proper names of Panjābis, p. 22 sqq.; comp. below note viii. 17. Such names are still common throughout the whole of India, and are usually given to children born after the death of their older predecessors.

1071. The Aśvattha (Ficus religiosa L.), is called caladala because its leaves are ever dropping; comp. Amarakośa, ii. 4, 20.

1073. Regarding the gilt parasol of the Kalaśeśa temple, see vii. 528 sqq.

1077-1078. The passage shows that the building of stone bridges over greater rivers was unknown in Kāśmīr during Hindu times; comp. note iii. 354.

IIASA
(A.D. 1089-1101)

HAṘṢA
(A.D. 1080-1101).

Spoilation of Bhīmakeśava temple.

1080. Then Loṣṭadhara, once at a time of jesting, asked the king to set a god free from his captivity.

1081. On the king asking what [he meant by] this, he thus spoke to him, with a smile : "There was once at the town of Uḍabhāṇḍu the S'āhi called Bhīma."

1082. "The Bhīmakeśava [temple], which he founded, was on account of a quarrel among the members of the Purohita corporation (pāriṣadya) locked up for a long time in the reign of Kalaśadeva."

1083. "When, after settling the quarrel, they opened the door [of the temple] they noticed that the silver armour [of the god's imago] had been stolen by thieves."

1084. "From fear of such [theft], evidently, they have kept that [image] again locked up from that time to the present day, together with the treasures and [sacrificial] apparatus belonging to it."

1085. "Let, therefore, the treasures of this [shrine], which cause the fear of theft, be taken away. Let that [imago], too, freed from its captivity, enjoy its treats of flowers, lights and other [offerings]."

1086. Thus urged on by him, the king acted in that way, and found thereupon a treasury full of jewels, gold and other [valuables].

1087. And he reflected upon what riches there might be in other wealthy temples, when there was such wealth in this deserted shrine.

1088. The members of the local Purohita corporation then induced the king by a solemn fast (prāya) to grant [them] in compensation exemption from the forced carriage of loads (rūḍhabhāroḍhī).

1089. As he was addicted to extravagant expenditure upon various corps of his army, his thoughts in consequence of the above assumption became in time firmly fixed upon the spolioation of temples.

1090. Then the greedy-minded [king] plundered from all temples the wonderful treasures which former kings had bestowed there.

1091. In order to get hold of the statues of gods, too, when the treasures [of the temples] had been carried off, he appointed Udayarāja 'prefect for the overthrow of divine images' (devotpāṭananāyaka).

1081. Regarding Bhīma S'āhi, and the temple erected by him, compare note vi. 178. For Uḍabhāṇḍapura (Waihand, Und), see Note J, v. 152-155.

L fills the lacuna in this verse by reading bhīmābhīḍhaḥ śāhī.

1082. The emendation pāriṣadyānām is confirmed by L. For the term pāriṣadya, comp. note ii. 132.

1087. Read with L vasu for A vastu.

1088. The term rūḍhabhāroḍhī, corresponding to the modern Bāgār, has been explained in note v. 174.

The context requires the emendation kṛta-prāyaḥ for kṛtaprāyaḥ; comp. the expressions kṛtaprāya and kṛtaprāyopaveśa in vi. 25; vii. 177, 1088; viii. 668, 811.

1089. Read with L nānāsenānga°.

1091. Compare with the following account of Haṛṣa's iconoclasm the reference made 1092. In order to defile the statues of gods he had excrements and urine poured over their faces by naked mendicants whose noses, feet and hands had rotted away.

1093. Divine images made of gold, silver, and other [materials] rolled about even on the roads, which were covered with night soil, as [if they were] logs of wood.

1094. Crippled naked mendicants and the like covered the images of the gods, which were dragged along by ropes round their ankles, with spittings instead of flowers.

1095. There was not one temple in a village, town or in the City which was not despoiled of its images by that Taruṣka, King Harṣa.

1096. Only two chief divine images were respected by him, the illustrious Raṇasrāmanī in the City, and Mārtāṇḍa [among the images] in townships.

1097-1098. Among colossal images, two statues of Buddha were saved through requests addressed by chance to the king at a time when he was free with his favours, namely the one at Parihāsapura by the singer Kanuka, who was born there, and the other in the City by the Ś'rāmṇa Kuśinśrī.

1099. Those who are anxious to amass fortunes do not stop from evil actions, though in this world they may have reached riches which are a wonder for all. Thus the elephant, though he is the pleasure-seat of the [lotus-born goddess] Lakṣmī, yet somehow falls into the sin of destroying the lotus-bank [in his desire] to obtain the lotus-flowers.

1100-1101. O shame! Though he possessed his grandfather's and father's treasures and those which Uḥarṣa at the commencement of his reign had brought from Lohana, and though he had confiscated from the temples the riches [bestowed] by former kings, yet he endeavoured to secure [more] wealth by oppressing the householders.

1102. Merely upon his order the bad ministers then appointed numerous officers, who took their designation from frequent new imposts.

vii. 1344 to the destruction of the silver image of Parihāsakeśvara. This, however, occurred only in the year preceding Harṣa's death, and at a time when he must have been reduced to great financial straits by Uccala's rebellion.

For a doubtful reference to the 'devatpā-tanāyaka,' see note vii. 1541.

1093. For gaṇḍāli, see note vii. 356.

1094. Liṅgā nagnāṅga.

1095. Harṣa, on account of his procedure against sacred images, may well be called a Taruṣka, i.e. a Muhammadan. But may not the use of this epithet, along with the fact of his iconoclasm, be taken as an indication of Harṣa's leanings towards Muhammadanism? Compare vii. 922 seq., 1140.

1096. For the temples of Raṇasrāmanī and Mārtāṇḍa, see notes iii. 453; iv. 192.

Read with Liṅgā nagnāṅga.

1097-1098. The great Buddha statue at Parihāsapura is certainly the one which King Indrāditya erected in the Rājavihāra; see note iv. 200. The statue in the City is evidently identical with the Bṛhadbuddha mentioned as still standing in Ś'rīnagara in the time of Susāta; see viii. 1184.

Harṣa
(A.D. 1089-1101).

Desecration of divine images.

Harṣa's exaction

Harṣa
(A.D. 1088-1101).

1103-1104. Shamo, shamo, when royal servants know nothing but time-serving, [It was due to this] that even the minister Umuraku, though a respectable man, old as he was, accepted upon the king's order the office of 'prefect of property' (nṛthanāyaka) [and with it] the function of plundering the property of all temples and villages.

1105-1106. Sahelaka, of the Purohita corporation (pārṣada) at the temple of Samarasvāmīn, who as the adviser of Vijayamalla had been hateful to the king, obtained the position of 'prefect of property' by securing a doubled revenue, and having [once] obtained access to the king, became in time Mahattama.

1107. What more [need be said]? As he was seizing the property of all by all [sorts of] 'prefects' (nāyaka), he appointed also a 'prefect of night soil' to raise revenue.

1108. Owing to his senselessness (jāḍya), which was only hidden by the appellation [given to him] 'he who is pregnant with riches' (śrīgarbha), the emphy of those treasures (kośa) corresponded to their manner of acquisition.

[1109-1114. General description of the frivolous pastimes of kings, and how they fall under the power of flattering courtiers.]

1115. Whatever folly of kings has thus been noticed in passing, all this becomes insignificant by the side of Harṣadēva's senselessness.

1116. To one named Bhīmanāyaka, who could play charming music, he gave, when pleased by his performance on a drum, an elephant together with a female elephant.

1117. On this account, Kanaka, a younger brother of Cunpaka, became [Harṣa's] own pupil in singing, and exerted himself with much trouble in practising songs.

1118. To compensate him for his trouble he gave him a lakh of money (dhinnāra) in gold, without flinching.

1106. Regarding the title mahattama, see note vii. 488.

1107. The important part which the night soil of the city plays in Kāśmīr horticulture, has been referred to in note vii. 39.

1108. The meaning of the first half of this verse is not quite certain. By śrīgarbha an epithet of Harṣa seems to be alluded to; comp. vii. 1424, and Kṣemagupta's appellation Kaṅkaṣavarṣa, vi. 301. Perhaps a pun is intended upon the word kośa, which might also be taken in the sense of 'calyx of the lotus.' The words of the first half verse might be interpreted also as referring to the lotus. (The lotus, on account of its growth in the water, jala, is often credited with the quality of being jāḍa, 'dull'; comp. e.g. iv. 110; vi. 317; also vii. 1379; viii. 2479.)

1115. The recollection of Harṣa's mad proceedings still lives in the Kāśmīr phrase: Pi kyako, Harṣa dēva hyu, 'Why, he is like Harṣa-deva!' It is applied to persons who commit foolish and extravagant acts.

1117. In the absence of any contradictory evidence we must assume that this Kanaka, brother of Cunpaka, whom Harṣa rewarded so magnificently for taking singing lessons from him, was Kalhana's own uncle. The high position of the family would explain in some way the extravagant present.

Regarding the probable value of the sum indicated, compare Note H (iv. 495).

1119. When he saw a picture of Candulā, the beautiful wife of Parmāṇḍi, the lord of Karṇāṭa, he was struck by the god of love.

1120. Low-natured parasites urge on senseless princes by continual incitements to ridiculous jealousy, as [if they were] dogs.

1121. Having his heart turned by the parasites, he shamelessly vowed before his court to obtain Candulā and to overthrow Parmāṇḍi.

1122. As he had taken a vow not to use unboiled camphor [until then], wandering poets thus ridiculed while pretending to praise him :

1123. "From speech and dress you are recognizable as a wanderer from the Dekkan. From the scent, too, we know that you have a ball of camphor in your hand. If it is boiled, then go and hand it as an offering to King Harṣa; if not, keep it, because such is found at present in yonder coconut tree."

1124. "The king of brilliant lustre has commenced the showing of Palasa until he has slain the lord of Karṇāṭa; until he has subverted Candulā; until he has effected his entry into the town of Kalyāṇa; until he has seen the Pinnatā; until he has satisfied his curiosity about the great treasures [hidden] in the ground of the king's park."

1125. The wretch Madana, the commander-in-chief, pleased the king by accepting the post of chamberlain to that [queen] in effigy.

1126. To provide her with dresses and ornaments, and to appease her jealousy, he drew from the king regularly an appportionate allowance for her.

1127. In this story Madana's roguery and shamelessness and the king's foolishness and caprice became manifest, like [gold] on the touch-stone.

1128. Other parasites plundered him by showing him an old woman and saying: "There, we have brought you your mother Bappikā from heaven."

1129. Others brought slave girls before him and said they were goddesses. He worshipped them, and abandoning his exalted position and wealth was laughed at by the people.

1119. For Parmāṇḍi, i.e. Vikramāditya of Kalyāṇa, see note vii. 1135 sqq. His wedding with Candradevī or Candakalā, the daughter of the Ś'ihara prince of Karṇāṭa, is described in the vi. and viii. Cantos of the Vikramādikāvyavivṛita. Bīḥana gives a lengthy account of the charms of the princess whom the king is said to have won in a Svayamvara; comp. Prof. Bühler's Introduction, pp. 38 sqq.

✓ 1122. Camphor is prepared as a crystalline substance, deposited on cooling, from a decoction made from chips of certain kinds of wood; comp. Warr, Economic Prod., ii. p. 84.

'Unboiled camphor' is, therefore, a nonentity. Harṣa's vow is as ludicrous as his boast to invade Karṇāṭa.

1124. Kalyāṇa, the old capital of the Western Chalukyas, is identical with the modern town of that name in the Bidar district of Bahārabad.

Pinnatā (i. Pinnatā) may be a river, as suggested in N.P.W., s.v. The name seems otherwise unknown.

Palasa is given in the Rājamighaṇṭu as the name of a kind of camphor; see P.W., s.v.

1128. L. gives the correct form of the name as amended in Ed.; see vii. 319.

HARṢA
(A.D. 1080-1101).

HARṢA'S LOVE FOR Candulā.

HAṆṢA
(A D. 1080-1101).

1130. These [slave girls], instructed by the parasites, who taught them [to give] counsels etc. [pretended to have been obtained] from conversations with the gods, confused his mind.

1131. Some among these [slave girls] showed themselves eager for amorous intercourse at those occasions, and the king forsook his good fortune by touching them with his own body.

1132. As he was anxious to live for a very long time, they granted him, when in his foolishness he asked for a long life, hundreds of years to live.

1133. When he desired to give magic perfection to his body (pinḍasiddhi), some Domba made him swallow a drink which, he pretended, was an elixir having that power.

1134. What object is there in relating the other foolish acts of this [king], who at the bidding of his parasites gave away portions of his life just as [if it were] a procurable property?

1135. What respectable man could relate the other even more shameful practices of his which he followed to obtain strength and beauty?

1136. Being of small intellect, he was thus for many a year thrown into absolute blindness by his own senselessness and the wickedness of evil advisers.

1137-1138. As there are at present persons of little faith whose minds are swayed by doubts in regard to the miraculous deeds of Meghavāhana and other [ancient kings], so there will be surely in time people who will not believe these astonishing misdeeds which I relate.

1139. Afflicted with want of wisdom as he thus was, in a kingdom full of deceit, yet he was, while he lived, never at the mercy of enemies watching for weak points.

1140-1141. That he was never shot at with an arrow and killed, or wounded by one or the other enemy when at night he was standing upright in the illuminated hall, and teaching in person the dancing-girls how to act,—that must be due to [there having been] a balance of the life-period [allotted to him], or to the sinfulness of his subjects.

1142. Then there occurred somehow serious misconduct among the women of his seraglio, which foreboded the fall of the king, who himself was the embodiment of all that is immoral.

1130. I translate according to L tā vyomacarasaṁlāpa°.

1132. L reads 'myriads of years' (°varṣā-yutānyasmai).

1133. The meaning of the term pinḍa-siddhi is not certain.

1137. Compare regarding Meghavāhana the stories related iii. 16 sqq.

1141. Read with L taḍāguyh°.

1142. L sarvāśuddhi° as emended.

1143. Those youths mad with love, and those women excited by youth, were at that time aiming at Harsa's destruction.

1144. In his fury he had some women executed with their lovers, others he expelled from his seraglio and exiled them along with their paramours.

1145. All his servants, feeling troubled by the guilt they had themselves incurred in their wickedness, wished him evil and plotted for his death.

1146. He showed in all respects such weakness of moral sense as befitted a son of King Kalaśa.

1147. His father's wives, who had brought him up on their arms, he took in his arms, kissed them, and continually disported himself with them.

1148. He had carnal intercourse with his sisters, and angered by a harsh word he punished and violated Nagā, the daughter of his father's sister.

1149. While continually supporting the Turushka captains of hundreds with money, this perverse minded [king] ate domesticated pigs until his death.

1149 bis. Thus by his misconduct he sullied to excess the company of this [country's] kings, just as an animal [would sully that] of wise men.

1150. Angered on one occasion, this indolent king undertook an expedition against Rajapurī, with all his collected forces.

Expedition against Rajapurī.

1151. When the [other] kings saw the incomparable outfit of his army, they feared that he would have strength to invade the three worlds.

1152. He, however, on seeing the fort of Prthivigiri, desired to capture it, and placed his camp at its foot without entering the capital [of Rajapurī].

Siege of Prthivigiri.

1153. When he had stopped there for more than a month, the defenders of the fort became distressed owing to their food and other supplies being exhausted.

1154. How large were not the tribute and the supplies which King Saṁgrāmapāla offered in order to save that [garrison] ?

1155. When the king showed firmness and did not accept those [offers], he bribed the prefect of police (Suṁa).

1156. When the king did not agree to turn back, he (Suṁa) secretly instigated the soldiers to claim a large marching allowance.

1147. Read with I, āropya for A āruhya.

1148. It is doubtful whether the Nāga hero mentioned is identical with the princess of that name referred to in vii. 203. Kallanā, the mother of the latter, is there described as an aunt of Kalaśa, not as his sister, as our passage would represent her.

1149. It can scarcely be doubted that K. is alluding here to Muhammadan troop-leaders in Harsa's service. By eating pork, which the latter would not touch, the king puts himself lower even than the Mlecchas. May we recognize in the mention here made of 'Turushka' officers, another indication of Harsa's propensity towards Muhammadanism? Comp. above, note vii. 1095.

1149 bis. This verse is missing in A. The text is supplied by L: ittham ācaratānarthāḥ pāṭhivānām ihādhiḥ | paikṛtiḥ sandūṣitā tena tirāṣṭreṇa vipuścītām.

1150. Read with L sarvābhīṣeṇa.

1152. I, rājadhānīm is preferable to A rājapurīm.

I am unable to trace the position of the Prthivigiri fort, which is only here mentioned.

HARSA
(A.D. 1080-1101).

II 1157A
(A.D. 1089-1101).

1157. Thereupon these [men], who were mostly of low character, began under ironical sayings a solemn fast (vr̥ṣṭya), and as the king's treasury was far away, his army fell into disorder.

1158. While the king was arranging to meet this [difficulty], the prefect of police started, as another means of intimidation, the [rumour of an] attack from the Turushkas.

Retreat from Prithvira.

1159. Thereupon the king, who had but little firmness, raised his camp and marched off in fright, leaving his whole treasure and stores on the roads.

1160. A servant who is trusted without having been tested, at a critical time brings disaster upon his masters, like a bad sword in a fight.

1161. This [minister], being himself unfit, did not wish others who possessed fitness [to be around the king], and thereby spoilt the king's fortune, just as a low-bred horse [spoils] a stable.

1162. From that time onwards the glory of the king vanished, and his epithet of Pratāpacakravartin ('the glorious ruler of the universe') faded away altogether.

1163. With a dejected face he praised Kaṇḍarpa, who had accomplished [alone] that enterprise in which he with all his servants had failed.

1164. When he wished to recall him, the prefect of police prevented this intention of the slow-witted king by an intrigue.

1165. Having thus learned his pofidy, the king imprisoned the prefect of police, yet punished him only as the case made it necessary, not because he felt angry.

1166. While he was [detained] in a stronghold and in doubt as to his life, he greedily collected the betel, clothes and other [articles] sent [to him] by servants and relatives.

1167. The king, however, misled by fate, re-instated in his post this [minister], who was born to bring about his total ruin and who deserved death.

1168. The parasites, by dexterous praises, stirred the king up again, just as Karna and the rest [stirred up] the descendant of Kuru (Duryodhana), after he had been defeated on the expedition against the herdsmen (ghoṣa).

1169. The disputant who has been defeated in the discussion compensates himself for his late defeat by insulting his opponent with abuse; the wife who has become unfaithful, by worrying her husband with wretched quarrels; and the official who has lost all his wealth and greatness, by getting the king into trouble.

1165. Read with L pratipatty°.

1166. The conjectural emendation durge is confirmed by L.

1168. Compare Mahābh. iii. cxxlix. 1 sqq. Duryodhana's attempt to carry off Virāṭa's herds is meant; see above, vii. 585.

1170. Sahela, the Mahattama, was in apprehensions on account of money due, which he had embezzled, and being clever in taking care of his own interests he entangled the king in a serious difficulty.

1171. Having found out a vulnerable point of the Daruds, he urged on the king to seize the fort called Dugdhughāta along with the Lavanyas of Lahara.

1171A
(A.D. 1089-1101).

1170. Regarding Sahela[ka], see vii. 1105.

1171. For A bantūm read with L. ran-dhram.

DUGDHUGHĀTA. The name of the hill fort here mentioned is written in A and the Edition as Durughāta, but can be safely restored as Dugdhughāta with reference to the form found in other passages, and to the reading Dugdhughāta furnished by B. In vii. 2108, we find the name both in A and B rightly spelt as Dugdhughāta; in vii. 2715, the second part of the name is given as -ghāta by A, and quite erroneously as -raṭṭa by B.

Both these passages agree with one own in placing this fort on the border of the Darud territory to the N. of Kuraur. This border, as already indicated in note i. 312, must be assumed to have followed in K's time, as it does at the present day, the mountain range which forms the watershed between the Vitasta and Shud rivers on the one side and the Kisanganga on the other.

A closer indication as to the position of Dugdhughāta is furnished by the mention of the river Madhumatī in the subsequent account of the siege, vii. 1179, 1191. This Madhumatī can be no other than the stream of the Buḍḍpūr Nālā (marked 'Madkod,' i.e. Buḍḍkāl, on the map) which flows into the Vohr lake from the N. near the village of Kolas, and is to this day known by that name to the Brahman population of the Valley. The several Saigunias of this stream are still visited by the Brahmans of the This accounts for the mention made of this Madhumatī as a sacred stream in the Athamata, 1201 sqq., 1308. The other stream of this name which flows into the Kisanganga at the Śrīvātā Tirtha, and has already been mentioned in note i. 37, cannot be thought of in connection with Dugdhughāta on account of its position outside Kuraur.

When visiting the Buḍḍpūr Nālā in August, 1894, I ascertained that a pass leading over the mountains in the N. in the direction of Gurēz (map 'Gourdis') bears the name of Dud'khut. The close similarity of the names, in combination with the topographical details given below, makes it highly probable that the name of the old fort has survived in that of the pass. K's dud (mille) is the phonetic representative of Skr. dugdha. In the second part of the modern name, -khut, we have, perhaps, a popular etymology. K's khut, meaning a cutting, a narrow passage. Or vice versa, K's -ghita may be taken as a Sanskritized rendering of an earlier Kāśmīrī form of khut.

The pass of Dud'khut, which I subsequently ascertained, lies at the head of the side valley shown as Minimarg on the map. Its position may be fixed approximately at 71° 30' long. 31° 30' lat., and its height at about 11,500'. Its immediate approach from the south or Kāśmīr side is formed by an open valley which for about three miles ascends very gradually with a grassy slope. This valley bears the name of Upe marg, and may possibly correspond to the Prājñamāhika of vii. 1182.

The route leading up to the Dud'khut Pass from the village of Harath is all along practicable for laden animals, and was, until the construction of the 'Hilgit Transport Road' over the neighboring Trāghat Pass, often used by the Darud traders of Gurēz. It was also, according to the information supplied to me, used regularly by the Sikhs for military transports, until a disaster which befell a convoy through an avalanche lower down in the valley, led them to change the route to the Trāghat Pass some seven miles to the S.W. The latter pass has been adhered to ever since, though it is higher than the Dud'khut Pass, and owing to its exposed track less suitable as a route of communication.

The watershed on the Dud'khut Pass is formed by an almost level plain about a quarter of a mile broad. To the E. of it rises abruptly an isolated rocky hillcock about 150' high, which shows precipitous walls to the S. and W., and is also on the other sides accessible only with difficulty. The top of this hillcock forms a small plateau about 100 yards long, and half as broad, which commands a complete view of the approaches of the pass both from S. and N. On this plateau I was able to trace scanty remains of walls which seemed to have belonged to polygonal towers such as are found to this day near the Pir Pantāl and Tog'maidān Passes. The military position afforded by this hillcock is excellent,

HARSA
(A.D. 1089-1101).

1172-1173. This [fort]—after the Dāmarā Lukkunacandra, who held it, had been previously executed on King Ananta's order by Janaka, the lord of the Gate,—had been offered [to Kalāśa] by the [Dāmarā's] wife, who was fasting before the [king's] door. King Kalāśa having refused it, the king of the Darads took possession of it.

1174. As owing to [the possession of] that [fort] the Darads had occupied numerous villages in this territory [of Kāśmīr], the king was induced by the minister [Sahela] to take up this expedition.

1175. The place had no tank, and the snow which was kept [there] for the use of the garrison, had at that time become exhausted by a drought.

1176. When the Mahattama [Sahela] had ascertained by spies this weak point, he repeatedly pressed the king to seize this [fort], and the latter undertook the attempt.

and it is possible that we have in these remains the last traces of the fort of Dugdhaghāta referred to in the Chronicle.

The details furnished by the narrative of the siege of Dugdhaghāta seem to support this assumption. The configuration of the hillock and the hardness of its rock would make the construction of a tank very difficult. Hence we can understand the curious expedient of storing snow instead of water for the garrison's use (vii. 1175). Of the high elevation at which the fort Dugdhaghāta must have been situated, we have an unmistakable indication in the heavy snowfall which put an end to the siege, vii. 1186 sq. After what is stated previously about the drought and the warm weather, which had reduced the fort's snow supply, vii. 1175, 1185, it is clear that this snowfall must have occurred at the close of the summer or at least early in the autumn. And in this connection it may be noted that heavy snow-storms have more than once been experienced in recent years on the neighbouring Trāg'bal Pass as early as September.

Notwithstanding this elevation, and the consequent severity of the climatic conditions, a fort erected at the Dud'khut Pass would have remained inhabitable for a small garrison throughout the year. This is proved by the fact that the block huts built on the even more exposed Trāg'bal Pass have been inhabited through recent winters by employes of the Dāk and telegraph service of the Gilgit Road.

Finally, we may point out that the narrow gorges of the Madhumatī and its northern tributary, through which the route to the Dud'khut Pass leads above and below the village of Ātavūṭh, correspond exactly to the description given in vii. 1191 sq. of the route followed by the Kāśmīrian force on its disastrous retreat from Dugdhaghāta.

LAVANYAS.—The Lavanyas mentioned here for the first time, play a great part in the internal troubles related in Books vii. and viii. They must have formed at that time an important tribal section of the rural population of Kāśmīr, and their name, like that of the Tantrins, survives in a modern 'Kram' name of very frequent occurrence, viz. Lūn'. The numerous passages in which the Lavanyas as a body or individuals are referred to, tell us nothing about their origin, but show that many of them must have held a position of influence as land-owners or tribal headmen. In vii. 1227 sqq., where we read of a persecution of the Lavanyas in Maḍa-varāṭṭya, they are repeatedly designated as Dāmaras.

The designation Lūn', as other 'Krams' in Kāśmīr, is nowadays a mere name, there being nothing to distinguish those who bear it from other Muhammadan agriculturists in regard to customs, occupation, etc.; comp. note v. 248. Lūn's are found throughout the Valley. According to a villager's statement, recorded by LAWRENCE, Valley, p. 306, they are popularly supposed to have come from Cilās. But I have not been able myself to trace such a tradition. Up to Jonarāja's time the Lavanyas seem to have retained a certain importance, as their name is of frequent occurrence in his Chronicle. By S'rivara they are mentioned only once, i. 282.

1172. L gives the name as Thakkanacandra

1174. Read with L rāyā sa.

1175. The emended text is supported by L nirvāṣe, which is an easily explained clerical error for nirvāḍe.

1177. When Cappaka, who was in charge of the 'Gate,' was about to proceed on this expedition by the king's order, the Fātagaṇḍa (Ananda) endeavoured to get the better of him.

FLARSA
(A.D. 1080-1101).

1178. This latter, since the king had withheld [from him] the charge of the 'Gate' and had appointed him as governor, was showing enmity to all who were [acting] as lords of the 'Gate.'

1179. Though he (Ānanda) caused confusion in the army, the lord of the Gate (Cappaka) crossed the Madhumatī river and invested the fort with his troops.

1180. The king, though despatching all feudatories from all sides to the fort, still kept himself at the distance of one march [from the latter].

1181. The Kaśmīrians fought with the Narad soldiers, who threw down big boulders and other [missiles], and who were difficult to defeat on account of the shelter which the fort gave them.

1182. Malla, śubhga's son, kept with his sons at the place of attack, called Prājñamāhika, and caused [to the enemies] alarms which they withstood with difficulty.

1183-1184. His two brave sons, Uccala and Sussala, to whom an astrologer had foretold the acquisition of the royal power, were taking care of their honour on account of that ambition. The elder of the two, who was most difficult to control, had, though he hated the throne, started on that expedition, from the force of the coming events.

1185. Parched by the drought and the king's lustre, the Narad soldiers held the fort with difficulty.

1186. Then there came down heavy rain which turned the [whole] ground into one [sheet of] water, and appeared like an order of Fate effacing Harṣa's lustre.

Retreat from Dugdha ghāta.

1187. Fate showed itself favourable and surrounded the hill [occupied] by the fort with impassable masses of snow which enveloped it entirely, like armour.

1188. Fate lets some fall as they rise, and throws up others while they fall, and thus seems to play with [men as if they were] balls.

1177. Read with ī nātayagṇḍas and cap-pakam. For the meaning of abhinandhātum comp. vii. 1255, 1522.

By Fātagaṇḍa is meant Ananda, who had himself aspired to the office of lord of the Gate; see vii. 993-995.

1178. The proper text is restored by ī, vaivāṇ for A dvāraṇ.

The expression drāṛādhihikāribhik does not indicate that there were several 'lords of the Gate' at the same time, but that the disappointed Ananda intrigued against all those who were successively holding the office.

1179. Regarding the Madhumatī river, see above, note vii. 1171 on Dugdhaghāta.

1182. Regarding Prājñamāhikā, see note vii. 1171 on Dugdhaghāta.

HARRA
(A.D. 1089-1101).

1189. Then those bad councillors, rendered miserable by the rain, remembered their houses, and caused confusion in the king's camp just as before.

1190. Like a fish which swimming against the stream has hit his face against a rock, the king turned back from that place also, without caring for victory.

1191. The whole army abandoned its stores, threw away the treasure, left its valuables and dropped its arms, thinking of nothing but flight.

1192. The stream, which was in flood, swallowed up the king's soldiers on the route, as they were fleeing by different paths lamenting and pursued by the enemy.

1193-1194. In the river Madhvanatī the linen cloths abandoned by the men appeared like rows of geese, their shields like multitudes of lotuses, the heaps of swords like water-plants, their horses like rocks, their golden vessels like ruddy geese and those of silver like foam.

1195. The number of those who were captured or slain by the victorious Darada, or carried away by the stream, could not be counted.

1196. The proud Uccala, Malla's son, was the only one who, together with his younger brother, did not flee, but endeavoured to save the army which was thus left without loaders.

1197. The whole force of the Darada, which was rushing forward like the ocean to flood everything, was stopped by these two, who resembled two mighty rocks on the coast.

1198. On these two when they returned after saving the army and securing priceless renown, royal Fortune seemed to bestow perceptible lustre, as [if she were] a girl choosing for herself her husband.

1199. From that time onwards all people thought that these two proud [princes] deserved the crown, but not the cowardly king.

1200. The people formed this conviction, when [they saw that] these two, despising the gifts of favour, did not go to see the king even after such deeds.

1201. Then the king, freed from fear of his enemies, proceeded to the City, while the glory of the two sons of Mallarāja spread in [all] directions.

1202. All people, in anticipation of coming events, compared the two to Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, while the king was likened to Rāvana.

1203. The senseless king, however, undismayed and unashamed, began again to oppress the land just as [if that had been] his fixed occupation.

1204. A low-minded person strikes down him who is close by for a small fault, but not the enemy afar off who has committed an enormous offence.

[Thus too] the dog in mighty fury bites the stone which hits, but not the person who has thrown it from a distance.

1205. When he had returned, he heard that Madana, whom, being pleased with his services, he had made commander-in-chief, was openly talking of his defeat.

1206. In his anger for this he wished to kill him, and accused him of another offence, namely, that he had neglected a written order sent by the queen.

1207. When he (Madana) arrived from Maḍḍavarājya and was not received by the king, he became frightened and went to the house of the councillor Lakṣmīdhara, who was a Tukṣa [by birth].

1208. The king, though another minister had pleaded for him, had him executed together with his son, while the troops looked on laughing.

1209. A king's angry smile, an unseasonable blossom on a tree, and a Vatāla's laugh do not pass away just thus [without a result].

1210. Those who, rendered self-confident by great favours, serve their master without care, find their end like those [snake-charmers] who boasting of their familiarity with a great snake [die] violently owing to their charm [failing].

1211. The curse of Sāryamati asserted itself among the band of intriguers until [it brought about also] the death of Madana.

1212. The king, who trembled at the sight of valour, had Kalaśarāja placed in fetters in the house of Lakṣmīdhara.

1213. In order to insult him, the king sent to him his enemy Udaya, under the pretext of making an inquiry.

1214. The proud [Kalaśarāja] on seeing the other sparkling in his luck, flamed up in anger, and seizing a weapon from some one struck him down in a moment.

1215. Thereupon his (Udaya's) servants threw him down and killed him. Thus ended the servants of that evil-minded king.

1216. On this land which suffered wounds, as it were, of the king's infliction, there fell also another series of calamities which were like caustics thrown [on those wounds].

1217. In broad daylight people were killed by robbers, who would take a golden bowl even from the king's apartments.

1218. A plague was raging, and day and night the sound of the funeral music did not cease, accompanied by loud lamentations.

1219. In the year [of the haukika era four thousand one hundred] seventy-five (A.D. 1099-1100), the villages were flooded by an inundation, and there arose an extreme scarcity of all wares.

HAUSA
(A.D. 1089-1101).

Execution of Madana.

Famine in Kashmir,
A.D. 1099.

HARRA
(A.D. 1089-1101).

1220. A Khari of rice was bought for five hundred Dinnāras, and two Palas of grape-juice cost one Dinnāra.

1221. A Pala of wool was sold at six Dinnāras. Of salt, pepper, Assafoetida (hingū) and other [articles] it was difficult even to hear the name.

1222. The water of the streams was covered with the dead, whose corpses were swollen from being soaked with water,—as if forests of cut trees had come down from the mountains.

1223. Thinking that the palace could not be seen from afar owing to its being hidden by trees, the king had them cut down in all directions.

1224. The trees, which with their blossoms and fruits appeared like householders, were struck down everywhere, and were lamented by the bees which seemed [to form] their families.

1225. While the people were thus distressed, the king threw upon them heavy fines which took away their breath, just as if a boulder [were thrown] on an old bullock which has become worn out by [dragging] the plough.

1226. He tormented the people through the Kāyasthas, and did not even let alone the earth in towns, villages or elsewhere, owing to the heavy fines he inflicted.

Persecution of Dāmaras.

1227. Then furious, like another god of death, he ordered the governor (Ānanda) to slay all of the Dāmaras who had become over-powerful.

1228. He first attacked numerous Dāmaras of Holūḍā in Maḍavarājya, and killed them just like birds in their nest.

1229. While he was killing the Lavanyas, he left in Maḍavarājya not even a Brahman alive if he wore his hair dressed high and was of prominent appearance.

1230. Since he impaled even travellers, taking them for Lavanyas, the country became terrible to look at, [just as if it had been] Bhairava's kitchen.

1231. When he was impaling the ferocious wife of a certain Lavanyu, the Lavanyas all became frightened at the governor and fled in all directions.

1232. Some of them ate cow's meat in the lands of the Mlecchas; others lingered on by working water-wheels, hand-mills, and the like.

1220. Regarding the khāri measure and the varying prices of rice, see note v. 71. For the approximate value of the prices stated here in Dinnāras, comp. Note H, iv. 496. Regarding the pala, see note iv. 202.

1221. Salt is not found in Kāśmīr, but is imported from the Panjāb and Ladāk; see LAWRENCE, Valley, pp. 63, 393. Nor is Assafoetida produced within the limits of Kāśmīr; see ib. p. 68.

1226. With na nṛd apyavāśepitā, comp. the Kāśmīrī saying, mīts tī thāv' nas na ('not even the earth has been left').

1228. Holūḍā is the modern Pūlar Pargana; see note i. 306. Regarding Maḍavarājya or Marāḍ, the designation of the eastern portion of the Valley, comp. note ii. 15.

1232. Compare below, vii. 1292. The working of water-wheels and hand-mills still offers a means of subsistence for the poor in towns of Northern India.

1233. The governor sent to that Bhairava of a king whole strings and rows of Javanya heads, [just as if they were] a great affaring.

HARSA
(A.D. 1080-1101).

1234. At the gate of the king's [palace] there were seen everywhere rows of triumphal arches (torana) covered with Ḍānara skulls, which appeared like cups (ghaṭī).

1235. Indeed, whoever brought the head of a Ḍāmara received bracelets, dresses and other [rewards] which were hanging at the gate of the royal palace.

1236. Vultures, herons and other [birds] frequented the king's gateway and occupied the spreading arches to feast on the heads of the Ḍāmaras.

1237. Wherever the king took his abode, there the people formed wide-spreading triumphal garlands with the horrible heads of Javanys.

1238. In this land which was filled with corpses, just as [if it had been] a burning-ground, the nose was tormented by impure smells and the ear by the howls of the jackals.

1239. From the outskirts of Balerakapraya, as far as Jokapraya, the governor formed one avenue with Ḍāmaras fixed as poles.

1240. When he had thus exterminated the Ḍāmaras in Maḍavarājya, he hurried to Kramarājya to follow up the same procedure.

1241. The Ḍāmaras resident in Kramarājya, knowing for certain that they were doomed, collected a force in Lauḍāha.

1242. They all joined in the fighting and committed great slaughter, so that the governor was checked there for a long time.

1243. What else [could it have been]? In the form of Harṣa some demon had descended [to the earth] to destroy this land hallowed by gods, Tirthas and Rsis.

1244-1245. Liveliness at night, sleep in the day-time, cruelty, excessive conduct, meanness, and pleasure in doings which befitted the god of death,—these and some other habits peculiar to him were like those of a goblin, and were noted as such by intelligent men in his own time.

1246. In the meantime the younger son of Malla (Sussala), intoxicated by youth, was comforting the heart of Lakṣmīlkhara's wife.

1247. She was attracted by that prince who was her neighbour, and felt no love for her husband, whose look was like that of a monkey.

1239. Ḍāmaras identified with Lakṣavar in our passage, see note ii. ('the drinking station of Baleraka') is not otherwise known.

1240. For Kramarājya or Kamraz, see note ii. 15.

1241. Lauḍāha is in all probability the old name of the present Lālāb Pargana to the N.W. of the Volur lake. The proper Kā. pronunciation of the modern name is Lālāv. Comp. for a phonetic parallel Karṇāha > Karnāv, viii. 2535.—The Lokaprakāśa, ii., has metamorphosed Lālāv into Lalavaka, and P. Sāhibrām in his Tirthas makes up the form Lalava (l).

HAṚṢA
(A.D. 1089-1101).

signs against Uccala
and Sussala.

1248-1249. "Why did you not, O king, kill Uccala and Sussala, those two who have qualities fitting them for the throne and who are ambitious, whom you have slain other relatives who were insignificant?" Though Lakṣmīdhara spoke thus in his raging jealousy, the king yet showed no anger [against them], as he suffered the torments of regret on account of his former murder of relatives.

1250. Though he (Lakṣmīdhara) said this to him again and again in person as well as through others, he was afraid of killing [them], remembering their prowess.

1251. Then [however] forgetting love for kinsmen, [their] attachment and the rest, he took counsel with his ministers and decided to kill them.

1252. This evil design of the king was then reported to those two by a courtesan, Thakkunā by name, who was connected [with them].

1253. When Darśanapāla, their friend, had removed their doubts about this matter, they left at night accompanied by two or three attendants.

flight of Uccala and Sussala (A.D. 1100).

1254. They left the City in the month Mārgaśīrṣa of the year [of the Baukika era four thousand one hundred] seventy-six (A.D. 1100), and reached the seat of the Dāmara living at Utrāsa.

1255. The treacherous Lavanya Prastarāja, after prevailing over his own younger brother Sillarāja, conducted them abroad.

1256. Then the elder brother proceeded to Rājapurī; the younger betook himself to the court of Kalha, the ruler of Kalīṅjara.

1257. When the two had left the country, no confidence was felt by any one in [Harṣa's] reign, and the king himself, who understood presages, became alarmed at evil omens.

1258. Then he asked Samgramapāla, [king of Rājapurī,] through Lakṣmīdhara's mouth, to kill Uccala, and offered him money [for this].

1250. The lacuna of two syllables which the text shows, may conjecturally be filled by reading tayor ghāṭe.

1254. Utrāsa is undoubtedly, as the gloss of A, has it, the modern village Putrus (map 'Watoasoo'), situated close to Sāngas in the Kutuhār Pargana, 75° 22' long. 33° 43' lat. P. Sahibram reproduces the name as Uttarasa in his Tirṭhas.

Regarding the term upaveśana, comp. note vii. 1070.

1255. Prastarāja, the Lavanya, is the Dāmara of the preceding verse. This shows that at that period the term Dāmara was not a tribal designation; comp. Note G, iv. 348, and note vii. 1171.—For the meaning of abhisandhāya see vii. 1177, 1522.

1256. Kalīṅjara, more correctly spelt Kālīṅjara in vii. 204, 618, 915, cannot be the same place as the well-known Kālāṅjara, 'a city of the Kalachuri kings of Central India, now represented by the Kālāṅjar hill fort' in the Banda district of the N.W. Provinces (comp. Ind. Ant., xxii. p. 180). The context of viii. 915, and of those passages where Kalha and Padmarāja, a later ruler of Kalīṅjara, are mentioned (viii. 519, 581, 1023, 1034, 1974 sq.), shows that some hill territory to the S. of Kāśmīr is meant. To this territory refers clearly also the notice found in Ferishta's History (transl. Briggs, vol. i. pp. 89, 99) of 'a hill fort called Kalunjur on the frontier of Kashmeer.' The fort is mentioned by Ferishta as the place where Mahmūd of Ghazna imprisoned one of his high officials. I am unable at present to trace any other notice of the place or to attempt its identification.

1259. He (Saṅgramapala) had paid but little attention to Malla's son when he had come to him, but showed more respect [for him subsequently] on account of that fear [of Harsa].

1260. In this world [it often happens that] by showing fear a malignant person, acting under the impulse of fate, raises his enemy whose success is approaching to [greater] importance.

1261. Those of Rājapuri are by nature no well-wishers of Kaśmīr. What need then be said about the intrigues [which arose] when a mighty opponent [of the Kaśmīrian ruler] had arrived [among them]?

1262. Uccala then exerted himself by carrying on negotiations with the Ḍāmaras through some persons, mostly dishonest, who had joined him. Uccala at Rājapuri.

1263. The Ḍāmaras again, whom the king had oppressed, made great efforts to bring him [to Košūr] and sent many envoys with offers of presents.

1264. Janaka, Sargatarmacanda's son, made additional efforts by despatching artful messengers.

1265. Saṅgramapala, when he saw the messengers of the Ḍāmaras, abandoned his fear of the king, and openly paid homage to Uccala.

1266-1267. He (Saṅgramapala), after breaking camphor over [Uccala's] head to [assure his] safety, wished to let him start, though [he himself felt] depressed by the weighty nature of the affair. But Kulaśarīja, the chief Ṭhukkura of that territory, who had been bribed by Harsadeva, approached him when he was alone, and said to him:

1268. "By neglecting to propitiate King [Harsa] and supporting Uccala, you obstinately reject the wishing-cow and take hold of the ho-goat's neck."

1269. "Is this [Uccala] one of the princes of Kaśmīr? What can this mendicant do? Therefore, conciliate King [Harsa] and put yourself out of fear."

1270. "Put this [Uccala] in the fortress of Rājagiri. He [Harsa] will then from fear do whatever you desire, and be ever your friend."

1266-1267. The breaking of camphor is evidently referred to as a custom assuring protection to a stranger.

1270. The fortress of Rājagiri is mentioned under the name of Rājagiri in an interesting passage of Alberuni's India, i. p. 208, which has been quoted in Noto E on Lohara, § 12 (iv. 177). Alberuni places this fortress to the S. of the snow-peak 'Kulārjak' which I have identified in the note quoted with Mount Taṭakūṭi, the highest peak of the Pir Panṭsal Range, 71° 32' long. 33° 41' lat. He speaks of 'Rājagiri' and the fortress Lahūr (recte Lauhūr, our Lohara) as the two strongest places he had ever seen.

The position indicated by Alberuni for Rājagiri, and the fact that he saw the fortress on Mahmūd's expedition against Kaśmīr, suggest that this stronghold was situated in the valley of the Prinṭs Tohi (Taṭsi), which forms the approach to the Pir Panṭsal Pass.

I have heard of the existence of several ruined forts between Bahrūngalla and Sūran in that valley, but have never been able to visit the latter myself. A close examination of the local traditions and of the topography of that hill region will probably enable us to fix the position of Rājagiri with as much accuracy as that of Lohara.

HARSA
A.D. 1089-1101
— —

HARṢA
(A.D. 1089-1101).
Intrigue against Uccala.

1271. On being thus addressed the weak Khaśa ruler, who was afraid of him (Harṣa) and was lusting [to increase] his wealth, agreed to do so.

1272. And he replied: "I am not able to capture that resolute [Uccala]. You should yourself detain him, whom he is sent to you, by a ruse."

1273. After these words he dismissed him to his own house, and then spoke to Uccala: "In the morning you ought to visit Kalaśarāja."

1274. "He is the chief minister here; through him you will avoid risks. Afterwards I shall let you start with your followers to destroy your opponent."

1275. When Uccala then on the following day was going to the residence of that [minister], he received a warning of what was going to happen, first by bad omens and subsequently from his trusted friends.

1276. When Kalaśarāja heard that he (Uccala) had gone back into the Khaśa king's presence, the plan having been betrayed, he came up in a rage, with the soldiers he had ready.

1277. Uccala knew that he had come to attack [him], and being himself an excellent soldier, he wished to proceed outside with his own followers to give battle.

1278. When the fray had begun, the lord of the Khaśas tried to make peace, and staying with Kalaśarāja asked him (Uccala) to come to his own assembly-hall.

1279. That abode of strength (Uccala) shook off the attendants who wished to keep him back, and readily stepped into the Khaśa assembly, while his underlip shook with rage.

1280. Nobody, neither Kalaśarāja nor the king, could face that embodiment of glory, who in his fury looked like the mighty sun which is [to destroy the world] at the end of the Kalpa.

1281. When the hall had been cleared, he with great dignity spoke thus to the Khaśa lord who tried to conciliate him, and to his minister, while anger gave harshness to his words:

1282. "Long ago there lived as king of Dārvābhisāra Nara, a descendant of Bharadvāja; his son was Naravāhana, who begot Phulla."

1283. "The latter [begot] Sātavāhana; from him sprung Canda; his son was Candurāja, who also had two sons called Gopāla and Simharāja."

1282. For the pedigree of the Lohara family detailed in this and the following verses, compare the genealogical table in Appendix.

For Dārvābhisāra, see note i. 180.

1283. The name Sātavāhana has been corrected here after vi. 367 in place of A. L. Sārthavāhana. The name is found in the alternative form Sālāvāhana also as that of a Rāja of Campā; comp. the Campā grant, edited by Prof. Kielhorn, Ind. Ant., xvii. p. 8, and above note vii. 218.

Uccala's genealogy.

1284-1285. "Śmihurāja, who had many sons, gave his daughter Dīldā to King Kṣemavṛkṣa in marriage. She being left without a husband or male children, placed Śaṅgrāmarāja, the son of her brother Udayarāja, on the throne. [Another] brother of hers, Kantirāja, begot Jassurāja."

1286. "Śaṅgrāma[rāja] was the father of Ananta, Jassa[rāja] that of Tanvaga and Guhya. From Ananta was born King Kulaśa, and from Guhya [was born] Malla."

1287. "From Kulaśa were born Haraḍera and the rest, and thus we from Malla. Then, when this is the pedigree how can foolish persons ask: 'Is this one [of the princes of Kaśmīr]?' "

1288. "What, however, is the use of a pedigree on this earth which falls to the lot of the strong, and who else should be the helper of the strong man but his arm?"

1290. "Thank heaven, that I have not [allowed] these objects of pity here to touch [my] head with their hands, and that I have [thus] not become a disgrace to the race of Kaśmīr kings."

1290. "Hereafter you will see my power." Thus speaking he left that place and went forth to conquer, followed by a hundred foot-soldiers.

1291. Somebody met him carrying a slain hare. By this good omen he thought he had [already] won his enemy's royal fortune.

1292. Vaṭṭadera and other exiled Paṇaras left off turning water-wheels, handmills and the like, and joined him on the march.

1293. When he came distressed into Rājapurī, after leaving Śaṅgrāmapāla, who was in camp, the queens of the latter cheered him up.

1294. As he was proceeding in the evening to his own residence from their apartments, after having taken a meal, he was attacked outside by Kulaśarāja's soldiers.

1295. While he was prevented from leaving by the queens blocking the door, Loṣṭharaṭṭu and others of his armed followers were killed in the fight.

1296. When the chief persons [of Rājapurī] had interceded and stopped the fighting, he whose soldiers had been few already [before], found himself surrounded by a still smaller number.

1287. Kulaśarāja's words, vii. 1268, are alluded to.

1289. Uccala compliments himself in those words at not having been put under obligations by the Rajapurī chief. These would have placed him in the humiliating position of being the client of his inferior.

1291. The sight of a hare at the start is counted as a lucky omen in the Jyotiṣaśāstra; comp. e.g. Bṛhat-saṁhitā, lxxxvi. 22 sqq.

1293. Among Śaṅgrāmapāla's wives there might have been relatives of Uccala. A daughter of Uccala is subsequently mentioned, viii. 1361 sq., as married to Somapāla, Śaṅgrāmapāla's son.

UCCALA
(A.D. 1089-1101).

Uccala's fight at Rājapurī.

HARṢA
(A.D. 1080-1101).

1297. Though he had only on the full-moon day of Čaitra boon exposed to dangers, yet he started without fear on his expedition on the fifth day of the bright half of Vaiśākha.

1298. He despatched Vāṭṭadeva and the others by their own respective routes to [raise] revolts, and himself formed the plan of invading [Kāśmīr] through Kramarājya.

1299. Kapila, the son of Kṣemarāja, whom the king, after Udayasiha's death, had put over the Lohara territory, allowed him to pass.

1300. Marching at the head of all, with sword and shield, he first taught his (Kapila's) soldiers to flee at Parpotsa.

Uccala invades
Kāśmīr.

1301. After capturing the commandant of the 'Gato' (dvāreshu), Sujjaka by name, who was sitting at ease, he threw himself rapidly upon Kāśmīr, just like a falcon lusting after flesh.

1302. As soon as he had arrived, the onanios of the king, such as some Ḍamaras and Khāśikas from the mountains, joined him from all sides.

1303. King Harṣa trembled when he heard of his having arrived suddenly, just as if he had dropped from heaven or been thrown forth from the womb of the earth.

1304. He then became perplexed at the thought that he might get a firm footing and slay the governor (Ānanda) who stood in Kramarājya.

1305. Since the prefect of police (Sumna) delayed in collecting troops, he despatched in haste Paṭṭa, giving him a large number of officers.

1306. Whether fate deprived him of courage or whether a treacherous design took hold of him, he (Paṭṭa) delayed on the march and neglected the favourable opportunity for attacking the enemy.

1307. Whomever else the king despatched, such as Tilakarāja and others, they all betook themselves to Paṭṭa and did not take the offensive.

1308. As the prefect of police and other persons whom the king despatched became also confused, Uccala obtained a firm footing.

1309. As he was marching to Varāhamūla, he captured a horse of auspicious marks which had come from the enemy's force and which seemed to represent the royal Fortune.

1299. Udayasiha is probably the same person who is named Udayasiṃha, vii. 581, 1054.

The route followed by Uccala, from Rāja-puri viā Lohara and the Toṣ*maidān Pass into Kramarājya, has been discussed in Note E on Lohara (iv. 177; § 6). The early season at which Uccala forced the pass accounts for the surprise of the king's officers as described in the following verses.

1301. Probably the watch-station of Kīr-kotādrāgha on the Toṣ*maidān route is meant here; see note vii. 140.

1302. Khāśika, or Khāśaka, viii. 398, 2756, 3006, is another form of the ethnic name Khaśa; comp. for the latter note i. 317.

1305. See regarding Sumna, vii. 961.

1309. Regarding Varāhamūla (Varahmūl, Bāramūla) and its ancient shrine of Viṣṇu Ādivarāha, see note vi. 186.

1310. And upon his head fell a garland from the head of [the image of] Mahāvarāha, just as if the earth, which rested on the shoulders of that [god], had bestowed it upon [him as the man of] her choice.

ILABRA
(A.D. 1080-1101)

1311. As his road was blocked by fighting men belonging to the Kūka and other families of physicians (?) he abandoned Ḥuṣkapura and proceeded in the direction of Kramarājya.

1312. In the meantime the Ḍāmaras, on hearing of his approach, got emboldened and throw the governor nearly into a panic.

Rising of Ḍāmaras

1313. They had before already defeated him, killing many soldiers of note, such as Paśorāja and others, and his authority had waned [in consequence].

1314. He thereupon retired slowly and occupied Tāramūlaka, where his opponents, joined by Uccala, also followed him.

1315. Collecting there a large force, he supported for a long time the vehement onslaught, which was like that of the east wind [and which proceeded] from Uccala, who resembled the cloud [bringing destruction over the world] at the end of the Kalpa.

1316. There the two armies maintained an equal struggle for victory, just as two jealous elephants for one female.

1317. Then Ananda, too, a maternal uncle of Uccala, collected the Ḍāmaras and raised a rebellion in Madhavarājya.

1318. In these troubles masses of Ḍāmaras issued forth from all regions, just as bees from the holes [in the ground] when the snow melts.

1319. At that time the Mahattama Sahala, the Kāyastha, was commander-in-chief of the unfortunate king's army, as well as lord of the Gate.

1320. It was then a great thing that he (Sahalaka) did not abandon Madhavarājya, though attacked by Ananda in frequent fights.

1321. Uccala, displaying wonderful energy, thereupon drew up a large army and surrounded the governor, together with his force, in battle.

1310. The earth which Viṣṇu in his form of Varāha, or 'primeval boar,' had raised up from the ocean, is compared to a girl who chooses her husband at a Svayamvara.

1311. The Kūka family is frequently mentioned in the vii. and viii. Books. Tilaka, Sobhaka and others, who held high posts under Uccala and his successors, belonged to it; see viii. 180, 581, 575 sqq., 1070, 1102, 1202, etc. There is no mention made elsewhere of the Kakas being physicians. For °vaiśya°, a later hand in A has corrected °vaiśya°, which would turn the families here mentioned into Vaiśyas.

1314. Though Tāramūlaka is repeatedly mentioned in the subsequent narrative (vii. 1330, 1350; viii. 2938, 2968, 3007, 3124), I am unable to indicate even approximately its position. The repeated inquiries I made in Kamrūz, where the place has to be looked for with reference to our passage and vii. 1339; viii. 2938, have failed to bring to light any local name which could be connected with Tāramūlaka.

1318. Compare for the simile the gloss of A, vii. 893.

HAUSA
(A.D. 1089-1101).

1322. We do not know how it then came about that the soldiers, while still in possession of swords, horses, and armour, saw themselves clearly captives.

1323. That excellent [governor], though captured in this fashion, thought [only] of what was of help to his lord. Devotion to the master does not change in self-respecting men, even at the close [of their life].

1324. He urged, thereupon, Uccala to proceed quickly to the City, saying, in order to encourage him, that he would not have another such opportunity.

1325. As he (Uccala) marched on, he (Ānanda) caused towns, villages, etc., to be plundered by various [troops of Uccala's], thinking that such acts would bring disrepute upon him.

Uccala at Parihāsapura.

1326. He (Ānanda) then led him to occupy Parihāsapura, from which [place] it is very difficult to get out, owing to the obstacles [offered] by the steep slopes and the water [around].

1327. There he urged his own people to burn Uccala and himself at night in the quadrangle [which they both occupied]; but, from regard for him, they did not carry this out.

1328. What cannot be accomplished by one who disregards his own person, if his body as well as his mind is capable of bold enterprise?

1329. The cowardly tortoise carries an impenetrable skin, which protects its body; the lion, which displays great courage in daring deeds of violence, is always unprotected. Shame upon fate which shows an eager partiality for the mean, and which inflicts upon the body of the brave the sting of weakness on all sides.

1330. He then sent words to the king: "I have dragged him along and thrown him before you like a jackal. Come quickly and capture him."

1331. Thereupon the king, accompanied by the whole multitude of chiefs and soldiers, marched forth [from the City], resolved: "To-day, death or victory."

1332. As his life was at stake, he had a general amnesty proclaimed under the sound of drums, and all the citizens followed him.

1326. The description here given of Parihāsapura's situation is quite exact. The Uḍar or alluvial plateau of Paraspar, on which the ruins of Parihāsapura are situated (see Note F, iv. 194-204), rises on all sides with very steep slopes. The marshes which surround it on all sides except on the S., must in former times have been even more extensive (comp. Note I, v. 97-100). They would even at present offer serious obstacles to military operations in the spring and early summer.

1327. The quadrangles (caturbhāṅā) which enclosed Lalitāditya's temples and Vihāra at Parihāsapura, are specially mentioned in iv. 200, 201. The extant ruins of these courtyards have been described in Note F, iv. 194-204.

1329. Correct with Durgapr. lābhāś channa°.

1332. As neither Ā pārair nor the reading adopted in the text, parair, gives a satisfactory sense, I have translated above according to the conjectural emendation parair.

1333. The king's followers, on well-bred horses, covered the distance in a moment, and routed the enemy's force which had previously reached Bharatasetu.

1334. While the king's army came on like the agitated ocean, the governor destroyed the enemy's force throwing himself into its midst.

1335. When Uccala's force was thus broken up, some Dāmaras who were swift on their feet escaped by running, and others who were tired threw themselves into the Rājavihāra.

1336. When a Dāmara called Trillasena was seen entering by his opponents, they set fire to the Vihāra, thinking that it was Uccala.

1337-1338. The proud Uccala, who had long fought with Somapāla, the paternal uncle of Darśanapāla, in the midst of the enemy's cavalry, was with difficulty induced by Janakacandra and others to leave the battle, and escaped from Parihāsapura just as [if it had been] the face of death.

1339. After crossing with his horse the Vitastā from the village of Gaurikābhāta, he proceeded again with the Dāmaras to Tāramūlaka.

1340. Intoxicated by such a limited victory, like [some] small gambler [by a small winning], the king returned to his capital, bestowing praises upon [the governor] Ānanda.

1341. As he did not follow in pursuit, though he knew that his opponent was alive, the Dāmaras, notwithstanding their defeat, took fresh courage.

1342. Uccala, with firm resolve, endeavoured again, in the month of Jyaiṣṭha, to collect those who had dispersed in flight on all sides.

1343. As this proud [prince] was befriended only by his own arm, and was dependent on others, this great endeavour of his in the midst of a famine was attended by difficulties.

1344. The king broke up and removed the glorious [image of Viṣṇu] Parihāsakeśava which [Uccala], though quite destitute of means in the midst of that [famine], had preserved when he had it in his power.

1345. After this [image] had been broken up, heaven and earth became

HAṚṢA
(A.D. 1089-1101).

Uccala's defeat.

Destruction of the Parihāsakeśava image.

1333. Bharatasetu is mentioned only here; its position is unknown.

Ennod with Durgapur. vīrodhinām.

1335. The Rājavihāra is mentioned, iv. 200, among Lalitāditya's structures at Parihāsapura; for its probable position and remains, see Note E.

1339. The gloss of A, identifies Gaurikābhāta with 'Gaurikābhāta near Parihāsapura.' This local name could not be traced by me in the vicinity of Parīspūr.

1344. K. refers here to the image of Parihāsakeśava placed by Lalitāditya at Parihāsapura. According to iv. 202, this image contained 84,000 Palas of silver, which, accepting the calculation given in the note on that passage, would correspond to a weight of 336,000 Tolikas, or approximately as many rupees. The currency value of this mass of silver in the Kaśmīr of Harṣa's time cannot be estimated with exactness. But it must have been far greater than that of the equivalent amount of Rupoo coinage at the present time; comp. Note II, iv. 495.

1345-47. In this curious and somewhat involved passage, K. seems to me to refer to a natural phenomenon which lasted for some time during the last year of Harṣa's reign covered with dust, which was grey like the plumage of pigeons, [and which remained] till the death of Harṣa.

HARṢA
[(A.D. 1089-1101).]

1346-1347. It was a story among the people that before [the erection of that image] there had been in this land darkness, even at day-time. This had ceased after the erection of the image of Parihāsakeśava, which spread daylight by its silver; it happened again for a month and a half after the destruction of that [image].

1348. When the king was taking again a little breath, his opponent having become less bold, there appeared Sussala from the direction of S'ūrapura.

1349. As he stopped at Avanāha, he was roused up from apathy by the reproachful message of his father, who eulogized the elder [brother].

1350. When he had received some horses which King Kallu presented to him, he at last dropped his regard for the king (Harṣa); on this account he had tarried.

1351. Though engaged in a cruel struggle, yet from beginning to end this embodiment of artfulness showed a politeness which deceived the enemy.

1352. By defeating in a fight the commandant Maṇikya, he secured from the watch-station (drāṅga) of S'ūrapura victory and ample means.

1353. On account of the wealth thus obtained, this favourite of fortune displayed wonderful affluence during the whole time of his enterprise.

1354. The king thereupon, disregarding Uccala, sent the governor, Paṭṭa and others to fight Sussala, whose movements were rapid.

(A.D. 1100-1101), and which was attributed by popular superstition to the destruction of the Parihāsakeśava image. This coincidence might have given rise to the legend that the great silver image had originally been erected for the purpose of removing a similar phenomenon.

As regards the phenomenon itself in Harṣa's time, we can gather two points from K.'s account. Firstly, dust of pigeon-grey colour is said to have filled the atmosphere from the time of the removal of the image (after Jyāistha, i.e. 27th April—28th May, and before 9 śudi S'rāvāṇa, i.e. 18th July of the year 4970, A.D. 1100; comp. vii. 1342, 1360), to the death of Harṣa, 5 śudi Bhādrapada 4177, i.e. August 31st, A.D. 1101. Secondly, after the destruction of the image there was darkness for one and a half months.

Combining these two facts, the assumption seems justified that what really took place at the time indicated was a phenomenon of atmospheric dust which manifested itself with great intensity for a month and a half at its commencement in the summer of A.D. 1100, and which lasted until the summer of the next year.

It is characteristic that the story about the alleged phenomenon which preceded the erection of the Parihāsakeśava statue, is not even alluded to by K. in iv. 194-206, though he gives there a lengthy account of all the images and temples erected by Lalitāditya at Parihāsapura. The guarded language in which this part of the story is referred to in our own passage also deserves notice.

1349. Avanāha is identified by the gloss of Δ, with 'Paudupāvanagrāma,' i.e. the hamlet of *Pād*ṣāvan* situated about five miles below Hūrpūr at the point where the routes to the latter place and to Sidan separate, 74° 52' 30" long. 38° 42' 15" lat. The place is correctly marked as 'Pad Pawan' on the larger Survey map. The connection in which Avanāha is mentioned again viii. 2028, makes, however, the proposed identification very doubtful.

1352. Regarding the Drāṅga of S'ūrapura, see note v. 39 and my Notes on the Pir Panjāl Route, J.A.S.B., 1895, p. 381 sqq.

Sussala seems to have secured for his use the revenue of the customs station at S'ūrapura; comp. S'riv. i. 408; Rājat. viii. 2010, and Fourth Chron. 258.

1355. This valiant [prince] routed their troops at S'ārapura. Many were those who were drowned, and found their end in the waters of the Vaitaraṇī.

1356. There the goddess of victory, dismayed as it were, did not touch the body of the brave Darśanapāla, since he was not true to his master.

1357. On the following day, the flying troops which had escaped with their lives joined Sahela, who was stopping at Lokapūṇya.

1358. Sahelaka then, fearing Sussala's attack just as [if it were] the end of the world, proceeded with the various routed troops to the City.

1359. When the approach of Sussala had thus discomfited the king, Uccala, who stood at Tīraṇāla, obtained again a firm position.

1360. The Dhūmaras, who, being themselves mostly on foot were afraid of the [king's] cavalry, brought him up once more by the difficult mountain route of lahara.

1361. The king too, after appointing Udayarāja as lord of the City, sent again the governor to lahara to fight Uccala.

1362. When thereupon the maternal uncle of the sons of Malla (Ānanda) had reached Padmapura, none of the frightened ministers would accept from the king the chief command of the army.

1363. When then the king asked in despair: "Have I still got any one?" Candrarāja accepted from his hand the garland of office (adhikārasraj).

1364. He, descended from the illustrious Jinūrarāja and other [ancestors] who had not desired to die on a couch, displayed noble conduct.

1365. He, having been raised to the command of the army at a desperate time, like the son of Droṇa, marched out and drove back that hostile force from Padmapura.

1366. He gradually occupied the territory, and on the ninth day of the bright half of S'rāvṇa killed the enemy's general (kampanaśa) inside Avantipurā.

11ABBA
(A.D. 1080)-1101
Sussala's victory at S'ārapura.

✓ 1355. Vaitaraṇī is the name of the river which has to be crossed to reach the world of the god of death. The name seems to have been applied to one of the streams which join the Vitastā above Vijayāśvara. But the passages of the Nīlamala, 1310, and the various Mūhātmyas (Vitastāmāh., Chayabhedamāh., Kedāremāh., etc.), in which this name occurs, do not permit of a certain identification. The only river near S'ārapura is the Rembyāra or Ramapadyāra (l. 265), and it is curious that the tradition of the Vijayāśvara Pūrhitas, as communicated to me by P. Vān Bhyū of that place, actually takes the name Vaitaraṇī to be the appellation of the Rembyāra in its course near and below S'ūpiya.

1357. For Lokapūṇya, see note iv. 193.

1362. Ānanda is moant; comp. vii. 1317. Previously Sahelaka had been both Dvārapati and Kampanaśa; see vii. 1319.

1363. The expression adhikārasraj is fully explained by Jomard's comments on S'rihantac. iii. 60, which inform us that it was the custom in Kāśmīr to put a garland of flowers on persons newly appointed when receiving charge of their office. Compare below the use of the term raj, viii. 1021, and kūryasraj, viii. 1032.

1364. Read with L. pratyapadyata.

1365. Aśvatthaman, the son of Droṇa, is moant, who commanded the surviving Kauravas after their last great battle.

HAṚṢA
(A.D. 1080-1101).

1367-1368. The latter separated from his troops which were fighting near Govardhanadhara, was with a few attendants listening to songs when the enemy's cavalry broke in by the road along the bank of the Vitastā, and put him to a sudden death. Whence should luck [come] to those who are careless?

1369. When the king saw his head, which Candrarāja had sent, he hoped afresh for victory, thinking that it was [a sign of] fate's favour.

1370. Fate, while moving away in aversion, produces meanwhile by attentions the illusion of its returning [in kindness], just as the lion [while moving away] turns back his glances.

1371. After Candrarāja, who showed energy in his efforts, had collected forces, he proceeded to Vijayakṣetra, moving along an army in its eighteenfold division.

1372. The Creator, resembling a person holding a balance, did not allow at that time the equilibrium between the two armies to be disturbed, just as [if they had been] the two scales.

1373. Thus [it happened that] on the third day the force of the governor ran away in Luhara, demoralized by an unseasonable fall of rain.

1374. The soldiers, pained by the cold wind and sinking in the slough of the fields, at once abandoned their horses, swords, armour and other [equipment], as [if they had been helpless] animals.

1375. Then Janakacandra and others put the governor to death, though Uccala from kindly feeling was protecting him.

1376. This minister was the only one to purchase glory at the expense of his body among King Harṣa's servants, who were characterized by treachery and timidity.

1377. Surely Devasarman and others must have been the models with which he vied,—though somebody might form a reproach [against me] for having inverted [the order].

1378. Who would not, remembering that the result depends on fate, praise him for the destruction of the Lavanyas, for the confusion [carried] into the enemy's battle array, and his other deeds?

✓ 1367-68. The position of Govardhanadhara is uncertain. The shrine of that name at Parihāsapura cannot be meant here. P. Sahibram refers in his Tirthas. to a Nāga called Govardhana situated in the vicinity of Anantanāga (Anatnag). This may possibly be meant here.

In the Gāṅgodbhedamāh., 90 sq., reference is made to a Govardhanadhara Viṣṇu, apparently worshipped in close proximity to the Tirtha of Bheṭṭadevi, i.e. Buṭṭāṭr in S'ukru; comp. note

A, i. 35. The distance between this locality and Avantipura is, however, considerable.

1371. The numbers here given refer to the conventional division of an army, as indicated e.g. Amarakośa, ii. 8, 79, 81; comp. below vii. 1513.

1377. K. wishes to say that Ananda, the governor, might fitly be placed even before Devasarman and other models of faithful servants; comp. iv. 551 sqq.

1378. Compare vii. 1334.

1379. Why, is there not the moon to defeat the [ocean's] hell-darkness? Is there not the poison [of Kālukūta] to frighten that [ocean], which swallows up the waters? Is there not Mahavāntari to destroy the [submarine] fire in its interior? Though all these [properties of the ocean] together have proved without avail, yet the ocean should not be called a fool. Those who consider that success is dependent on fate, will show their perception of [the truth of] things just by praising him.

ITANSA
(A.D. 1089-1101)

1380. Gajjā, his mother, ascended the pyre and [thereby] paid homage to her own noble character [as one] of those virtuous women who have borne sons worthy of praise for devotion to their lord's service.

1381. When the king was ever sending her son into risky enterprises, she being overcome by maternal affection, had thus spoken to the ruler of the earth:

1382. "O lord, do not employ this only son of [a mother] who has no other children, on every task which imperils life."

1383. He had replied to her: "O mother, as he is the only support for you who have no other children, so [he is] also for me, who has no other servants."

1384. In this appreciation by the king of her son's faithfulness, that proud and virtuous woman had recognized the high position [which her] son had attained.

1385. When Uccala, at that time, arrived at Hiranyapura, the Brahmans of Uccala's Abhiṣeka. that place assembled and consecrated him as king.

1386-1387. While these events were happening, the ministers [thus advised] the king who was greatly dispirited: "[Your enemies] are too many. Go, therefore, with these to the mountains of Lohara. The people themselves will soon recall you from there when their oneness for a new ruler has passed away, or you will yourself return in [a few] days."

1388. He replied: "I am not able to start at once, leaving behind the ladies of my seraglio, my treasures, the throne and other precious things."

1389. They answered: "Trusted servants mounted on horses will place behind their backs the treasures and the ladies of the seraglio, and bring them on."

1390. "What loss of dignity is there if that throne on which a lover of a S'vapaka woman was [seated], is occupied by another?"

✓ 1385. Hiranyapura has been identified in note i. 287 with the present village of Ranyil on the way from Jar (Lahara) to Srinagar.

1386-87. The text shows here a lacuna which probably extends over four padas.

From verse 1391 it may be concluded that the missing words contained also a request for advice addressed to the ministers by the king.

1390. Cakravartin's conduct is alluded to; comp. v. 383 sqq.

HARṢA
(A.D. 1089-1101).

1391. When the king then pressed them: "Let this be, give me other advice!" they spoke to him in haste a great deal more.

[1392-1404. Proverbial sayings put into the mouth of the ministers about the value of courage, firmness, etc., in dangerous situations. Praise of those who bravely seek the end of their troubles in battle. No reference is made to Harṣa's specific situation.]

Ministers' advice to
Harṣa.

1405. When he rejected also this advice and pressed for fresh counsel, they felt in despair, and spoke to him thus roughly and as the occasion required.

1406. "You may also in your difficulty give up your life like Utkarṣa. Otherwise you might suffer something disgraceful intended [for you] by your enemies."

1407. He replied to them: "I am unable to kill myself. Therefore you should slay me when misfortune has arrived."

1408. The ministers felt pained by these words of the king who had succumbed to cowardice just as [if he were] a man of low station, and addressed him again with tears in their eyes.

1409. "If we, deprived of strength by fate, are unable to remove [this danger], how could our arms proceed to such a deed?"

1410. Surely those [councillors] whom the king had cherished, must have been beasts in human form that they did not remove his misfortune when he had reached such a pitiable state.

1411. Fie over the weakness [displayed] by servants on an occasion when success can be achieved by the mere sacrifice of that body which is bound to decay, though it may have lived to the end of Yugas!

1412. Who is meaner than he who, though being a man, forgets that attachment to the master, the recollection of which makes women enter the pyre?

1413. Those who look upon their master's sorrow, fear, misery, and other afflictions as if they were an actor's [exhibitions], make this earth unholy, though it is [hallowed] by sacred places.

1414. If a man has seen his son dying of hunger, his wife under the necessity of being sent to another person's house, his best friend in distress, his milk-owl pained by want of food and the rest and howling plaintively, his parents ill and on the point of death, and his lord overcome by the enemy,—then hell has for him no greater torment in store.

1415. The king who had done high acts though he had fallen into errors as if possessed by demons, addressed once more those beasts of men.

1416. "Nobody else, I know, will reign with such wide aims as I have reigned in this late period."

1417. " 'Death and Kubera sit upon the lips of kings,' this saying was true of me alone in this Kali Yuga."

1418. "When fate arrives whose way has to be followed by Rudra, Upendra (Viṣṇu), and the great Indra, what grief is that for a mortal?"

1419. "What torments me, is that this land, after having been like a virtuous woman, should have fallen like a prostitute into the arms of the insolent."

1420. "Henceforth whoever knows how to succeed by mere intrigue will aspire to this kingdom whose power is gone."

1421. "The cowards, whose day of success has come, will surely laugh haughtily seeing that whatever [was done by me] with superhuman effort has been in vain."

1422. "People generally do not blame an enterprise if they see its success, since they do not consider whether it was justified [by the attending circumstances]."

1423. "Since the churning [of the ocean] has succeeded, does anyone blame the churning-mountain (Mandaraṁbri) for the unfavourable circumstances [attending the enterprise], namely that the destroyer of the wings [of the mountains, i.e. Indra], an enemy, was the helper, and that he whose juice causes death (Vāsuki), was the churning-cord."

1424. "That for the sake of maintaining the people I, though versed in a combination of sciences, affected to be [solely] a producer of riches (śrīgarbha), this has been the cause of my confusion."

1425. "Ucāla too, whose intellect might be gathered on the tip of a finger, will mock my actions, showing his black teeth [in a laugh]."

1426. "On account of this disgrace then, [but] not from fear, I desire, now that I have fallen into a helpless state, such a death, wishing [thereby] also to vindicate myself."

1427. "The robe I wish to preserve the renown which falls [to me] owing to [the people's saying]: 'Who could have taken away from him the land, if he had not been killed by his own people?'"

1428. "Once, King Muktāpīṭha, who had been shining at the head of kings, was caught by his enemies in a difficult situation, and reduced to great straits."

1423. When the gods churned the Ocean to recover the fourteen 'Ratnas,' the great serpent Vāsuki was twisted round the mountain which served as the churning stick, and Indra directed the operation.

1424. Compare for the term śrīgarbha and its possible significance, note vii. 1108.

1425. The reading of Durgāpr., matkṛtye, is an acceptable emendation for A satkṛtye, justified by the close resemblance of म and स in Śāradā writing.

1426. The king refers to the death at his servants' hand for which he has asked in vii. 1407.

1428. The story told as an episode in verses 1428-1449 represents one of the versions in which the legends of King Muktāpīṭha-Jalilāditya's death lived in popular tradition; comp. iv. 337-370. The particular version here related has already been briefly referred to by the author in iv. 368.

ILARSA
(A.D. 1080-1101).

ILARSA
(A.D. 1080-1101).

Tale of King
Mudāpīṭa's death.

1429. "When he was marching in the northern region with a few followers, after having hidden his troops on different routes, he was blocked by the enemy on a difficult path."

1430. "As he was roudored helpless by the scarcity of stores, the [hostile] King S'alya by name, who had eight lakhs of horses, vowed to capture him."

1431. "Dispirited in his mind by the thought that negotiations and the like expedients wore of no avail, he asked his chief minister called Bhavaśvāmin what to do."

1432. "The latter, too, felt convinced that the calamity could not be averted, and recognizing the necessity of taking a proper course, replied to him."

[1433-1441. General exhortations to preserve honour and renown. The latter alone can escape decay and must be protected against fate, which is bent on humiliating those of exalted position.]

1442. "'Recognizing, O king, that the pleasures which you have cherished and enjoyed, have [now] wholly vanished, the time has come to exert yourself for keeping your honour intact.'"

1443. "'Pretend to-day, O king, to be suddenly attacked by that rapidly acting disease called daṇḍakālasaka.'"

1444. "'To-morrow, then, I shall tell you what has to be done to avert the calamity.' With these words the chief minister left and proceeded to his own abode."

1445. "The king thereupon pretended to have the daṇḍakālasaka illness, and rolling about with motionless eyes shouted like one out of senses."

1446. "As his sufferings were [apparently] not reduced by sweating, massago, vomiting and other remedies, the people said that he was going to die."

1447. "The minister then declared that his master was doomed to die, and in order to show his gratitude burned himself."

1448. "The king praised him for having thus aptly indicated the hard course of action which from delicacy he had not mentioned before as the only one left."

1449. "The proud king, too, then burned himself, after declaring that he was unable to support the excessive pains."

1450. "This wise [king] by thus giving up his life, prepared the steps for the rise of his own glory, but not for that of the fame of others."

1451. "Thus strong-minded [kings] succeed, by their own resolution

1432. Emend with Durgāpr. nyānye.

1440. The lacuna of A is filled by L na.

1443. According to a passage from the Carakasaṁhitā quoted in N.P.W., the illness here named is a kind of dysentery.

or a counsellor's advice, in averting the disgrace which fate wrought [for them]."

IIARSA
(A.D. 1080-1101)

1452. When he (Harsa) stopp'd after saying those words, the ministers advised him to send Bhoja, his son, to the castle [of Lohara] to preserve his lineage.

1453. When the prince had started after the ceremony for an auspicious departure [had been performed] he, deluded by the prefect of police, recalled him.

1454. His wisdom, bold resolution and decision vanished all at once in his misfortune, when the time of his ruin had approached.

1455. The lightning of fortune, the crane of glory, the thunder of courage and the rainbow of fame, they all follow the cloud of fate.

1456. The same king of whom in the time of his good fortune it is hold on account of his wisdom, courage, and other qualities that he might attack Indra,—he, at the rise of misfortune becomes incapable, just as [if he were] lame, foolish and blind, and people ask themselves how, indeed, he could have put down his foot on the ground.

1457. The Thutrin troops, when sent to oppose the enemy, claimed marching allowances, though they remained in the town.

Dissolution of Harsa servants.

1458. All the servants of the king too betook themselves to his [rival] kinsmen; and those few who remained at home, [stayed there] only in body [but not in mind].

1459. There were two or three who had not even the desire to join the enemy. Yet why should they be praised when they soon gave up their lives in the fashion of women?

1460-62. A dancing girl of the family of the female dancer Kāṇasrāvati, had adopted a girl of unknown origin called Jayamati. The latter after losing her virginity was as a young woman Uccala's mistress, and became subsequently from greed of money the concubine of the governor Ananila. When the latter died she, devoid of shame, went to Uccala. This very person through the will of fate was destined to become the chief-queen [of Uccala].

1463. The royal servants collected in bands and talked without fear of Uccala, even when observed by the king.

1464-1466. Every single soldier whom the mass of the mercenaries would employ as their mouth-piece; who would take away the man's courage in battle by talking loudly about the greed and disgrace [of the leaders]; who, when he [himself] proved inefficient, would make jokes which cut to the quick; who would cause affrays at the time of taking rations, etc., by claiming a privilege, and who would 1462. The term kota or kotta is used very frequently in the Chronicle as an abbreviation for Loharakotta. The latter, as the family stronghold of Harsa and his successors, is 'the Castle,' kar' ३६; comp. vii. 969, 1000, 1013; viii. 1031, 1034, 1066 sqq., etc., and Note J.

HAṚṢA
(A. D. 1089-1101).

be an expert in discussing the greatness of their master's liberality, etc.,—each one of these caused demoralization in the ranks.

1467. The king in his hatred of the family of Malla had Vyādhiramāṅgala, the son of S'rīlekṣhī's nephew, attacked and killed.

1468. His wife, who was a daughter of the maternal uncle of Malla's sons (Ānanda), and her mother-in-law set their house on fire and burned themselves.

Attack on Malla.

1469-1470. At that time the S'āhi princesses spoke thus to the king: "Malla is an accomplished hypocrite who makes [your] court disaffected, while hiding his ferocious nature, like another Yama, under the observance of the vow of silence and other [austerities]. Therefore, let him, as an enemy and anxious to see his sons on the throne, be killed without fear."

1471. He (Harṣa) himself proceeded to the attack, and as he stood at the gate lusting for his life, Malla went before him to fulfil his desire.

1472. He led the life of a Muni, and had in keeping with his honourable character refused to leave the king, though his sons had asked him [to do so], when about to start their rebellion.

1473. He, however, had remained in his house, and had given Saṭhaya and [two] other half-brothers of the two future kings [Uccala and Sussala] as hostages, in order to assure the king.

1474. Against him then, who had lived the life of a Muni, and had observed from his earliest time the cult of a [sacred] fire, the doomed king turned his rage.

1475. He was at worship when he was called by the enemies, and when he went forth to the fight, he shone forth in that same dress.

1476-1478. Wearing the sacred cord, holding in his hands the rosary, with his fingers rendered brilliant by the sacrificial grass, with his forehead smiling, as it were, with its mark of ashes, he [appeared] like another Jāmadagnya (Parasūrāma). At the time of death he seemed to carry on his head the water of Prayāga under the guise of his moving locks which were wet from the bath, and partly white, partly black. His hero's band (vīrapaṭṭa) seemed like an [ordinary] headdress, his shield like a parasol; carrying his sword-blade (asidhārā) he seemed as if on the way to the Dhārātīrtha, and his sword appeared as if it were his staff.

1467. Regarding S'rīlekṣhī, the queen of Saṅgramarāja, see vii. 123.

1468. For Ānanda, see vii. 1317.

1469-70. Harṣa's wives from the S'āhi race are mentioned again, vii. 1550, 1571; comp. also Note J, v. 152-155, and vii. 958.

1473. Saṭhaya, Lothana and Raṭha were born from S'vetā (see viii. 378 sq., also vii. 1487), Uccala and Sussala from Nanda, vii. 1491.

1476-78. The various comparisons and puns, which can in part only be paraphrased, account for the remark made in the preceding verso, viz. that Malla, when going out to fight, seemed yet to retain the dress of a Muni.

The waters of the Gaṅga and Yamunā meeting at Prayāga are supposed to be white and black respectively; comp. note iii. 327. For the sacred bathing-place Dhārā, compare P. W., s.v.

1479. Some servants of his who went before him, were first to receive the embrace of the celestial maids, as they had held also the foremost rank in his employ.

1480. Two Brahmans, Ragyanātha and Vijaya, also the superintendent of the kitchen Koṣṭhaka and the soldier Sajjaka distinguished themselves by falling in that fight.

1481. The doorkeeper Udayarāja, though wounded, and the agent Ajjaka, escaped with their lives, as their time had not yet come.

1482. Seeing the gate closely beset on all sides by the hostile soldiers, he (Malla) threw himself fearlessly at their head.

1483. He whose [hair] was bleached by old age, appeared, as he was rushing about among the swords and shields, like a flamingo among S'ovala plants (Blyxa octandra) and lotuses.

1484. And in a short time he was soon pierced by hundreds of sharp-pointed arrows, and asleep on his couch of a hero like another Bhīṣma.

1485. How deplorable was not such a king who, [himself] being near his end, cut off [Malla's] head and in arrogance rode his horse over his back?

1486. Malla's princely consort Kumudaleklā and his wife's sister Vallabhā, immolated themselves in a fire kindled in their residence.

1487. Āsumatī and Sahajā, Malla's daughters-in-law, who were the wives of Salhaṇa and Ratha, and the daughters of Rāja and Avakalya, [respectively], also burned themselves.

1488. Also six female attendants of the ladies of his household, who had been in the enjoyment of all comforts, died on the same pyre.

1489. This happened on the left bank of the Vitastā, the water of which became warm by the conflagration of the great house and by the tears hot with grief.

1490-1494. Nandā, the mother of future kings, who was of noble birth, was in her own seraglio on the other side [of the river] and was eagerly looking from a high terrace towards the camps of her sons, distinguishable in the north and south by the smoke of their kitchen-fires. This virtuous lady burned herself in her house together with her nurse Cāndrī, who felt unable to see the water which was to be offered at the funeral libations of her whom she had brought up as a child with her own milk. She (Nandā) had not yet seated herself in the flaming fire, but was [already] surrounded by the flames which were playing around, as [if they were her] female companions, when she uttered the following curse against the king: "May you, O sons, before many days do to the family of your father's enemy what the son of Jamadagni (Parasūrāma) did."

1484. Bhīṣma, the Kaurava, was wounded to death by numberless arrows.

1493. Parasūrāma revenged the murder of his father by exterminating the whole Kṣatriya race.

HARSA
(A.D. 1089-1101).

Death of Malla.

HARṢA
(A.D. 1089-1101).

1495. Darśanapāla, though the king was preparing to kill him, was saved from moment to moment by wonderful incidents, as he was yet destined to live.

1496. Or it may be that he was spared by malice for only one other year to suffer humiliation and to rot away by disease.

1497. When Malla's sons heard of their father's murder on the ninth of the dark half of Bhādrapada, their grief became absorbed in rage.

Sussala attacks Vi-jayeśvara.

1498. Burning then, with the fire of his fury, the villages as far as Vahnipuraka, Sussala marched hastily on the following day towards Vijayakṣetra.

1499. When thereupon Candrarāja marched out to meet his attack Paṭṭa, Darśanapāla and others deserted him together with their troops.

1500. Though abandoned by those on his own side and having only a very small force, he maintained for a long time the combat with the enemy's strong forces.

1501. In that battle the two Rājagṛhyas Aṣoṭumalla and Malla, a descendant of Cacara, were received in the embraces of the celestial maids.

1502. While the darkness [created] by the dust was lit up by his moon-like parasol, Candrarāja fell and was received in the arms of the divine maids as well as his follower Indurāja.

1503. By [causing] the death of this hero, too, fate tore up, as it were to their very fibres, the roots of the lotus-plantation of King Harṣa's hopes.

Capture of Vijayeśvara.

1504. When Sussala then entered that place (Vijayeśvara), Paṭṭa and the rest fled in fear into the courtyard of the temple of Vijayeśa and closed the gate.

1505. Only the councillor (āsthānīya) Padma fell outside fighting. Lakṣmīdhara, who sought death, was led away as a captive by the Ḍāmaras.

1506. Sussala then ascended to the terraced roof of the treasury (gaṇḍa) of the Vijayeśvara [temple] and saw them all below [assembled] like frightened animals.

1507. The cunning [Sussala] after giving sureties had, with a laugh, first among them the two, Paṭṭa and Darśanapāla, brought into his presence.

1508. As they could not get up to him for want of a ladder, Sussala's followers dragged them up by a rope, to which they clung, half dead, with their hands.

1495. Darśanapāla, though keeping by Harṣa's side, was a secret supporter of the pretenders; see vii. 1253, 1356.

1498. Vahnipuraka is nowhere else mentioned. Durgāpr. has proposed to amend āvalnipuraka into avantipuraka, referring the passage to the villages about Avantipura. But the expression brodhāvahninā contains clearly an allusion to the name Vahnipuraka.

The place meant might be the present village of Vampūr, situated about two miles to S.W. of Vijapur: Vijayeśvara.

1502. The original reading in A, subsequently corrected by A., makes Indurāja the son of Candrarāja.

1505. Comp. regarding the term āsthānīya, note vii. 85.

1509. When ashamed they asked permission to go abroad, the thoughtful Sussala promised this and thus alleviated their disgrace.

1510. Being treated by him to fried meat and other [delicacies] and being gently talked to, that same day they forgot their anxious desire to go broad.

1511. The recollection of that what Sussala, under some [strange] impulse, did on the following day, must verily thrill even the body of the creator of the universe.

1512-1514. He opened the door and stepped quite alone, carrying his sword and using harsh insulting words, into the midst of those assembled in the courtyard of the temple of Vijayेश्वरा, where there were King Jāsa, the son of King Ugr's maternal uncle, and three other chiefs, Umādhara, etc., and where the multitude of Rājaputras, horsemen, Yātrins and feudatories [belonging] to the eighteen [divisions of the] army could not be counted.

1515. He mercifully promised safety to them who prostrated themselves, and then after taking the [image of Ś'iva] Vijayेश्वरा there as witness.

1516. He then ascended again to the terrace, had them all disarmed, and led by his servants, with their arms bound by ropes.

1517. The place where Sussala held his assembly, being covered with heaps of gold and silver sword-hilts and decked with arms, appeared as if decorated with strewn flowers.

1518. He handed them over to the Īmāras to guard as [one hands] cattle to herdsmen, and stopped there for three days.

1519. When he had reached the village of Suvarṇasāmāra, he then discharged Paṭṭa and Darśanapāla, who wished to go abroad.

1520. The weak Paṭṭa on reaching S'ūrapura, was joined by his wife who had come from her home, and forgot to go abroad.

1521. The little docency which the treacherous Darśanapāla had shown by his desire of going abroad, was counteracted by his friendship for Paṭṭa.

1511. Correct with C and Durgāpr. 'pyaś-gaṇh.

1512-13. Our passage shows that Bappikā, Harsa's mother, was a princess of Campā. Regarding the relations between the royal houses of Kāśmīr and Campā, see note vii. 218.

Jāsa is mentioned again viii. 538, 547 sqq., as lord of Campā.

Regarding the eighteen divisions conventionally counted in an army, see note vii. 1371.

1519. Suvarṇasāmāra is probably identical with the present village Sun'sāmūl, situated in the Ś'ukra Pargana, 74° 56' 15" long. 33° 50' 40"

lat. (marked on larger Survey map). This identification is supported by vii. 1131, 1136, where the place is mentioned in connection with Kalyāṇapura (Kulampūr, see note iv. 483) and S'ūrapura. Skr. suvarṇa appears in Kā. as śaṇa.

1520-21. The text of the first verse as found in A₁ gives no proper sense. Saṁśṛjya-māno is an impossible form, and has probably to be corrected with Durgāpr. into saṁśṛjya-māno. The following verse also shows that 'pyasmūrīd cannot be correct. I have translated above according to the conjectural emendation vyasmūrīd.

IIARSA
(A.D. 1089-1101).

Sussala attacks S'inagar.

1522. Sussala, then eager to seize the throne for himself, wished to prevent his elder brother from occupying the City.

1523. [This was] because the relation between the older and younger brother did not imply any precedence, as they were almost of the same age and at all times [equally] arrogant.

1524. In the course of two or three days the energetic Sussala occupied various places, and appeared in the neighbourhood of the royal palace itself.

1525. When he was about to set fire to Bhojadeva, the king's son whose other name was Buppa, went forth to fight him.

1526-1527. His father fearing from his own example the wickedness of prince, had, by the will of fate, always kept him powerless. But now he was set free [to act] as there remained no other resource, and in how many combats was he now the foremost of the fighters!

1528. If he had before been brought up to be the equal of his grown grandfather (Ananta), would not this resolute [prince] have cleared all regions of rivals?

1529. There is, indeed, nobody who has not a good plan, but its execution is neglected. Everybody knows how to use a dart, but he is a rare person who knows the aim [for it].

1530. This prince was born to surpass his adversary whose valour was excessive, just as the Timingala ('swallower of the Timi') [surpasses] the large son-fish (timi).

1531. Because the father displays ingratitude, his progeny does not deserve to be reproached. Because the sesamum-seed is turned into a pasty refuse, does the oil [pressed from it] lose the perfume of blossoms which it has imparted?

1532. Pittha, the wicked son of Devesvara, though raised by the king to a high position, had yet joined the enemy's party.

1533-1534. When the fight with Sussala had commenced, the king asked his (Pittha's) son Milla for his horse. Pained by the [king's] contemptuous look, he exclaimed: "To-day you will recognize, O king, my true character." Then going out, he proudly in battle washed off the insult with the streams [of blood] that flowed from the sword-blades.

1535. The ruin of everything did not cause such great pain to the king's heart, as his failure to recognize the true character of that grateful man.

1525. The text has here a lacuna which, though only of one syllable, renders it impossible to ascertain the meaning of the preceding word kalaśā. . . . It might have been the name of a building (temple of Kalaśa?) or the designation of a portion of the palace.

1536. Kings, however, being continually deceived by their exalted position, realize the true character [of their servants] only at the time when they can honour it solely by words.

1537. Sussala, whose force was defeated by Bhoja, left the battle precipitately and fled to Lavanotsa, having twice come and gone.

1538. When Bhoja returned exhausted by the fierce heat, he stretched himself out repeatedly on a couch by his father's side in the garden.

1539. Then there arose a shout in the north from the bank opposite to the royal palace: "The elder son of Malla has arrived. Break off the bridge!"

1540. The wicked prefect of police (Samra) had sent him (Uccala) word: "The throne is in Sussala's power, if you do not reach to-day."

1541. Thereupon he marched on in haste, and first slew in battle Devanāyaka, who stood before the [temple of the] god Narendrāvara.

1542. Then Nāga, the town-prefect, who was encamped (sthūmastha) and who disposed of numerous troops, marched forth with a force of horsemen to meet him.

1543. As he (Nāga) was accompanied by chosen troops, the king relied upon him, and having [successfully] emerged from the fight with Sussala, felt no fear of Uccala.

1544. While Malla's son (Uccala) whose force was small, feared [an attack] from him, he (Nāga) took off his helmet and offered him greeting.

1545. He (Uccala) suspected that he (Nāga) might like the governor (Ānanda) be attached to the opponent, and therefore he told him to go to his own house. This the wretch did.

1537. Regarding Lavanotsa, see note i. 320.

1539. This passage proves conclusively that the palace, as explained in note vii. 186-187, stood on the left or southern bank of the river.

1541. The shrine of Narendrāvara is nowhere else mentioned. It might have been erected by, or named in honour of, King Narendraditya-Lakṣmaṇa; see iii. 383.

It is doubtful whether the word devanāyaka is really a proper name, or only an ironical designation of Udayarāja whom Harṣa in vii. 1091 is said to have appointed as 'prefect for the overthrow of divine images' (devotpātānanāyaka). No mention is made subsequently of Udayarāja.

1542. Here the rendering of sthūmastha is conjectural. The word, which clearly has a military significance, recurs viii. 663 sq., 762. Some indication as to its meaning is furnished by certain passages of Śrīvara's Chronicle, where the simple sthūman seems to designate the 'camp' or 'cantonment,' and sthūmastha or sthūmasthita the troops occupying it. In iv. 225 sqq. we read of a dislocation of troops according to which one division is to form the centre by occupying the city and two other divisions to form the wings by going into 'sthūman.' iv. 249 mentions a distribution of the forces by three routes 'according to their separate sthūmans.' In iv. 208 a leader is spoken of as 'sthūmasthita,' i.e. encamped at the outskirts of the city; and in iv. 445 it is said of another that he used part of his troops for guarding the routes and dismissed another 'sthūmārtham,' i.e., as I understand it, to their standing quarters.

The meaning here conjecturally proposed for the word sthūman, agrees with its etymology and the interpretation given for it in Vedic passages, viz. 'station,' 'place'; comp. P.W., s.v.

1545. The stratagem of Ānanda, related vii. 1323 sqq., is alluded to.

IIARṢA
(A.D. 1080-1101).

Uccala enters S'āmagar.

हार्या
(A.D. 1089-1101).

Fight at the city bridge.

1546. The reward which this man got for his treachery was seen in his present life; he died after having had to beg in this very land.

1547. When the king then came to the river-bank he saw at the bridge-head the Dāmaras, whose [appearance] was changed and dark like that of trees burned by a forest fire.

1548. In their midst only the body of Janakacandra, who wore white armour, shone forth like that of the planet Venus in the darkness.

1549. The king had constructed the 'Great Bridge' (mahāsetu) with boats for his own benefit, but by the will of fate it served in the end the enemy's advantage.

1550. Then the S'ūhi princesses and the other queens eager to die, ascended with fire-brands to the four-pillared pavilion (catuṣṭhika) of the 'Palace of hundred gates' (śatadvāra).

1551. The people looked on with indifference as their lord fought with his rivals at the bridge-head, without feeling affected, just as [if it were mere] horse-play on the Āsvayujī day.

1552. The king took up the flight at the bridge-head, and again and again held back his wives from setting fire [to the palace, in the hope] that victory was yet in store.

1553. Then Janakacandra and others shot arrows at the king's fighting elephant, which stood in front of the bridge and had thrown off its armour.

1554. Hit in the joints by arrows, the elephant raised a trumpeting roar, and turning back trampled down with his feet his own force.

1555. Attacked by the elephant which had turned hostile, as fate [had done], the foot and horse of the army were routed.

1556. The king retiring before the enemy's soldiers then crossed the bridge, and together with the horsemen entered in a panic the courtyard of the 'Palace of hundred gates.'

1557-1564. He who was never seen even in private without magnificent apparel, and the hollow of whose mouth could not be seen even while eating,—his body

1549. Comp. regarding the use of boat-bridges in Kaśmir, note iii. 354.

1550. Judging from vii. 1558, śatadvāra seems to have been the designation of a separate building in the palace. Possibly a large quadrangle is meant from which a hundred doors opened. By catuṣṭhika is meant probably an open pavilion attached to the palace, and having four pillars; comp. vii. 1670 sq.; viii. 23, 28, 1875, 2327, also catuṣṭka, vii. 1024.

1551. The text of this passage is restored by reading with I. °āsvayujigāṁ for °yujigāṁ of A, which gives no sense. The old custom mentioned in the Nilamata of indulging in mutual jokes and playful abuse on the last day of the Āsvayujī month, has been fully explained in note iv. 710. With the expression āsvayujigāṁ in our passage are to be compared the words of the Nilamata, III sqq.: kardamenāmlip-tāṅgaib hṛdītaryam tathā naraiḥ | suhṛdaḥ kardamenāpi lepayadbhir itas tetaḥ || . . . aśīlām vadamānais ca hyākrośadbhis tathā dvija.

was [now seen] perspiring in the sweat caused by the sunrays whose [force] was doubled by the fright; his attendants had to replace again and again the armour which slipped from his shoulders; repeatedly he drew back the arm which had lost its hold on the reins, in order to keep back the horse which was urged on by the touch of his unsteady heels; with his hand from which the sword had glided, he was arranging behind his ears the locks of hair, which were hanging from the side of his bald head; on his withered neck hung down his long dangling earlap which had no ornament, and which appeared like the very snake of death; he threw up again and again his lips, dry from the want of betel and yellow like lac, and with difficulty moistened them in his exhaustion; raising his emaciated wan face, in which the pupils of the eyes were covered with dust, he looked with despair in his heart at his wives, who stood on the roof; by signs of his hand he was holding them back, anxious as they were to set fire [to the building]. Thus the people saw him in his fear moving about within the courtyard.

IIARSA
(A.D. 1080-1101).

1565. Mallaraja's residence which was close to the royal palace, was set on fire by Janakacandra after crossing the river.

Capture of palace.
Bhoja's flight.

1566. When Bhoja saw the flaming fire approaching towards the palace, he took to flight, knowing that the kingdom was lost.

1567. Breaking open the gate which was covered with the enemies' darts just as if with reeds, he rushed out on horseback from the courtyard into the open.

1568. Accompanied by five or six horsemen he set out with the intention of reaching Lohara, after crossing the bridge in front of the Simharajamatha.

1569. The king rode about with some horsemen outside the buildings and with tears [in his eyes] looked in the direction where his son had disappeared from sight.

1570. In the meantime the servants of some of the king's wives were battering the four-pillared pavilion (catuskika) in order to save [their mistresses] who were seeking death.

1571. The Sāhi princesses did not know this, and thinking that the enemy had broken in, set fire thereupon to the roof of the four-pillared pavilion.

1572. Then citizens and Pāmaras striking at each other with upraised weapons plundered the treasures and other [valuables] in the burning palace.

1573. Some found their death there; others got rid of their poverty; some 1568. It is not probable that Bhoja in order to proceed to Lohara in the S.W. should have crossed from the palace, which was on the left bank (see note vii. 184-187), to the other side of the Vitastā. In vii. 1513, however, we are told that Cappaka, when starting after the prince, did the same thing. It is possible that a bridge over the Kṣiptikā (Kut^hkut) or Dagdhaigū ('het^hkut) is meant here.

1570. The queens on entering the 'Catuskika' had blocked its door, and the servants who wish to prevent them from burning themselves, have first to force an entrance.

HARṢA
(A.D. 1009-1101).

Sacking of the palace.

became ridiculous by obtaining things which they had never set their eyes upon before.

1574. One put camphor into his mouth thinking it was white sugar. Then as it burned his mouth, he threw the pot into the river.

1575. Some low-caste people eager to get gold burned clothes which were painted with gold, and then anxiously searched the ashes.

1576. In one place low-caste women were grinding in hand-mills a mass of unpierced pearls, taking them for white rice-corns.

1577. The goddess of wealth (Lakṣmī) which resided in this . . . land, after having been mocked by such ill-treatment, did not show herself anywhere again.

1578. Wild Dāmaras could be seen at every step carrying ladies of the king's seraglio who wore magnificent dresses, and resembled fairies.

1579. Seventeen queens with Vasantalekhā at their head, including daughters-in-law [of the king], burned themselves there while the rest left.

1580. Such was the crackling heard from the burning buildings that it made one believe that it was the bubbling of the aerial stream boiling under intense heat.

1581. The king, as he viewed this [spectacle] standing close to the drinking-fountain (prapā) of the illustrious Padmasrī, recited again and again this ancient verse which he remembered in his anguish :

1582. "The fire which has risen from the burning pains of the subjects, does not go out, until it has consumed the king's race, fortune and life."

1583. Uccala, when he saw that his opponent had yet an armed force, crossed back to the other bank [of the Vitastā] together with the Dāmaras, after burning the palace.

1584. The king, who wished to find his death fighting, was thrown into fresh confusion at every moment by the numerous conflicting opinions [prevailing] among his foot-troops.

1585. Every time he was going into combat by the advice of Anantapāla and other Rājaputras, he was turned back by the words of the prefect of police.

1586. Caṇṇaka advised him either to fight or to go to Lohara. Prayāga was for the second course, but not the first.

1577. I am unable to make any proper sense with A °tyadrīye or L °tyadrīse. A possible conjecture would be °tyadrīye.

1580. The Gaṅgā in its flow through the air (ākāśagaṅgā) is alluded to.

1581. The Padmasrī-prapā, only here mentioned, might have been a drinking-fountain or well constructed by Padmasrī, the queen of Kalāśa; comp. vii. 781.

1582. This verse is found, according to BÖHTLINGER, Ind. Sprüche, 4206, with slight textual variations in the Yājñavalkya-smṛti, the Pañcatantra, and in numerous didactic texts and anthologies.

1586. The mention which K. makes here of his father Caṇṇaka, and of a servant of the latter, vii. 1623, is of interest, as it indicates the probable source from which K. gathered his detailed account of the last days of Harṣa.

For Prayāga, Harṣa's trusted servant, see vii. 632.

1587. The king had received no news of his son, and in his anxiety told Cappaka to follow up his track.

1588. With a sigh the latter spoke to him: "O king, in a short time you will have no one else to follow you but Prayāgu. Hence you ought not to send me away also."

1589. With tears the king replied to him: "People say that you are honest. Then why do you also disregard my order at this moment?"

1590. "Without my son I cannot recognize the quarters, though it may be day-time and the sun [visible]. You ought not to feel anger against him who has grown up on your arms."

1591. For the minister had had in those very days a quarrel with the proud prince on account of a mare.

1592. Touched by these words of his master which contained a reproach, he bent his head downwards in embarrassment and started to follow up the prince.

1593. Though he [had started] with fifty horsemen, including his brothers, servants, and others, he found himself only with four [to follow him] when he reached the other side of the river.

1594. When his two brothers and S'cēṇṇja's son, the horseman, had fallen on the road after having their horses killed, he roamed about followed only by Dhamuka.

1595. After he had wandered by the river-way though without obtaining news of the prince, he came at the close of the day to the confluence of the Vilastā and Sinuthu.

1596. In the same fashion the king despatched other trusted persons to search for his son, and others again used this pretext to leave his side.

1597-1599. The prefect of police, who had taken bribes and shown himself disaffected in the war against Īṇjapuri and elsewhere; who, unable to tolerate efficient officers [by his side], had rendered the army worthless; who had made the king object to his son's departure to Lohara; who had brought the enemy into the City while the king was taken up by another fight,—he who had brought about the ruin of everything, also prevented the king at that time from taking the proper course of action.

1600. The weak-minded king listened in complete dejection to the manifold advice, and could not decide himself upon any single action.

1594. The text is here corrupt. I translate after the emendation proposed in the Ed. One of Cappaka's brothers, Kanaka, is mentioned, vii. 1117.

1596. I have adopted in translating

Durgap's emendation vīracarmanā for the meaningless vā varmanā of the text.

1597-99. Compare for Samra's various treasonable acts, vii. 1155 sqq., 1161, 1453, 1540.

HAUSA
(A.D. 1089-1101).

Cappaka sent after Bhaja.

IIARSA
(A.D. 1089-1101).

1601. As indeed a flute does not give a sound, if all blow at its different holes, thus too, counsel, if swayed in many different directions by the [opinions of] various people, does not arrive at a resolution.

1602. It is verily a sign of the [imponding] catastrophe, when even a mean person, without having been asked, can boldly give the advice which suits his mental character.

1603. When the king was proceeding to fight, an equerry (sūta), Trailokya by name, laid hold of his reins and extolling the prefect of police, again addressed him thus :

1604. "Your grandfather once won a victory with the Ekāṅgas and the mounted men. Therefore, let us go to the Akṣapaṭala [office], in order to collect them."

1605. "Joined by them we fall from behind upon the enemies, whose force consists chiefly of foot soldiers, and destroy them as falcons [destroy] the birds."

Descent of Harṣa
[100]st.

1606. Thereupon when the king was about to move [in that direction], his force dispersed in all directions, just like people caught by a down-pour while watching a theatrical performance.

1607. To the sons of S'cyārāja, who had come from (?) Pārevitasta, he gave his jewelled necklace and other [ornaments] to provide for his son on the journey.

1608. As soon as this regal ornament was in the hands of those market gardeners, the king who had been distinguished by high lustre, appeared to the people deprived of his royal dignity.

1609. While his soldiers deserted at every step, he moved about between the Akṣapaṭala and other offices, but no one joined him.

1610. Then in the evening he wandered about looking for a refuge among the houses of his ministers, but not one let him in when he stood at the door.

1611. Those [Brahmans] who are clever in solemn fasts (prāyapañśā), are thoroughly useless in the end. Vain is the reliance which kings put on wretched Brahmanas.

1612. As he was anxiously wandering about among the houses of all those who were [of note] in this land, hoping to be received, he came to the house of the minister Kaṇḍa.

1604. Regarding the Ekāṅgas and their share in the victory of Ananta, see vii. 156 sqq.; for the akṣapaṭala and its connection with the Ekāṅgas, comp. note v. 301.

1607. The form Pārevitastām of A L cannot be correct. Local names, formed by prefixing pāre to a river name, are treated as masc. or neuter (comp. Pāreviśoka, iv. 5; vi. 180). It appears further from Janar, 651, 869, that the locality called Pārevitasta must have been situated a considerable distance above Srinagar. As neither Bhoja nor the king proceeded up the river, the accusative ending of Pārevitastām would be inexplicable. I accordingly propose to emend Pārevitastāt.

The person referred to here as S'cyārāja is possibly identical with the S'cyārāja of vii. 1594.

1613. The latter was away at the castle of Lohara; his wife asked the king to stop and [then] to proceed in boats towards the castle, but deceived by fate he did not enter.

HARSA
(A.D. 1080-1101).

1614. The [minister's] sons, whose perfidy was like that of their father, hid themselves from the unfortunate [king], just like poor debtors from their creditors.

1615. While evil councillors had before kept from his view all the [wrong] he had done, he now heard reproaches and recognized that he was guilty.

1616. Wholly overcome by despair and distrusting even those at his side, he was completely deserted by his followers when he had passed the [hill of] Pradyumna.

Harsa's flight from Srinagar.

1617-1618. Even those Rājaputras, Anantapala and the rest, who claim descent from the thirty-six families and who in their pride would not concede a higher position to the son himself, they too left him step by step, and their horses disappeared in the dense darkness.

1619. When he had descended from his horse after approaching the Johlamatha, the prefect of police with his younger brother also deserted him.

1620. "Here is my father-in-law's house," he said; "after looking for a place there for you to pass the night, I shall return." Under this pretext he departed.

1621. As he was going, Prayāga asked his younger brother for his bracelet in order to procure provisions; instead of this he gave him barley.

1622. Then the king was left with his property consisting of a single garment, with his bare life and with the single Prayāga as follower.

1623. At that hour Mukta, the cook of Canpaka's attendant Jelaka, joined the king and became his trusted companion.

1624. As they were wandering about, a woman from a den called out to them that the ground in front was difficult to get over on account of breaches made by the flood.

1614. Compare regarding Kapila's conduct, vii. 1200.

1616. Pradyumna is probably an abbreviation of the name Pradyumnapitha or Pradyumnasikhara given to the 'hill of S'arikā' or Hār'parvat in Srinagar; comp. note iii. 460. As the greatest part of old Srinagar lay on the right bank of the river and around that hill, Harsa's visits to the houses of the various ministers, etc., may have taken him beyond the S'arikā hill.

1617-18. I am unable to explain what select group of noble families is alluded to here. The designation of certain exclusive family groups by a term indicating the original number of houses counted within the group, is still customary among the Dāgrā Rājputs. Thus a section of the Mīsūs is known as the Jārān Ghar, 'eleven houses.'

1619. The Johlamatha is nowhere else mentioned.

1624. The river banks for some miles below the city now also show numerous breaches through which the water in flood-time passes into the low-lying marshy tracks on both sides.

HARSA
A. D. 1089-1101).

1625. The king then sat down on the bank of the Vitastā, and Prayāgaka called some boatmen to proceed to the castle of Jayapura.

1626. He had previously arranged with the soldiers stationed there to conduct the king to the residence of Bhīmādeva

1627. Bhīmādeva, though an adherent of Uccala, had told him that he would attach himself to the king if he were to come to his seat.

1628. When the boatmen brought a boat, the king did not get into it, doomed as he was and confused by the dangers which had come close under his eyes.

1629. When the end [comes] for embodied beings, the lamp of their intellect draws quickly to the point of extinction, as if it noticed the snake in the hand of approaching death.

1630-1631. The king, even at the time when he was seeking for shelter, did not remember Bimba, the Dāmara of Nilāśva, who had not joined his enemies. While treason was ripe, this honourable man had alone kept faithful, like a true wife never turning his eyes towards anyone else [but his lord].

1632. Then the clouds began to let flow their waters, as if to cleanse the earth defiled by the touch of treachery.

1633. A lonely place, pouring rain, darkness, bad company, fear of enemies,—what evil did not befall him?

1634. O shame! The name of the evil-doers, though unworthy of remembrance, has yet now openly to be mentioned in the sequence of the narrative.

Harṣa's last refuge.

1635. At a burning-ground there is [a sanctuary of] certain divinities known by the name of Someśvara, which had been worshipped [there] by a magician called Somānanda.

1636. These were in the courtyard of a hut which was [the abode] of a low-class mendicant called Guṇa, and was [surrounded] by a garden shaded by high trees.

1625. Jayapura kotta, founded by Jayapīḍa, occupied the place of the present Andarhōṭh; see note iv. 506-511.

1626. I am not able to explain satisfactorily preyāśrayaṇ, apparently an attribute to mandīram. Neither a person nor a locality of the name preya is known. As a conjectural emendation might be suggested preyāśrayaṇ for preyāśrayaṇ.

See regarding Bhīmādeva, viii. 21, 28, 45, etc.

1631. Nilāśva must be the name of a territorial division in Kāśmīr proper, which, however, cannot be identified now. The Lokaprakāśa shows the name as Nilāśa in the list of Kāśmīr Parganas given at the commencoment of the iv. Prakāśa. The passages viii. 424, 2778, 3114 sq., 3131, mention Dāmara of Nilāśva, without giving any clue as to the position of the tract. Śrīvara, iv. 110, speaks of an assembly of people from Nilāśva at Dugdhāśrama, i.e. Dudarkhām, at the lower mouth of the Sind Valley. Verse 267 of the Fourth Chronicle seems to place Nilāśva in a westerly direction, as a force is collected there to oppose an enemy encamped about Pratāpapura, i.e. Tūpar (comp. note iv. 10). Abu-l-Fazl's list of Parganas contains no name bearing the slightest resemblance to Nilāśva.

1636. L gives the name of this mendicant as Chinna.

1637. This man lived as a procurer in the company of a prostitute whose [real] name was Bhīṣā, but who was generally known as Vīraha-bhujangī.

HARṢA
(A.D. 1089-1101).

1638. To the hut of this [mendicant] who lived in the neighbourhood of the shrine of Pratāpagaurīṣa, Mukta took the king to pass the night.

1639. The king held on to Mukta and Prayāgaka to him. Thus they proceeded, seeing the ground [only] from time to time by the flashes of lightning.

1640. To this hut Prayāgaka and Mukta brought with difficulty the stumbling king, who had no headdress, and to whose body the soaked clothes were clinging.

1641. Then he remembered with grief Kaṇḍarpa whom wicked councillors had ousted, and who would have been able to ward off his ruin, just as Utpala [had remembered] the demon Indra.

1642. After Mukta had got over the wall and had withdrawn the bolt [of the gate], the king entered the courtyard of the hut, from which the mendicant was absent.

1643. As he entered his right foot struck against a stone and bled; by this evil omen he knew that his death was nigh.

1644. As the hut was locked, he sat down in the courtyard and in fear passed the night, which the terrible masses of clouds made fearful.

1645. Smothered over with mud he stood on the muddy bare ground and passed that night of terrible rain, his body being covered with the woollen cloak of a slave.

1646. By sitting down and getting up again at intervals he forgot his misfortune, but [though] awake he felt frightened like one [who dreams that he is] falling down a precipice.

1647. "What am I? Who has overcome me? Where am I to-day? Who attends me? What have I now to do?" Such thoughts made him shudder again and again.

1648-1649. "My kingdom is lost; my wives are burned; my son has disappeared; I am alone, without friends and provisions, rolling about in the courtyard of a beggar." When he thought of each one of these misfortunes he

1637. Vīrahabhujangī is a nickname—'a snake, when without a lover.'

1638. The position of this temple cannot be traced, and hence the locality where Harṣa found his death, is also uncertain. From the preceding account of Harṣa's flight, it must be concluded that it was some distance below Srinagar near the right bank of the river.

1641. I have not been able to trace the legend to which allusion is made in the simile.

1646. Road with L. ʾrāntarū duḥkham; comp. i. 369.

IIARSA
(A.D. 1089-1107).

Murder of Bhoja.

could not even in stories find any one else who had sunk [so] low and was afflicted with grief equal to his own.

1650. Bhoja, again, after leaving the City was roaming about with the two or three horsemen left, and reached Hastikarṇa.

1651. He thought as he went: "Surely, in five or six days I must win back the throne, even if Indra were my enemy."

1652. A man of valour, restless, like the ombryo [moving] in the womb, what great deeds does he not wish to accomplish? But fate obstinately deludes him, as [if it were] the breath of [former] actions touching [the child as it leaves the womb].

1653. Expecting his servant Nāgeśvara with what his mother had sent for his journey, he stopped inside the Raṅgarāṣṭra [grove].

1654. He was staying there inside an empty temple-building when he heard that that [servant] had arrived. As he went out the latter struck at him without more ado.

1655. Who could not admire what that prince, true to a Kṣatriya's duties, did, when this treachery had revealed itself?

1656. Like a lion he destroyed his assailants in combat, and [when he fell] covered with blood instead of unguents, he adorned the couch of a hero.

1657. There fell also his maternal cousin Padmaka and his favourite Khela, who showed unmeasured strength in fighting.

1658. Uccula proceeded for the night to the Maṭha of Queen Suryamatī, and his brother too returned from Lavanotsa, worn out by fighting.

1659. When the two [brothers] heard that Bhoja was killed, and that only Narṣa remained, the thorn, as it were, was removed from their mind, and only one edge of it remained.

1660. Yet even thus when their exile was forgotten and the royal fortune so far won, the gained throne appeared to them as if not gained.

1650. Regarding the Hastikarṇa here mentioned, see note v. 23.

1652. The unborn child is supposed to remember the actions done in its former existences, and to form plans accordingly for the new life. As it leaves the womb these reminiscences and plans are forgotten, and the newly-born individual becomes subject to the consequences of its preceding existence (karma).

1653. I take Raṅgarāṣṭra for the name of a sacred enclosure (vāṭa) or grove at Hastikarṇa. The same name (Kā. Raṅgavār) is given to this day to an old grove of walnut-trees at Guz (Uttaraghoṣa, see note vi. 281), which contains some Liṅgas and images, and is visited as a Tirtha; it is mentioned in the S'āradīmāh. 35 sqq.

1657. I amend lālitaś caiva, with reference to lālitaścaiva, in place of lālitaś caiva; ॐ and ॐ can scarcely be distinguished in S'āradī characters. For the term lālitaś, see v. 229; vi. 152, 166, etc.

1658. Comp. regarding the Maṭha of Sūryamatī, note vii. 180.

1661. In the morning the mendicant whom Mukta had searched out somewhere and brought up, unlocked the [door of his] hut after prostrating himself before the king.

TIARSA
(A.D. 1089-1101).

1662. Into this hut, which was full of mosquitos, and where the seat was a place strewn with grass, the king stepped, after Mukta had sprinkled water in it.

1663. The king, to hear whose word was a great honour even for kings, went in his fright so far as even to flatter a beggar.

1664. He suffered on noticing in his speech and way of eating the boorish, shocking coarseness which befitted a beggar.

1665. Prayāga gave to the beggar his own under-garment to sell, and sent him away to a shop to obtain food.

1666. The wretched mendicant, who openly used coarse language and sharp words, and who inwardly caused fear of betrayal, troubled the king as much as an enemy.

1667. Then, in the afternoon, the vile mendicant brought also his female companion, who carried on her head a basket with pots [full] of victuals.

1668. When the king saw himself recognized first by the servant (Mukta) and the beggar, and now also by the woman, he abandoned the hope of life.

1669. With his mind full of his terrible misfortune, he merely touched the food which Prayāga brought, from regard for the latter, but did not eat it.

1670. Then Prayāga, standing in the courtyard, asked the female mendicant, what the news were, and she in her coarseness told him openly of Bhoja's death.

TIARSA hears of Bhoja's death.

1671. The king, though told by Prayāga that this was a false [report], yet recognized the truth of the rumour from an ominous sign he noticed in his body.

1672. Submerged in ill-luck as he then was, a misfortune fell upon him such as would not come upon the tongue even of an enemy wishing evil.

1673. In his grief over his son he felt that by the restraint he had from policy put upon him in his youth, he had himself brought misfortune over him from his very birth.

1674. From excessive tenderness he felt as if that [son] who had fallen in combat in a manner worthy of great heroes' envy, had been murdered as a babe on the urn.

1675. In his misery he fancied that he saw his son [as a child], with his limbs [adorned] by strings of pearls [and resting] on his own breast swelled by youth, and [in this delusion] he uttered benedictions.

1676. He felt humiliated by the thought: "The youth who ought to have

Harṣa
(A.D. 1089-1101).

been spared, is killed. I, however, who am old, prolong my life by such unsoonly means."

1677. Lamenting thus his son, and rolling about in unspeakable pain, he passed a second night in the mendicant's dwelling.

1678. Prayāga asked him to proceed to the Bhagavanmaṭha, but deprived of thought by his grief he showed at night not even a wish [to do this].

1679. The night which then came, seemed to express its grief by the heavy dew-drops which rained like tears from the down-turned face of the moon, and by the wailing cries of the ruddy geese.

1680. Prayāga on seeing his lord exhausted by hunger and thirst, in the morning asked the mendicant to obtain food.

1681. The mendicant left and after he had entered on his return put before them two pots which contained food cooked in a sauce.

1682. When the mendicant said that he brought them from the sacrificial feast of a householder, Prayāga sighed and spoke :

1683. "Look, O king, how happy the people are when they have lost their lord." He replied with a smile : "Why do you talk as if you were simple-minded ?"

1684. "He who is gone is just gone ; by his affliction no one else is afflicted ; everybody looks only after his own welfare ; nobody grieves for any [misfortune but his own]."

1685. "When the sun, the sole eye of the world, has gone to the transcendental world, the whole world sleeps comfortably in its dwellings. Who else then would think : 'How could all this exist when deprived of me ?'"

1686. "So solely was before my loving reliance on my son that no other such love could arise [in me] for a living being, now that I have heard of his end."

1687. "If I myself after hearing that my son, the life of my life, is dead, yet remain here as if all were right, how can any one else be blamed [for showing indifference] ?"

1688. When after this the king ceased speaking, Prayāga gave back those two pots and again secretly urged the mendicant to obtain [proper] food.

1689. The latter said : "The amount left me after yesterday's expenses is not sufficient. Yet I will try," and then left as if he felt sorrow.

Betrayal of Harṣa.

1690. Is not secret information which has to be guarded, [as hard to keep] for small-minded people, as the imperishable quick-silver is hard to digest for persons of small strength ?

1678. The Bhagavanmaṭha is only here referred to.

1681. The text has a lacuna of two syllables.

1691. Manoratha, the relative of a Brahman ascetic, heard the tale from that mendicant who was his friend.

1692. He spoke to the wretched mendicant: "We shall obtain wealth from King [Uccala] by delivering his kinsman," and thus led him to become a traitor.

1693. He must be believed to have been born from some despicable vile servant, since good and bad actions are indicated by a corresponding birth.

1694. From those two Illārāja learned the fact and reported it to Uccala, who ordered him to act himself in this matter.

1695. Others, however, say that it was the Kāyastha Bhūtabhīṣa who got the mendicant and the Brahman to approach Illārāja.

1696. If this account be a calumny [made] at a time which was filled to excess with rumours, [it was started because that] rogue of a servant (Bhūtabhīṣa) was distinguished for his treachery.

1697. It was [a punishment] fit for such an action that he died in prison after having been carried on the back of a S'vapāka and having suffered various humiliations.

1698. Harṣadatta under the pangs of hunger, and at the repeated instances of Prayāga made up his mind to take food, though his grief over his son was fresh.

1699. Thinking each time that the mendicant had arrived bringing food, he looked out through a window, as a young bird [looks out] from its nest.

1700. He saw the hut entirely surrounded by soldiers who had come up, and he heard the noise of the bolt being withdrawn from the gate of the courtyard.

1701. He then knew that he had been betrayed, and noticed that villain of a mendicant in the company of the soldiers, as he was calling from the courtyard to Mukta to come out.

1702. He made Mukta leave him, opened the folds of the door, and without fear grasped the small knife he had by his side.

1703. One ferocious soldier, spurred on by bold assurance, then stepped up to him with drawn sword and wearing armour.

1704. The king, who was skilled in athletic exercises, throw this man down 1696. The moaning of this verse is doubtful, and the text, perhaps, corrupt.

1697. Compare regarding Bhūtabhīṣa's end, viii. 93 sqq.

1702. The mention here made of Mukta's escape is of interest. It permits us to assume that K. had his account of Harṣa's flight and death directly or indirectly from this surviving witness, who was connected with his own family (vii. 1623). Perhaps this explains also the favourable colour put upon Mukta's departure at the catastrophe.

ILARSA
(A.D. 1080-1101).

to the ground, though hindered in his movements by the narrow space of the hut, but from mercy did not kill him.

1705. Filled with false pride even at that moment, he said: "To kill this wretch who is on the ground does not help me."

1706. One soldier who was getting down after removing the roof, and another who was getting up, fell to the ground from fear when they saw him with upraised weapon.

1707. For a moment he was seen standing in a defying posture and [straight] like a staff, on the back of the soldier who had first entered, just as Oāmūṇḍā [stood] over Ruru.

1708. The fight at the king's last hour was not rendered glorious by lion-like roars [of brave men], nor by the sound of kettle-drums, nor the furious noise of [clashing] arms.

1709. On the contrary, the armed Dāmaras got without noise into his hut, as ants [got round] a mouse which is inside a pot.

1710. Then another who had entered through the roof, attacked the king after striking Prayāgalea on the shoulder and head.

1711. This soldier, after parrying the king's weapon, struck him rapidly twice with a dagger in the breast.

Iarṣa killed, A.D. 1101.

1712. After uttering twice the word: "O Mahāśvara," he fell dead to the ground, struck down like a tree which has been cut at the root.

1713. Sovereign as he was, he found a death which was fit for a thief who in his flight had entered a house.

1714. No other king has been seen in this epoch as powerful as he was, nor of any other [king] so shameful a funeral.

1715. It was his aversion to battle alone which destroyed the grandeur of this high-minded [king] with all its attending happiness.

1716. Or, his fault may have been only his want of independent judgment, and all errors which brought about his complete ruin [may have been] those of his ministers.

1717. His age was forty-two years and eight months, when he was slain on the fifth day of the bright half of Bhādrapada in the year [of the Laukika era four thousand one hundred] seventy-seven (A.D. 1101).

1718. The force of the king's nativity which intended the extinction of his race, made him destroy his own family like [another] Duryodhana.

1707. The story of the fight in which Oāmūṇḍā, a form of Durgā, with her attendants, the Śaktis, defeated and killed the Daitya Ruru, is told e.g. in the Padma Pur., v. xxvi. 50-95.

1717. Compare for the date note viii. 35.

1719. He was born under the zodiacal sign of Cancer [and at his birth the planets stood in the following astrological houses]: Mars and Saturn in the fifth, Jupiter and Mercury in the sixth, Venus and the sun in the seventh, and the Moon in the tenth.

1720. [The result was as above] because the great author of the Saṃhitā has declared that Kuru descendants and others [who were born] when the Moon, Venus and the malignant planets stood in the tenth, seventh and fifth astrological houses [respectively], would be destroyers of their own families.

1721. Impious were all the people in this land who cut off their lord's head and carried it, just as [if it were] that of a robber, before his opponent.

1722. When the head of the king was cut off, the earth together with the oceans shook, and the sky, though cloudless, sent down heavy rain.

1723. For the iniquities which the people perpetrated against his head, when it was raised on a staff, they were to suffer thereafter lasting calamities as from a curse.

1724. Then commenced in this land the new [fashion of] cutting-off the king's head, just as the destruction of the divine images [had begun in Harṣa's reign].

1725. King Uccala, from a proper feeling did not look at the head when it was brought [to him], but after remaining for a long time in tears, and it burned.

1726. O the misery! The body of so great a sovereign would not have received a funeral without Uccala's orders, as [if it had been] that of a robber.

1727. Deserted by his servants and without a family, he was then burned naked like a pauper by a certain wood-dealer called Gauraka.

1728. This story of Harṣa is, indeed, long and somewhat astonishing like a kind of Rāmāyaṇa or Bhārata.

1719-20. The astrological houses in Harṣa's horoscope are to be counted from Cancer, and thus correspond to the Zodiacal signs, Scorpio, Sagittarius, Capricorn and Aries. The positions of the planets are correctly indicated in the diagram of the horoscope drawn by A, and reproduced in the Ed. Regarding the terms by which the astrological houses are referred to in the text, comp. e.g. Varāhamihira's Lagṇajātaka, i. 15 sqq.

The quotation from the 'Saṃhitā' refers probably to Varāhamihira's Bṛhatsaṃhitā (comp. above, i. 55), but I have not been able to trace it.

The 'malignant planets' (māpāḥ) are the Sun, Moon, Saturn, and Mars; comp. e.g. Lagṇajātaka, ii. 4.

Professor JACOB has at my request been kind enough to calculate the actual position of the planets for the date of Harṣa's birth as indicated above in vii. 1717, and to communicate the result in the following note: -

"The horoscope of Harṣa, as given in the text and correctly explained by the drawing in the gloss, does not suit the king's (presumable) birth date Lokakāla 4191 (Kali 1150, A.D. 1058) 9 months. For at that time Saturn was in Taurus, not in Scorpio, and Venus in Scorpio, not in Capricorn. The places of the three remaining planets (Mercury, Mars, and Jupiter) square with our text. The error in Saturn's position is such as to exclude the possibility of any conjectural correction."

Regarding the question thus raised as to the character of the information here recorded by K. compare the Introduction.

1724. Comp. vii. 1001 sqq.

1729. Fortunes are the passing flashes of lightning from the cloud of fate, and exceptional greatness finds a disgusting end. Notwithstanding this, the pride of imaginary greatness does not cease in those whose souls are struck by delusion.

1730. Though he had such a multitude of women in his seraglio, not one of them bewailed him. Among so many followers not one followed him into death or settled at a sacred place [as an ascetic]. After seeing such want of affection on the part of the people whose mind is absorbed by their own comfort, the heart [of men], O shame, still does not renounce the world and seek its [sole] pleasure in [a residence in] the forest.

1731. An individual who assuredly is nothing in the beginning and nothing in the end, suddenly goes for a moment, in the interval, through the condition of happiness and again of misfortune, resembling an actor without head or feet. Where he goes, when hidden behind the curtain of mundane existence (Saṃsāra), we do not know.

1732. The royal fortune abandoned its seat in the family of Udayarāja, and proceeded to that of Kāntirāja, [while keeping] within the race of Sālarāhuna, as the daylight, after leaving the Himālaya summit when it is deserted by the gods, [proceeds] to the celestial slopes of the Mount Mera.

Thus ends the Seventh Taranā in the Rajataranāṅgi, composed by Kaṭhapa, the son of the great Kāśmīrian minister, the illustrious Lord Caṇṇaka.

1731. Read with L yaś ca for A yac ca.

1732. Compare vii. 1283 sqq., and the genealogical table in Appendix.

Colophon. A L have after this the following verse:

"There have been here narrated [the reigns of] six kings from the family of Udayarāja [who ruled] for ninety-eight years less three days."

The total length of the reigns for those six kings is correctly given, the dates for the deaths of Diddā and Harṣa being Lokakāla 4079 Bhādrapada śuklā 8 and 4177 Bhādrapada śuklā 5, respectively.

LONDON :
PRINTED BY GILBERT AND RIVINGTON, LTD.
ST. JOHN'S HOUSE, (LINCOLN'S INN), E.C.4.